Indeed, the Indictment goes still further. It stretches beyond these 22 defendants and affects the fate of millions. This through the prosecution of the organizations, which, taken in conjunction with law No. 10, has as its result that one can be punished for the guilt of other persons. Finally, a thing that is more important at the moment is a further form of the summary treatment of the defendants. The Prosecution is bringing in the conception of a "conspiracy" to reach the result again that persons can be made individually responsible for something wrong that others did. I must go into this point in greater detail, as it concerns my client too. It is actually clear, I think from the previous speaker's statements that a conspiracy to commit crimes against the peace, the laws of war and humanity did not in fact exist, so I shall only show one thing, if such a conspiracy did actually exist, Jodl at least did not belong to it.

The prosecutor admitted that Jodl's participation in the conspiracy before 1933 could not be proved. And, in fact, anyone whose attitude toward the whole National-Socialist movement was so mistrustful and who spoke with such sceptical reserve about its seizure of power (witness General v. Vermann) did not conspire to help Hitler into the saddle.

But the prosecution seems to think that Jodl joined the alleged conspiracy in the period before 1939. In fact, during this time too nothing essential changed for him.

Actually his attitude toward Hitler was now a lawfully loyal one, for it was Jodl's respected Field Marshal von Hindenburg, who had called Hitler to the government, and the German people confirmed this decision with over 90 percent of its votes. Added to this was the fact that in Jodl's eyes, and not only Jodl's, Hitler's authority was bound to rise powerfully in view of his marvelous successes at home and abroad, which now followed one another in quick succession. But personally Jodl remained without any connection with Hitler. He did not participate in any of the big meetings at which Hitler developed his program. His book "Mein Kampf," the Bible of National Socialism, he only read parts of. Jodl just remained an unpolitical man in accordance with his personal inclinations, which lay far from party politics, and in accordance with the traditions of the old family of officers from which he sprang. Inwardly of liberal leanings, he had little sympathy for National Socialism, outwardly he was forbidden, as an officer, to belong to the party and he was forbidden all rights to vote and all political activity.

If, as the Prosecution says, the party held the conspiracy together and was the "Instrument of Cohesion" between the defendants, then one asks in vain what cohesion existed between Jodl and—let us say—Sauckel, or between Jodl and Streicher. Of all the defendants, except the officers, the only one he knew before the war was Frick from one or two official conferences in the Ministry of the Interior.

He kept out of the NSDAP and his attitude toward its organizations was even in some sense inimical. His greatest worry during those years—as later right to the end—was the danger of party influences in the armed forces. Jodl did what was in his power to prevent the SS being “puffed up” into a subsidiary Wehrmacht to prevent the handing over of the customs frontier guards to Himmler, and he notes triumphantly in his diary that, after the withdrawal of Col. Gen. Baron von Fritsch, Hitler did not, as was feared, make Gen. von Reichenau, who had party ties, commander-in-chief of the army, but the unpolitical Gen. von Brauchitsch, etc. If Jodl had conspired for National-Socialism in any way, he would have behaved in the opposite manner on each of these points.

DEFENSE

Jodl was also not present at any of the so-called “meetings of conspirators.” Neither on the 5 November 1937 (Hitler’s testament remained unknown to him) nor at the Obersalzberg in February 1938, nor at the meeting on the 23 May 1939, or the 22 August 1939. No wonder! Jodl was, after all, at that time still much too small a man to be brought in on occasions which were of such decisive importance to the state. People don’t conspire with lieutenant colonels or colonels on the general staff; they are simply told what they are to do, and that settles the matter as far as they are concerned.

However the most incontrovertible proof that Jodl can have belonged to no conspiracy to wage aggressive war is his 10 months’ absence just before the war began. Jodl had left the OKW in October 1938 and was sent to Vienna as an artillery commander. At that time there was, in his view, so little probability of a war that before leaving Berlin he drafted, on his own initiative, a covering deployment in all directions. In this he moved the mass of the German forces to the center of the Reich, because he could not see any, in any way, definite opponent against whom a deployment plan would have had to be prepared. Exactly a year before the beginning of the attack, this alleged conspirator for aggressive wars drew up a purely defensive general staff job. And although he knew definitely that in case of war he would have to return to Berlin, this possibility seemed to him to be so distant that he transferred to Vienna with all his furniture. And still further, as he wished to get away from office work again at last, he had the mountain division at Reichenhall promised him for the 1 October 1939. And lastly, as late as July he got himself shipping tickets for a sea trip planned to last several weeks, which was to have begun in September. So sure was he of a peaceful further development.

During these 10 months up to the time he was called to Berlin shortly before the outbreak of war, Jodl had no official or private connections with the OKW. The only letter he got from them at that time was the one which promised him his transfer to Reichenhall on 1 October. Note that at the most critical time, at the very time when the alleged conspirators were discussing and working out the Poland plan, Jodl was out of all contact for 10 months with the authoritative persons and knew no more of what was happening than one of his second lieutenants. When the Fuehrer came to Vienna during this summer, it did not even seem worth while to Keitel to introduce Jodl to him, although Jodl was called upon in the event of war to carry out the alleged common aggressive plan as strategic advisor to the Supreme commander. One can imagine how astonished Jodl was to read in the Indictment that he had been a member of a conspiracy to launch the war.

But perhaps it is asserted that Jodl only joined the conspiracy after 1939.

As a previous speaker has already explained, an officer who cooperates in the place indicated for him in carrying out a war plan can never be considered a conspirator. He does in fact have a plan in common with his superior, but he has not adopted it willingly, nor has he concluded an agreement, but, within the normal order of service, he simply does what the post he occupies demands.

Jodl can be considered a typical example of this. He did not go to Berlin on his free decision. It had already been laid down long before that he had to enter the Fuehrer's staff in case of war. The arrangements for the current mobilization year laid this down. This mobilization year ended on the 30 September 1939; for the following year Gen. von Sodenstern was already designated as Chief of the Wehrmacht Operational Staff. So if the war had broken out 6 weeks later, Jodl would have entered the war as commander of his mountain division. He would then in all probability not be on this defendant's bench today. One sees that his whole activity in the war was fixed by a ruling which was independent of his will and had been laid down in advance long before. This fact is, in my opinion, in itself already striking proof that he did not participate in a conspiracy to wage wars of aggression.

When Jodl reached Berlin on 23 August 1939, the beginning of the war had already been laid down for 25 August. For reasons unknown to him it was then postponed another 6 days. The plan for the Polish campaign lay ready. He did not need to conspire to produce it. If a conspiracy against Poland existed at that time, the co-conspirators were quite somewhere else, as we now know as a result of the secret German-Russian treaty.

DEFENSE

Jodl was not introduced to the Fuehrer until 3 September 1939, i.e., only after the war had begun, at a time when what had to be decided had already been decided.

From then on his official position brought him close to Adolf Hitler. One must actually add, close to him physically only. He was never really close to him. Now, too, he did not learn Hitler's plans and intentions, and was only let into them as the occasion arose to the extent that his work absolutely demanded. Jodl never became Hitler's confidant and never had cordial relations with him. It remained a purely official relationship and often enough one of conflict.

In other ways too, Jodl had remained a stranger to the party. There is no idea of his having sought contact in Vienna, for instance, with the party leaders there, although this would have been natural enough.

Most of the party leaders and most of the defendants he came to know only when they visited the Fuehrer's headquarters from time to time. With the exception of the officers, he continued to have no relations with them. The party clique in the headquarters he hated and considered it an unpleasant foreign body in the military framework. He never ceased to fight against party influences in the armed forces.

He still did not participate in party functions. He did not participate in Reich party rallies, apart from the fact that he once watched the Wehrmachts' exhibition there, having been ordered to officially. He avoided every one of the Munich anniversaries on 9 November.

The prosecutor repeatedly brought in his Gauleiter speech to prove that, in spite of all this, Jodl identified himself with the party and its efforts, that he was after all not a soldier but a politician, and that he was an enthusiastic supporter of Hitler's.

Here one must first note, the document L-172 which is presented to us as this Gauleiter speech is not the manuscript but a collection of materials put together by his staff, on the basis of which Jodl then drafted his manuscript. Over and above this, the speech was made extemporaneously; not a single word of this document proves that Jodl really spoke it.

Also the occasion of the speech must be taken into account. After four hard years of war, after the breaking off of Italy which had just taken place and before the fresh, terrific burden which Hitler planned to impose on the population as the extreme effort—at this critical moment everything depended on the peoples' will to continue remaining intact. For this reason, the party tried to get expert information upon the war situation so as to be able to buoy up the sinking courage again. For this task the Fuehrer earmarked General Jodl, no doubt the only competent person. Some people would have welcomed this opportunity to make themselves popular with the Party leaders, but Jodl accepted the task against his will. The title of the lecture is "The military situation at the beginning of the fifth year of the war." Its contents are a purely objective description of the war situation on the various fronts and of how this situation was created. The beginning and the end give—at least according to the document before us—a paean of praise to the Fuehrer from which the Prosecution draws doubtful conclusions. When a lecturer has first and foremost to win the confidence of his listeners, these consisting of Party leaders, and when his task is to spread confidence in the supreme military leadership, then such rhetorical phrases are something quite understandable.

Besides, Jodl does not deny that he sincerely admired some of the Fuehrer's qualities and talents. But he was never his confidant or his fellow conspirator and he remained in the OKW too the nonpolitical man he always was.

Jodl was therefore not a member of a conspiracy. No concept of a conspiracy can help to make him responsible for actions which he did not himself commit as a guilty man.

And now I will deal with these individual actions with which Jodl is reproached.

According to Article 6 of the Charter, the Tribunal is competent to deal with certain crimes, against the peace, against the Laws of War, and against humanity, which crimes are specified in the Charter, and for which the personal criminal responsibility of the guilty individual was laid down. If we disregard for the time being the crimes against humanity, which come under a special heading, there are two preliminary conditions under which the individual punishment of the defendant can take place.

1. There must be a violation of international law of which they were co-guilty in some respect. The meaning of this whole trial and the meaning of the Charter after all lies in the fact that the force of the rules of international law is to be strengthened by penal sanctions. If, therefore, some special kind of violation of international law is committed, not only the responsibility of the particular country which violated the law will come in as heretofore, but in addition guilty individuals are also to be punished for it in future. Therefore, there can be no punishment without a breach of international law.

2. But provision is not made for such a responsibility of individuals in the case of all breaches of international law, but only for those which are explicitly named in the Charter. Article 6 a specifies the crimes against peace, paragraph b crimes against the laws and usages of war. Other actions, even if they are contrary to international law, do not belong here.

DEFENSE

Quite a few court sessions could have been saved if the Prosecution had taken these two points into account right from the beginning. Because as is to be shown yet—there is a tendency to accuse the defendants beyond these limits of actions contrary to international law which are not specified in the Charter; but this is not all, they are to be called to account also for deeds which are not at all contrary to law, but which can at most be considered as inethical.

In the following points I stick to the clear arrangement of the Anglo-American trial brief and add to it what was brought up against Jodl by the two other prosecutors.

Point 1, the collaboration in the seizure and consolidation of power by the National-Socialists has—as already pointed out—been dropped.

Points 2 and 3 concern rearmament and the reoccupation of the Rhineland. Jodl had nothing to do with the introduction of general compulsory military service nor with rearmament.

Jodl's diary contains not a single word about rearmament. He was a member of the Reich Defense Committee, which was not, however, concerned with rearmament questions. He was here concerned with the measures which were to be taken by the civil authorities in case of mobilization. There was nothing illegal in that. We were not forbidden to mobilize, for instance, in case of an enemy attack. The preparations in the demilitarized zone which were proposed to the committee by Jodl limited themselves also to the civil authorities and consisted only of preparation for the evacuation of the territory west of the Rhine in order to defend the line of the river Rhine in case of a French occupation. The preparations were purely of a defensive nature.

If, in spite of that, Jodl recommended that these defensive measures be kept very strictly secret this is not evidence of any criminal plans, but only the natural thing to do. As a matter of fact, particular caution was imperative, for the French occupation of the Ruhr was still fresh in peoples' memory.

Neither had Jodl anything to do with the occupation of the Rhineland. He learned about it only five days before the execution of this decision of the Fuehrer's. Further statements are superfluous for according to the Charter neither rearmament nor the occupation of the Rhineland—whether they were contrary to international law or not—belong to the criminal actions under Article 6.

These cases would come under the Charter only if a preparation for aggressive war was seen in them. But who would have thought of an aggressive war at that period? In 1938, owing to lack of trained troops, we could not have put into the field one sixth of the number of divisions our expected enemies, France, Czechoslovakia, and Poland could have produced. The first stage of rearmament was supposed to be reached in 1942, the Western Wall was to be completed by 1952, heavy artillery was lacking entirely, the tanks were at the testing stage, the ammunition situation was catastrophic. In 1937 we did not possess a single capital ship, as late as 1939 we did not have more than 26 seagoing U-boats, which was less than one tenth of the British and French figure. As far as war plans are concerned there existed only a plan for the protection of the Eastern frontier. The description of our situation in the Reich Defense Committee is very typical, it was said, in a matter of fact way, that a future war would be fought on our own territory, hence that it could only be a defensive war. This—please note—was a statement made during a secret session of this committee. The possibility of offensive action was not mentioned at all. But we were then not capable of serious defensive action either. For this very reason the generals thought of themselves as gamblers already at the time of the occupation of the Rhineland. But that any one of them could have been sufficiently utopian to think of an offensive, there is not even the semblance of any evidence for thinking.

As Points 4–6 the Trial brief designates "Participation in the planning and execution of the attack on Austria and Czechoslovakia."

a. A deployment plan against Austria did not exist at all. The prosecution quoted the Document C-175 as such. But this is a misunderstanding. It is a program for the elaboration of the most various war plans, for instance for the war against England, against Lithuania, against Spain, etc. Among these theoretical possibilities of war, the "Fall Otto" is also mentioned, i.e., an intervention in Austria in case of an attempt to restore the Hapsburgs. It says in the document that this plan is not to be elaborated but merely to be "thought out." But, as there was no indication whatsoever of such an attempt by the Hapsburgs, nothing at all was prepared for this.

Jodl did not attend the meeting on 12 February 1938 at Obersalzberg. Two days later came the order to propose certain deceptive actions, obviously in order to put pressure on Schuschnig.

DEFENSE

nigg so that he should comply with the Obersalzberg agreements. There is nothing illegal in this, even if the prosecutor speaks about "criminal methods."

Jodl was completely surprised 2 days before its execution by the Fuehrer's decision to march in. The Fuehrer gave this order to march in by telephone. Jodl's written order served only to file it. If this had been the authoritative order, it would after all have come much too late. It was issued at 0900 hours on 11 March and the march in took place on the following morning. Its course was described to us. The troops had purely peacetime equipment. The Austrians crossed the border to meet and welcome them. Austrian troops joined the columns and marched with the German troops to Vienna. It was a triumphal procession with cheers and flowers.

b. The case of Czechoslovakia follows:

As late as the spring of 1938 Hitler stated that he did not intend "to attack Czechoslovakia in the near future" (388-PS of 30 May 1938). After the partial Czech mobilization, which was unprovoked, he changed his view and decided to solve the Czech problem after 1 October 1938, and not on 1 October 1938, as long as there was no interference to be expected from the Western Powers. Jodl was therefore to make the preparations concerning the General Staff. He did it in the conviction that his work would remain theoretical because—as the Fuehrer wanted under all circumstances to avoid a conflict with the Western Powers—a peaceful settlement was to be expected. Jodl tried to achieve only one thing—that the plan should not be interfered with by Czech provocation. And really things happened as he expected they would. After the examination by Lord Runciman had shown the untenableness of the racial conditions in Czechoslovakia and the justification of the German national point of view, the Munich arrangement with the Western Powers took place.

Jodl is reproached with having proposed in a memorandum that an incident might be "organized" as a motive for marching in. He has given us the reasons for it. But the incident did not take place. This memorandum is not a breach of international law, even if only because it is a question of internal considerations which never achieved importance outside. And even if this idea had been put into execution, such guiles have always been used, ever since the Greeks built their Trojan Horse. Ulysses the initiator of this idea is praised for this by the ancient poets as "a man of great cunning" and not branded as a "criminal." I do not see anything unethical in Jodl's behavior either, for, after all, in the relations between states somewhat different ethical principles are applied from those in boarding schools for young Christian girls.

c. The occupation of the Sudetenland itself was carried out just as peacefully as that of Austria. Greeted enthusiastically by the liberated population, the troops entered the German areas, which had been evacuated to the agreed line by the Czech troops. Both these marchings in are not crimes according to the Charter. They were not attacks (this presupposes the use of force) still less wars (they presuppose armed fighting), let alone aggressive wars. To consider such peaceful invasions as "aggressive wars" would be to exceed even the notorious conclusion based on analogies of National-Socialist criminal legislation. The four signatory powers could have included these invasions, which were still a recent memory, in Article 6, but this was not done because it was obviously intended to restrict the completely new kind of punishment of individual persons to wars, but not to penalize such unwarlike actions. Generally speaking, it must be said, any interpretation of the penal rules of the Charter which extends them is inadmissible. The old saying applies "privilegia stricte interpretanda sunt." Here we have an example of privilegium odiosum. Indeed there has probably never been a more striking example of a privilegium odiosum than the unilateral prosecution of members of the Axis Powers only.

Now one could also get the idea of making Jodl responsible for having drafted an invasion plan against Czechoslovakia at a time when a peaceful settlement was not yet ensured. But Jodl reckoned with a peaceful settlement and had good reason to expect it. He therefore lacked the intention of preparing an aggressive war.

To this statement of facts which exclude Jodl's guilt must be added a legal consideration. We have decided—and there should be no doubt about it—there is no punishment for crimes against the peace without a violation of international law. Now if the Charter makes preparations for aggressive war subject to punishment, it clearly means that a person who prepared an aggressive war which actually took place should be punished. On the contrary, war plans which remained nothing but plans do not belong here. They are not contrary to international law. International law is not concerned with what goes on in peoples' heads and in offices. Things which are immaterial from the international point of view are not contrary to international law. Aggressive plans which are not executed in the same way as mere aggressive intentions may be unethical, but they are not contrary to law and do not come under the Charter. It is here a question of plans which were not carried out because the peaceful occupation of the Sudetenland based on international agreement was not an aggressive war, and the occupation of the rest of the country, which furthermore was accomplished without resistance and without war, no longer had any connection with Jodl's plans.

DEFENSE

This occupation of the rest of the Czechoslovak territory in March 1939 need not be discussed in greater detail here, for Jodl was at the time in Vienna and did not take part in this action. Neither did he have anything to do with its planning. For it has no connection whatsoever with Jodl's former work in the General Staff. Since then the military situation had changed completely. The Sudetenland with its frontier fortifications was in German hands. The unopposed march which then took place, therefore followed totally different plans, if such plans existed at all. Jodl did not take part in this march in itself.

Point 7 of the Trial brief regards war tension against Poland. The essential things have already been said on this subject. At the moment when Jodl left Berlin, no deployment plan against Poland existed; when he returned on 23 August 1939 the intention existed to enter Poland on the 25th. The plan for this was naturally ready, Jodl did not have a share in it.

The prosecution stresses further that Jodl was present in Poland in the Fuehrer's train on 3 September and that this was a proof that he took part in the war. Is this too a reproach against a soldier?

Point 8 of the Trial brief concerns attacks on the seven countries from Norway to Greece. The Trial brief gathers these seven wars together into one point—quite rightly too. They form one unit, because all of them resulted with military necessity and with logical consequence from the Polish war and from England's interference. It is for this very reason that the fact that Jodl had nothing to do with the unleashing of the war against Poland is so important when judging him.

The historians will have to do a lot more research work before it is known how everything really came about. The only criterion for the judgment of Jodl's behavior is how he saw the situation at its various stages, whether, according to that what he knew, he considered Hitler's various decisions to wage war justified and to what extent he influenced developments. That is all that we are concerned with here.

In reference to the statements made by Dr. Siemers in this regard day before yesterday, in order to avoid any misunderstanding I should like to add the following:

1. There is not the slightest doubt that the merchant ships of a state at war may cross the neutral coastal waters. If its enemy, in order to prevent any traffic of that sort, mines the coastal waters, this fact is a clear breach of neutrality. Capital ships and battleships have the right of passing through, in so far as they adhere to the rules which have been stipulated and do not participate in any combat action in the coastal waters. And if this applies even to capital ships and battleships, it applies all the more so to ships who are transporting prisoners of war.

2. The fact that a war is a war of aggression does not in any way influence the validity and application of the normal war and neutrality right. A contrary opinion would lead to absurd results and would serve only to become a grave digger for the complete right of war. There would be no neutral states, and the relations between the belligerents would be dominated and determined by the principles of brute force and its applications. Each shot would be murder, each instance of capture would be punishable deprivation of freedom, and each bombardment would be a criminal material damage.

This war, in any event, was not carried on or conducted along such principles by either side, and even the Prosecution does not uphold the point of view. Nor does the Prosecution maintain this point of view, otherwise they would not have charged the defendant with certain deeds as being crimes against the laws of war and neutrality laws. The entire reproach under point three would be quite senseless and not understandable. And apart from that, Prof. Jahrreiss dealt with this question on pages 32 to 35 of his final argument.

a. Norway—Denmark. Jodl heard for the first time in November 1939—and this from Hitler himself—about the fears of the German navy that England intended to go to Norway. He then received information which left no doubt that these fears were basically right. He also had regular reports according to which the waters near the Norwegian coast were coming more and more into the English sphere of domination so that Norway was no longer neutral.

Jodl was firmly convinced—and still is to-day—that the German troops prevented the English landing at the last minute. No matter how Hitler's decision may be judged legally Jodl did not influence it. He considered the decision justified and was bound to consider it as such so, even if one wished to regard Hitler's decision as a breach of neutrality, Jodl did not give criminal help by his work on the General Staff.

b. Belgium—Holland—Luxemburg. Like every military expert, Jodl knew that if Germany was to fight the war in the West to its conclusion, there was no other course but a military offensive. In view of the inadequacy of the German equipment at the time and the strength of the Maginot-line, there was, however, from a military point of view, no other possibility for an offensive than through Belgium.

DEFENSE

So Hitler was, for purely military reasons, faced by the necessity of operating through Belgium. But Jodl also fully knew, as did every German who experienced August 1914, how difficult a political decision was faced thereby as long as Belgium was neutral, i.e., was prepared and in a position to keep out of the war.

The reports which Jodl received and against the accuracy of which no justified doubts could arise now showed that the Belgian Government was already cooperating in breach of her neutrality with the general staffs of Germany's enemies. This, however, can be dropped here in the defense of Jodl. It suffices to know—and this is incontrovertible—that part of Belgium's territory, i.e., the air over it, was being continuously used by Germany's Western enemies for their military purposes.

And this applies perhaps even more strongly to the Netherlands. Since the first days of the war, British planes had flown over Dutch and Belgian territory as and when they pleased. Only in some of the numerous cases did the Reich government protest, and these were 127 cases.

The Prosecution does not put the legal question correctly. Because air warfare gained its present important position, conditions were such that a state which wished to remain neutral could withhold its territory from continual military use by one of the belligerents as and when the latter wished, or else give clear notice of the termination of its neutrality. Since air warfare became possible, a state can hand over, or have to hand over, to one of the belligerents the air over its territory, and yet remain outwardly and diplomatically neutral. But, by the very nature of the idea, the defense of its neutrality can be claimed only by a state whose whole territory lies de facto outside the theater of war.

The Netherlands and Belgium were long before that 10th of May no longer de facto neutral. For the air over them was, in practice with or against their will, freely at the disposal of Germany's enemies. What contribution they thus made toward England's military strength, i.e., towards the strength of only one of the belligerents, is known to everybody. It is necessary only to think of Germany's Achilles' heel—the Ruhr.

Our adversaries clearly maintained the point of view that, when the barrier constituted by Holland and Belgium protected our industrial areas against air attack, their neutrality was to be disregarded; but when it protected France and England, its violation was a crime.

Jodl naturally realized the situation. His opinion on the legal question was, of course, a matter of complete indifference to Hitler. His activities remained here too the normal activities of a General Staff officer.

c. Greece. Hitler wanted to keep the Balkans out of the war, but Italy had attacked Greece against his will at the beginning of October 1940. When the Italians got into trouble a request was made for German help. Jodl advised against it, since then English intervention in the Balkans would have to be reckoned with and every hope of localizing the Italo-Greek conflict would thus be lost. Hitler then ordered everything to be prepared for the necessity which might perhaps nevertheless arise, if German help for Italy against Greece became inevitable. (Orders of 12 November and 13 December 1940.)

If the attempt to localize the Greek-Italian conflict did not succeed, it was clear that Greece would be involved in the great German-English struggle. The question was now whether her territory would lie within the war zone controlled by the British or the Germans. And as, in the case of Norway, Belgium, and Holland, part of the territory of these countries was already at England's disposal before the beginning of open hostilities and they were therefore, de facto at least, no longer neutral—perhaps could no longer be neutral—so it was also with Greece now. The Prosecution on Greece establishes that British troops were landed on the Greek mainland on 3 March 1941 after Crete had already some time before come within the area controlled by the British. Hitler did not give permission for aerial warfare at Crete until 24 March 1941 and began the land attacks only on 6 April.

Here too Jodl had no influence on Hitler's decisions. He could have no doubt that Hitler's decision was inevitable as the war between the world powers was now developing. There was no choice; ever increasing parts of Greek territory would have been drawn into the sphere of English power and would have become the jumping-off points for bombing squadrons against the Roumanian oilfields had Germany not stopped this process. Moreover, the experiences of the first world war were frightening; the coup de Grace was then made from Salonica.

d. Yugoslavia. Hitler wanted to keep Yugoslavia out of the war too. The German troops in the Balkans had the strictest orders to respect its neutrality rigorously. Hitler even declined the application by the Chief of the Army General Staff to ask the Yugoslav Government for permission to let sealed trains with German supplies through their territory.

DEFENSE

The Simovic putsch in Belgrade on the night after Yugoslavia joined the Tripartite pact was considered by Hitler as a malicious betrayal. He was of the opinion that the change of Government at Belgrade, which altered the course of its foreign policy 180°, was only possible if England or the Soviet Union or both had provided cover from the rear. He was now certain that the Balkans would be fully drawn into the war tangle. He was certain that the German troops in Bulgaria were directly threatened and also the German line of communication which ran close to the Yugoslav frontiers.

Under these conditions, Hitler took the decision for war on the morning following the Belgrade putsch. Jodl's suggestions, and later Ribbentrop's too, to make things unambiguous by means of an ultimatum, were not considered at all. He wanted to make sure that Yugoslavia and Greece should not come into the sphere of influence of England but into that of Germany. The next day's news concerning Moscow's telegram of friendship to the Belgrade putsch government and about the Yugoslav deployment then already in progress (confirmed by the statement of General von Greiffenberg, Doc. book III. A. J. 12 (Jo.65)), and lastly the Russö-Yugoslav Friendship pact were for Jodl irrefutable signs that Hitler had seen the connection of events correctly.

The decision to fight was taken by Hitler, and by Hitler alone.

Point 9 concerns the aggression against the Soviet Union. What each of the two Governments, that of Berlin and that of Moscow, wished to achieve by the agreement of the 23 August 1939 is to-day not certain. One thing is, however, certain and that is that these partners who were up till then enemies had not entered into a marriage of love. And the Soviet Union was for the German partner a completely mysterious quantity. And it remained so too. Anyone who does not consider this fact can in no way judge Hitler's decision to make a military attack on the Soviet Union, and above all the question of guilt.

If anywhere, it was in the Russian question that Hitler came to a decision without listening to the slightest advice from anyone to say nothing of taking it. He wavered for many months in his opinion about the intentions of the Soviet Union.

The relations of the armies of both sides on the demarkation line were from the very beginning full of incidents. The Soviets at once occupied the territories of the Baltic States and of Poland with disproportionately strong forces.

In May and June 1940, when there were only five to six German covering divisions in the East, the Russian deployment against Bessarabia with at least 30 divisions reported by Canaris and the deployment into the Baltic territory caused great anxiety. On 30 June, 1940 apprehensions were again allayed so that Jodl—as the Document 1776-PS has shown—even thought that Russia could be counted on as a helper in the fight against the British Empire. But in July there were renewed worries. The Russian influence was advancing energetically in the Balkans and the Baltic territories. Hitler began to fear Russian aggressive intentions as he told Jodl on 29 July.

The sending off of several divisions from the West, where they were no longer required, actually had nothing to do with this. It occurred at the request of the Commander-in-Chief in the East who could not fulfil his security task with his weak forces.

Hitler's worry concerned above all the Rumanian oilfields. He would have liked most to eliminate this threat already in 1940 by a surprise action. Jodl replied that, owing to the bad deployment possibilities in the German Eastern territories, this could not be considered before winter. Hitler demanded verification of this opinion. Jodl arranged for the necessary investigations in a conference with his staff in Reichenhall, which was obviously misunderstood by the Russian prosecution. On 2 August Hitler ordered improvements to be made in the deployment possibilities in the East, a measure which was no less indispensable for defense than for an offensive.

Toward the end of August—this is the order of 27 August—10 infantry divisions and 2 panzer divisions were brought into the Government-General in case a Blitz action should become necessary for the defense of the Rumanian oilfields. The German troops, now totalling 25 divisions, were certainly intended to appear stronger than they really were so that an action should be unnecessary. This is the sense of Jodl's order for counter-espionage (1229-PS). Had there been aggressive intentions then there would rather have been an attempt to make one's own forces appear smaller than they were.

At the same time Hitler appears to have given the General Staff of the army orders, without Jodl knowing anything about it, to prepare an operational plan against Russia for any eventuality. In any case, the General Staff of the army worked on operational plans of this kind from 1940 onward (General Marcks and then General Paulus).

Unfavorable information then accumulated after the Vienna award on 30 August 1940. If Jodl was to believe his utterances, Hitler was becoming convinced that the Soviet Union had firmly

DEFENSE

• resolved to annihilate Germany in a surprise attack while she was engaged against England. The leaders of the Red Army had (according to a report of 18 September) declared a German-Russian war to be inevitable (C-170). In addition, reports came in of feverish Russian preparations along the demarcation line. Hitler calculated on a Russian attack in the summer of 1941 or winter of 1941-42. He thus decided, should the discussions with Molotov not clear up the situation favorably, to take preventive steps. For then the only chance for Germany lay in offensive defense. For this case of emergency, preparatory measures were ordered by Hitler on 12 November 1940 (444-PS).

The failure of the discussions with Molotov decided the question. On 18 December 1940 Hitler ordered the military preparations. Should the coming months clear up the situation, all the better. But it was necessary to be prepared in order to deliver the blow in the spring of 1941 at the latest. This was presumably the latest possible moment, but also the earliest, since more than four months were required for the deployment.

Jodl, as an expert, emphatically pointed out to Hitler the enormous military risk, the undertaking of which could be decided upon only if all political possibilities of averting the Russian attack were really exhausted. Jodl came to the conclusion at that time that Hitler has exploited every possibility.

The situation grew worse. According to the reports which were received by the army General Staff at the beginning of February 1941, 155 Russian divisions, i.e., $\frac{2}{3}$ of the total Russian strength known to us, had deployed opposite Germany. But the first stage of the German deployment had just begun.

The Government's telegram of friendship to the participants in the Belgrade putsch on 27 March 1941 destroyed Hitler's last hope. He decided upon an attack, which actually had to be postponed for more than a month owing to the Balkan war.

The deployment was undertaken in such a manner that the fast German units, without which the attack could not be conducted at all, were brought to the front only in the last two weeks, i.e., after 10 June.

Real preventive war is one of the indispensable means of self-preservation and was indisputably permitted according to the Kellogg-Briand pact. The "Right of Self-Defense" was understood thus by all the signatory states.

If the situation was wrongly conceived, the German military leaders are not to be blamed for their error. They had reliable reports on Russian preparations which could only have sense if they were preparations for war.

The reports were later confirmed. For when the German attack met the Russian forces, the leadership of the German front got the impression of running into a gigantic deployment against Germany. General Winter developed this here in detail in addition to Jodl's statements, particularly with regard to the enormous number of new aerodromes near the line of demarcation, and he drew particular attention to the fact that the Russian staffs were provided with maps of German territories. Field Marshal von Rundstedt also confirmed this as witness before the commission. This will come before the court during the further course of the trial.

Jodl firmly believes that Hitler would never have waged war against Russia unless he had been absolutely firmly convinced that no other path lay open for him at all. Jodl knew that Hitler knew the danger of a two-front war fully and would risk the victory over England—which he thought was no longer in doubt—only in an inescapable emergency.

Jodl only did his job as an officer of the General Staff. He was convinced, and still is to-day, that we were waging a genuine preventive war.

Point 10 finally brings the war against the USA. That Jodl did not intend to increase the number of our enemies by a world power is obvious, and also shown by documents:

Now what is the position with regard to the responsibility for these campaigns? A declaration of war is a decision in the field of foreign politics, the most important one in the whole of this field.

It depends on the constitutional structure of the concrete state as to who is responsible for this decision—politically, criminally, and morally; it depends on the way the formation of a will in the field of foreign politics takes place in this state according to its constitution. Prof. Dr. Jahrreiss has spoken about this. In the Fuehrer state it is exclusively the Fuehrer who has to make this decision. Anyone who advises him about this cannot be responsible, for, if what the Fuehrer orders has legal force, he who influences this order can not be acting illegally.

The Charter is obviously of the opinion that those who in any way participated in the Fuehrer's decision or influence it are also co-responsible. If we take this legal conception as authoritative, the question of responsibility crystallizes into a problem of competence.

In every community the spheres of tasks of its organs must be delimited, there must be rulings on competence laying down what each official is called upon to do and not to do. Thus in all states the relations between the military and the civil administration is naturally regulated, as also within the military and within the administration the spheres of tasks and the relations between their thousands of offices are regulated. If things were otherwise, chaos would reign.

DEFENSE

Particularly in wartime the problem of competence in the relations between the political and military leadership is important. For the military is the most important instrument of policy and the assistant may easily try to become master—the military interfere in politics. It was a German tradition to avoid this. The Bismarckian empire already tried with great consistency to keep officers away from politics. They had no right to vote, were not allowed to go to political meetings, and in fact any statements on politics were looked upon askance. For it could in some way be looked upon as a taking of sides, whereas the taking of sides was severely banned. The military were to be politically blind, completely neutral, and knowing only one point of view, which was that of legitimacy, i.e., subordination to the legitimate ruler. Thus in the years 1866 and 1870, when there was danger of war, it was not Moltke but Bismarck who advised the King as to the political decision. This changed during the last years of the first World War. General Ludendorff became the strongest man in the Reich owing to the force of his personality and the weakness of his political opponents. People often talk of German militarism. For the time when the soldier seized political power this was justified. The Weimar State got rid of this completely. The non-political character of the armed forces was stressed with all sharpness and the military again limited to its particular field. This went so far that a civilian was made minister for war, who had to represent the armed forces politically in the Reichstag. For the longest time it was a Liberal-Democratic minister who was meticulously careful to avoid all political influence by the generals.

When founding the Wehrmacht, Adolf Hitler maintained this sharp distinction between politics and military, indeed he even stressed it in a certain sense. He, who wished to make the whole people politically minded, wanted a non-political Wehrmacht. The soldier was deprived of political rights, he was not allowed to vote or to belong to any party, even the NSDAP (as long as the old law on compulsory military service was in force). He also consistently kept his generals and highest military advisers away from any interference in political requirements. He also remained consistent towards his own party. When, after Fritsch had gone, a new Commander-in-Chief of the Army was to be appointed, it would have been easy enough to have chosen Reichenau, who had National-Socialist leanings, but he appointed von Brauchitsch. He did not want any political generals, not even National Socialist ones. His point of view was that he was the Fuehrer and he the politician; the generals had to see to their own affairs, they knew nothing about politics. He did not even tolerate advice when it concerned politics. The generals did in fact repeatedly venture to express doubts as to his political plans, but were obliged here to limit themselves strictly to purely military points of view.

This sharp division of political and military spheres of competence is, for that matter, not characteristically German. It applies also, if I see rightly, to Anglo-Saxon democracies, and indeed to a particularly strong degree.

At any rate it was so under Hitler; he made political decisions, and it was only on their military execution that the generals had any influence. It was their task to make the military preparations necessary for all political eventualities. But it was Hitler who pressed the button to set the machine in motion. The "whether" and "when" were decided upon by the Fuehrer. It was not for them to weigh the opportuneness, the political possibilities, or the legal permissibleness.

Psychologically this attitude of the Fuehrer became still more pronounced owing to the hardly comprehensible mistrust he felt towards his generals. A remarkable phenomenon, anyone who disregards it can never come to understand the atmosphere which reigned in the Fuehrer's Headquarters. It was a mistrust of the—as he thought—reactionary attitude of the officers' corps. He never forgot that the Reichswehr had fired at him in 1923. This was, moreover, the natural mistrust of a military dilettante, who nevertheless wanted to be a strategist, toward the military expert, and also probably the mistrust of the political expert toward political dilettantes in officers' uniform. This mistrust of the political outlook of his military entourage was moreover by no means entirely unfounded. For the generals had wanted to put a brake on his rearmament plans, to hold him back from the occupation of the Rhineland, and had expressed objections to his march into Austria, and to his occupation of the Sudetenland! And yet all these actions had succeeded smoothly and without bloodshed. The generals felt like gamblers when carrying the plans out, but Hitler was sure of his game. Is it to be wondered at that their political judgment did not carry too much weight with him, and is it to be wondered at that on the other side, the apparent infallibility of his political judgment met with more and more recognition?

Thus Hitler tolerated no interference in his political plans and the outcome of it, as has been drastically represented to us here, was that, had a general raised objections to Hitler's political decisions, he would not actually have been shot, but his sanity would have been doubted.

DEFENSE

To receive advice was not the concern of this man of power at all. Thus, at the beginning of military undertakings, the chances of the plan were hardly ever considered in general discussions. None of the important decisions since 1938 came as the result of advice, on the contrary, the decision often came as a total surprise to the military command. Thus it was, for instance, with the march into Austria, of which Jodl learned two days before, or in the case of the attack on Yugoslavia, which was suddenly decided upon by Hitler and carried out without any preparations within a few days. The alleged "discussions" at the Fuehrer's quarters, the course of which the witness Field Marshal Milch described so clearly, were nothing else but the "issuing of orders."

Within the Wehrmacht too, of course, the spheres of competence of the individual departments were sharply divided, and the method which Hitler used in order to make these divisions as insurmountable as possible is of interest. This was achieved by the method of secrecy. Enough has been said about this, particularly about the so-called "Blinkers order," which forbade anybody to get an insight into anybody else's work. It thus happened that each department was isolated and strictly limited to its sphere of tasks. Obviously what Hitler desired to achieve by this system was that he should be the only one to get information from all sides, and that he should retain the reins in his hands as the only fully informed person.

Indeed, even more, he strengthened this system still more by only too often playing individual personalities, groups, and departments off one against the other to prevent any conspiracy amongst them.

These methods were interesting, because they often inevitably came into conflict with one of the basic ideas of National-Socialism—the Fuehrer principle—but were carried through in spite of this, for instance, when the sphere of competence of two departments covered the same territory, such as perhaps the competence of a military commander and of Himmler in the same occupied territory. What was ordered by one did not concern the other, even though the carrying out of the order might encroach upon the arrangements for which the other was responsible. Thus the military commander was in no way the master in his territory. Things were the same in the civil administration too; there was the duplication of the Landrat (prefect) as a state functionary and the Kreisleiter (districtleader) as a party functionary of the Reich Governor and the Gauleiter. Everywhere there was a dualism of powers and therefore a dissipation of power. There was method in this; it prevented lower organs becoming too strong and secured the power of the supreme leadership. It may be said epigrammatically that the Fuehrer principle was realized only in the Fuehrer.

What then was the position of Jodl's sphere of competence within all this machinery?

He was the chief of the operational staff of the armed forces, which was a department of the OKW coming under Keitel. Jodl's main task was, as the name of the department implies, to assist the Supreme Commander in the operational leadership of the armed forces. He was the Fuehrer's adviser on all operational questions—in a certain sense the Chief of General Staff of the armed forces. The task of this Chief of General Staff in all countries in which this arrangement is known is not that of giving orders but of advising, assisting, and carrying out. Even if from this alone, it follows that Jodl's position has frequently been misunderstood during the course of this trial.

1. He was not Keitel's Chief of Staff, but the chief of the most important department of the OKW, though he had nothing to do with the other departments and sections of the OKW.

He was also not Keitel's deputy. Keitel was represented by the senior departmental chief. This was Admiral Canaris and, in his absence, Jodl. But, as Keitel was present almost without interruption, he only had to be represented very rarely.

2. It is also wrong when Jodl is designated by the Prosecution as the commander of one campaign or another. He had no power of command, let alone being in command of an army.

3. It was also wrong when it was repeatedly said that Warlimont was present at the meeting of 23 May 1939 as Jodl's "representative" or assistant. Warlimont was in the OKW, Jodl had left the OKW in October 1938 and had nothing more to do with Warlimont in May 1939. What results from all this with reference to Jodl's responsibility for the real or alleged wars of aggression?

In general, one can only be made responsible for what one does criminally whereas one should not do it, and for what one has criminally failed to do whereas one ought to have done it. What an officer or an official has to do or not do is a question of competence. So this is where the problem of competence assumes its importance for us. Let us look at it more closely.

DEFENSE

Jodl is reproached with having planned and prepared certain wars which were breaches of international law. This reproach is justified only if it was within his competence to examine, before he carried out his task, the legality of the war which might be waged and to make his cooperation dependent on this decision.

This must be very definitely contested. Whether to wage a war is a political question and is the politician's concern. The question of how to wage war is the only question concerning the armed forces. The armed forces can suggest that the war is, in view of the opponent's strength, too risky or that the war can not be waged at a particular season, but the final decision rests with the politicians.

I could in fact imagine that the Chief of the Operational Staff of the armed forces would become at least morally guilty of complicity in a war of aggression, if he had incited the decisive quarters to bring about a war, or if, drawing attention to military superiority, he had advised the political leadership to exploit the moment in order to carry out extensive plans of conquest. In such cases one could call him an accomplice, because he—over and above his military task—intervened in politics and provoked the decision for war. But if he plans and carries out the plan of war in eventu, i.e., in case the political leadership decide on war he does nothing else but his evident duty.

One should consider the extraordinary consequences which would arise from a contrary conception: the competent authority declares war, and the Chief of General Staff, who regards this war as contrary to international law, does not cooperate. Or the Chief of General Staff is luckily of the same opinion as the head of the state, but one of the army commanders has objections and refuses to march, another one has doubts and has to think it over first. Can a war be waged at all in this case, be it a war of defense or a war of aggression?

Such a conception of law would, in the future, lead to results which could not be vindicated at all. The Security Council of the Allied Nations has decided to set up a world police with the task of protecting world peace against aggression. And also the creation of a world general staff has been considered which would have to plan and carry out this punitive war. Now let us imagine that the Security Council decides on a punitive war and the Chief of General Staff replies that in his opinion, there is no aggression. Would not the whole security apparatus in this case depend on the subjective opinion of a single non-political person, i.e., would it not in fact become illusory?

I only add one more thing in passing. If this opinion should prevail, what efficient man would still decide to become a regular officer, if, on reaching a high position, he had to risk being put on trial for crimes against the peace in case of defeat?

It is, for that matter, wrong, even if only for practical reasons, to impose on a general the duty of examining the legality of a war. The general will only seldom be in a position to judge whether the state to be attacked by him has broken its neutrality or whether it threatens to attack or not. And furthermore, the conception of a war of aggression and of war contrary to law is, as Prof. Jahrreiss has explained, still completely uncleared and contested among the practitioners and theoreticians of international law. And how, a general who lives far apart from all these considerations is to recognize that it is his duty to carry out a legal examination?

But even if he had recognized the war as illegal, just let us imagine the really tragic position in which this general would find himself. On one side is his evident duty toward his own state, which he particularly took an oath to fulfil as a soldier, on the other side this duty not to support any war of aggression. A duty which forces him to commit high treason, and desertion, and to break his oath. One way or the other he will become a martyr.

The truth is this. As long as there is no superstate authority which impartially establishes whether, in a concrete case, such a duty does exist for the individual and as long as there is no superstate authority which will protect people who fulfil this duty against punishment for high treason and desertion, an officer cannot be held criminally responsible for a breach of the peace.

Under all circumstances a contradiction must here be pointed out, which the Prosecution has fallen into, on one hand it reproaches the generals with not having been solely soldiers, but also politicians; on the other hand it demands of them that they should remonstrate against the political leadership and sabotage its resolutions—in short, that they should not solely be soldiers, but politicians.

The Prosecution does actually acknowledge this up to a certain point. They say that it is not intended to punish the generals for having waged war, for this is their task, but they are reproached with having caused the war.

And the second argument, which often recurs, is that, without the generals as helpers, Hitler could not have waged these wars, and that makes them co-responsible.

This argument contradicts itself. For the help which the generals gave Hitler consisted in the planning and carrying out of the military operations, i.e., in waging the war, for which they can, in the opinion of the Prosecution too, not be criminally accused. Let us look at this more closely. Jodl is said to have caused wars. It has been sufficiently proved that he played absolutely no part in the launching of the Polish campaign. And it was this very campaign which, with strategic necessity, brought about all the further happenings.

DEFENSE

Actually one need not examine the origins of the individual wars at all to be able to say, according to what we know now, that in this assertion there lies an enormous over-estimation of Jodl's power in the Hitler state. The resolution to start the war was far removed from his influence. Advice from the generals was not heard on this very point. At most, purely military considerations for and against could be submitted. And the Norwegian campaign was the only one of all these campaigns which a military man advised Hitler to carry out for reasons of strategic necessity. But that was not Jodl. As regards the latter, the assertion that he caused wars would be founded on nothing. Let the protocol, the memorandum, or any other document be shown according to which Jodl at any time incited people to war, or even only recommended the resolution to start a war. His Gauleiter speech is produced against him. In it Jodl shows—looking back—how the events developed out of one another. For instance, how the Austrian Anschluss facilitated action against Czechoslovakia, and how the occupation of Czechoslovakia facilitated the action against Poland. But it is bad psychology to deduce from this that a general plan for all this existed from the first. If I buy a book, which draws my attention to another one, and I then buy the latter as well, does it follow that, at the time of the first purchase, I already had the intention of getting the second one as well? If Hitler had extensive plans right from the start, Jodl did not know of them, let alone consent to them. His purely defensive deployment plan of 1939 already proves that by itself alone.

Every time a campaign had been resolved upon, he did indeed do his bit to carry it out successfully. It is thus supporting activity which is the object of the second of the arguments mentioned earlier.

It is true that without his generals, Hitler could not have waged the wars. But only a layman can build up a responsibility on that. If the generals do not do their job, there is no war, but one must add; if the infantryman does not march, if this rifle does not fire, if he has nothing to clothe himself with, and nothing to eat, there is no war. Is therefore the soldier, the gunsmith, the shoemaker, and the farmer guilty of complicity in the war? The argument is based on a confusion between guilt and causation. All these persons, and many others too, effectively cooperated in the waging of the war. But can one therefore attribute any guilt to them? Is Henry Ford partly responsible for the thousands of accidents which his cars cause every year? If an affirmative answer is given to the question of causation, the question of guilt is still not answered. The Prosecution even refrains from putting this question.

The question of guilt will be discussed later. Here only the following is anticipated. A guilty participation in the planning and carrying out of a war of aggression presupposes 2 things—

1. That the culprit knew that this war was an illegal war of aggression.
2. That, by reason of this knowledge, it was his duty to refrain from cooperating in it.

The latter links up with what has already been mentioned. By virtue of his position, it was Jodl's duty to make plans. Whether they were used or remained unused, did not depend on him. It is characteristic that Jodl made a whole series of deployment plans which were never carried out. All general staff tasks are only drawn up for an eventuality—in case the political leadership should "press the button." Often they did it, often they did not. That was no longer a matter for the general staff officer.

The other presupposition for an accusation of guilt is that the culprit recognizes the war as a war of aggression. The question is, therefore, how these things appeared to him. How they were in reality interests the historians. The decisive question for the criminal lawyer is: What reports were submitted to Jodl about the conduct of the enemy? Could it be taken from these reports that the enemy was acting contrary to his neutrality, that he was preparing an attack on us, etc.?

The decisive point is not whether these reports were true but whether Jodl believed them to be true. I must stress this, because it has been said here at times "the court will decide whether this was a war of aggression." That, of course, is true, because if the court decides that it was not a war of aggression, any sentencing for a war of aggression will fall out from the start. But if the court agrees that the war was, in fact, launched illegally, this does not in itself affirm the guilt of any person.

Someone who takes someone else's watch in the belief that it is his own is no thief. The guilt is lacking, for had it really been his own watch, he would not have been liable to punishment. So if Jodl believed that facts existed which, had they been true, would have made the war a legally admissible one, a sentence for breach of the peace would not arise.

DEFENSE

Now the Prosecution has repeatedly asked the generals the ironical question how it confronted with the ethical code of an officer to assist in a war which they had recognized to be illegal.

Let us assume that Jodl was sure that the war was illegal and that he had, for reasons of conscience, refused to collaborate. What difference would there have been then between him and a soldier who throws away his rifle in battle and retreats? Both of them would be liable to the death penalty for disobeying orders in war.

I know that the United States is generous enough to respect a soldier who, for religious reasons, refuses to take up arms and not to treat them as we do. But that doubtless does not apply to a man who, owing to objections based on international law, does not cooperate in the war decided on by the political leadership. One would object that it is not his affair, not an affair of conscience, to examine the admissibility of the war, but that this is the duty of the responsible state authorities. According to continental law, one would not even begin to consider such an excuse for refusing obedience.

Furthermore I regard that ironical question to the generals merely as an attempt to lower them morally not as an accusation touching the subject of these legal proceedings. The International Military Tribunal is not a court of honor which decides about the actions of the accused as they concern honor, but a criminal tribunal which has to judge certain actions which have been declared criminal by the Charter. It appears to me that the prosecution forgot this fact on several occasions.

Before I pass on to the last point—the eleventh of the Anglo-American trial brief, regarding crimes against the laws of war and humanity, I must make a few preliminary remarks.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Again we must turn first to the question wherein lay Jodl's responsibility as Chief of the Operational Staff of the armed forces?

As we know, Jodl was primarily the adviser of the Supreme Commander-in-Chief in the operational leadership of the armed forces. This staff, however, had still other departments in addition to the operational departments of the three branches of the armed forces. When the operational tasks increased tremendously during the winter of 1941–1942, a division of work was arranged between the chief of the OKW and Jodl, according to which Jodl was only responsible for the military operations and the drawing up of the Armed Forces Report, while the chief of the OKW worked on all other matters in connection with the quartermaster department and the organizational department of the operational staff of the armed forces. It follows from all this that Jodl had nothing to do with prisoners-of-war, for whom a special department in the OKW was responsible, nor with the administration of the occupied territories, and therefore nothing with the seizure of hostages and with deportations (I shall discuss UK-56 later).

Nor did he have anything to do with police tasks in the zone of operations or in the rear military zone.

The operational staff of the armed forces had no authority to issue orders; nevertheless, there are many orders to which Jodl signed either "by order" or with his own "J."

We must now thoroughly discuss these orders and the responsibility for them.

1. There are orders which commence with the words "The Fuehrer has ordered" and are signed by Jodl, or signed by Keitel and initialed by Jodl. These are orders which were given by the Fuehrer orally, with the order to Jodl to draft them or put them into writing. With regard to the responsibility, the same applies here fundamentally as for the orders signed by Hitler. For, in order to determine the responsibility, one must ask the questions "What was the task of the person to whom the order was communicated? What was his right and his duty to do?"

When the contents of the order were fixed in all their essential points, Jodl's task was only a formal one; he had to word what was already established, to give it the usual shape of a military order, without being allowed to alter anything in its contents. It must not be overlooked that the criminality of an order can only lie in its contents and that it was precisely the contents which a subordinate had no influence on here. There the reason for the impunity of the subordinate does not lie in the order of his superior officer to act thus or thus, but in the lack of competence to alter anything in the given facts. If the Prosecution then sees in the formulating of the order criminal assistance, it is impossible to agree with this. In the first place, because it is an order of the Fuehrer's which creates law and in the case of which criminal assistance is impossible.

But even this is not accepted, and a Fuehrer's order is, on the contrary, considered as contrary to law and as punishable, one can still not get over the fact that it was not Jodl's business to examine the legality, but only to draw up the order technically correct, i.e., in accordance with the will of the author of this order. If he did this and only this, he has no responsibility. Here the superior essentially gave the order himself, and the subordinate just put it into words. People actually want to make a difference between a clerk being given the job of writing down the order and a senior general.

DEFENSE

The latter too will not have the legal, but perhaps he will have the moral, duty of expressing his scruples to his superior. Jodl actually always did this; this was the least of his various methods to prevent an illegality; to which I shall refer later.

2. Another very frequent case is where Jodl signed his order "I. A.," i.e., "Im Auftrag" (by order) or also initialed with his "J" orders signed by Keitel. Where does the responsibility lie here? We shall have to differentiate here between military and legal responsibility. From the military point of view, the superior, by whose order the order is signed, is responsible for it. Criminal law, however, lays the emphasis on the guilt, i.e., it wants to find the real culprit, not the person responsible from the military point of view. As, however, the owner of the initial or the person signing "by order" is mostly the author of the document, it may happen that the latter is responsible for purposes of criminal law, although he is not responsible in the military sense. For this reason it is necessary here to ascertain the actual share of both signatories in each case, and to determine the culpability accordingly.

3. Where Jodl did not affix his initial on the right below the last word of the document, but on the top right hand corner of the first page, it means merely that the document was submitted to him for his information. It does not say whether he actually read it or approved of it. Initials affixed in this manner do not, therefore, by themselves bring the initialer into any connection with the order for criminal purposes.

4. Jodl is also being charged now with certain notes, partly so-called "memoranda," partly handwritten remarks which he wrote on drafts or other documents. What is the position with regard to the legal significance of such notes?

The following statement has already been made in the "Fall-Gruen" in connection with the tentative proposal to manufacture an incident: A memorandum contains the deliberations, statements of fact, and opinions of the author or of other authorities, etc. It is not an order but the data on the basis of which the superior can decide whether he will issue an order and what order. As long as such a memorandum remains a memorandum, it is a purely internal affair without any significance in international law and can never be a violation of the laws and customs of war, as was explicitly laid down as the presupposition for punishment on Article 6b of the Charter.

The same applies to the marginal comment which so often occurs in the files of the OKW: "Yes," "No" or "That is impossible," etc.

Admittedly, such memoranda or marginal comment may obtain legal significance. If a memorandum contains a proposal which is contrary to international law, and if it influences the superior in such a way that he issues an order with the same contents, this might possibly be regarded as participation in a violation of international law. If, however, no order is issued, or if an order is issued which is contrary to the proposal, then this proposal has remained without effect, a purely internal matter, and unpunishable under all circumstances.

Furthermore, a memorandum or marginal comment may be a guide to the writer's sentiments. It may be gathered from it that he is inclined favorably toward international law or that he takes no account whatsoever of considerations of international law. That may often be an important help in judging his character.

But we do not punish the sentiments. Murderous intentions throw a bad light on the subject, but are not punishable. Caution must of course be exercised in the evaluation of such remarks. They are often thrown in thoughtlessly, without much deliberation, only intended for the reader in question, etc.

If we take all this into account, several of the accusations which the prosecutors have raised against Jodl are eliminated in advance.

1. His behavior on the matter of the low-flying airmen (731-PS, 735-PS). It had been proposed to leave low-flying airmen who attacked the civil population in a truly criminal manner, as it happened again and again, to the lynch law of the people. Jodl was opposed to this proposal, as it was bound to lead to the mass murder of all airmen who parachuted down. Jodl raised objections and more objections in the form of marginal comments. He succeeded in sabotaging the order thereby. The armed forces never issued such an order. This should be placed to Jodl's credit, but it is apparently held against him that he did not use words of moral indignation in declining the proposal. Under the conditions existing at the time, such a cause would probably have had even the opposite effect. In any case, there is no crime here.

2. Commissar Order (884-PS). On this horrifying draft order which had been drawn up already prior to the outbreak of the Russian war Jodl made the comment that it would provide reprisals against our soldiers, the order should preferably be drawn up in the form of a retaliatory measure, i.e., one should wait and see what action the commissars really took, and then take counter measures perhaps. Again he is not given credit for the fact that he opposed it, but he is accused of how he opposed it. From a legal point of view that is meaningless. He did not even receive news regarding the success of his protests.

DEFENSE

3. Geneva Convention (D-606). In this case Jodl did not only submit a memorandum but also a statement in great detail to Hitler, as he wished under all circumstances to cross the latter's plan of renouncing the convention. There he mentions all the reasons against the renunciation, and reassures Hitler afterward by saying that it is possible to circumvent certain clauses even without a renunciation of the convention. This again is not an action contrary to international law, but shows at the most sentiments opposed to international law. More correctly, it appears to do so. In truth this was nothing but proven tactics for dissuading Hitler from his infamous plan. The renunciation did not take place. If one takes offense at the unethical argumentation, one overlooks the fact that Jodl, after five years experience, knew better than we do with what arguments it was possible to persuade his chief.

4. Order regarding Leningrad (C-123). By letter of 7 October 1941, Jodl notified the Commander-in-Chief of the Army—and it's nothing but a notification—that Hitler had repeated an already previously issued order to the effect that an offer of capitulation was not to be accepted from either Leningrad or Moscow. Such an offer was, however, never made, the order could not therefore have been carried out at all. The whole matter remained on paper, and if only for that reason does not constitute a violation of international law. This also can at the most be regarded as a guide to the author's sentiments, but has no place on an indictment for the suspicion of a punishable action. The following should, however, be added in explanation of the matter. In this letter Jodl explained the indisputable situation of constraint which had caused Hitler to issue this order.

a. An offer of capitulation would only be simulated. Leningrad, in fact, was mined and would be defended to the last man as the Russian wireless had already announced. The bad experiences as a result of the delayed action mines prepared according to a plan in Kiev, Odessa, and Charkov had taught the German operational staff what things they must beware of.

b. In addition there was the great danger of an epidemic which would exist also in case of a genuine capitulation. Even if for that reason alone, German troops must not be allowed to enter the town. Acceptance of a capitulation was thus not practicable at all.

c. Added to that was the sheer impossibility of the German troops feeding a half-starved urban population of millions as well. The railway tracks had not as yet been altered to the width of the German tracks, even the supplies for our own troops caused much worry. And finally there was the military danger for the German operations, of which Field Marshal Leeb had complained to the defendant Keitel.

All this compelled steps to be taken to prevent the population of the towns from fleeing westward and southward through the German lines, but to make escape to the East possible for them, indeed, even to encourage it. Hence the directive to leave gaps in the front in the East.

The fact that Hitler let it be understood how he intended to utilize the militarily technical situation of constraint within the framework of his Eastern plans lies outside the military considerations. It has nothing to do with the order itself. The only question is whether it was inevitable from a military point of view, and this it was in fact, for the above-mentioned reasons. Whether renewed notification of the order was given by Jodl or not could not alter the situation in any way.

I shall discuss now individual war crimes of which Jodl has been accused.

a. The Commando Order. Two orders of the 18 October 1942 which were drawn up word for word by Hitler and signed by him have played a special part in this trial—the so-called Commando Order to the troops (498-PS) and the explanatory order connected therewith to the commanders (503-PS).

According to their substance these orders lie outside Jodl's sphere. If Jodl had anything to do with the matter at all, then it was for a special reason. These orders are executive directives to an order which had been issued by Hitler 15 days previously which had also been drawn up by him personally and attached to the Armed Forces Report of the 7 October 1942. Jodl composed this Armed Forces Report as usual, and therefore also the supplement regarding the previous history of the order which Hitler afterward had added at the end of the Armed Forces Report. Hitler requested him therefore to work out drafts for the executive order. Jodl did not do so, nor did he submit a report which his staff had drawn up on their own initiative to Hitler. On the contrary, he had Hitler—with whom his relations were very strained at that time—informed that he was incapable of conforming to the request. Hitler then drew the two orders up himself.

Jodl is now accused of two things, he distributed the orders drawn up by Hitler through official channels, and he furnished the second, the explanatory order to the Commanders, with a special directive for secrecy.

The order arose from Hitler's excitement about two kinds of intensified warfare which made their appearance about the same time in the autumn of 1942. One was the fatal efficacy of excellently equipped sabotage detachments which landed by sea or were dropped from the air. The other one was a special running wild in the fighting methods of enemies who acted singly or in small groups.

DEFENSE

Jodl has described here how this running wild appeared from the messages and photographs of the troops. Experience showed that these methods, which violated all military ethics, were met with especially among the sabotage detachments. Hitler wished to counteract these unsoldierly methods, and to stop the sabotage activity which was so dangerous for the German prosecution of the war, but knew, of course, that sabotage cannot be objected to on grounds of international law if it is carried out by ordinary soldiers. Hitler's first order, the one contained in the Armed Forces Report of the 7 October 1942, is therefore quite simply explained, no mercy will be shown to enemy soldiers who appear in sabotage detachments and behave "like bandits," i.e., who place themselves outside the military code by their method of fighting.

The executive directives should have defined the standard of unsoldierly conduct; Hitler's executive directive did not contain this definition, in the decisive points it is not definite, and this made it possible to apply the order in the sense of its undoubtedly justified fundamental idea, and not to apply it where there were even doubts as to whether one had been dealing with "bandits."

After all the reports which had been received about the enemy's behavior, Jodl considered the basic tendency of Hitler's directive in the Armed Forces Report of 7 October 1942 understandable, and thought that the directives given by Hitler in the Commando Order of 18 October 1942, which were in some points not clear, were in part admissible from the point of view of international law and in part perhaps questionable from the same point of view. He says that he still knows no more exactly now than he did then, whether, and to what extent these directives were contrary to international law. He says that one thing only was certain, namely, that the indefinite wording of the order made it possible for the commanders to apply the order only against people who had simply placed themselves outside the bounds of soldierly behavior.

Jodl hoped that this method would be applied and, as far as he could, he promoted it, as is proved by evidence taken. He used all his powers to help insure that the practical application of the Commando Order was restricted to what was undoubtedly admissible. He took steps to insure, further, that the order was not applied in large areas, i.e., in the greater part of Italy, as soon as it was at all possible to wrest a local limitation from Hitler (551-PS).

The directive for secrecy is interpreted as a sign of Jodl's consciousness of guilt. But this secrecy had cogent reasons of a different nature. The enemy had to be prevented, as far as possible, from learning what serious damage their sabotage detachments which were operating in a bandit-like manner were causing. Hence the special directive for secrecy only in the order 503-PS, which gives information about the damage, while the main order was known to the whole world through the Armed Forces Report. There was actually also a second reason for Jodl's imposition of special secrecy on the explanatory order. He did not wish to see the final decree, according to which captured Commando personnel were to be shot after interrogation, circulated. It revolted him as a human being to exclude unsoldierly fighters from the sphere of the Geneva Convention, whether such a course was admissible or otherwise according to international law. He hoped, and was justified in hoping, that the commanders would find ways of preventing inhumanities in individual cases by means of a healthy interpretation. And unauthorized persons were not to have knowledge of the decree.

The fundamental idea, which it was not indeed necessary to exceed in practice, conformed to international law which is only intended to protect men who are fighting as soldiers. This is, after all, the tendency of all the articles of war, which presupposes a chivalrous battle. Something had indeed to be done to turn the use of such wild methods into a hazardous operation for the enemy. Nothing could be said against sabotage detachments who fought in a soldierly way. The enemy had only to desist from those methods which were in radical contradiction to international law.

The following must also be stressed. The transmission of this order does not prove responsibility for its contents. This is not like other cases where Jodl advised or drew up the order, on the contrary, he refused to draw it up. He merely distributed it, as instructed, through the ordinary official channels. He is guiltless, however, not because—or better, not only because—he was ordered to pass it on, but because he had no right to interfere with the order which was to be passed on. It was outside his jurisdiction, outside his rights, to examine it. His activity was purely technical, independent of the contents of the document. In theory he was not even obliged to read it. Let us assume that, after drawing up the order, Hitler told some lieutenant to telephone it to the Commander-in-Chief. Would it then have been the lieutenant's right and duty also to examine the contents of the document with regard to its legal admissibility and to announce afterward "I will not do this," or "I shall have to consult the Hague convention for Land Warfare first to see if I am allowed to do it"? The most grotesque consequences would ensue! And in this case the colonel general is also nothing but a messenger who passes on what has been handed to him. Jodl's answer to my question as to what would have happened if he had refused to pass it on is characteristic of the military interpretation of the situation, "In that case I would have been removed immediately, and rightly so!"

DEFENSE

b. Partisan warfare. As far as partisan warfare is concerned, reproaches could be levelled against Jodl only in two cases—

1. If he had permitted the warfare to take place in a disorderly and "chaotic" manner, as one witness has asserted, or

2. If he had issued battle directions, but if these had been contrary to international law.

But neither of the two is the case; Jodl was not personally responsible for this matter, but he had to take some interest in the partisan activity when it reached an extent which was beginning to interfere with the military operations. He issued a directive in 1942 which was replaced by a second one in 1944. It is therefore out of the question that no rules existed for the combating of partisans. Nor can Jodl be reproached on the second point. Although Hitler wished to have a type of warfare waged against these dangerous opponents which had no consideration for ethics and international law, Jodl—without his knowledge—issued a pamphlet about the combating of partisans which cannot be attacked legally. He went as far as to have partisans in civilian clothing treated as prisoners of war, and to permit the burning down of villages to be carried out only on the orders of a divisional commander; this was intended to, and could prevent violations of Article 50 of the Hague Convention for Land Warfare (RF 665, Doc. Book 11, Jo 44).

Jodl cannot be reproached, however, if the combating of partisans nevertheless degenerated badly. It is not a matter for the Chief of the Operational Staff of the armed forces to supervise the observance of his directions in four theaters of war.

c. Burning down of houses in Norway (754-PS). The prosecution have accused Jodl during cross-examination of having ordered the destruction of Norwegian villages. This accusation refers to the teleprint of 28 October 1944 to the High Command of the 20th Mountain Army. The Prosecution has a false idea of the role which fell to Jodl's lot here.

The military position was then as follows. The Germans were retreating to the not yet completed Lyngen line. And there was a danger that the Red Army would continue to follow up during the winter and would thus destroy the much weaker German units, if, while advancing along the Reich Road 50, the only one that could be used at this time of year, they found the homes and the population with their local knowledge available. Without these billets and the support from the population the Russian advance was impossible. The evacuation of the population and the destruction of the houses would exorcise the danger and, over and above this, it would make partisan warfare against the German troops impossible. But the evacuation of the population was also necessary in the interests of the population itself.

In this position, Hitler issued, not on the advice of the soldiers but on that of the Reich Commissar for the occupied Norwegian territories, the decree which Jodl reported, by order, to the High Command of the 20th Mountain Army through the proper channels with all Hitler's military and ethical considerations. One can really hear Hitler's radical way of speaking.

Jodl, who knew, as a result of a telephone conversation with the staff of General Rendulic, that the mountain troops did not need such a far-reaching order militarily and therefore did not want it, was against this order and—when he could not prevent it—sought for a solution which in practice led to the correct result. He wanted the order to be carried out by the troops only as far as was absolutely essential militarily and in accordance with what was permissible under the Hague Convention for Land Warfare (Art. 23 g). He knew that his brother, who was in command in the North, thought exactly like him, he knew the soldierly spirit of the mountain troops in general and he knew in this particular case in advance that this order went too far for the troops. So that it should be understood correctly by everyone right from the start, in the introduction to the teleprint he not only explained clearly that it was a "Fuehrer order"—the second paragraph expressly uses these words—but he let the soldiers know that the Fuehrer had issued this order on the suggestion of the Reich Commissar, and not on the suggestion of the military. Then they knew. And they acted accordingly. No militarily unjustified demolitions occurred. Thus among others, the three towns of Kirkenes, Hammerfest, and Alta were not destroyed. According to the literal application of the order, they had to be destroyed.

d. Deportation of the Jews from Denmark (UK-56). The Prosecution wants to make Jodl responsible for the deportation of the Jews from Denmark. The prosecution bases this accusation on a teleprint which Jodl sent "By order" (I.A.) to the commander of the German troops in Denmark. It is particularly difficult to understand this accusation by the Prosecution. For the different documents submitted by the Prosecution unequivocally prove that the deportation of the Jews from Denmark was decided upon by Hitler on a suggestion from Dr. Best, therefore, on a suggestion from the civil authorities and against the objections of the commander of the German troops and that this task was assigned to the Reichsfuehrer SS. The OKW was concerned with the whole affair only because at that time the military state of emergency existed in Denmark, so that the commander of the German troops, as the highest executive authority in the country, had to be informed by his superior authority of the action ordered by Hitler and assigned to Himmler in order to prevent friction between the German authorities in Denmark.

DEFENSE

On 20 September 1943 Keitel and Jodl had received the first intimation of the discussions between Hitler, the Foreign Office, and Himmler, in a teleprint from the German commander. Jodl had only one wish—to keep the armed forces out of this matter. His temperamental remark on General von Hanneken's teleprint of 3 October 1943 (D-647) "Also a matter of complete indifference to us" (namely, whether the Reichsfuehrer SS publishes the figure of the Jews arrested or not) shows that only too well this has nothing at all to do with ethical considerations, either positively or negatively.

The whole thing had nothing to do with the armed forces. But difficulties could arise as a result of Himmler's action, as the armed forces were after all responsible for quiet and order in Denmark. The armed forces could not alter the decision taken by Hitler in this police matter, and could not have altered it even if they had been competent for this question.

Jodl simply informed the commander, by the teleprint UK-56, of the decision Hitler had taken in the field of the police. And the Reichsfuehrer SS, the Foreign Office, and the commander in chief of the reserve army were simultaneously informed by Jodl that he had let the commander in Denmark know. Now there was a clear line, and friction between German offices was excluded. And the OKW had only to see to this.

One cannot say that the information which Jodl gave made the execution of the order which Hitler had decided on apart from the Wehrmacht easier. It is clear to anyone who knows even a little about Hitler's position of power that friction between German offices would in no way have prevented the thing being carried out, but would at most only have delayed it, and would certainly not have made it pleasanter for the persons affected.

Your honors, it is an old saying of criminal law, a saying which I always find cited in foreign decisions too, that, "actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea." Two things go to make a crime, the "actus," the objective side of the crime, the deed; and the "mens rea," the subjective side, the guilt.

The Prosecution has fallen into a remarkable contradiction there. In some cases it stresses the "mens rea" and fails to see that the criminal "actus" is lacking. I have shown this in the case of the above-mentioned marginal comments, which do not represent any illegal actions, but at most could allow one to infer an illegal frame of mind. In other cases the prosecution looks only at the "actus," but does not ask whether a "mens rea" is also present. This second mistake is more dangerous, as here the outside of the crime is visible to everyone and it is often only a delicate psychological examination that comes to the conclusion that there is no "mens rea" which corresponds to the "actus." We will come to speak of this further on.

As regard the action, what is meant is behavior declared criminal by the Charter. This behavior can consist of positive action or of omission. If a father sees his child drowning while bathing and does nothing to save it although he could have, we declare him guilty either of murder or of killing by negligence, according to the degree of his guilt. This commission of a crime by omission is important in this trial too. For the Prosecution repeatedly stresses that Jodl was present at this or that meeting, at this or that speech. On one single page of the Anglo-American trial brief the sentence "Jodl was present at * * *" occurs six times. What does this mean legally? Being present at and listening to things can be of great importance for the evaluation of a later deed, for the doer cannot excuse himself by saying "I didn't know" if he participated in the discussion of a plan. But mere presence does not in itself make one co-guilty. According to British law, even presence actually when a crime is committed makes one co-guilty only if encouragement is added. The same applies in German law. But where such does not come into the question, to lay stress on a person's presence when a criminal intention was discussed can only be a reproach that he knew about and tolerated it.

We often hear this reproach of having tolerated crimes now not only in this court. The whole German people are reproached with having tolerated a criminal regime and the annihilation of millions of Jews. Undoubtedly a crime can also be committed by tolerating things. But to make it a serious criminal indictment, e.g., one for intentional killing two prerequisites must be fulfilled. (1) the subjective side, he must have known that the victim would meet his death if he did not intervene, (2) he must have been in duty bound, and able, to prevent this death.

DEFENSE

As far as Jodl is concerned the following applies. What an officer or official is legally bound to do or prevent depends on the regulations governing competence, and we know how strictly Hitler insisted on their being adhered to, how sharply he managed to divide up the political and military leadership and the military and the SS in their spheres of tasks. This was indeed the reason why Jodl took every opportunity to oppose the plans for extending the SS, for one thing was clear, once something had become the sphere of the SS, the armed forces had lost the right to have any say in it. It does not therefore mean much, for instance, that Jodl was present at a discussion between Hitler and Dr. Best, at which one of the things discussed was terrorism in Denmark and the way to fight it (RF 90). The mention of so-called "counter-murders," if such were really discussed, was not heard by Jodl (he was not present at parts of the session). His presence at this session does not mean much if only because the whole matter concerned occupied territory and did not concern the Chief of the Operational Staff of the armed forces, who was brought into this meeting because of other things which were discussed at it. So even if Jodl had heard more drastic things at that time than he actually did, any interference would have been out of the question and would have been rejected at once.

The reproach of having tolerated things also assumes that the possibility existed of preventing the crime. In the case of Jodl, only orders by the Fuehrer come into the question primarily; these orders he should—as people say—have prevented. But enough has already been said here about how things stood with regard to influence on Hitler's decisions. As long as his decision had not yet been made, arguments could, under favorable circumstances, still impress him; but once his decision was made, it was irreversible. Any contrary opinion is simply based on ignorance of the facts. In course of time Jodl did actually develop other methods for influencing decisions of the Fuehrer, or at least for influencing their practical effects. He used delaying tactics; either he waited so as to let the matter be forgotten if possible, or else he made difficulties and raised objections, the type of counter arguments having actually to be adapted to Hitler's way of thinking (Order regarding Commissars) ; or he sent for opinions from various departments in order to gain time (low-flying airmen) ; if the order had to be published, he often inserted into it on whose application the order had been issued, in order to show the commanders in chief that he did not identify himself with this matter (Norwegian villages); or he tried to influence the practical application by not objecting to behavior contrary to the order (Commando Order, etc.). But if one thinks that he could simply have refused to draft an unethical order, one has only to look at the Commando Order, where this method had exactly the opposite effect to what was intended.

I now come to the second part of the Latin saying I quoted—the deed in itself is no crime, “nisi sit mens rea.”

This is the last point in my statement and is at the same time the most difficult and the most important in a modern criminal trial.

“No guilt, no punishment,” this principle has been accepted in all civilized states since the Renaissance, even though different views as to the nature of guilt may exist in some places.

Allow me first to make a short comparison between the Anglo-American legal view and that of the Continent, e.g., of Germany. It is important when judging some cases.

I have already had to touch on an important point of the question of guilt when discussing the aggressive wars. If one wishes to make Jodl, the general staff officer, responsible for waging these wars at all, it is at any rate of decisive importance how he viewed the whole state of affairs. If he believed, on the basis of the reports he received, that facts existed which—if they were true—justified the waging of war, Jodl cannot be reproached with having knowingly waged a wrongful war. This applies even if his assumption rested on mistakes. Such mistakes exclude design. In a decision Regina v. Tolson it is stated “at common law a reasonable belief in the existence of circumstances which, if true, would make the act for which a prisoner is indicted an innocent act has always been held to be a good defense” (Kenny, Selection of cases illustrative of English criminal law, p. 18). In another decision Regina v. Prince it is stated “It seems to me to follow that the maxim as to ‘mens rea’ applies whenever the facts which are present to the prisoner’s mind, and which he has reasonable ground to believe, and does believe to be the facts, would, if true make his acts no criminal offense at all” (Kenny, p. 22). In a third case, Commonwealth v. Pressby, a good example is given, a sentry shoots at his commanding officer who is approaching him, in the belief that he is an enemy (Kenny, p. 14). This last example is closely related to the wars of aggression which are to be judged here.

As a rule, ignorance of criminal law is no excuse under British law. However, one finds the noteworthy principle “if, however, there is a doubt as to the question of law, a person cannot be convicted and subjected to imprisonment if he has merely acted on a mistaken view as to the law." Naturally a mistake about preliminary questions in civil law can also exclude criminal intention "if a person takes what he believes to be his own, it is impossible to say that he is guilty of felony" (Principle and practice of the Criminal Law, by Seymour F. Harris, London 1943, p. 26). This rule could also be significant in our field too for mistakes regarding the regulations of international law.

DEFENSE

Yet in this doctrine of mistakes I see a certain difference from German law. In German law any mistake, even if resulting from negligence, excludes intention. In British law this seems to apply only to "reasonable" mistakes "unaccompanied by negligence." If that sentry had shot too soon and without sufficient investigation, he would, under German law indisputably only have to be sentenced for killing by negligence. In England and America, if I understand it rightly, this careless mistake would not be taken into consideration at all, and this soldier would have to expect a sentence for intentional killing. But this difference in the conceptions of law should not play any part in our case. For one can hardly reproach Jodl with having come to his conception of the situation on the basis of a hurried and careless examination of his reports.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Lastly, in a third point which is of importance here, the views again agree. Every serious crime must be deliberate though, for deliberateness, one need not have the consciousness of doing something criminal, but one must be aware that it is not right to act in this manner. To constitute a criminal act there must, as a general rule, be a criminal intent. The general doctrine is stated in Hales Pleas of the Crown, that "where there is no will to commit an offense, there can be no transgression" (Commonwealth v. Pressby, Kenny, p. 14).

In German law, it has been argued for a long time whether the perpetrator must know that he is acting in direct contravention of the law, or whether it is sufficient for him to know that he is in general committing something contrary to his duty. And the prevailing opinion which has also been taken over by the plan of our German Criminal Code, states the perpetrator must be conscious "of acting against a law, or of acting wrongly in some other way, in a natural sense." I was greatly interested to find the same idea, expressed in almost the same words, in the decision of Green v. Tolson (Kenny p. 15-16) "it must at least be the intention to do something wrong. That intention may belong to one or other of two classes. It may be to do a thing wrong in itself and apart from positive law, or it may be to do a thing merely prohibited by statute or by common law, or both elements of intention may coexist with respect to some deed." Thus according to British law, knowledge of not being allowed to act thus is one of the constituents of intent "There is a presumption that 'mens rea'; an evil intention, or a knowledge of the wrongfulness of the act, is an essential ingredient in every offense." Sherras v. de Rutze, Kenny, p. 34). This decision quotes some exceptions to this principle, which do not interest us here, however, they concern bigamy and seduction, where positive definitions of the statute intervene, as well as certain offenses against public order, etc.

Our question now is, was Jodl aware of wrongdoing during the preparation and passing on of the various plans and orders of which he is accused to-day? According to my innermost conviction, No.

The only evidence of it, which the Prosecution has produced is the question, why, if he had a clear conscience, was he in some cases so intent on observing strict secrecy? There is an answer to this. In military questions there are the most manifold reasons for not allowing certain things to become known. This was so before the war and all the more so during the war, and even now, after the war, deep secrecy shrouds the atom bomb for example. This kind of observance of secrecy need not be connected with a guilty conscience. And if Jodl says he had arranged that one of the two Commando Orders should—irrespective of other reasons—be kept secret because of its repulsive final regulation, he did so, presumably, for the sake of the honor of the German Wehrmacht, and truly not because he thought that he himself was doing something wrong by passing on the order, which he had after all not drafted himself and for which, as he was convinced, he was not responsible.

This last fact must be stressed; it is of general importance. In all Jodl's military preparatory work, whether he was making plans for wars or drafts of decrees or memoranda the point is not only whether he knew or suspected that this war or that decree were contrary to law, but it is decisive whether he knew that by his cooperation, by his actions, he was doing something wrong. That Jodl did not have bad conscience clearly follows, it seems to me, from the fact that before his capture he had three weeks time in which to burn most of these documents, but did not do so, because he was quite convinced he had nothing to conceal.

When drawing up this order, he was not conscious of wrongdoing. He could not be if only for two reasons, partly because he felt himself bound by the Fuehrer's orders, partly because—regardless of any concrete order—he was convinced that in his position as Chief of the Operational Staff of the armed forces he was in duty bound to act in this way.

DEFENSE

Let us look into this more closely. About the order and its legal meaning I will not speak any further. One point, however, appears to me to be in need of elucidation. Mr. Jackson quoted paragraph 47 of the German Military Penal Code to prove that, according to German law, an order by a superior officer does not excuse the subordinate.

Incidentally it is remarkable, that, in the case of the conspiracy, British-American law is used, whereas,—in the case of this order, German law is drawn on—in each case according to whichever is the less favorable to the defendant. I do not know, however, whether Mr. Jackson would have referred to paragraph 47 of the Military Penal Code, had he known how it was interpreted by the Supreme Military Courts and what was therefore the real legal position in Germany.

It is first of all necessary to establish that at the beginning of paragraph 47 there stands the principle, "Should, by the execution of an order on official business a criminal law be infringed, the superior officer issuing the order is alone responsible." And now comes the exception which practice has cut down to the absolute minimum for the sake of maintaining military discipline. It is based on the point of view that a subordinate is subject to punishment as a participant only if the order was not binding on him (because, for instance, owing to its nature it did not come within the framework of Wehrmacht tasks) and if the subordinate was aware that the action ordered had a crime or an offense as its aim; the offense must thus be directly intended by the person issuing the order and the subordinate must be certain of this (Reich Military Law Code 19, p. 195). That he could and should have realized this is not sufficient (Reich Military Court 13, p. 184). And, even if the subordinate is responsible, in case of slight guilt, punishment may be waived (final sentence of paragraph 47).

The whole definition is very much contested, but one can see how the courts have limited its validity in order to cover the obedient soldier as much as possible. Actually, a punishment of cases in this kind occurred very rarely. Jodl does not remember a single case in his 30 years of service.

I must insert something here, since a few days ago Mr. Jackson presented a document subsequently, which concerns this problem (3881-PS). These are statements which Dr. Freisler made as President of the People's Court during the trial of those who took part in the attempt of 20 July 1944. Freisler was always considered in Germany as a caricature of a judge, his unworthy shouts in that murder trial were produced here before us by the prosecutors a few months ago in a sound film. This legal expert—so far as the sense of his remarks, torn from the general context, is recognizable—meant, when an officer ordered a subordinate to give assistance in murdering Hitler, this order did not justify the one who obeyed. In order to establish this, Freisler's "authority" was not required in any case. If ever a military order was issued which went outside the competence of the Wehrmacht and was therefore not binding, and did not therefore serve as an excuse, it was the order to murder the head of this very Wehrmacht. But how an order by some officer or other to murder the head of the state can be compared with the order of the head of the state to commit an act contrary to international law is incomprehensible.

I am not, however, dwelling further on this idea. No understanding of Jodl's position can be achieved and no correct judgment of his actions formed, if we do not look at the two men who faced each other here.

The Prosecution have made it easy for themselves. Were Hitler still alive, he, as the head of the major war criminals, would sit in the first place on the defendant's bench and would be considered as the base and source of all terrible events. Now that he is dead, his person is minimized when judging the other defendants and their conduct treated almost as if he had never existed at all. This man of force, this infernal power, as Jodl called him, cannot be passed over as a negligible quantity when the question is to do justice to the commissions and omissions of his immediate entourage. During these months I have again and again had to think of the connection between genius, madness, and crime which was once shown by the perspicacious Cesare Lombroso. In history it is success that has the last word on the worth and worthlessness of men. That is why the judgment of history on Hitler will perhaps be a crushing one. But one must not forget his beginnings; when Germany's position at about the end of 1932 is compared with that at the end of 1938, one is not surprised at the incomparable prestige which he had at the very time when Jodl came into close contact with him.

Jodl now stood opposite this man. Jodl, an honest soldier, extraordinarily gifted, but never striving for anything else but to be a conscientious soldier, with a prosaically realistic mind, ill-disposed toward all diplomacy, all political machinations, grown up in accordance with the ideals of the German officer corps—bravery, faithfulness, obedience—training according to the 100-year old tradition of the German General Staff, which knew only fulfilment of duty, selfless work, and more work.

DEFENSE

That this man, who was working at Adolf Hitler's side, was bound to come under his influence is self-evident. One must consider the time at which this took place. A relation of confidence could not grow out of it, of course, but Jodl was also not the man to submit without opposition. There were enough clashes and explosions. Jodl was regarded as the man who dared to oppose the Fuehrer more than anybody else. He could, as Kesselring reported, oppose him with a sharpness which at times reached the limits of what is militarily permissible.

For this very reason I do not believe that it is order and obedience which can make us appreciate fully Jodl's behavior during these years.

It was rather the much more comprehensive thought of the fulfilment of duty, complete devotion to what had been allotted to him as his task at a critical time. One should realize the situation in which Jodl found himself, his country's battle for existence, the demands of the war which was continually becoming more horrible, and at the same time the view of his supreme Commander-in-Chief which deviated from all tradition—about what was permissible and not permissible in a war. It becomes quite clear that Jodl was bound to come into conflicts, into conflicts with Hitler and into conflicts with himself.

Permit me to make a comparison. You, Your Honors, feel yourselves bound by the Charter of this Tribunal, as you have already informed us. Perhaps some of you have been assailed by doubts as to whether all the conditions of this Charter conform to the international law at present valid and to the generally recognized legal principles. But you have rejected such doubts, since you, as judges, consider yourselves bound by the rules which your four governments have agreed upon.

Jodl in his capacity as a general staff officer, may have felt himself bound, in a similar way, to assist in the orders of his supreme Commander-in-Chief, even if doubts regarding their admissibility in international law may have assailed him here and there. But he considered himself bound by his office to draw up plans for war without examining whether and under what conditions they were carried out; he had to formulate and issue thousands of orders, even if he disagreed on some points. Where neither remonstrances nor delaying tactics had any effect, he had to submit. As a general staff officer he had a purely assistant function. That he might be doing wrong while fulfilling this function according to the best of his knowledge and conscience never even occurred to him.

It is said now, Jodl should not have taken any part in this or that affair under any circumstances. What should he have done?

If one reproaches somebody with having acted in a certain way, one must be in a position to state what action would have been right in that situation.

It is declared that he should have resigned. This would of course be an easy way out. It could be taken in peacetime, but in wartime it was different.

Jodl tried repeatedly to get out of the OKW and to get posted to the front. Applications for resignation were altogether futile unless they were desired by the Fuehrer, as in the case of v. Brauchitsch and v. Leeb. In wartime he strictly forbade his generals to apply to resign. This was desertion, he said; the private in the front line could not resign either when he found things were unpleasant. The general also had to remain at the post where he was put. In 1944 this order was repeated in writing with all possible emphasis and given reasons. If a general wanted to quit for reasons of conscience, he was to know that the Fuehrer himself bore full and sole responsibility for his orders and that the generals' sole duty was to be responsible for their strict execution. Resignations on such grounds were not soldierlike and criminal. So Jodl could not resign. Should he perhaps have faked an illness? This also is desertion and, in wartime, a crime punishable by death. Is it possible seriously to expect an officer brought up in the good old traditions to betray his country in time of need like a coward—his country to which he had devoted all his life? The effect of which would be that he would no longer be able to look any new recruit in the face?

There was therefore only the third solution—Murder and revolution. In peacetime this would at the same time have meant civil war, in wartime the immediate collapse of the front and the end of the Reich. Was he then supposed to cry “Fiat justia percat patria?”

Really the prosecution seems to be of the opinion that such an attitude was to be demanded from the defendants. An astonishing idea! Whether murder and treason can ever be justified ethically had better be left to moralists and theologians to dispute over. For lawyers, at any rate, something like that cannot be a subject for discussion. To be obliged on pain of punishment to murder the head of the State? And, what is more, as a soldier? And in wartime? People who commit such crimes have always been punished, but to punish them for not doing so would be something new.

Naturally there are limits to legal obligations for the lawyer too, but in dilemmas which offer only this kind of solution, the old saying applies "Ultra posse nemo obligatur."

DEFENSE

Jodl was no rebel. His conscience told him the Fatherland is in need, everybody at his post! Jodl's place was at the head of the operational staff of the armed forces. He did not get this post voluntarily, he did not keep it voluntarily. It was a hard duty. He fulfilled the task which this post imposed on him, according to the best of his ability and conscience—unto the bitter end.

Your Honors!

Allow me in conclusion to recall a personal reminiscence which throws more light on Jodl's personality.

I made his acquaintance about 20 years ago in the house of his uncle, the philosopher Friedrich Jodl, in Vienna. There I had a conversation with him on the education for a career as an officer. What the young captain said about it was of such moral earnestness, and so far from anything that could be called militarism that I have always retained it in my memory. I had no more contact with him of any sort until last autumn, when I received the surprising summons to defend him here. My first thought was "This gallant soldier must be helped." But I doubted whether to undertake this, since I am not a professional attorney. Still, when I met him in the court building for the first time, he said something to me which scattered all doubts "Rest assured, professor," he said, "if I felt a spark of guilt in me, I would not choose you as my defense counsel."

Your honors, I believe that a gentleman, and not a criminal speaks thus.

I ask that the colonel general Alfred Jodl be acquitted.

2. FINAL PLEA of Alfred Jodl

Mr. President, may it please the Tribunal, it is my unalterable belief that when history is being recorded in the days to come it will arrive at an objective and just verdict for the higher military leaders and their assistants. For they and together with them, the entire German Wehrmacht were confronted with an insoluble task; namely, to conduct a war which they had not wanted under a Commander-in-Chief whose confidence they did not possess and whom they themselves only trusted within limits; to conduct a war which they had not wanted with methods which frequently were in contradiction with their operational principles and their considered opinions which had been disregarded; to fight with troops and police forces which did not come under their full command and with an intelligence service which, in part, worked for the enemy. And all of this, together with the complete and clear realization that this war would decide the fate and the existence of our beloved country. They did not serve the powers of Hell and they did not serve a criminal but rather, their own people and their own country.

As far as I am concerned, I believe that no man can do more than to try to reach the highest goals possible for him. That, and nothing else, has always been the guiding principle for all my actions, and for that reason, gentlemen of the High Tribunal, no matter what verdict you may arrive at in my case, I shall leave this courtroom with my head held as high as when I entered it for the first time many months ago.

Whoever calls me a traitor to the honorable tradition of the German Army, or whoever asserts that I remained at my post for personal and egotistical reasons, him I shall call a traitor to the truth. In a war such as this, in which hundreds of thousands of women and children were annihilated by a carpet of bombs or through low-flying aviation, and a war in which partisans used every means which they considered expedient, in a war like that, even though they may appear questionable according to international law, harsh measures are no crime in morality or in conscience.

For I believe and avow that your duty toward your own people and your country stands above every other. To carry out this duty to me was honor and the highest law. This is something of which I am proud.

May this duty be supplanted in a happier future through an even higher one, through the duty toward mankind.

XIX. FRANZ VON PAPEN

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Egon Kubuschok, Defense Counsel

Your Lordship, Gentlemen of the Court:

Papen is accused of taking part in a conspiracy to commit a crime against peace. With respect to time the prosecution limits the discussions of the facts of the case to the termination of his activity in Vienna. It admits that for the subsequent period, especially during his activity as ambassador in Ankara, no indications were found to support the accusation. In other words, according to this viewpoint Papen is said to have taken part in the preparatory actions for unleashing a war of aggression, which actions as regards time, the Prosecution has placed very far ahead, but he is not said to have actively participated in the immediate preparations and in the crime against the peace itself.

DEFENSE

The Prosecution deals with Papen's activity as Reich Chancellor in the last pre-Nazi cabinet, with the part he played as vice-chancellor in Hitler's cabinet until 30 June 1934, and with his activity as Minister Extraordinary in Vienna. It was faced with the task of proving that during this period preparatory actions for a crime against peace actually took place and that Papen in full recognition of these aims collaborated in the preparations. Since the counts of the indictment deal with a field of activity which is in itself a legal one and since the criminal element cannot be introduced into the individual acts except in the direction of their aims, judgment of the Papen case lies essentially in the subjective field. The Prosecution is faced with the fact that Papen's own sentiments which often came to light and the policy which he actually pursued cannot be made to agree with the interpretation given by them. Therefore, they seize upon the premise that he is a double-faced opportunist who has sacrificed his real sentiments or those displayed to the existing conditions of the day and Hitler's will. In consequence it must be the task of the defense to bring about an elucidation of his personality in order to prove that Papen's actions and statements constitute a uniform consistent line and that his entire attitude de facto was such as to forbid connecting him with the offenses of the Charter; and that those of his actions which are under discussion must have been undertaken in pursuit of other aims than those which the Prosecution thinks it can recognize. Furthermore, the defense will outline Papen's entire political activity in its legality and within the framework of this activity it will deal with the actions considered punishable by the Prosecution and will finally submit counter-evidence showing that he actively worked against a political development as represented by the facts of the case brought forward in the indictment.

We shall arrive here at a just evaluation only if the discussion is kept away from the question of political suitability and correctness and if we accept the politician as he reveals himself to us with the opinions which he developed from origin and tradition. Moreover, an essential element in judging fairly will be the elimination of that knowledge we have now received at the trial from later years and concerning this later period.

We shall have to direct our considerations only to the time of the actions themselves, and only then shall we obtain a clear opinion of what Papen could see and expect at that time.

The Prosecution places the beginning of Papen's participation in the conspiracy on 1 June 1932, the date of his appointment as Reich Chancellor. However, it gives no answer to the question from what circumstances we are to see Papen's entry into the association of conspirators which is alleged to have been already in existence. It is impossible indeed to give an answer to this. Papen's activity as Reich Chancellor cannot either be regarded in the least as an activity in the sense of a Hitler conspiracy. The idea behind the formation of the cabinet, the entire leadership of the government during his chancellorship, and finally his departure from office are too clearly manifest to allow us to read into them a promotion of Nazi ideas, a paving the way for National Socialism or even a participation in a conspiracy allegedly already on foot. The Papen cabinet was formed at the time of an unusual economic, political, and parliamentary depression. Unusual means had already become necessary under the preceding cabinet. They were to be continued now in part on entirely new lines. In times of unusual crises a parliamentary legislative body probably always offers a certain difficulty. Therefore, even in the days of Bruening's cabinet the Reichstag was almost completely excluded from legislation and for all practical purposes was placed in the hands of the Reich President by means of the Notverordnung (Emergency Powers Law). It was now thought necessary to work on new lines. A cabinet of men who were experts in their own field but who were not bound to any party was to do away with these difficulties. Therefore, it was with this intention that the new cabinet was composed without the collaboration of parties. The tasks with which the new government was faced and the program necessarily resulting from the conditions of the time brought with them of necessity an attitude which was hostile to National Socialism. Any wish to strike at the roots of the depression must involve a fight on the part of government policy against the roots which would lead to the growth of National Socialism. These lay in discontent over economic conditions and the political situation abroad.

But on the other hand one could only think of doing peaceful and reconstructive work of any benefit if some modus vivendi could be found with the National Socialist Party. Not only according to constitutional law alone had the party the power to practically paralyze every government activity. With nothing more than the possibilities it had as regards propagandistic influence on the masses it offered the key to a possible pacification of inner-political conditions, the first prerequisite for the start of far-reaching economic measures.

Papen was faced with this situation in the last days of May 1932 when without anything of his doing and to his surprise he was commissioned by Hindenburg to form a presidential cabinet.

DEFENSE

With regard to his governmental activity I wish to limit myself in my defense against the indictment to the following details:

The formation of the cabinet of 1 June 1932 took place contrary to previous parliamentary custom without any preceding consultation with the National Socialist Party. New pioneer economic laws with hitherto unknown financial commitments were decreed in order to fight unemployment and at the same time to eliminate the previous inexhaustible reservoir for the growth of the National Socialist Party. The purpose of the new economic measures and the limited financial possibilities were the conditions for a great enlargement of the frame of these laws in time. The labor market was to be stimulated by means which were to result from the future savings of public taxes if the measures were successful. The economic laws were based only on this exhausting of financial possibilities. Intentionally no use was made of unproductive public work projects or a stimulation of the labor market by armament orders. These long range economic measures which could be successful only in the case of an uninterrupted government policy made the problem of their acceptance by the Reichstag especially urgent. In the field of foreign politics Papen continued the course which the Bruening cabinet had pursued and in so doing he laid particular emphasis on those points of honor the recognition of which would have brought no damage to the other parties to the treaty, but which would have taken from the National Socialist Party a forceful means of propaganda in influencing the masses.

At the Conference of Lausanne Papen openly explained the innerpolitic situation. He pointed out that substantially ideological points were at stake the denial of which would give the National Socialists the impetus they desired. He explicitly emphasized that his efforts were the last attempt of a middle-class cabinet and that in the event his policy failed only National Socialism would profit from it.

Papen strove to make the National Socialist Party take a share in the responsibility without wishing to entrust it with the key position of the office of Reich Chancellor, a share in the responsibility which would have brought a party of negative polities to a recognition of actual conditions and which would thus have eliminated the attractive demagogic propaganda.

These first attempts by Papen to bring about a participation of the National Socialist movement in governmental work is already regarded by the Prosecution as paving the way for National Socialism.

However, this is nothing actually but an attempt to find a basis of some kind for practical governmental work, an attempt which had to take into account the experience of the Bruening cabinet and the development of the National Socialist Party. The fact could not be disregarded that already the Reich presidential election in March 1932 had brought Hitler 36.8 percent of all the votes. If one takes into consideration the fact that Hindenburg was the candidate on the opposite side and that Hindenburg's personality certainly caused many followers of the NSDAP to cast their vote in this special case in a way which was not in accordance with party directives, the fact follows that a heretofore hardly known opposition party arose which numerically outweighed by far all the other parties, and which in its position as an opponent was able to paralyze a priori any governmental activity. Hence followed, what was a foregone conclusion for Papen, the endeavor to get this party out of its status as an opposition party. This decision would be all the easier if the firm conviction were there that a share in the responsibility of government would turn the opposition party from its radical course and especially curb it considerably in its further development.

The best evaluation of Papen's governmental activity, seen from the standpoint of the National Socialists, comes from the fact that it was the National Socialist Party which opposed Papen's decisive economic legislation and with its vote of no confidence—pronounced jointly with the Communist Party—brought about the end of the Papen cabinet.

The subsequent negotiations of the still acting Reich Chancellor, especially the events of the 1 and 2 December 1932 show again his unequivocal attitude toward the NSDAP.

Papen proposed a violation of the constitution to Hindenburg. He wished to exhaust this last means in order to avoid a Hitler chancellorship. Schleicher prevented this solution on the grounds that in the event of a civil war which might then break out the government would not remain master of the situation with the existing police and military forces. In the face of these clear historical events the attempt of the Prosecution must remain without success to read the opposite into the facts and into these clearly recognizable, unequivocal motives.

What are then the points which the Prosecution believes that it can marshal in the face of this?

One, that Papen, in his first negotiation with Hitler and a short time after forming his government, consented to rescind the order prohibiting the wearing of uniforms, a measure which, even if it had merely been taken as a political compensation deal to achieve acceptance of the cabinet, would be something very natural according to parliamentary rules. Not only was the NSDAP the strongest party in the Reichstag, but also and especially on account of its general political work in public life it constituted a powerful factor of the first order. Therefore, it could not a priori be driven into a state of opposition if it was intended at all to pursue a realistic policy of long duration and to overcome the emergency in earnest by revolutionizing the economic program.

DEFENSE

The repeal of the prohibition concerning uniforms was based also on more deep lying reasons, because it was a one-sided prohibition against one party and the opposing organizations were not limited in this respect and the acknowledgment of the law of equal treatment here could only eliminate dangerous propaganda material. The repeal of the prohibition concerning uniforms was furthermore by no means the announcement of a license for political acts of violence. The warning of the Reich President, announced with the proclamation of the decree, that acts of violence resulting from the decree would bring about an immediate prohibition of the organizations as such, according to all intelligent estimation should have had the effect of preventing damaging results.

The claim of the Prosecution that the repeal of the prohibition concerning uniforms was the main cause of the increase in the number of National Socialist seats at the July election is completely at variance with the facts. In this connection I will refer to the already mentioned result of the Reich presidential election of March 1932 at which the real situation did not even become completely manifest owing to the fact that Hindenburg was the candidate on the other side. The election of 21 July 1932 brought 13,700,000 National Socialist votes whereas in the Reich presidential election of 10 April 1932 Hitler had already received 13,400,000 votes. There are no grounds whatsoever for the assumption that the appearance of uniforms which, incidentally, had been replaced earlier by camouflaged standardized clothing even during the period of prohibition, might have had a determining influence on the outcome of the elections.

Much more important and in a negative sense more decisive for the outcome of the elections was certainly the general prohibition of political parades proclaimed by the Papen cabinet at the beginning of the election campaign. Public meetings and political parades are the most important expedient for a party under demagogic leadership. To have this taken away before the election was undoubtedly a much greater minus for the NSDAP than the previous plus it had received in the form of permission to wear uniforms.

In the letter of 13 November 1932 in which Papen again tries to induce Hitler to participate in the government, the Prosecution sees an effort which is undignified in its form and blameworthy in its essence to smooth the path of National Socialism to power. It forgets that Papen conducted the November elections in sharp opposition to the NSDAP, because he tried to remove the party from the key position in which without Hitler it was impossible numerically to form a majority from the Social Democrats inclusive of them and extending to the farthest right. It forgets that this result had not been achieved, that the key position even with 196 seats remained with Hitler and that, therefore, it was necessary to make another attempt to win Hitler over for a presidential cabinet under some conservative chancellor. It overlooks in this point that Papen's proposals here again had the definite aim of excluding the NSDAP from the Reich Chancellorship. For National Socialism a cabinet under a conservative politician, who according to the constitution would have had to determine the principles of the policy, would only have brought the party's influence on to this or that department, but in return for this influence it would have resulted also in its sharing the responsibility through its participation in the government. From the standpoint of opposition to National Socialism seen in retrospect one could indeed have welcomed nothing more than such a case in which the party's participation in the government limited in influence and had a share in the responsibility. The end of opposition policy which was so tremendously favorable for propaganda would undoubtedly have brought about the end of the growth of the National Socialist movement and the conversion of its radical elements.

The polite form of the letter was due to the official duty of the Reich Chancellor toward the leader of the strongest party in parliament. It is a foregone conclusion that in using this form and because of the purpose of the letter the writer does not refer to negative points but to those positive things which were suitable for use in any cooperation in the government.

In order to be able to construct from the period of Papen's Reichchancellorship something that is at least a foothold in proving his union of ideas with National Socialism the Prosecution has imputed to the temporary elimination of the Prussian government by the decree of 20 July 1932 intentions which in no way could pass the test of an objective examination.

The "coup d'etat" of 20 July, as the Prosecution terms the execution of the decree of 20 July, had not the slightest thing to do with promoting the National Socialists. In the opinion of the Reich cabinet and according to the decisive judgment of Reich President von Hindenburg domestic policy showed the necessity for eliminating that toleration of Communist acts of terror which was practiced by the Prussian cabinet in office and which continuously and openly came to light. From this state of affairs Hindenburg drew his conclusions and issued the emergency decree (Notverordnung) of 20 July. By a decision of the then still entirely independent Reichsgericht (Reich supreme court) it was determined that this decree with regard to constitutional law was permissible within the framework of state political necessities.

DEFENSE

If in carrying out this decree the request was indeed actually conveyed by police authorities to the minister of the interior who had been suspended, that he leave his offices, the word "coup d'etat" lends a meaning to this measure which goes far beyond what actually happened. Also in considering the effects of this measure an assumption that here the way was paved for National Socialism is not justified by any facts. The appointed Reich Commissioner Bracht belonged to the Center Party ("Zentrum"). The key position of police president in Berlin was intrusted to a man on whom the hitherto existing cabinet Braun had previously conferred the office of police president in Essen. Briefly, the result of the change was only that on the one hand an effective cooperation was now assured with the Reich authorities, and on the other hand new people filled some political positions which up to now had been the almost exclusive monopoly of the Social Democratic Party to an extent which from the point of view of parity could no longer be justified. That in filling these positions the National Socialists were passed over was a charge which was made against Papen time and again by the National Socialists.

Consequently, Papen's entire term of office in the government constitutes a clear line of realistic politics which show that on the one hand he did not let go the rudder in carrying out necessary and especially economic measures, but that on the other hand he tried to get a numerically almost overwhelming opposition party to collaborate. Papen's attitude toward the NSDAP became even more manifest after he had been asked by the Reich President late in November 1932 to collaborate in the effort to form a new cabinet.

In this he showed he had the courage to take the most extreme consequences. Realizing that it was impossible to go on with a non-National Socialist government according to parliamentary principles, he submitted to the Reich President the proposal to rule with the aid of armed force even if he thus caused a violation of the constitution and risked causing a civil war.

It is just as difficult to reconcile oneself with such a proposal, when one adheres to thinking along lines of constitution law as it is impossible to overlook in retrospect that the proposed violation of the constitution limited in time was probably the only possibility to avoid the solution which then became necessary on 30 January 1933.

Any other temporary solution could not have had a satisfactory result. Sooner or later the opposition party would have forced the resignation of any non-National Socialist cabinet. Thus, the political unrest with its consequences on the entire economic life would have become a latent state. A state of affairs, which, by its alternate effect, was only suited to strengthen the National-Socialist movement and thus to bring it by force to a numerical strength which in the end would have resulted in the fulfilment of its entire totalitarian claim for an assuming unlimited power.

The part played by Papen in the formation of the cabinet of 30 January 1933 might in itself be disregarded. It is sufficient to be aware of the fact that all endeavors to bring about a parliamentary government without Hitler were already impossible from a purely numerical standpoint, and that such a parliamentary solution with Hitler was wrecked by his opposition. A measure born out of political and constitutional necessity cannot, according to the indictment, be considered as evidence of intended planning of a crime in the sense of the Charter. The significance of this count of the indictment must be considered. By maintaining all parliamentary rules, a government is appointed by Hindenburg in his capacity of chief of state, the head of which is the leader of the strongest party. This government when presented before the parliament finds an overwhelming majority. That which Papen is accused of, the knowledge of the activities of the National Socialist party in the past, holds true to the same extent also for the other participants, Hindenburg and all consenting members of parliament. The reproach leveled against Papen thus includes also an accusation against Hindenburg and the entire consenting parliament. For this consideration alone, the unique attempt of including in an indictment a self-evident, constitutional procedure of a sovereign state must probably fail.

If despite this fact I go into the events which occurred before the formation of the government, it is only in order to show clearly here, too, the unequivocal standpoint of Papen, who on one hand did not wish to close his eyes to the real facts, but on the other hand desired to undertake everything in order to prevent the danger of an uncontrollable development of this new formation. The Prosecution considers the Hitler-Papen meeting at the home of Schroeder on 4 January as being the beginning of the efforts made for the formation of the Government of 30 January. As a matter of fact the meeting at Schroeder's was nothing else than an exchange of ideas about the situation of the moment during which Papen and Hitler maintained their previous opinions and Papen pointed out that Hindenburg, owing to the apprehensions which he expressed, would in no case agree to Hitler's taking the position of Reich Chancellor. Hitler would have to accept the position of Vice-Chancellor, since Hindenburg took the standpoint that the possibility for a further development would only follow after he had proven himself over a long period of time.

DEFENSE

This meeting in Koeln took place upon Hitler's request. I refer in this instance to Schroeder's communique published by the press, which I submitted as Document 9 of the defense, and which I erroneously indicated during the cross-examination as being a joint communique issued by Papen and Schroeder. Schroeder establishes in it that he himself took the first step toward this meeting.

The fact that this meeting has in no way been the basis for the formation of the Government of 30 January is obvious from the fact that the discussion was immediately reported by Papen to Schleicher and Hindenburg and that during all the following time until 22 January Papen had nothing to do with the solution of the governmental problem. Schleicher as well as Hindenburg endeavored to obtain parliamentary support for the Schleicher cabinet through negotiations with the leaders of parties, efforts which failed, however, due to the weight of the political facts. The main effort was to split up the National Socialist party by inviting the collaboration of the Strasser wing in the Government. These efforts failed when Hitler's position became so strong after the result of the elections in Lippe that he regained absolute control over the Party against all attempts to split it up. The outcome of the elections in Lippe of 15 January 1933 was generally considered as a barometer of public opinion with respect to the political situation. All parties had mobilized their entire organization and propaganda apparatus, and therefore one could draw a conclusion from the result of this election concerning the general public opinion. The result showed that the losses suffered during the November elections were almost completely made up. Thus everybody could recognize that the decline of the National Socialist movement was stopped and that with the continuance of the momentary political and economic situation a further gain was to be expected.

The necessity for a decision became more and more urgent when on 20 January 1933 the Council of Seniors of the Reichstag—through its convocation of the Reichstag for 31 January—granted to Schleicher's cabinet practically only a period of grace up to that date. For a vote of no confidence introduced by the left and the NSDAP meant its immediate fall. The meeting in the house of Ribbentrop on 22 January, when Hindenburg wanted to learn through his son and the state secretary of the Presidential Chancellery Dr. Meissner Hitler's opinions about the political situation, has to be considered from this point of view.

The part Meissner played in it and also his general part in the formation of the Hitler Government cannot be established with certainty by means of the data at hand. In any case, being a member of the immediate circle around Hindenburg who finally took the decisive decision, he was by no means uninterested in the matters. His personality has been judged at least very differently. Because of his own interest in the case he can in no event be considered as a classical witness for the judgment of the events of that time. His testimony bears certainly in one point the stamp of unlikeliness. He maintains that he opposed Hindenburg's decision after the latter decided to appoint Hitler to the office of Reich Chancellor. This is said by the same man who during the session of the Cabinet concerning the "Enabling Law" (Ermaechtigungsgesetz) did not consider it necessary to maintain the right of the Reich President to proclaim laws, the same man who after the events of 30 June 1934 obviously collaborated in isolating Hindenburg from all those who could give him a true representation of the events. I make these remarks because a part of a Meissner Affidavit was read during the hearing of evidence against Papen. Although according to the decision of the Tribunal, the contents (of the affidavit) which was read shall not constitute a basis for the verdict, during the cross-examination questions were nevertheless asked which referred to the affidavit; this could cause an erroneous judgment. Besides, the decision of the Tribunal relieves me of the obligation to discuss in detail the contents of the affidavit and to indicate a number of inaccuracies which could be easily refuted.

The hearing of evidence has shown that until 28 January, Papen made no attempts whatsoever as regards the formation of a Government. On that day, in view of the imminent convocation of the Reichstag, Schleicher had to bring about a decision. On 1 December 1932 he advised Hindenburg against an open fight against the parliament and stated that the employment of the armed forces in a possible civil war would be hopeless. Now he thought that he himself could find no other solution than to beg to be permitted the use of those forces which he previously considered as being insufficient. But since no change in the situation had occurred since that time which could offer reasons for Schleicher's change of opinion, since moreover the position of the NSDAP was strengthened by the elections in Lippe and the general political situation had become still more tense through the attitude of the parties, Hindenburg upheld his decision of 2 December. Thus, the resignation of the whole Schleicher cabinet was inevitable. Now the events had to take their course, which necessarily and logically they had to follow if the possible use of arms was to be avoided. There was only one solution now—negotiations with Hitler. Hindenburg commissioned Papen to conduct the negotiations for the formation of the government. On Hitler's part it was clear that he would maintain his inflexible demands namely to take over himself the office of Reich Chancellor. The task, clearly recognized by Papen, was now to set limits to the political activities of the new party which had not proved itself yet on such a large scale.

DEFENSE

First of all, a change of course had to be avoided in those ministries in which any radicalism would have been particularly detrimental, namely the Foreign Office and the War Ministry. Hindenburg reserved for himself the right of filling these two key positions. In order not to entrust the new Chancellor with appointing the remaining ministers, as had been customary heretofore, Papen was charged with this task in his capacity of homo regius. He succeeded in limiting the number of National Socialist ministers to a minimum. Three National Socialist members of the Government faced eight non-National Socialists who for the main part were taken over from the former cabinet and who guaranteed a steady policy in their ministries. That was not all; within the framework of the constitution the authority of the Reich Chancellor was to be limited in a manner never known before. Papen was appointed to the position of Vice-Chancellor. His function was not connected with a special department but mainly intended to constitute a counterpoise to the position of the Reich Chancellor. It was decided that Hitler in his capacity of Reich Chancellor should report to the Reich President von Hindenburg only in the presence of the Vice-Chancellor. Thus, a certain control was established when the Reich President formed his opinion about the requests presented by the Reich Chancellor. In view of Hindenburg's personality, of which, according to human foresight, one could expect a quite considerable influence upon Hitler, this control over the information Hindenburg received promised that a shift toward a radical course would be avoided. This was the part the defendant had in the formation of the Hitler Government! The prosecution sees herein a decisive, conscious step toward the transfer of full power to National Socialism.

By considering the case objectively, even in retrospect, one can indeed arrive only at the conclusion that in view of the inevitable necessity of ceding the leadership of the cabinet to the National Socialist party, all possibilities for limiting the importance of this measure were exhausted. The position of Reich Chancellor left to National Socialism and the appointment of only two National Socialist ministers represented the limit of Hitler's originally much more extensive demands and this limit was only reached after long efforts.

For the consideration of the present proceedings it would not matter if the solution adopted on 30 January was the only possible one or not. Even if one were of a different opinion, the only thing that matters in looking at the case from a criminal angle is whether Papen could consider this solution as a necessity or only as a mere political expediency. Even if, contrary to all the facts one regarded his opinion as a Utopia, it should be taken into consideration from the point of view of penal law that one could only speak of a guilt if he had known the future consequences and the future plans of aggression and if in spite of this he had collaborated in the formation of the Government. The facts just mentioned have proved that there is not even the slightest supposition for this.

In considering the case it is of especially decisive importance also that the two ministries which are the most important or which are the only ones to play a part at all in connection with the accusation of breaking the peace, the Foreign Office and the War Ministry, were placed in the hands of men who enjoyed Hindenburg's confidence and had no connection with Hitler and of whom an unbiased direction of the ministries could be expected. It is not unimportant to consider in this instance what expectation one might have from Hitler's personality and his future policy.

The leader of the opposition party takes for the first time the responsibility. A party, the structure and development of which could certainly occasion many objections and apprehensions. A party which had developed on the basis of an absolutely negative attitude toward the hitherto existing Government leadership. A party which with its noisy appearance had certainly made many concessions with regard to the constitution of its membership. A party which had laid down a new program including points some of which seemed a long way from reality and impossible to carry out and which caused many objections, but which—and this is the only essential fact within the scope of our consideration of the case—apparently did not have any criminal character.

DEFENSE

On the other hand one cannot disregard the experience taught by life and history that propaganda and responsible work are two very different things. That a party which develops from nothing needs, according to experience, more negative and noisy propaganda than an old existing party. Even if the cabinet of 30 January had consisted of National Socialists exclusively, even if a moderating element had not existed in Hindenburg's personality, one could have assumed according to the rules of reason and experience that Hitler, who acceded to power by means of propaganda, would take into account the existing conditions in his practical, responsible work and would show himself in his activities essentially different from what he appeared during the propagandistic preparation of the ascension to power.

A small example had already shown the difference between a party in opposition and in responsible Government work. The same National Socialists with their same program and their same propaganda who now, on the 30th of January took possession of the position of Reich Chancellor, had already held the leadership or participated in the governments of some German states. We see Frick, the leader of the Reichstag faction act as responsible minister in Thuringia. His field of action included even the police and we see the National Socialists zealously tackling some economic problems in these states. But we did not see them commit excesses or not even pursue an unreasonable policy which would have been at least in approximate agreement with their propaganda. Could it not be expected then that in the Reich, together with the greater tasks, the natural sense of responsibility would also increase? And that especially in view of the safety measures taken, matters would not take a dangerous course?

It is not superfluous to discuss Hitler's personality in this connection. Hitler, especially after the failure of the attempt to split off the Strasser group, was the absolute autocrat of his party. Undoubtedly he did not show in the leadership of his party, in his speeches, and in his appearance that reserve which would have been a matter of course for the leader of such a big party. However, all signs indicated that Hitler had the party under control to such an extent that he would be able to put through also unpopular measures which had to be taken under the pressure of reality. In the questions concerning the participation in the Government he had pursued a policy wise in its tactics but unpopular with the impatient masses, because he took the facts into account.

Could it not be expected then that this man who now had reached his aim namely to take over the leadership of the cabinet would abandon the unrealistic ideas he advocated when he was in the ranks of the opposition and would submit to the real exigencies of public and international life? It is also a general fact known from experience that a man confronted with particularly great aims and with a particularly big responsibility grows as a ruler and as a man in proportion with these aims and this responsibility. In view of this general historic experience one could not assume that a man entrusted with responsibility, after certain initial attempts which could be interpreted as being promising, would soon revert to the thesis of his former opposition ideas; that after a couple of years this man would throw overboard every positive idea he emphasized—I remember for instance Hitler professing his adherence to the Christian foundations of the State—and that he would even surpass the negative ideas he formerly advocated and increased to an immeasurable extent his aims and his methods. We see now Hitler's full development before us and we are perhaps tempted to interpret his actions during the last years, because they represent something which is so monstrous and therefore so particularly impressive, as being the manifestations of his whole personality, while assuming that during the preceding time he had already been the same.

It is not possible, within the scope of this trial and based upon the events, upon his speeches, and especially his actions, to interpret and to understand Hitler psychologically from the beginning of his political appearance until its end. His well-known fear of disclosing himself and the mistrust he showed more and more toward nearly everybody in his sphere of life make it particularly difficult to judge his personality.

The individual facts which occurred, lead however to the certain conclusion that Papen too, despite the fact that he was close to Hitler, could not suspect him in 1933 of being the man he showed himself during later years.

If Papen, in agreement with Hindenburg's wishes and while executing his orders in his capacity of homo regius, did everything in order to prevent the possibility of a radical development, fully aware of his responsibility, he also strove with all his energy toward the same goal over and beyond the obligations of this task. After the formation of the cabinet he did not cross his arms and take the easy way, which would have been favorable for him from an opportunist point of view. He undertook to form a counterweight to the National Socialists at the elections of 5 March 1933 through a union of the conservative parties of the right. For someone who would have adopted the National Socialist ideas or even agreed to offer blind obedience to their leader, the next thing to do would have been to put an end to the opposition of this large newly constituted conservative group and to let it make its way toward a union with the party which had recently come to power, a way which at that time appeared to many as absolutely natural. Papen entered the election contest as leader and organizer of the oppositional group "Black-White-Red" (Schwarz-Weiss-Rot). His speeches of that time, excerpts of which I submitted in the document book, show a clear picture of his aims and intentions. They were the affirmation of a nationalistic idea, free from the propaganda licentiousness of National Socialism and its doctrines. In any case, his program was in irreconcilable contrast to what later turned out to be the unpredictable extension and unlimited transgression of the confirmed aims of the NSDAP.

DEFENSE

The formation of the political action block "Black-White-Red" was to guarantee what Papen had tried to achieve by the composition of the Cabinet of 30 January: a coalition cabinet which as an inevitable result of parliamentary rules and the entire political situation left the post of Reich Chancellor to the leader of the strongest party, who however was forced to rule in the framework of a coalition cabinet with all the limitations which derived from it.

I believe that I have made it sufficiently clear by these statements that Papen's collaboration in the formation of the Cabinet of January 30 does not constitute an attempt to place National Socialism in a position of exclusive power. The opposite has been proven by facts.

With regard to the defense I have gone far beyond what would be necessary in any way for the denial of a verdict of guilty. If even at that stage somebody had cooperated in really giving the National Socialist party an exclusive influence, there still would not be any proof to see in this of a preparatory action for the punishable crime in the sense of the accusation. The program laid down by the National Socialist Party and the statements of the party leader of that time, which in view of their propaganda value must be construed much more narrowly from an objective angle, can be misinterpreted as much as one likes, and one may read into them in retrospect any number of facts which became recognizable later, one still cannot see in all this the way to the crimes set out in the Charter.

In Papen's activities as Vice-Chancellor during the period from 30 January 1933 to 30 June 1934, the Prosecution thinks it can see a continuation of his efforts toward a conspiracy for the purpose of consolidating the position in power of the ruling National Socialists. The Prosecution has charged him in this connection with collaboration in the various laws passed during this period by the government, which according to their opinion merely served the aforementioned aims. I will demonstrate, however, how the work of the defendant developed in detail, in particular that he did not deviate from his original policy. The Prosecution deals with a number of laws passed by the cabinet in the beginning which must be considered as a compromise as far as their political format is concerned, a compromise between the demands of the National Socialists, and the conservative ideas of the other members of the cabinet.

We see problems being touched which National Socialism made the subject of discussion and propaganda for years. The conservative members of the cabinet were then facing the following situation:

The strongest party and the Reich Chancellor could not entirely ignore these questions, they had to be solved in some form. The principle of every coalition cabinet entails a compromise for both parties. In compromising, the other party need not change its opinion. If, for example, in a coalition cabinet, which is led by a labor party, the program of the labor government which perhaps contemplates a general socialization to be carried out in practice, the collaboration of the other members of the cabinet will consist in preventing a general extension of the measure and in limiting its effect to those cases, which in their opinion deviate least from the course followed before. One cannot expect from the strongest party and from its leader who occupies the constitutional position of Reich Chancellor to continue the policy of his predecessors. The other members of the coalition must make sacrifices if any governmental activity is ever to be possible.

Since in the framework of this Trial we do not have to judge considerations of political expediency and not even moral conceptions, but only whether what happened was done with a criminal purpose in the sense of the Charter the task set for the defense is comparatively simple.

In the legislation we see the ideological problems raised by National Socialism partly solved. We must concede to the non-National Socialist cabinet members involved that, in considering these laws, they thought about a final solution and not about an intermediary stage. Their basis was the experience of the past, the experience of the political life of all countries, namely that a problem settled by law is normally concluded. It was unthinkable—for it was incompatible with a normal governmental activity and the preservation of the authority of a legislative body—that after the issuance of a law, a problem which had already been dealt with should continually be considered anew in the following years and each time be brought to a more radical solution. Papen has proved that he carefully tried to maintain the concessions made to the opponent within a more or less endurable limit. The fact that in the laws of that time, National Socialist doctrines appear only rarely and in moderate terms, shows sufficiently that the composition of the cabinet of that time with regard to personalities had a retarding influence on the penetration of National Socialist ideas.

DEFENSE

Without this influence it would not be understandable why Hitler undertook a relatively unpopular limitation of the previously advocated aims of the party.

The hand of the defendant which checked and corrected the shaping of the individual laws is clearly discernible. The classic example for this are his endeavors in bringing about the Enabling Act (Ermaechtigungsgesetz). It was a technical necessity to the legislation during the crisis of that time. The preceding years had shown that owing to the time-consuming deliberations in the Reichstag urgently needed legislation was not acted upon satisfactorily. Therefore, already in Bruening's time, almost all the legislative power was practically put in the hands of the Reich President, so that the important laws were issued in the form of emergency decrees by unilateral legislative acts of the Reich President. If, due to these compelling reasons, the legislative power could not in practice be left in the hands of the Reichstag, the legislative power thus transferred to the cabinet constituted a compromise. As shown by the result of the Reichstag vote concerning the Enabling Act, none of the parties including the Zentrum party failed to recognize this. The question now arises as to whether the right of the cabinet, where, according to the constitution the Reich Chancellor had to establish the fundamental lines of policy, would be limited by the fact that the right of proclaiming laws was reserved for the Reich President. The State Secretary of the Reich President himself declared in a cabinet session that he did not think it necessary to charge Hindenburg with the responsibility of the entire legislation because of the latter's right to proclaim laws. Papen's direct intervention with Hindenburg immediately afterward remained without success, as stated by the witness Tschirschky.

Then, we see Papen again in the foreground when the problem of anti-Semitism had its first legal result. At that time, the situation was the following:

There were the broad masses who for years had been influenced in this direction, a predominantly National Socialist group who had consistent anti-Semitism as one point on their program. We saw the effects of propaganda on the masses which manifested themselves in the aforementioned individual actions, during the first weeks after the formation of the Hitler government.

The conclusions to be drawn from this situation were clear. A problem which has been stirred up, which had already a pernicious outcome in practice, had to be legally settled. It was clear that in this question National Socialism through its exaggerated propaganda had contracted a certain obligation toward its followers. It was difficult to determine the extent of the legal limitation which for the incited masses always remained a disappointment. The way out could only be a compromise. The settlement was directed to a field where a change in the hitherto existing situation seemed to be the least severe.

Whereas in accordance with the contents of the "Professional Government Employee law" (Berufsbeamtengesetz) only those were dismissed from their position who occupied their position not on account of their professional qualification, but due to their membership in a political party, all Jewish government employees who were appointed after 1918 were also dismissed. As a rule, a right of pension was maintained. Papen's successful endeavor aimed to limit numerically the effect on the Jewish government employees concerned. He had an audience with Hindenburg who was especially approachable on the idea of protecting war veterans. Through Hindenburg's personal influence on Hitler, Jewish war veterans and dependents of fallen soldiers were then excepted from this law.

Since an overwhelming part of the young government employees who had been employed since 1914 were war veterans, the numerical effect of this exertion was quite considerable. This is made especially clear by the official figures published concerning the conditions in the legal profession, and which were presented in Defense Exhibit 33. Furthermore, the defendant is charged for the measures taken against the labor unions. First consideration must be given to the fact that the measures were not carried out by a regulation based on a Reich law. It is moreover important that with the reshaping of affairs the continuation of labor unions with a Social Democratic character and a similar influence might have appeared as an anachronism.

Papen's attitude with respect to the labor union problem is shown by his speech of 4 March 1933, Document 10. Here, too, it must be considered that at the time the measures were taken, one could not have foreseen the extent of their further development. Considering its many rather sound ideas for the settlement of social questions, the German Labor Front at the time of its foundation did not merit the judgment it now deserves for the coercive measures taken at the end.

The amnesty decree, as shown by the hearing of evidence, is no novelty. Also in 1922, in order to set an end to a period of political unrest, an amnesty decree was issued, which also pardoned crimes subject to death sentence. The establishment of special courts was a measure of expediency to speed up the sentencing of political offenders, because longer normal proceedings did not safeguard the desired momentum of warning. It is significant that the order concerning crimes of violence was applied for the first time during Papen's Reich chancellorship, National-Socialists in the case of the Potempa murderers. Thus it is erroneous to see in the nature of those laws a commendation of actions committed or a promotion of the Nazi idea.

If the Prosecution, in criticizing Papen's legislative activity during this time, still engages in considering the Political Coordination Act for the states (Laender) of 31 March 1933, it touches first of all a question of home policy, which is really far outside of a field which could justify a discussion in the sense of the Indictment.

If the indication of the Prosecution should have the sole purpose of showing that Papen has in this respect changed the point of view advocated previously, it must be said here that political opinions in general subject to alterations and often must be altered, and that from a change of conception with respect to political expediency measures one can by no means draw a conclusion as to a general change of opinion. As a matter of fact, the first Statthalter Act was designed to eliminate a dualism between the Reich and the States (Laender), which Papen had always considered as disadvantageous. Papen has always advocated, especially with respect to Prussia, a solution in the sense of Bismarck's time, when the office of President of the Prussian Council of Ministers and that of Reich Chancellor were united in one person.

Thus, this question which ought to be touched only in passing involves not even a change of opinion, much less a change of sentiment.

The following must be considered with respect to the legislative work in the cabinet of the defendant von Papen: His position of vice-chancellor was without an administrative province. The influence, even in political questions, which the head of a regular ministry had in cabinet sessions did therefore not exist in the case of Papen. He could only express misgivings or objections from a general point of view without being able to base them on departmental grounds.

Considering the small number of cabinet session protocols available—despite all my efforts I did not succeed in procuring the remaining ones—the extent of Papen's opposition and that of the other ministers cannot be proved by documents. The fact that he voiced this opposition was revealed in the hearing of evidence. But, as admitted, the success was a small one. Thus, it is the duty of the defense to investigate deeper the reasons why Hitler's powerful position gradually increased and why the influence of the non-National-Socialist ministers became smaller, in short, why the guarantees failed which had been provided when the government was formed on 30 January.

At the beginning the course of the cabinet sessions did not deviate from the normal procedure. The questions which arose were made the subject of discussions. Hitler did not try to carry through at any cost the bills which were rejected for good reasons. A clear description to that effect is given by the affidavit of the former minister Hugenberg (Def. Exhibit 88).

The elections of 5 March, with the overwhelming success of the National Socialist party brought along a substantial change. Beyond its purely parliamentary effects, Hitler was strengthened in his conviction of being the deputy of the German people. He thought that now the time had come for him to make use of his right, granted to him by article 56 of the constitution of the Reich, to determine in his capacity of Reich Chancellor the fundamental lines of policy even in case of an opposition on the part of the ministers.

With respect to the constitutional situation I refer to Document 22 which shows that in questions of fundamental policy even a majority decision of the ministers was without effect against the decision of the Reich Chancellor. Now, Hitler became very unapproachable to any suggestions. In case of a relevant opposition he thought to have against him an oppositional phalanx, and soon it became evident that objections made in the cabinet were of no use to change Hitler's attitude. At the best, one could hope, as the defendant v. Neurath declared as a witness, to influence Hitler outside the cabinet in a direct discussion. The essential factors in Hitler's development into an autocrat were his increasingly strengthened position with regard to Hindenburg and his ever increasing influence on the Reich Defense Minister von Blomberg.

DEFENSE

Hitler's first measures which, in Hindenburg's eyes, showed his endeavors toward the establishment of a strict order had constantly improved Hitler's personal relations with Hindenburg. He skillfully understood to adjust himself to Hindenburg's mentality. Therefore, he succeeded very soon to abolish the original stipulation concerning the obligation of making joint reports. Thus, Papen was deprived of the major possibility to influence Hindenburg.

The attitude of the War Minister von Blomberg was the second decisive point in Hitler's development.

The Wehrmacht was a factor of power. Hitler knew that its men and officers were probably essentially unpolitical, but that by no means—especially as far as its leadership was concerned—they were inclined to have National Socialist ideas. An extensively radical course of the government might therefore always give rise to resistance on the part of the Wehrmacht. It must be added that owing to his personality Hindenburg listened especially willingly to reports coming from military circles. As long as the War Minister was not a disciple of Hitler, the latter was prevented from carrying out any radical ideas.

It is not yet possible today to gain an historically clear picture, which would permit one to explain the reason for Hitler's influence on Blomberg. We must state the fact that Blomberg became very soon an ardent admirer of Hitler, and that on his part no sort of resistance could be expected against any extensive radical development whatsoever of Hitler's policy. The 30th of June 1934 proved this very clearly.

In retrospect the logical consequence of this development becomes clear. Hitler could only be impressed by power. The Wehrmacht with its strength of that time was, especially in relation to the position of the Reich President von Hindenburg, a factor of power with which, at the beginning, even Hitler and his party would not have been able to cope in case of a commitment of forces. That is the reason for Hitler's endeavor to win Hindenburg's confidence, that is the reason for his comparatively cautious maneuvering during the time before Hindenburg's death, which by no means allowed to presume a further stronger development. From the time of Hindenburg's death, Hitler appeared as a dictator without consideration for anything and who at least in the field of internal policy displayed his ruthless power policy.

In addition to the legislative activity of the cabinet, the Prosecution dealt with the question to what extent Papen was responsible for the oppression of political opponents and for certain acts of violence which occurred during the period which the terminology of that time called "national revolution."

During the cross-examination Papen was asked whether he knew about the arrest and mistreatment of individual Communist and Social-Democratic personages named to him. Papen gave an essentially negative answer. However, he knew that due to the Decree for the Protection of People and State issued by the Reich President, measures had been taken which suppressed the personal liberty of a great number of leftists. The decree was issued by the Reich President outside Papen's responsibility and by suppression of the relevant constitutional stipulations. It was established under the impression created by the Reichstag fire, an event which up to the present day has not been clearly elucidated, but for which the official statement that Communist circles had instigated the arson seemed to be absolutely believable. Especially since the search of the Liebknecht House, the Communist headquarters, produced, according to Goering's declaration, very serious evidence concerning the actions planned against the Reich cabinet. The inquiry was held by a judge of the Reichsgericht (Reich Supreme Court), a personality whose impartiality was beyond any doubt. Therefore, Papen could understand the legal security measures which the administration of the interior thought necessary.

But knowledge of the arrest of those politicians is by no means connected eo ipso with the knowledge of the details and of the extent of the measures taken at that time.

During the years of the National Socialist regime we learned again and again that the knowledge of acts of violence remained restricted to the narrow circle of the direct participants. The measures taken before the release of an internee in order to reduce him to silence were evidently successful. Thus, we see again and again that there was always only a small circle of knowing persons which was composed of the immediate environment of returned internees. This explains the fact which sometimes amazes one afterward, namely, that quite large circles were not informed of the kind and extent of the excesses committed. It is evident that close relatives and similarly thinking friends of the politicians arrested at that time knew of what had happened to their people. The extent of the secrecy is shown best by the fact that the witness Gisevius assumes that the conditions in concentration camps did not become generally known to Gestapo officials until 1935.

DEFENSE

Thus, it seems to me absolutely explainable, that Papen knew very little about the measures, which during the first months were almost exclusively taken against political opponents of National Socialism coming from leftist circles, at any rate, that his knowledge did not go beyond the fact, that in this respect, arrests were made within the scope of the "Decree for the Protection of Nation and State."

It was a different matter, however, with the later encroachments on the rights of church offices and organizations, which to a large extent appealed to him and whom he at once tried to help energetically. The same holds true for the measures in connection with 30 June 1934, which will be discussed later on.

In any case it is a decisive fact that the measures as far as they were outside the law were subject to the jurisdiction of the police and the Ministry of the Interior. The law itself is an emergency decree of Hindenburg's. It came about legally. The now broadened conception of protective custody does not in itself constitute a crime.

With regard to anti-Jewish excesses the Prosecution accused Papen of having sent a telegram to the New York Times on 25 March 1933 describing the situation in Germany as quiet so far, and of having pointed out that individual actions had occurred but were now prohibited by an order from Hitler.

From the sources which were accessible to him Papen had of course heard of the excesses of which individual SA men had become guilty in this period which was still unsettled politically. If, on 12 March 1933, Hitler categorically forbade such actions by individuals and ordered the strictest punishment for any culprits in the future, Papen could assume with a clear conscience that this order which emanated from the highest authority would henceforth be obeyed.

In passing, it is not uninteresting in this respect to refer to a public announcement of the "League of Jewish Front Soldiers" of 25 March 1933. This proclamation also stated the fact that the situation with respect to the Jewish population was in general quiet and that excesses were confined to actions by individuals, which had now been forbidden by Hitler. (I shall submit this publication of the League in my Document Book for the Reich Government.)

The same standpoint was taken in a publication of the American Chamber of Commerce in Cologne on 25 March 1933, which publication I shall also present during the hearing of evidence for the Reich Government.

The Jewish boycott which was announced some days later and which was carried out on 1 April 1933 was, contrary to the opinion of the Prosecution, no government measure but exclusively a party measure which Papen, too, sharply opposed as well as others in the cabinet. The publication of the "Times," submitted with Neurath's defense Exhibit 9, proves that over and beyond this Papen made representations to Hindenburg and called for the latter's intervention with Hitler.

For the rest, one must take into consideration the fact that the Jewish boycott had been announced as a defensive countermeasure which was to be limited in time and to be extended only to business life. It had been expressly ordered that any use of force was forbidden and that excesses were to be prevented by corresponding measures. In its presentation of matters of domestic policy the Prosecution has merely shown that through the measures taken the position of the National Socialist party was to be strengthened, so that it should then be possible to turn to the aims of the foreign policy of force which had been decided upon beforehand. Still more important than the discussion of domestic conditions is therefore an examination of the foreign policy of the Reich during the time Papen was Vice Chancellor.

Hindenburg's reservation, that he would appoint the Foreign Minister and the appointment of von Neurath to this post when he had been Foreign Minister until then and was not a National Socialist, leads one necessarily to expect a development of foreign policy along the course hitherto taken.

Hitler's first measures seemed not only to justify this expectation but even to go beyond it. The first speech on matters of foreign policy held on 17 May 1933 dealt with Germany's relations to Poland which in the past had never been entirely satisfactory. The annexation by the Poland which had newly come into existence of large territories formerly belonging to the German Reich had brought with it a latent tension between these states. Hitler was the first to take up the problem and to resolve, according to his declaration in the Reichstag, to bring about a policy of friendship with Poland by recognizing the Polish state and its needs. If one considers the fact that this thought of renouncing all claims to a revision against Poland was not only generally unpopular but also stood in sharp opposition to previous propaganda, it was impossible to foresee the development of later years. One was necessarily convinced that here was an internally strong government supporting its domestic reconstruction with a policy of peace abroad.

Germany's adherence to the Four Power Pact, and its renewed profession of adherence to Locarno serve to underline this conviction. The struggle in foreign politics for ideological values lay in a different direction. The question of eliminating the clause in the Versailles Treaty which stipulates Germany's exclusive guilt and the question of equal rights for this large country which had pursued a persistent policy of peace since 1918 were demands which on one hand did not seem to burden the other side with unbearable sacrifices and which were yet suited to remove from the German people an ideological burden which it considered a pressing one.

DEFENSE

Germany's withdrawal from the disarmament conference must be considered from these viewpoints. It took place after long drawn out negotiations had produced no positive results and because it was in no way evident that the powers were inclined to bring about in future a fulfillment of the German demands. The declaration of the Reich Government and of Hindenburg that this step was to be looked upon as a tactical step, and that the same objectives were to be retained, namely the preservation of peace under recognition of equal rights, all this therefore had to appear credible and reasonable.

From the same points of view Papen also approved of this setup. With regard to the simultaneous withdrawal from the League of Nations, opinions could have differed. Here, too, one might hold the view that the withdrawal was necessary as a movement of protest and that one could prove through factual efforts in the matter itself that it was intended to adhere to a policy of peace.

Papen figured among those who felt obliged to advise against withdrawal from the League of Nations, even though he himself had experienced as Reich Chancellor that the negotiations in the large and manifold assembly of the League caused certain difficulties in some questions. On the other hand, however, he was so convinced of the institution of the League of Nations as an instrument of agreement and of facilitation of the technical possibilities for agreement that he wished to avoid withdrawal from the League of Nations. He advocated this opinion very strongly. Since he could not persuade Hitler in Berlin, he followed him to Munich shortly before the decision in order to lay his well-founded opinion before him there. Ergo we see Papen here working actively in a field for which in his position as Vice Chancellor he actually has no responsibility aiming at a solution which if one takes as a basis the views of the Prosecution concerning the withdrawal from the League of Nations can only be considered as a step toward peace.

Because of the fundamental importance of the withdrawal from the League of Nations the measure was submitted to the German people in form of a plebiscite enabling it to state its opinion. On the occasion of this plebiscite, Hitler, the government, and Hindenburg issued proclamations which emphasized expressly that this step was not intended to constitute a change of policy but merely a change of method. Preparations for the plebiscite were carried out in line with this statement.

The Prosecution accuses Papen of having glorified in his Essen speech the successes of Hitler's government and of having advocated an unconditionally affirmative attitude toward the questions to be decided by the plebiscite.

If Papen did this, it was because he felt obliged to do so, the decision having been cast once and for all and having to be justified before the foreign countries. If the responsible leaders actually did not strive for anything but a change of methods, no objections could be made. The position of German foreign policy would have been shaken if the people had shown in the plebiscite that it opposed the measure already taken. It was therefore quite natural to approve of this policy in public within the framework of the solemnly given assurances. Moreover, it could not be overlooked that in a plebiscite on government measures the vote of confidence could not pass over internal politics altogether.

We have to take the date of the speech into consideration. In November 1933 Hitler had made good progress in the field which was in the foreground of necessity and interest, namely in the easing of economic distress and the elimination of unemployment. His measures were on a large scale and at first showed apparent success. Here, too, one cannot measure things by the same standard as one applies to them to-day in full knowledge of their development. At that time the course taken hitherto seemed justified by its success. In his electoral speech which demanded a vote of confidence in the government for the purpose of agreement on a matter of foreign policy, Papen felt obliged to refer appreciatively to this positive development in internal politics.

In his introductory speech Mr. Justice Jackson acknowledged himself in the following words the conditions in 1933 which have been described.

"After the reverses of the last war we saw the German people in 1933 regain its position in commerce, industry, and art. We observed its progress without distrust and without malice."

Of all problems of foreign policy it was perhaps the question of German-French relations which interested Papen most. In his own testimony he has stated his views on this subject and has related how as early as in the twenties he collaborated in various political and or Catholic bodies with the idea of promoting understanding and rapprochement between France and Germany. I refer in this connection to Document 92 and to the meeting between Papen and the French Colonel Picot which is described therein and which is characteristic of Papen's attitude.

DEFENSE

In the new government, too, Papen paid special attention to this question as commissioner for the Saar territory. We see how he attempted to avoid also in the Saar question everything that could in any way impair the relations between the countries; even if only temporarily. From this came his suggestion that there should be no recourse to a plebiscite which might give renewed impetus to political chauvinism in both countries. Hitler himself, not only before he took over power but also as responsible chief of the cabinet had stated time and again that Germany had no intention of bringing up the question of Alsace-Lorraine, but that the Saar question was the only problem to be still settled between the two countries. And in so doing he followed the suggestions of Papen entirely which aimed at a peaceful settlement.

Furthermore Papen is accused of having deceived the contracting party, namely the Vatican, when he concluded the concordat in July 1933. By concluding the concordat Papen had intended merely to strengthen Hitler's position and to enhance his reputation abroad.

The hearing of evidence has shown that the concordat in its effects, too, was a bilateral pact and that the legal obligations of the concordat offered certain legal protection to the violated party also during the Treaty violations on the part of Germany which followed soon afterward.

In any case, it is entirely wrong to suppose that Papen had any knowledge of intended future violations of the treaty and that he had brought about its conclusion while he was in possession of such information. If he had wished to enhance Hitler's reputation abroad, this means would have been the least suitable that could be imagined. A struggle against the church without the concordat would have been a matter which, it is true, would have met with an unfavorable reception abroad, but which nevertheless would have been an internal German affair. Through the existence of an interstate treaty these church persecutions became simultaneously a violation of an international treaty with resulting effects of a special nature upon prestige. One cannot conclude a treaty for the purpose of gaining prestige if immediately after its conclusion one proceeds to violate the same treaty. This deliberation alone already refutes the assumption of the Prosecution. Beyond this the accusation of the Prosecution is of symptomatic importance.

Every action of Papen's which has somehow come to light must be interpreted in the sense of the conspiracy theory to Papen's disadvantage, and the simplest recipe for this is to place the later development into the foreground, claiming Papen's cooperation and knowledge in this development, and to designate his previous contrary statements of opinion as ambiguous and double-faced. This recipe is simple if one considers the knowledge of later developments in retrospective as self-evident and if one does not picture the true, factual situation at the time, above all, if one makes no effort to reexamine the logic in the original intention which is claimed and the further developments it had. Only in this manner can one as in this instance achieve a result which on closer consideration presupposes the folly of the person acting at the time.

But quite apart from these deliberations the attitude of the defendant toward religious matters prohibits the slightest doubt in the sincerity of his intentions. In the hearing of the evidence it was set forth that not only his closest personal advisors in church affairs but also the highest dignitaries of the church who were in closest personal as well as professional contact with the defendant in these matters emphasized that his attitude as a Catholic was absolutely free of reproach at all times. The lack of foundation of the whole indictment with regard to church questions is already made clear by the confutation of the assertion of the Prosecution that Papen himself broke the Concordat by dissolving the "Work Association of Catholic Germans" ("Arbeitsgemeinschaft Katholischer Deutscher")—I refer in this respect to the unequivocal testimony of the former secretary of the "Work Association of Catholic Germans," Count Roderich Thun. (Defense exhibit 47.) It must be stated, however, that Papen not only saw with regret the subsequent violations of the Concordat by the Reich but that he actively tried to oppose them. The entire activities of the "Work Association of Catholic Germans" consisted practically of nothing else but the establishment of such violations of the Concordat in order to furnish Papen with a basis for his constant interventions with Hitler. After Papen's departure for Vienna the practical opportunity for such interventions ceased to exist.

From all of Papen's speeches it is evident that his attempt at safeguarding the churches did not emanate from considerations of political expediency of the day but from his fundamental religious attitude. I believe there is no speech in which he did not express himself on this problem emphasizing time and again that only the Christian philosophy of life—and thus the Christian churches—could be the foundation for the orderly government of a state. In just this Christian foundation he saw the best protection against the tendency of the party to give preference to an ever increasing extent to the idea of sheer might over that of right.

DEFENSE

With regard to Papen's report to Hitler of 10 July 1935 (2248-PS) which was submitted during the cross-examination the Prosecution fell victim to a quite obvious misunderstanding. Papen refers in it to the favorable results there would be in the field of foreign politics if one could succeed in eliminating political Catholicism without touching the Christian foundation of the state. Papen does not state here his opinion on past and present situation but furnishes advice for the future. The contents of this advice are definitely positive in the ecclesiastical sense. They state that one may eliminate political Catholicism but the purely ecclesiastical interests themselves, that is, the Christian foundation of the state must remain untouched. These directives destined for future times obviously contain criticism of the past as well. We see here how in connection with activities in the field of foreign policy matters are discussed and brought up to Hitler which in themselves belong to another field.

In his own testimony Papen stated his opinion of the accusation of the prosecution that as a good catholic he should have resigned after the Pope had issued his Encyclical Letter "With Grave Apprehension" of 14 March 1937. Papen could refer in this connection without any criticism and with full approval to the standpoint of the church itself which has always been of the opinion that one should hold a position so long as it still offers the slightest opportunity for positive work. Owing to this wise attitude and to its feeling of responsibility for the German Catholics the Church did not completely break with the Third Reich until the end. One cannot ask an individual Catholic to take any other standpoint. This all the less as Papen in purely foreign political activities came into no conflict whatsoever with his Catholic conscience.

The accusation that in the fall of 1938 he should have protested to Hitler about the treatment of Cardinal Innitzer is also lacking in foundation. Papen himself can no longer remember today when and in what form he heard of these occurrences at all. The German press did not publish anything about it and in no case did such matters reach the public via internal Church channels, as the Prosecution assumes. In any case at that time Papen had no possibility whatsoever to intervene, being merely a private person and besides in bad standing with Hitler for the moment.

I have already dealt with Hitler's development into an autocrat. After the abolishment of joint reports to Hindenburg, Papen's influence was reduced to minimum. Protests in cabinet sessions coming from a single man who was unable to base these protests on requirements of his own department were of purely declaratory nature. Meanwhile the circle of applying Nazistic doctrines in practice was closing more and more. It became clear that the willingness to compromise of the first days in agreeing to a rule by coalition was slowly abandoned and that the National Socialist idea kept gaining ground in all fields. It was clear to Papen, that he could not follow that course. It was likewise clear that he in the framework of his official position could not alter the general trend, despite his efforts to help in individual cases. On the other hand his theoretically still existing position of Vice Chancellor gave him certain weight in public life. Thus he had to face the problem whether he should stand forth with public criticism of prevailing abuses as a last attempt to gainsay influence upon the development by public discussion of the problems. In case of failure, he would have at least achieved the public branding of those abuses by a responsible party, even if as a natural consequence Papen would have to give up his position and would thus no longer be able to aid many people in individual cases.

In his Marburg speech of 17 June 1934 Papen distinctly branded all abuses which had become apparent until that time. Such extensive public criticism remained the only instance in the history of the "Third Reich."

He realized that the danger of Nazism lay in the fact that its different doctrines in practice dovetailed into an encircling inclosure suppressing the entire public life. Had that inclosure been breached at a single spot, the dangerous character of the entire system could not have been maintained. If only one of the points discussed would have met with success when carried out in practice, it would have shown a total change of conditions. The system objected to could not have existed another day if the freedom of public speech, demanded by Papen, would have been granted. It could not have been upheld, if the conception of justice and of equality before the law were recognized. It could not have existed if freedom of religion were granted. A Nazistic racial theory cannot be upheld if the maxim of the individual's equality, common to all confessions, is advocated.

Each of Papen's attacks in his Marburg speech—he had dealt with the racial issue already in his Gleiwitz speech—was in itself an attack upon the development of the entire Nazi doctrine. The audience was clearly shown by a leading member of the opposition in the government where the entirety of the abuses originated from.

DEFENSE

The consequences for Papen of such an action were obvious to begin with.

Either Hitler would take into consideration the state of affairs, after it had become a matter of public discussion or Papen was going to offer his resignation, since for further cooperation he could no longer reconcile his viewpoint with the path chosen by Hitler.

Evidently Hitler in his position at that time did not consider it necessary to make a concession to public opinion by deviating from his line of action. He tried to kill the opposition by forbidding the publication of the speech and by penalizing its distributors. Papen resigned, Hitler did not accept his resignation immediately, since he obviously had to take Hindenburg into consideration, wishing to clear up the situation first of all with him. Meanwhile the events of 30 June took place.

What fate had been destined for Papen in the course of those events will probably never be known definitely. Particularly, it will never be elucidated whether different people were moved by different intentions.

The improvisation of the action becomes best apparent in the way it was carried out against the office of the Vice-Chancellor. Bose was the first victim in the very building of the Vice-Chancellery. Jung, who was arrested outside of Berlin, was similarly shot. His fate, though, became known to Papen and the public only much later, as it had been hoped at the beginning that he not only had left Berlin but had gone to Switzerland, having been warned by the measures taken against the Marburg speech. The other members of the staff, which could be apprehended, were taken into custody by the police and later sent to concentration camps. As to Papen himself one evidently hesitated to make a final clear decision on his fate. His close relationship to Hindenburg would seem to indicate the advisability of not burdening the list of victims of 30 June with so prominent a name, after it had been burdened enough in relation to Hindenburg with the crime, against Schleicher, camouflaged though as self-defense.

Anyway, within the framework of the accusation it suffices to establish that whatever Papen's fate has been in the end, the measures taken against him and his people demonstrate his absolute opposition against Hitler and the Nazi policy.

During the cross-examination the Prosecution presented letters to Papen, which outwardly seem to show at first a certain divergence from his usual attitude. In those letters Papen assures Hitler of his attachment and loyalty and hides his real and material desires under polite phrases which otherwise were in no way customary in his relations with Hitler. It may appear surprising, that a man who opposed the system, who had been persecuted for that reason and upon whose associates such incredible things had been inflicted, chose such a form of letter. But for a fair judgment a correct understanding of the state of affairs at that time is required. A state of lawlessness existed at that time. It offered a favorable opportunity to get rid of troublesome opponents in the course of these measures. The examples of Schleicher, of Klausner, and others have sufficiently shown that. There was no way of knowing beforehand when and in what manner the measures taken against the persons already involved in these matters would end. One believed almost hysterically to see in every man with opposing ideas a conspirator with those SA groups, who sooner or later were really going to revolt against Hitler.

How far indeed persons of the right on the ground of their opposite attitude had joined hands with the SA, a powerful factor at that time has not been established yet with certainty. Anyhow it could not be judged at that time whether or not Hitler's statements in regard to persons not belonging to the SA were correct.

For Papen the situation at that time was as follows: He knew of Bose's assassination, but was as yet unaware of Jung's fate. He hoped that the latter had escaped. Three of his co-workers were in a concentration camp. These had first to be released from there. And also for the future the suspicion had to be dispersed that any one of them as well as Papen himself had been in contact with the SA circles in revolt.

If Papen ever wished to make any representations with Hitler, the first requirement for any possible success would be to put a distance between him and such SA circles. Papen therefore felt obliged to assure Hitler of his loyalty and faith.

Besides Papen has been convinced for years that Himmler and Goebbels were behind the attack on him and the Vice-Chancellory and that Himmler in particular wanted to eliminate him, having been prevented from doing so only by Goering, and that therefore in order to safeguard himself against these two it was necessary to assure Hitler of his correct attitude.

In judging these letters it is not their form, but their contents which is essential. The alpha and omega of the letters are the demand of rehabilitation for his own person and his associates. He demands court action. He advises Hitler to strike out from his intended Justification Law all actions directed against persons outside the SA circle.

DEFENSE

But what is the meaning of these demands of Papen? Their real significance is the upholding of what is legal against the illegal actions of 30 June. He demands an objective and legal clarification of all that is to be condemned in the events of 30 June. When we consider these events of 30 June, we must bear in mind that these events fell into two parts. The first were measures against the SA leaders, whose radicalism had always been known and who were always to be connected with acts of violence and independent activities, which in the past had had to be condemned. An intervention against such people could be explained as an act of state defense against dangerous forces which were ever ready for revolt.

The other part consisted of measures against personalities who stay outside the SA circle. A court investigation would have resulted in the clearing up of these events and in the condemning of the responsible persons.

I believe that when in cool criticism one pictures to oneself the events at that time, one can only arrive at the conviction that Papen's situation aims could actually have been no other than that which he had proposed to Hitler a rehabilitation by means of a court action of those persons who had been unjustly persecuted and the elimination of a summary justification of the measures in question by a law. If we come now to the heart of the matter and to what was actually desired, we cannot give to the form of these letters the meaning which is ascribed to them by the Prosecution.

That the form in particular did not represent an approval of the measures of 30 June, but was merely used for the above-mentioned purpose is best shown by the examination of the letter of 17 July. Though at that time Papen had achieved the release of his co-workers from the concentration camp, his other demands were not fulfilled by Hitler. So we now see a piece of writing which is entirely lacking even in the most elementary forms of politeness—merely objective statements and objective requests—a piece of writing signed only the name of Papen without even a closing courtesy formula.

As to the affair in question Papen does not retreat from his line for a single moment: He holds fast to his resignation and demands immediate action on it, as the letter of 10 July 1934 shows. He refuses to play any part in future government activities. He leaves Hitler immediately after having had him called out of the Cabinet session on 3 July. He keeps aloof from the Reichstag session, at which the Justification Law has been confirmed. He rudely declines the offer to accept the comfortable post of ambassador at the Vatican. Such his negative attitude.

As to the positive one, he strives to bring about the intervention of the Wehrmacht. He turns to his friend Colonel General von Fritz Blomberg, but owing to his attitude, it is out of the question. Fritsch will not act without a formal order from the Reich President. So now Papen endeavors to get in touch with Hindenburg. But Hindenburg's entourage keep him off.

All accesses to his estate Neudeck are closed by SS guards. Papen sends his secretary Ketteler to Hindenburg's neighbor and old friend Mr. von Oldenburg to obtain entry in that way, but also that attempt fails. He has to witness, how obviously Hindenburg has been influenced, when he publicly approves of Hitler's conduct on 30 June in an official telegram.

So what was Papen to do now, which would promise even moderate success?

In his negotiations with Hitler he tried to keep things on a legal plain. The attempts to mobilize the only factor of power, the Wehrmacht, had failed. Hindenburg cannot be reached; he is evidently influenced by his advisers in the opposite direction.

The Prosecution is of the opinion, that this was just the time when Papen should have openly pointed out the criminal events on 30 June; he could possibly have effected thereby the collapse of the entire Nazi system. That assertion is untenable. Apart from the fact that Papen, as shown, had no longer the opportunity for such an official statement, subsequent developments in Germany demonstrated that such an individual protest would not have had any effect against the powerful position of Hitler either within the country or abroad. Hitler's prestige in Germany was already then so great and more so later on, that such a protest, even if it could have reached the public at all, would surely not have found any echo in the masses of the population. To be sure, the great masses saw only the economic improvement and the strengthening of Germany's position abroad and only a numerically thin layer realized the true danger of the development. Most foreign countries knew about the events on 30 June more than the German people. A statement by Papen to the people would not have thrown much more light on it. No conclusions were drawn from the available information by foreign countries either at that time or later.

The Prosecution is even of the opinion that such a step might have led to the reoccupation of the Rhineland by the French. I am unable to discover where the Prosecution has found a basis for such an assertion. It is contradicted by the fact that no military reaction of any kind followed after the events which occurred later and which do not belong in the realm of internal politics, but vitally touched the world abroad—as for instance the introduction of compulsory military service and the occupation of the Rhineland.

DEFENSE

By his resignation and ostensible non-participation in the sessions of the Cabinet and of the Reichstag, Papen showed the public that he was hostile to the development. His conduct was a public protest against the measures of 30 June and against their perpetration. The Prosecution cannot overlook these apparent signs which are historical facts. It attempts therefore to construct an anti-thesis between his conduct and his mental attitude. The only assistance at their disposal to that end are the letters addressed by Papen in July to Hitler. Even if the spirit and purpose of those letters were not clearly discernible from their contents, as in fact is the case, such an attempt would also fail in the face of the facts which were just stated because of the inadequate means at hand.

Generally, I would like to state in this regard the following. On what ground should Papen have taken an inimical attitude toward Hitler during his Vice-Chancellorship and during the events of 30 June, while being in fact a loyal follower of his? On what ground should Hitler have desired it himself who, according to the Prosecution, conspired with Papen—and this, after all, would only be a result of the conspiracy! Could it be in the interests of Hitler that Papen disclosed in his Marburg speech all the weaknesses and misdeeds of the Nazi system? On what ground should Hitler have wished that Papen so obviously distanced himself from the lawless actions on 30 June? It should have been in his interest that his Vice-Chancellor kept also outwardly in line with the Reichs-Chancellor.

If we consider that, only one conclusion can be arrived at: What the Prosecution believes to be able to interpret as the mental attitude of Papen, lacks all logic.

This thesis of an unconditional obedience to Hitler despite certain contrary facts intended to serve as camouflage is used again by the Prosecution with respect to Papen's acceptance of the position in Vienna.

Before discussing this complex let me briefly state the following:

In my opinion, the final development of the Austrian question, which occurred after Papen's recall and undoubtedly without his cooperation, namely the marching in on 12 March 1938, does also not represent a crime in the sense of the Charter. The Charter considers as punishable the preparation and the waging of a war of aggression or of a war in violation of international treaties.

In the three counts of the indictment, it has merely confined itself to the arraignment of what appears as a most serious crime with its terrible further consequences; the aggressive and prohibited war, the crimes against the rules of warfare, and the crimes against humanity in their most violent form, the immeasurable consequences of these grave actions have all justified this unusual trial. The Charter does not charge the Tribunal with the punishment of all the injustice which has occurred during the course of the development of National Socialism. Such a task could not be fulfilled within the framework of this Tribunal for technical reasons and for lack of time. It is not the task of the Tribunal to examine whether international treaties were observed or not. This question is only of importance if wars were caused or if the crimes of violence which are to be described in detail have to be accounted for. The march into Austria is no war however far one stretches the conception from the standpoint of international law. In this case it is a decisive fact that no force was employed and not even the slightest resistance was offered, that on the contrary the troops were received with jubilation. Furthermore, the march into Austria cannot be considered in connection with the later acts of aggression. It was a special case based on the special situation which since 1918 had already found its expression in the efforts both on the Austrian and on the German side to bring about a union (Anschluss) of the hardly prosperous Austrian state with Germany in some kind of constitutional form.

Therefore, the actual events must be detached from Hitler's war plans or purely military plans of preparation—with which I shall deal later—and must be regarded as the solution of a political problem of the country which had become acute and the result of which had always been the desire of both sides, independent of Hitler.

Papen's activity in Vienna is clearly characterized by three episodes; the circumstances of his appointment on 26 July 1934, his letter to Hitler dated 16 July 1936 (Defense Doc. 71) after the conclusion of the July agreement, and his recall on 4 February 1938.

The following circumstances lay at the origin of his appointment. A crucial event had occurred. Dollfuss is murdered; not only are the relations between Germany and Austria strained but they have reached an extremely dangerous stage of development. The international situation is menacing. Italy is marching upon the Brenner. An ultimate divergence of Austria toward one of the groups of powers interested is directly to be feared. Thus, there is the threat of a final situation which would definitely render impossible the maintenance of even merely supportable relations between Germany and Austria.

DEFENSE

In this difficult situation, Hitler obviously thinks it necessary to dismiss his objections against the personality of Papen and entrust him with the mission in Vienna. Papen was particularly fitted for the initiation of a policy designed to overcome the deadlock resulting from the assassination of Dollfuss. Papen had always spoken in the Cabinet favor of a friendly development of relations in the question concerning Austria. Papen was internationally known as a man for a reasonable policy of mutual understanding.

Papen naturally was extremely hesitating as to the taking over of this post. His experiences in the domestic sector of the last period, his personal attitude to the treatment of himself and of his collaborators on the 30 June, his attitude to the assassination of Dollfuss, with whom he had been on most friendly terms since the time of his previous activity, were opposed to the taking over of the post. This resolution therefore was for Papen a very grave one. The perception, however, that he himself would alone be in the position to fulfill this task within the framework of true pacification must outweigh everything. Could he assume that anybody else had the strong will and also the possibility of assuring the maintenance of the road of appeasement? He could never expect a personality of the Foreign Office and still less a member of the Party to have such a personal independence as he himself enjoyed. From his post as Vice-Chancellor Papen brought his experience. He knew the difficulties to convince Hitler by pertinent arguments in a corresponding form. He alone could hope to carry through his efforts for a peaceful policy, notwithstanding the extremist tendencies of Hitler's advisers. His experiences, on the other hand, had made him very careful. He made his conditions and demanded the establishment of a clear policy based on facts. He demanded the withdrawal of influence over the Austrian Nazi-movement, which must be assured by the dismissal of the man who directly or indirectly had participated in the criminal act: the Landesinspector Habicht. He requested his own subordination to Hitler in order to make possible the maintaining of the conditions which he had proposed, and in order to avoid any alterations in the course of its handling. He compels something seemingly impossible in contact with a head of the State; he has the conditions laid down in writing, under which he takes over his post as Ambassador. They are signed by Hitler. He wishes always to be in the position to force Hitler to keep to his written word.

We have a clear picture of these occurrences by the testimonies, particularly by the statement of the witness von Tschirschky, a man who according to the declarations of the Prosecution is really not suspected to view these things in the defendant's favor.

The Prosecution asserts that Papen, out of sheer opportunism as a faithful follower of Hitler's already known plans of aggression, had eagerly and willingly declared himself prepared to take over the new post.

Notwithstanding this, can this form of appointment, this extreme precaution of the defendant be really in agreement with such an attitude? These secret conferences, this unpublished document, signed by Hitler and in Papen's possession cannot really be considered a pretence in order to deceive, as would be the consequence of the Prosecution's charge. These things were not intended to be publicized and were never made public.

The circumstances at the taking over of the Vienna post could only lead to the conclusion that Papen honestly strove to maintain the established appeasement policy. It likewise is impossible to talk here of opportunism. Papen had declined the position of Ambassador to the Vatican. This position of an Ambassador in Vienna was hardly an enticing post of honor in a formed Reich Chancellor and recent Vice Chancellor.

Papen's own good economic situation excluded all along any material motives. Papen's letter of 16 July 1936 to Hitler (Def. Doc. 71) is the report of the success of his two years' efforts to bring about settled peaceful relations between both the countries. The treaty of 11 July 1936 put the seal upon this.

This document, the evidential value of which is without a shadow of doubt, clearly explains the task allotted to Papen and its performance. Papen points out that the aim has been reached for the execution of which he has been called to Vienna on 26 July 1934. He considered his task as accomplished with the conclusion of the Treaty.

No clearer evidence can be produced of the exactness of Papen's statement on his task and its performance than by this letter. Why did they believe they must impute a dubious interpretation to his mission? As an obliging instrument of Hitler's plans of aggression he has undertaken the task to prepare and carry out a forcible annexation of Austria. He has been charged with undermining the Schuschnigg Government and cooperating with Austria's illegal Nazi movement to this effect. All he did with a view to pacifying the mutual relations has been camouflage in order to enable him to carry out his underground plans. And here the trustworthy statement of account is mandatory.

DEFENSE

Is this also to be a camouflage, and give a presentation which stands in absolute contradiction to the facts—this letter, found by the Allied troops in the secret records of the Reich Chancellory and now thankfully placed at the disposal of the Defense Counsel by the Prosecution?

The third point that clearly characterizes Papen's activity in Vienna is his recall on 4 February 1938. The numerous recalls and nominations of that day clearly showed a reorganization of the most important military and political posts. The personalities of the recalled military and diplomats clearly show what the sole reason was for the unusual and extensive sudden change at that time. If Hitler then also recalled Papen from his post, without the actual reason for this, entirely unexpectedly and without giving a reason, it is thereby clearly proved that Hitler at the beginning of a radical foreign political course no longer saw in Papen the right man for Vienna.

These three points are suitable to confirm unequivocally and sufficiently the peaceful activity of Papen during the entire duration of his Austrian mission. As the Prosecution, however, also strives here to apply single events against Papen, I shall submit this period also to a short consideration still thus far.

We see Papen in a steady struggle with the illegal movement. The reproach that he had conspired with it is best led ad absurdum by the fact that Papen was selected as the victim of an attack by these same illegal men according to the plans of the illegal movement which have been confirmed by Foreign Minister Schmidt. The documentary evidence from the reports at hand which Papen sent to Hitler also has but one meaning. Here, too, there is a completely clear piece of evidence, since the reports to Hitler which took place regularly in the course of business, actually excluded an intention to deceive the public. It is regrettable that all the reports could not be found in order to give, in their entirety, a clear, complete historical picture of Papen's activity. Only a fraction of the reports are in front of us. But when Papen had transferred abroad at the end of his activity the copies of all his reports, as the evidence has shown, then he could have done this only in order to have a historical justification for his policy of peace. It is proven by it in complete clearness that his policy reproduced in the complete reports must have been a policy which was in contrast to the development which has been brought about by the other side in March 1938.

All witnesses, who have appeared in court and who could make statements about the Austrian conditions, have stated under oath that Papen led a policy of pacification and fought against any meddling of the illegal movement in the political happenings. What can be concluded from the presentation of the Prosecution against that? That Papen had to maintain a certain outside connection to members of the Austrian Nazi movement corresponding to his position as German Ambassador and corresponding to the state treaty concluded with Austria? A connection which was in no way kept secret, which was of an observing nature only, and which was necessary in order to fulfill the obligation to report to Berlin about the actual conditions in Austria. If he had actually worked together with the illegal movement in the way the Prosecution states, this would most certainly have been expressed in his reports to Berlin. He does not fabricate any secret plans with the law breakers, but we see him on the contrary in open negotiations with the Austrian government about the participation of the national opposition in the governmental work, which was agreed on in the July Treaty. And if we finally have before us the deposition of the history of the illegal movement in the report of Rainer (812-PS), we see their activity in those years takes place without the slightest cooperation or support from Papen.

What can be concluded against the defendant from the fact that he was interested in the activity of the Austrian Liberty Organization (Freiheitsbund)? If it is set forth that this Liberty Organization represents a non-Nazi, trade union, Austrian organization which was considered to be ready to go with Schuschnigg and to support the Cabinet?

What can be concluded against the defendant from the fact that he also observed the governmental conditions in Austria and reported to Berlin about them? And when the wish is expressed at this occasion that this or that constellation is favorable for the development of friendly relations with Austria?

During the cross-examination the Prosecution has presented reports of foreign agencies which Papen forwarded to Berlin. They believe that Papen has made the content of these reports his own. This supposition must be incorrect. The informational purpose of sending reports of the foreign secret service is clearly at hand. Beyond that the following has to be established here also. Papen especially forwarded to Berlin also those documents which had come into his hands and which contained a criticism of the German conditions. The witness Gisevius and Lahousen have pointed out that Hitler was informed incorrectly or insufficiently by his closest coworkers. The critical reports of foreign countries which Papen had forwarded to Hitler in a direct way could and also should fulfil the aim of drawing Hitler's attention to abuses and to make him abolish them. This is especially often the case concerning statements about the anti-clerical conditions in Germany. The presentation of the reports in the case Tschirschky concerning the activity of the Gestapo which were especially mentioned in the cross-examination are on the same line. The regular reports of Papen to Hitler deal partly also with the conditions in the neighboring states. The checking of the contents of the reports shows that they deal entirely with problems which are in direct connection with the foreign political situation of Austria in the Balkans and which therefore fall into the sphere of tasks of the ambassador accredited in Vienna.

DEFENSE

Finally we have to go into the affidavits of Messersmith. He describes events after a period of 10 years, in the case of Papen, seemingly in free memory. Time and later acquired information obviously seem to have clouded the picture of memory so completely that we see, for example, Papen's explanations about his tasks in the Southeastern area reproduced in the two affidavits with contents basically deviating from each other.

My criticism can furthermore be satisfied with the statement that the contents of the affidavits are in contradiction to every rule of experience and logic. A diplomat cannot have revealed the secret aims of his politics to the representative of another state who meets him with emphasized reserve. It is impossible, as Messersmith says in another place, that Papen told not only him, but even publicly, his alleged plan to overthrow Schuschnigg, with whose government Papen himself was accredited. It is an impossibility that such disclosures are supposed to have had no consequences whatsoever, and that they have been put down in an affidavit for the first time in 1945.

The two affidavits can therefore be no basis for the finding of a judgment, besides the fact that their content is disproved by the other evidence, which contained both the intentions and the actions of Papen.

I believe to have sufficiently discussed therewith the period in which Papen exercised his activity as Ambassador extraordinary in Vienna.

Beyond it, the Prosecution has taken into consideration Papen's cooperation in the discussion at Berchtesgaden on 12 February.

The occurrence of the conference of Berchtesgaden was not the beginning stage of a new course, but the result of the development up to that time. Months before, Papen and Schuschnigg in conversations had already regarded a meeting in the near future between the two statesmen as desirable. The July Treaty had naturally left many points of difference undecided. The testimony of the witness Guido Schmidt showed us the situation clearly: an opposition party very powerful in numbers, though officially not allowed but tolerated tacitly because of actual conditions, looked ideologically to a full extent toward its at least ideological leader in Germany. There the leader of this Party was at the same time head of the state. Regarding foreign policy a separation of the parties in both countries was necessary. The inner ideological unity, however, necessarily had to lead to differences again and again. We see, accordingly, in the Austrian government an understandable reserve and a constant concern to prevent a growth of the influence of this movement in administration and government. The treatment of the questions resulting from the July Treaty corresponded in practice also to this state of interests. It was obvious that the Austrian side should make an effort to treat the stipulations of the Treaty in a restrictive way. It was only natural that the wish existed on the German side to exhaust the possibilities of the Treaty to the fullest extent. Therefore, a direct contact with the responsible heads of both countries, who on the German side was at the same time the head of the Party, could only be regarded as a reasonable requirement.

The recall of Papen on 4 February threatened to break up this development. Perhaps with the approach of the more rigorous course which was expected, a meeting of that sort for the purpose of the eradication of existing difficulties would be postponed forever. Certainly, a different result could have been expected later on, in a tenser atmosphere, from the collaboration of a radical successor, than that hoped for by Schuschnigg and Papen.

It is therefore thoroughly understandable that even after his recall, Papen, during his farewell visit to Hitler on 5 February, when they came to speak of affairs, still accepted the mission to bring about the intended Conference and to accompany the Austrian delegation to Berchtesgaden for this purpose.

The Prosecution accuses Papen that already at that time the program of the subsequent talks had been determined. Papen, contrary to this, has testified in his interrogation, that he had only received the mission to arrange the discussion for the purpose of clearing up all points of difference on the basis of the July Treaty. The Prosecution still lacks the proof for its claim to the contrary. From what has happened on 12 February, it cannot in any way be concluded because of the personality of Hitler, what he personally thought at the first mentioning of such a discussion on 5 February, and much less, of which of his plans he informed Papen. The evidence has shown that the points voiced by Hitler on 12 February are identical with those demands which the Austrian National Socialists had raised immediately prior to the discussion and transmitted to Hitler in their own channels. From this it can be seen that the subject of conversation chosen by Hitler in the discussion of 12 February was at the very least substantiated and could not as yet have been on hand on 5 February. If the Austrian Nazis preceded Papen with their demands to Berchtesgaden, then the view of the Prosecution is thereby refuted that Papen had conspired with Hitler and the Austrian party. In this case he himself would probably have been the best liaison man between the wishes of the Party and Hitler. This is also emphasized through the testimony of the witnesses Seyss-Inquart and Rainer, who have stated clearly that they did not have any contact with Papen during this time. Rainer also points out in his report that Papen had been of the opinion that the fact of the prearranged discussions had remained secret before the Austrian party.

DEFENSE

The Prosecution has used the claim for the incrimination of Papen, that at the reception of the Austrian delegation on the German-Austrian frontier he had called Schuschnigg's attention to the presence of generals. Whether this really corresponds to the facts was not proven by the presentation of evidence. The sole evidence which can be used in respect to this is the testimony of Schmidt. The letter could no longer exactly testify anymore whether Papen had spoken of one General, namely Keitel, who according to past experiences after taking over his new office constantly kept himself in the surroundings of Hitler, or of several Generals. Papen himself does not know anymore to-day, if and in what form he made such an exclamation to Schuschnigg at the time. He also does not know if at the time he was aware at all of the presence of generals. It is very possible that it came to his knowledge at the overnight stay in Salzburg, where he had stayed at a different hotel from the Austrian delegation. In any case, however, the fact cannot be overlooked, that even if Papen had made the statement claimed by the Prosecution, this statement was made prior to the visit. That, therefore, he did not participate in any attempt at intimidation toward the Austrian gentlemen which might have been aimed at a motive of surprise. His participation in the discussion has been cleared by the evidence. Hitler alone was in command, who, in a brutal manner surprising to those who knew him, tried to impress Schuschnigg. Technical details were negotiated with Ribbentrop. Papen more or less participated as a spectator which also bore the fact into account that he did not occupy his official position anymore. According to the uniform testimonies of those participating, he only saw his task raised by circumstances to intervene soothingly.

One has to consider his position: he sees his intentions doomed to failure through the behavior of Hitler, which cannot be expected of any reasoning human being. He sees how a man who is quick-tempered by nature in his excitement lets all that go which is necessary for a reasonable discussion in the sphere of a conference of statesmen. He hears Hitler's threats, and has to consider him determined to let things go an irreparable way at the abrupt failure of the negotiations. In the framework of this situation, therefore, the achievement of certain concessions—Hitler acquiesced in the field of the Army Ministry and the economic demands—and the postponement achieved after a hard struggle of the final settlement for ratification by the Austrian government and the Federal President (Bundespräsident) was the optimal solution of the dangerous situation. Even though in this point Papen agreed with the Austrian statesmen who undoubtedly were willing while safeguarding only reasonably the interests of their State to affix their provisional signatures on account of the prevailing conditions, this does not justify the charge against Papen that he approved and intended the result from the outset.

Hitler's opinion on Papen's previous activity in Austria and his participation in the Conference at Berchtesgaden is best illustrated by the fact that no further office of any kind was any more assigned to him in Vienna. It is very unlikely that during the decisive developments to come Hitler would have failed to assign tasks to a man who inwardly and effectively attended the Conference at Berchtesgaden. One would not have replaced him by new people from Berlin, and for the still more complicated situation one would not have dispensed with the services of the man who, by reason of his years of service, was most intimately familiar with conditions as a whole. One would certainly have availed oneself of his personal contacts with Austrian statesmen which qualified him, in preference to others, to continue work on Hitler's plans. If the Prosecution's interpretation of Papen's efforts toward understanding during the discussion in Berchtesgaden as deceitful maneuvering were correct, there is little doubt but that Papen would have been permitted to continue working along that line, and after replacing his person one would not have charged people to deal further with those things whose course was much more radical.

Papen's memorandum on his farewell visit to the Prime Minister is revealing. A man who in his own commentary to Berlin passes on Schuschnigg's interpretation—that to some extent he had acted under pressure in Berchtesgaden—under “noteworthy,” is little likely to have been an active participant in the coercive negotiations.

DEFENSE

The record of evidence proved that thereafter Papen no longer held any public office.

The new Charge d’ Affaires, Freiherr von Stein, a pronounced National-Socialist, took charge of the Embassy. He was assisted by Keppler, a close friend of Hitler. Papen, on the other hand, makes his farewell calls, and he takes up residence at Kitzbuehel, a winter-sport resort.

In the meantime things are getting more and more critical. The plebiscite which Schuschnigg announces results in a development which perhaps Hitler even had not intended on that scale. The visit of Seyss-Inquart and Rainer on 9 March to Papen was accidental; there were no deliberations of any kind, and no decisions were taken. For Papen even to express the view—which Rainer confirmed—that, considering the formulation of the questionnaire, no decent Austrian could be expected to say “No,” but that he was bound to follow Schuschnigg’s password, suffices to indicate the contrast of Papen’s position toward the views of the Austrian Nazis and the views which the people from Berlin subsequently brought out.

If, in conclusion, I may still revert to Papen’s presence in Berlin on 11 March I must say that even in reviewing things in retrospect I can give no clear explanation for Hitler’s desire to know Papen in Berlin. Reasons for it may have been manifold. Should Hitler already at that time have been determined to foresee a solution in that direction as it finally came about—after all, doubts in that respect may exist—the reason might have been that he did not dare leave in Vienna this man who espoused the policy of peace; he might perhaps have assumed that because of the extremity of the position in which they found themselves, Austrian Government officials might perhaps have turned to him and that with Papen’s help propositions for a settlement might perhaps have come about.

I would remind you of a similar situation prior to the beginning of the campaign against Poland when Hitler was fearful lest “some swine (filthy fellow) might still come along with a proposal for an understanding in the last minute.” On the other hand it is also quite conceivable that it was suitable to have Papen in Berlin in the event of yielding on the part of the Austrian Government, in which case he might not have wanted to be deprived of Papen’s advice, because of his familiarity with conditions. In the scope of the necessary consideration of the indictment, it is, however, unnecessary to attempt to actually understand Hitler's inner motives. Decisive to be sure is finally merely that which Papen did during his presence in the Reich Chancellory.

Upon his arrival, he expressed to Hitler the desire that through the postponement of the plebiscite a lessening of tension would have to be brought about. His attitude concerning the further events was documented. Papen through his standpoint concerning the military preparations, respectively to the lifting of the order to march in. The shorthand notes of the telephone conversations which had been carried on by Goering have given us a plastic picture of the events in the Reich Chancellory. In connection with his testimony the result is that essentially he was the driving force and occasionally went even beyond Hitler's intentions. He emphasized that from the beginning he had been consistent in striving for a solution, he now did not need to reflect or be advised in order to come to a decision. Seherr-Thoss's affidavit renders Papen's attitude on the eve of the day in question. In an intimate circle he remarked that he had advised against marching in, that against his advice, Hitler, however, just then "had committed the madness of issuing the order to march in."

Finally we still have a clear picture of Papen's attitude concerning this in his conversation with the witness Guido Schmidt, which took place years later.

Austria's annexation was for a long time then already an historical fact and was considered by most Germans a great political achievement. Papen, on the other hand, criticizes most severely the methods used by Hitler and acknowledges anew the fundamental of legality and faithfulness to treaties which, seen from a broad view, was forsaken here to the detriment of Germany.

I come to the result that—Independent of the question of law as to whether the case of Austria is at all capable of discussion within the limitations outlined by the Charter—in completion of the defense of the defendant, contrary evidence has been produced that Papen neither brought about the entry into Austria himself nor prepared for it by a policy directed to this end; that his activity in Austria exclusively served the purpose which he assumed with his commission on 26 July 1934; a policy which served for the restoration of friendly relations between both countries, a legal aim which had not the slightest thing to do with a special or general policy of aggression.

The period following this is not brought under discussion by the Prosecution. The defense, however, must go into even this as evidence in refutation. It is easy to find a proof in established facts from this time that the assertions of the Prosecution from the earlier period must be incorrect.

DEFENSE

The Prosecution leaves Papen at the termination of his activity in Vienna and it gives no explanation for the reason to which Papen's current inactivity can be traced back. There is no cause, no event, which could have impelled the alleged conspiracy to this conduct.

We now come to the period of the immediate preparations for war and the outbreak of the war.

According to the assumption of the Prosecution, the former conspirator Papen at this time abandoned his previous course, in spite of the possibilities that were doubtless available. The Prosecution ought to have cleared up this transformation in some way, if one is not immediately to regard the interpretation of the actions in the earlier period as inconclusive in the sense of a criminal objective.

Papen retired to the country after the incorporation of Austria, where he remained aloof from public life for over a year until April 1939.

This fact is important if one considers the situation at that time; 4 February 1938 doubtless brought about a more rigorous course in German foreign policy.

In the opinion of the Prosecution Papen must have been a willing tool of Hitler for the first actions in preparation for this policy. Were this applicable, then one would have to regard Papen, in consideration of the result aimed at, as a hundred-percent successful diplomat. This so successful diplomat and conspirator now does not go to some place where he can continue his activity further, where preparations might have to be made in a similar manner, as for example in the Sudetenland. He is not placed in a position, where the great political threads run together, in Paris, London, or Moscow, where on the basis of his international reputation he might indeed appear as undoubtedly the most suitable man to support the Hitlerite policy. This man retires from public life at a time when the whole foreign policy of Hitler, when the Sudeten crisis, the incorporation of Czechoslovakia, and the preparations of the war against Poland created a period of an extremely tense political atmosphere. If at that time Hitler did not take his services into consideration at all, then it is clearly apparent from this alone, that Papen was not a conspirator, not even a follower of Hitler, and not even the instigator of the first success in Hitlerite policy, the incorporation of Austria.

In this sense it is also significant, that Papen is first called upon in a situation in which it was not the object to occupy a country, or to make preparations for intended operations. Papen is called upon at a time when the policy of expansion of our Italian ally into Albania caused difficulties and gave reason to fear entanglements with Turkey. And so here is a clear task, that of maintaining the status of peace.

If the Prosecution cannot utilize the activity in Ankara for its own support, then it still does not avoid passing unfavorable judgment on the acceptance of the post by Papen. It is, therefore, also necessary to go into this point in detail.

Papen was also very reluctant to accept this new appointment. Twice already, in more peaceful times, he had refused the appointment out of general considerations, because he no longer wanted to be active in any official position at all. Now he sees reasons to which he can no longer close his eyes. He sees a new task to which he believes it his duty to devote himself.

The entire political situation was extremely strained after March 1939. Even from a secondary flank the spark could easily fall on the powder-barrel. A conflict between Italy and Turkey could in fulfilment of existing treaties bring about a general war. If by his activity he could at least exclude the possibility of war to this extent, Papen must have found personal justification for taking over the mission. He was confronting the problem which confronts all those who have been called upon to cooperate within the framework of a system of which they disapprove. To stand aside, to adopt a completely passive attitude is, of course, the easier way, particularly if no other reasons impel the person in question to accept the post. The more difficult way is to take over a task within the framework of an over-all policy of which one disapproves, which in part of its field offers an aim worthy of achievement. And if this partial field is of such importance that the prevention of a possible war depends on it, then the decision to take over such a mission can only be understandable and worthy of approval. If only the most remote possibility of attaining such a goal exists, then private interests and feelings must step into the background.

If one reviews what Papen really did after taking over this mission to Ankara, if one sees that by his intervention the Italians were moderated from the German side and belligerent complications were avoided, if one considers that later Papen was successfully able to prevent the war from being extended to Turkey and the more distant southeastern territories, then in looking back one can only say that his taking over the mission against his personal feelings was the right decision.

If we saw during the presentation of evidence to what an extent Papen made efforts to bring about a peace of renunciation as early as the year 1939, then we must also approve his acceptance of the mission for this reason, independently of the fact of what final success was to crown his efforts, even if one could have only figured on a quite dwindling possibility of reaching the desired goal.

DEFENSE

The assumption of such a position would finally also be justified from the moral viewpoint if he had only had as much as one single partial success, as, for example, the saving of 10,000 Jews from being deported to Poland, which has been confirmed by the affidavit of Marchionini.

In this connection I want to discuss a misunderstanding which could arise from the judicial inquiry concerning this affidavit.

In his affidavit, Marchionini points out the lives of the Jews involved were saved by the intervention of Papen. Papen confirmed, upon interrogation, the correctness of the affidavit. This confirmation corresponds also with the facts. This does not mean, however, that the meaning of that action, as it is known to Marchionini to-day, and which he mentions therefore in his affidavit, was already known then. Papen knew, of course, that the deportation to Poland for an unknown purpose and with an unknown goal was something very grave. This also explains his intervention. He knows only to-day, the same as Marchionini certainly only knows to-day in all clarity, that the path of these people was not supposed to lead into deportation labor but directly into the gas chambers.

The activity in Ankara has been fully described by the witnesses Kroll and Baron von Lersner. It clearly shows a unified peace policy, a peace policy which, independently from the momentary military and political situation, even at the highest point of German victories, stressed a peace of renunciation. Papen was according to the statements of Rosen and Kroll deeply affected by the outbreak of the Polish war and condemned it from the first.

How can such an attitude and such an activity be reconciled with the assertions of the Prosecution? Papen is supposed to have brought about the war in a conspiracy with Hitler. The Prosecution believes it can deduce the criminal act from his behavior in the years preceding the war. No proof has been submitted as to what may have turned Papen the conspirator into an advocate of peace. It has rested its accusations on the shaky foundation of deductions and omitted to verify whether the assertions of the Prosecution might in any possible way be in agreement with the whole personality of the defendant. In view of the nature of the indictment, one cannot be content to solve the problem by the assumption of a splitting of his personality and an opportunistic attitude. The indictment includes crimes of monstrous proportions. Such an indictment must also rest on the personality of the culprit. Participation in such a conspiracy is only conceivable in the case of a complete identity with the doctrines discussed in the proceedings and described as "Nazism" to their utmost consequences. A conspirator in the sense of the indictment can only be a man who has given himself up entirely, with the whole of his personality, to that aim. He must be a man in whom even the last moral ties have been abolished. Such a personality cannot be a phenomenon of brief duration; the readiness for such a crime must lie within the person of the culprit.

In contrast to the distorted picture of Papen's character drawn by the Prosecution, his true personality has been shown up during these proceedings in all clarity. We see a man who is rooted by origin and education in tradition and conservative ideas. A man of consciously responsible national feeling, to whom for just these reasons a regard for others is natural.

His personal ties with the neighboring country in the West, his knowledge of the world preclude from the first his seeing things from a one-sided viewpoint, according to his own, national wishes. He knows that life requires understanding and the willingness to understand. He knows that international life is built on sincerity and faith and that one must stand by one's word.

We have before us a man who, on account of his deep religious feeling, which he always makes the basic principle of his actions, must necessarily stand in opposition to the ideological doctrines of National Socialism. We have followed his political career and seen that he held fast through all the periods of his activity to his basic political creed which was built on these elements.

In keeping with this fundamental principle and fully conscious of his responsibilities he did not evade any of the tasks assigned to him. And even if we are witnessing in the end the collapse of his hopes and his endeavors, this cannot be the touchstone for the sincerity of his convictions.

To arraign such a man at all under the indictment of a crime in the sense of the facts established in the Charter can surely only have been possible on the basis of the legal simplifications which an indictment for conspiracy offers to the Prosecution. In the facts of the case against Papen, even this interpretation must fail.

The prosecution has not been able to prove that Papen has at any time involved himself in the alleged conspiracy. Opposed to this is the reality. In the evidence offered in refutation facts are established which make a connection of his person with even the idea of the facts in the indictment impossible.

DEFENSE

The final conclusion is clearly given. Franz von Papen is not guilty of the charge brought against him!

2. FINAL PLEA by Franz von Papen

Your Lordship, may it please the Tribunal. When I returned home in 1919, I found a people torn by the political rights of the parties, attempting once more in those unfortunate days of my country, I believed as a responsible German that I should not be permitted to remain inactive.

I saw clearly that a re-birth of my country was possible only on the road of peace and intellectual discussion, a discussion which did not center only around political forms but, however, around the solution of the most burning social problems, which were the prerequisite of an inner state of peace.

Facing the onslaught of rationalistic ideologies, it was necessary—and this was my innermost conviction—that Christianity had to be maintained as the starting point of the rebuilding. From the premise of this inner-discussion, the maintenance of European peace would have to depend, too.

The use of my very best years was dedicated to this question. Anyone who knows the facts knows that I did not push myself to the high office and when like uncounted other Germans, in the emergency of 1933, I decided to cooperate in a prominent position then because I considered it to be my duty and because I believed in the possibility to steer National Socialism into responsible channels, because I hoped that the maintenance of Christian principles would be the best counterweight against ideological and political radicalism and would guarantee a peaceful domestic and foreign development.

That goal, however, has not been reached. The power of evil was stronger than the power of good and drove Germany into catastrophe without any hope of redemption, but should that be reason enough to damn those who kept flying high the banner of faith, opposing the flag of disbelief? And does that entitle Justice Jackson to claim that I was nothing but the hypocritical agent of a disbelieving administration? Or who gives Sir Hartley Shawcross the right to say, with scorn, ridicule, and contempt, "He preferred 'to reign in Hell than serve in Heaven'?" Gentlemen of the Prosecution, that is not your verdict—that is the verdict of another, but I should like to ask, doesn't the question of the defense of spiritual values remain in the center to-day for the rebuilding of a world?

I believe that I can face my responsibility with a clear conscience. Love for country and people is the only factor decisive for all my actions. I have spoken without fear of man whenever I had to speak. I served the Fatherland but not the Nazi regime, when I attempted in spite of most bitter disappointments of my domestic hopes, to save peace at least from diplomatic posts.

When I examine my own conscience, I cannot find any guilt, where the Prosecution has looked for it or claimed it, but show me a man without guilt and without faults, which seen from the historical point of view, this guilt may be found in that tragic 2 December 1932, when I did not attempt to persuade the Reich President to maintain the decision he had made the night before—in spite of the break of the Constitution and in spite of the threat by General von Schleicher that civil war was imminent.

Does the Prosecution really contemplate damning all those who with the most honest intentions were ready to cooperate? Does it claim that the German people in 1933, elected Hitler because it wanted war? Does the Prosecution really wish to claim that the German people in its overwhelming majority made the gigantic spiritual and material sacrifices, including even sacrificing its youth on the battlefields of this war—merely for Hitler's utopian and criminal aims?

This High Tribunal faces the tremendously difficult task, without yet having gained sufficient distance in time from the catastrophe, to recognize the causes and results of historical development in their true context.

Only if the High Tribunal recognizes the historic truth and appreciates it, then the historical mission of this Tribunal will be fulfilled—only then, the German people, in spite of the destruction of its Reich, will find the realization of its errors but also the strength for its future task.

XX. ARTUR SEYSS-INQUART

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Gustav Steinbauer, Defense Counsel

Your Lordships! High Military Tribunal!

Nurnberg, the old august imperial city, which has given not only to the German nation but also to the world one of its most deeply significant painters, Albrecht Duerer, an unsurpassed sculptor, Veit Stoss, and the mastersinger, Hans Sachs, has, on her ruins, become the stage for the greatest criminal trials which legal history knows. Nurnberg has seen within her walls not only the pomp of the old emperors, but the rallies of the NSDAP also took place there, year after year, as a part of that propaganda machine which understood how to put into motion millions of people by a gigantic, but also diabolical stage management, with flags and standards, drums and fanfares under the slogan of German equality of rights in order finally, in the extravagance of its aims, to lead a nation which has given humanity so much that is good and beautiful to the verge of ruin.

DEFENSE

We have heard the indictment here which tries to prove in a comprehensive way that some men had conspired to conquer the peaceful world by the waging of wars of aggression. It was said that the waging of these wars not only violated the treaties which were supposed to prevent war, but furthermore the rules for a humane conduct of the war, and had also trodden under foot the basic rights of humanity in the most contemptible way. Justice Jackson's passionate opening speech will go down into the history of this world trial like the speech of a Cicero against the conspirator Catilina. We saw for months how mountains of documents and a long chain of witnesses were supposed to confirm the indictment, and, on the other hand, how the defense as keeper and servant of the law was striving to help the Tribunal discover the truth. But in the gallery the representatives from all parts of the world were seated, and only too often the whole world held its breath, when there was a break in the dark fog banks and again and again made a glimpse into the depths of unsuspected crimes possible. But outside, before the gates of the Courthouse, stand the deeply moved German people, among whose former leaders the defendants after all belong. But regardless of how the trials will end, the defense must be given credit for one thing, namely, that with regard to the question of the guilt of the German people, one will never again be able to talk about complicity or collective guilt, perhaps rather about collective disgrace, because they were German men, under whose leadership crimes of the most horrible kind were committed! The curtain now rises once more on the final act of this world tragedy, in order to lend an ear again to the defense, and then to pronounce a sentence which must not only correspond to fundamental legal principles, but also insure that crimes such as the Prosecution describes will forever be avoided.

On 20 November 1945, at the beginning of the trial, the Presiding Judge stated that these trials are of great importance for millions of people in the whole world. For this reason, he said, everybody participating in them has the solemn responsibility of fulfilling his duty without fear and without favor for anybody, and according to the principles of law and justice. This duty was often an almost too heavy burden for the defense counsel! Not because of the extent of the material for the trials, not because of the abundance of legal questions which often were of a completely new kind, but because things were revealed here which are so monstrous and abysmally degraded that a normal brain will not even believe the possibility of such happenings. In so saying I am not thinking of the prepared human skin, of the pieces of soap made out of human fat which were shown to us, I am not thinking of the systematic way in which millions of innocent people were tormented, tortured, slain, hanged, or gassed. No, I am thinking of the many touching individual pictures which have made the deepest impression on me personally and probably also on everyone else.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Auschwitz alone has devoured 3½ million people, men, women, and children! That is really the most terrible weapon of the indictment, that the spirits of all these innocent victims stand beside the prosecutor, admonishing and demanding revenge. But I do not stand alone, either. The many innocent war victims on the German side, women and children who have fallen victim to the terror attacks which violated international law, in Freiburg, in Cologne, in Dresden, in Hamburg, Berlin, and Vienna, and in almost all other German cities, step to my side. My comrades from the Wehrmacht, who as honest and decent soldiers, have sacrificed their lives for the fatherland by the hundred thousands, young and old, faithful to their oath of allegiance stand by my side!

Personality

But even if they did not exist, if the defendant were all alone before his Judges, then it is even more my sworn duty as lawyer to stand helpfully at his side and to be his shield and defense, and considering the abundance of the indicting material, to call to you, Honorable Judges, "Do not judge in wrath, but rather search, like our Austrian poet Wildgans who was a Judge himself has written in the album of a young Judge, 'It is the flower (Edelweis) which blooms under thorns!'"

Before I now consider the indictment with its individual points, I should like to sketch a short picture of the personality of the defendant. Schiller's words in Wallenstein apply to him too, "Distorted by the hate and favor of the parties, his character portrait wavers in history." The indictment, in the trial brief, calls him a cunning, coldly calculating, political opportunist who had a mission before his eyes. It is more than obvious that he misused his position as Minister in order to deliver Austria to the conspirators by his double-dealing. He has committed atrocities in Poland and in the Netherlands in cold blood, and has trampled upon the rights of small nations to religious and political freedom of thought, unconcerned by constitutional obligations.

DEFENSE

George S. Messersmith judges similarly in 1760-PS when he says that Dr. Seyss-Inquart, with whom he himself had little personal contact—the defendant denies ever having met Messersmith—had been completely insincere toward his friend, Chancellor Schuschnigg, according to reliable information he (Messersmith) received. The statement that Schuschnigg and Seyss-Inquart were friendly is moreover incorrect. Messersmith had left Vienna in the spring of 1937. As all witnesses testify, Dr. Schuschnigg had at that time only just become acquainted with Seyss-Inquart. But Messersmith added literally that there is only one thing which may be said in favor of Seyss-Inquart at that time, namely, that he may have believed the German protestations which were made to him, namely, that Austrian independence would be respected.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

His political program was the "Anschluss" idea and, considering his origin, this is also easy to explain. His immediate home is the old mining town of Iglau, a German language enclave in the Slavonic sea. At an early age he learned what a small-scale fight means between two nations facing each other in enmity. He was deeply moved to learn that time's storms last year also swept over his immediate home, and that Iglau which had been German for 800 years, will be so no more! Therefore, in judging the defendant, we should take account of the fact that it was the Germanic Borderlands that have at all times experienced the greatest national distress and felt more strongly and fervently the idea of the great German Fatherland than the nationals of the rest of the Reich lulled into self-sufficiency born of self-confidence. Thus it is no accident that leading men in the Anschluss Movement whose names stand out in my Document Book came from the Sudetenland. Doctor Otto Bauer, the late leader of the Socialists, comes from Reichenberg, and State President Dr. Karl Renner likewise comes from Untertannowitz in Moravia, that is from German Sudetenland.

Inasmuch as I did not meet the defendant again since the fall of 1938 until I met him here again in prison, I have asked one of his collaborators in Holland who also enjoys the respect of the Dutch and who was no National Socialist and as Judge of the High Court, a position he held in former times, can be relied on, for an objective opinion on the personality of Dr. Seyss-Inquart. He writes—

"In his work his clear, keen thinking, and the systematic manner in which he fully applied his many-sided talents in carrying out his duties struck me at once." * * * "It is the great tragedy of his life and work that in the person of Hitler and several persons among those who were his closest co-workers, elements crossed his path which were stronger than he. As an intellectual and a mentally cultivated person he became immediately suspect to the main persons in power in the Party bureaucracy surrounding Hitler (Bormann) and in the SS administration (Himmler) although he wore the golden badge of honor of the Party and occupied a high honorary rank in the SS. He continued to be the young Party member who came from the ranks of the intellectuals and were always regarded with mistrust. For those elements, however, he was too 'soft.' Altogether, however, it was his hope that he might increasingly prevent independent sections in the Reich from trying to work their way into his sphere of action as he himself gradually won the Fuehrer's confidence to an ever greater extent. His relation to the Fuehrer was to become fateful to him, as I already mentioned." * * * "However, I am firmly convinced that in such manner he, as well as a great portion of our people, unwillingly as they were, became a sacrifice, a willing tool of the demoniacal power of Hitler."

This is the opinion of an upright German Judge!

Conspiracy

The Prosecution bases the trial on the concept of conspiracy in an endeavor thus to forge a ring around the defendants which is to combine them all in one common responsibility. My learned colleagues have already spoken of the concept conspiracy and its consequences in this trial. To repeat these statements would be to carry coals to Newcastle. But because this is the leading theme for the trial which has ascribed responsibility for the world-shattering events, above all to my client, I should like to submit to the Court a few additional ideas on that subject.

In going through the records of history, we often run across stories speaking of men who combined for the overthrow of a ruler who was disliked, or a system that was hated, and for them to seize power. All these cases were listed under the superficial, collective term "conspiracies." In the book he published in Paris, entitled "The Technique of the State Plot," Malaparte, an Italian, tried to describe the technical methods applied in conspiracies and revolutions, beginning with the time of Catilina down to Hitler and Mussolini. Even this survey of technique will be sufficient to show how unjustified it is to dub all these undertakings conspiracies, if it is intended to embrace within this term a definite concept such as known in penal law. In any case it is certainly not possible to simply classify all these things, in popular terminology briefly termed conspiracy, under the caption of conspiracy according to the concept of the Prosecution. When Guy Fawkes and his comrades, at the time of James I, tried to blow up the English Parliament in the so-called "Gunpowder Plot," perhaps this was a real conspiracy. Up to now, the English nation on the fifth of November every year celebrate, with fireworks and bonfires and the burning of a straw dummy, the anniversary of the day which saw the happy prevention of the plot. It would be a mistake, however, simply to term any kind of cooperation for political purposes a conspiracy, because—and it is particularly important to repeat and stress this—thanks to the vagueness of colloquial usage, it became always possible again to use the word "conspiracy" in political fights in order to justify thereby, because of lack of adequate legal grounds, the process of defaming and destroying political opponents.

DEFENSE

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

For the French Prosecutor I should like to cite from the history of his country, France, of an evidently erroneously termed case of conspiracy. Louis XVI was accused of conspiring against the nation and was found guilty. Citizen Doseze, on 26 December 1792, in the first year of the Republic at the bar of the National Convention, served as his defense counsel. His pleading was probably one of the most moving legal pleadings ever delivered, a discourse in which the defense counsel directed himself at the same time against another foe of criminal justice, a foe for political reasons or because of political passion, namely against a violation of the legal principle nullum crimen et nulla poena sine lege. Undaunted and unafraid he expounded among other things the following: "Where there is no law which can serve as directive and where there is no judge to make the pronouncement, one should refrain from accepting the general will as a foundation. The general will cannot as such speak either about a man or about a fact. But if there is no law according to which one can judge then it is also not possible to render judgment, then one also cannot think of conviction."

We still find to-day this principle of nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege firmly rooted in almost all law books. We find it in the German and in the Austrian penal code, we find it in article 1 of the Dutch penal law and we also find it in French law in article

4 of the "code penal" which states, "Nulle contravention, nul délit, nul crime, ne peuvent être punis de peines qui m'étaient pas prononcées par la loi avant qu'ils fussent commis."

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

The fact that this principle has not lost any of its significance even to-day while this trial is in process, but on the contrary kept its full meaning, results from that—I want to remind again the French prosecutor—that the French constitution which was submitted to the National Assembly on 19 April 1946 establishes specifically as statute of human rights in article 10, "The law has no retroactive force. No one can be convicted and punished, except according to the law which has been promulgated and publicized before the deed which is to be punished. Every person accused is considered under reservation as innocent unless he is declared guilty. No one can be punished twice for the same deed." What is now human right for the French must necessarily remain human right for the Germans.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

When in the year 1935 the idea of analogy found its way into German penal law, this innovation also found severe criticism in the circle of jurists outside of Germany. The second international congress for comparative jurisprudence held in The Hague in the year 1937 formulated a resolution against the analogy in penal law. In this resolution the congress expresses itself in favor of the principle "nulla poena sine lege." (See Vœux et Résolutions du Deuxième Congrès International de Droit Comparé, La Haye, 4—11 Août, publiée par les soins de M. Elemér Balogh, p. 69.)

From the above-mentioned statements it follows that it is legally inadmissible to apply principles in this trial which lack a legal basis. Continental law does not know the concept of conspiracy, Austrian law, which could come into question as the national law for my client, does not know this concept either. There are at best very small similarities if we point out that the explosives law of 27 May 1885, Reichsgesetzblatt 134, article 5 already declares the contemplation of the execution of a crime with explosives as punishable. Article 174 Ic of the penal code makes theft a crime if the thief commits thievery as a member of a gang which has banded together for the common commitment of thievery. German law recognizes the responsibility under the penal code for the act of another only as accomplice, instigator, and helper. Conditions in French law are similar, and articles 59, 60, 89, and 265 of the "Code Penal" are pointed out briefly.

That this fact is not clear and at least dubious is also admitted by the respected Russian teacher of International Law, Professor A. N. Trainin, in his book "La responsabilite penale des Hitleriens" (Publisher: La presse française et étrangère, O. Zeluek, Editeur, Paris 1945). He states in page 13, "The problems of international penal law have unfortunately been studied very little, there is a lack of a theoretical, clear definition of the fundamental concept 'International Crime' and a well-ordered system of this law remains still to be created."

DEFENSE

According to the prosecution, the aim or the means of the conspiracy are crimes against the peace, against the rules of war, and against humanity. Professor Jahrreiss has already spoken extensively about the liability for punishment of individuals because of the violation of international peace, and has described and given due recognition to the status of non-German international jurisprudence. But since jurists of the German language have also concerned themselves with this question, I would like to take the liberty of an additional remark.

The well-known Austrian scholar of International Law Alfred von Verdross has established in his book "International law" (Publishers: Julius Springer, Berlin 1937), "according to prevailing opinion, subjects of an international legal crime can only be states as well as other legal corporations immediately subject to International Law, but not individual persons * * *."

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

After these short supplementary explanations of the legal basis of the trial, I turn to the prosecution which accuses my client of having participated in the seizure and taking of control in Austria as a conspirator, and to have committed war crimes and crimes against humanity in Poland and in the Netherlands.

Thus the first act takes place in Austria, and the second one in the Netherlands, after a short interlude in Poland.

East of Berchtesgaden is the Obersalzberg at an altitude of 1,000 meters, * * * Adolf Hitler stands at the window thinking and his gaze glides over the meadows and valleys to the snow-covered mountains which shine a purple red in the light of the evening sun. The country which is protected by these mountains is Austria, his homeland. It is a German land, free and independent, and not subject to his will as the Reich, whose absolute Fuehrer he has become. When he wrote his life work in the fortress Landsberg, he wrote right there on the first page of his book, "German Austria must return into the great German fatherland." The shadows of night rise slowly from the depth of the valleys and his thoughts glide over the mountains to the old imperial city on the Danube which he loves and hates at the same time. It is the city of his joyless youth, filled with want and misery. In his book "Mein Kampf" he compares this city with Munich now and says about the latter, "Munich, a German city, what a difference from Vienna, I get sick when I think back to this racial Babylon." And still, this city remains the goal of his longing and he calls this same city in the March days of 1938 a pearl to which he will give the setting which its beauty deserves. And on his table lies a book "The History of German Austria." Hitler read this book again and again, it is the history of his homeland, and we also want to leaf through it a little, as far as time permits it here. We read, "Austria was throughout many centuries one of the strongest pillars of German life. Its evolution, its rise, and its descent form a considerable part of German history. Austria was and is a piece of the German glory and German suffering. Austria has received inestimable strength from the old Reich, but she herself has performed much of greatness and value for the expansion of the entire German culture."

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

The old Roman Empire of the German Nation was destroyed in 1806 in the clash of the two powers. The Reich died, but the Reich concept lived. At Leipzig in 1813 Prussians and Austrians fought shoulder to shoulder under Schwarzenberg, Scharnhorst, Gneisenau, and Bluecher for the liberation from the yoke of the Corsican tyrant. On 11 January 1849, the deputies of all German states assembled at Frankfurt-on-Main for the constitutional assembly. The Austrian delegate Bergassessor Karl Wagner from Styria spoke at that time the memorable words, "Leave an opening for us so that we can enter; we shall come, unfortunately perhaps not all of us anymore, we, Austria's Germans shall come, how and when, who can tell? Who can read in the book of the future? But we shall come!"

In the year previously in Paul's Church where the delegates of all German lands and states had met, the poet Ludwig Uhland as delegate spoke the memorable words, "May it be that it will always be Austria's job to be a light for the East; it has a closer, higher job; to be the artery in the heart of Germany."

But on the battle fields of Koeniggraetz in 1866 a community of a thousand years between Austria and Germany was destroyed and Austria was forced to leave the German Fédération. How unsatisfactory the solution of the German question by Bismarck's forced exclusion of Austria from the union of German states was, was also recognized in the Reich, where Paul le Lagarde wrote in 1875, "But despite this, 1866 and the German Reich is an episode. Nikolsburg cannot separate what has been decided by geography and history to be together, if this being together will not be a union for a long time yet."

DEFENSE

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

The common history of almost a thousand years, but above all the common language and origin, the same customs and the same mode of life, demand the closest unity. * * * But is it not a symbol of spiritual unity that just as the North-German poet Hebbel, also Beethoven and Brahms, made Vienna with its sense for art the permanent city of their work? There is no German music without Austria. But Austria did not only make her proud contribution to the cultural life of the German people in the field of art, but also in the fields of science and technology.

[The Tribunal objected to further discourse on the history of Austria. Defense Counsel omitted two pages of his prepared speech.—Ed.]

The massed common will of the two great persons of the Third Reich to take over Austria at the opportune moment is the key to the solution of the Anschluss question. For that one does not require a conspiracy; whoever also participated were figures on the chess board of the two men, supers in the great theater of the world.

But let us return to Austria. * * * I have already pointed out in the presentation of evidence that according to my opinion, three reasons led to the Anschluss, and have also attempted to explain this by the documents submitted to which I refer herewith:

1. The economic want,
2. The disunity of the democratic parties resulting from this, and
3. The attitude of the great powers toward Austria, especially during the critical days of March 1938.

Dr. Karl Renner, the federal president of the Republic of Austria who enjoys the confidence of the four occupying powers and on whom the entire Austrian people look with respect because he has stepped to the helm of the ship of state, for the second time in a period of serious emergency has described the history of the Anschluss very appropriately in a memorandum in 1945. "The political reason why the Anschluss idea got hold of almost all of Austria at the conclusion of the first World War lay in the repeated proclamations of the victorious powers that the war was waged for the 'right of self-determination of the nations'." * * *. "But this political reason was not decisive for the masses. Austria is a mountainous country with much too little arable land, a country of an entirely one-sided economic structure, its capital itself shelters a third of the population, its industry nourishes a large part of the latter only by working for its neighbors, receiving from them raw materials and bread. The sudden separation of the high agrarian parts of the previously uniform tariff territory of the Danube Monarchy, the measures of the successor states in 1918 introducing high protective tariffs deprived the country simultaneously of its food sources and its export territories. The fear not to be able to feed themselves and not to be able to find work at home, the sudden limitation of the labor market were the factors which made in 1918 the "Anschluss" (annexation) appear as the only possible solution. One cannot talk about a national Chauvinism of the Austrian working class, so much the less so, as this class had its origin to a very high percentage in parents of non-German blood and who had hardly lost their ties with the homeland. The overwhelming competition of the Reich German and Czechoslovakian industry loomed menacingly before the workers of all professions in this small country, cut off from the sea and poor in raw materials, which was afraid not to be able to stand up against this competition. To understand first of all this economic situation means to understand the "Anschluss" movement and brings the realization, how Hitler's boastful announcement that he had eliminated unemployment in the world had to make such a deep impression on the Austrian working class, that the desire to prevent the Anschluss was so weak within this working class at the beginning. * * *

With the decision of 5 September 1931, the Permanent International Court at The Hague declared the customs union between Germany and Austria incompatible with the Geneva protocol of 4 October 1922 by 8 votes against 7. This was the last attempt of the governments to achieve a closer mutual state-legal relationship with the express accord of the victorious powers. It failed. Wasn't the conviction bound to arise in the minds of fanatical "Anschluss" partisans that this paramount national aim could only be achieved through their own initiative?

A year later the deficit of the American Foreign Trade reached 613 million schillings. Dr. Dollfuss concluded on 15 July 1932 a loan agreement in Lausanne under the condition that the "Anschluss" problem would be put off for another 10 years. The ratification took place during the session of the National Council on 30 August 1932 with 82 votes against 80. In the federal council, the Social Democrat Koerner, at present mayor of Vienna, had protested against this law in view of a closer community with Germany.

Hitler came to power during the year after. The Social Democrats saw their party dissolved in the Reich, the trade unions crushed, they saw the Reichstag fire and the starting persecution of the Jews, and their leaders turned away from the "Anschluss" idea. The Catholic circles, who wanted to fortify the Catholic element in the Reich by the "Anschluss" also turned away because of beginning persecution of the clergy in the Reich, and only the National Socialists alone whose membership had increased ten times within a short time were in favor of the "Anschluss." As Dr. Dollfuss had eliminated the parliament and thereby the way to power by means of votes, the National Socialists, under the leadership of land inspector Theo Habicht, aspired with all means to the power in the State. It comes to the bloody events of the year 1934. Dr. Dollfuss is killed by the hands of assassins and his successor Dr. Schuschnigg attempts to restore the order in the deeply shaken state system. The Socialists, however, remain sulkily aloof because of the February events of the year 1934. Under the foreign political aspect the situation changes too. While Italy in the year 1934 still stood on Austria's side and while Missolini had deployed his divisions on the Brenner menacingly against the North, the Ethiopian adventure had forced Italy on Hitler's side. Austria is forced to follow the changed course and concludes also the agreement of 11 July 1936 in order to improve the economic situation. Germany recognizes the independence of Austria in this agreement and ceases the economic war. The price for that, however, is a series of measures which give the National Socialists in Austria a new boost. In order to extend the small platform of his government and in order to bring about a real satisfaction, Chancellor Dr. Schuschnigg declares to invite also the so-called Nationals to cooperate. Among these men is also the defendant, who then becomes Austrian State Councillor in May 1937. The idea of the "Anschluss" constituted his political program as already mentioned above. He never tried to hide this fact. He also comes from the ranks of the National opposition, a factor which must not be overlooked. The "Anschluss" also brought him nearer to National Socialism, and it seems immaterial to engage in long investigations at what time he actually became a formal member of the party. Among the documents confiscated at his arrest, there was in any case also his membership card with the number over 7 million. It is known, however, that in Austria the so-called old fighters were given membership number below 6,500,000. This statement concerning the party membership has also been confirmed by the witnesses Gauleiters Rainer and Uiberreiter. When the new State Councillor then paid his first visit at his assumption of office to the Fuehrer's deputy Hess, the latter is very polite but cool and he regrets that Seyss-Inquart was not an old fighter. The task of Dr. Seyss-Inquart is to supervise the execution of the July agreement and to act as a mediator between the Austrian Government on one hand, the national circles on the other hand, and the Reich. This task has been a thorny and ungratifying one. The patriotic circles, namely, could not forget the terror of the National Socialists during the Dollfuss period. The National Socialists, whose leader was Captain Leopold by that time, were not satisfied with the methods of the national representative Seyss-Inquart with the government. There are constantly differences of opinion between these two men, which go so far that Seyss-Inquart wants to give up his mission to bring about an agreement. I refer in this connection for the sake of brevity to Documents 44 (letter of State Secretary Keppler to General Bodenschatz), 45 (Goering's telegram to Keppler), and 46 (USA 704) of my document book. There occur continuous violations of the July agreement and the Austrian Police finds the "coup d'etat" plan, known as Tavs plan, which strives for a change of the government by violence. Minister Guido Zernatto has declared the defendant had remained aloof of all these endeavors. (Doc. 47 of my document book.) Then came the conference of 12 February 1938 at the Obersalzberg. The course of this conference is well known. That the defendant discussed things on the evening before this conference not only with Zernatto, the representative and intimate friend of the Chancellor in the government, but also with the national leaders becomes understandable if one considers again and again the, at all times, openly declared role as mediator by the defendant. The latter just had to know also the claims of the opposition, if at the conference of the two statesmen at Berchtesgaden a clarification of the differences of opinion was to be accomplished. The defendant cannot be charged with playing a double game within the framework of a conspiracy because the National Socialist Party tried to exploit the knowledge of the situation to their profit, and that in sending out Muehlmann was quicker than the unsuspecting Chancellor Schuschnigg. There, too, it must be referred to Zernatto who died in exile and who declares that he was under the certain impression that Seyss-Inquart had not yet knowledge of the agreements concluded at the Obersalzberg. On the basis of this agreement Seyss-Inquart was appointed Minister of Interior and Security. He goes in that capacity to Berlin in order to pay a State visit to the chief of State of the German Reich and in order to present to him at that occasion his political program for the relationship of the two States, which is known from the File Notes (Exhibit 61) submitted to the Tribunal. The testimony of the defendant as witness of this conference appears completely believable. Hitler had at that time obviously not yet decided to carry out the "Anschluss". It must at this point be referred to the testimony of the defendant Goering, who testified the following on 14 March when examined as a witness; "I was not present in Berchtesgaden, I did also not agree with this agreement because I have always been against every fixation which again extends this state of suspension". Through the agreement of Berchtesgaden the activity and propaganda of the Nazis in Austria had been permitted to a certain extent. The 2,000 party members released from prison on the basis of the amnesty and the members at least a part of whom had returned from the Reich, were especially active in the federal states to an increased extent for a rapid increase of the Party, and used Hitler's Reichstag speech of 20 February particularly as a signal for hostile demonstrations against the State for the purpose of acceding to governmental power in the shortest time. Not only Schuschnigg but the great mass of the working class now realized the dangerous character of the situation. The menacing peril caused past differences to be forgotten, and negotiations between Schuschnigg and the Socialist labor leaders and the Christian trade unions seemed to provide an insurance for the defeat of the imminent assault of Nazism, by the constitution of a common defensive front of all democratic forces. Prompt action was necessary and Schuschnigg proclaimed his plebiscite. The whole country awoke from its lethargy. Workers and peasants were called up to defend their country and the electoral preparations carried out under the leadership of Zernatto, in the short time available in the factories and in the very remotest mountain valleys. It was clear that this attempt of Chancellor Schuschnigg to swing the helm around and alter the course at the last moment could not fail to elicit the resistance not only of the National Socialists in Austria, but also of those in Germany. Hitler raved and Mussolini had unfortunately only too good a reason in warning Schuschnigg, before the election, with the hint that it would be a bomb which would explode in his own hand.

DEFENSE

DEFENSE

And now, let us turn back to the defendant. He was not only a government member, he was the trustee of the national opposition and the guarantor for Berchtesgaden before the Reich. If the Prosecution accuses him with having given Schuschnigg his word of honor with reference to the election and not having kept it, that is not correct. Reference is made, I understand, to the speech held by Gauleiter Rainer on 11 March 1942 before the Carinthian party members. On page 12 of this Document, 4005-PS, it is disclosed that Zernatto's lady secretary was a secret member of the NSDAP and betrayed the plebiscite plans to her co-members as soon as she learned them. Rainer says we already knew the whole plan at 11:30 p.m. that same evening! The protest formulated by Seyss-Inquart in the name of the Nationals to the Chancellor against the plebiscite was indeed entirely justified judicially. Beside the fact that there could be no security at such short notice for a proper vote, the vote itself was not constitutionally legitimate. Article 65 of the Austrian constitution of 1 May 1934 specifies exactly under what circumstances the nation can be called upon to vote. Dr. Schuschnigg, therefore, supports his proclamation of the election upon Article 93 of the constitution, which Article merely says generally; "the Federal Chancellor sets down the directives of policy." The execution of the election was incumbent upon the National Front, i.e., the political organizations. The subsequent developments are well-known, particularly the events of 11 March 1938. In this respect the main charge, that of conspiracy, is, I take it, that Seyss-Inquart has induced the entry of the German troops by his telegram about alleged unrest. We come across this historical lie, which has brought the defendant the name of "Judas of Austria", in most relations of the "Anschluss." We find it, for instance, in Raphael Lemkin's "Axis Rule in occupied Europe" (p. 109). We find it again especially in the opening speech of the American Chief Prosecutor Jackson, although it is incontestably proved by the submittal of Goering's telephone conversations, 2949-PS, in relation with Goering's testimony that this telegram was never sent and was dictated, what is more, to a third party at a time when the German troops had already received the order to cross the frontier. Consequently, these telephone conversations by Goering represent a historical document of the greatest importance.

Rainer's Carinthian speech and his testimony as witness before the Tribunal also contradict the Prosecution as regards Seyss-Inquart's contribution to the seizure of power! According to this Document, 4005-PS, it was Globotnik who made an abusive use of the Federal Chancellory's telephone to alarm the Federal States. Appointed Federal Chancellor by virtue of Schuschnigg's withdrawal under duress, the defendant discusses the constitution of the cabinet, invites the ministers to assume their functions and takes the retiring government chief home in his own car.

When it is further learned from the testimony of witnesses

DEFENSE

Stuckart and Glaise-Horstenau under what circumstances the law of annexation came into being, then it can indeed be said that Zernatto was right when he wrote that Austria was conquered, in his opinion, even against Seyss-Inquart and his government! (Exhibit 63). Whoever, therefore, dispassionately surveys the whole set of events of March 1938 relatively to the "Anchluss" and examines particularly the part played by the defendant can only come to the conclusion that one cannot really speak of a carefully elaborated "Conspiracy", of the minutely concentrated perpetration of a crime. Where Austria is concerned, however, the Englishman Geyde is right when he says the curtain fell on the "Tragedy of Austria" with the invasion by the troops. It was to rise again soon on a new play; "The Martyrdom of Austria".

On 15 March 1938, Adolf Hitler came to Vienna. We have seen in this Court room the film record of his reception. With emotion, the defendant addressed him as follows, "What centuries of German History have striven for, for what untold millions of the best Germans have bled and died, the ultimate aim of ardent struggles, the ultimate solace of bitter hours has materialized today. The 'Ostmark' is back with the homeland! The Reich has resuscitated, the German racial Empire (Volksdeutsche Reich) is established." With this Seyss-Inquart had defined the political aim which was, and remained, the guiding star of his actions.

With the Fuehrer came Joseph Goebbels, who switched his gigantic propaganda machine into full swing. Rallies were held in close succession. Festivals were celebrated. There was not a house in the whole country which was not beflagged. The leader of the socialist workers said "I vote yes" and the Bishops made exhortations for the accomplishment of a national duty, "Render unto God what belongs to God and unto the Emperor what belongs to the Emperor!" Both were to be mistaken. For with Goebbels came Himmler and his Gestapo and SS. Already, on the night of the 12 March, began a large arrest operation in Vienna. It included the members of the former military associations as well as prominent leaders of the socialist syndicates, Jews who were active in political or public life, communists and monarchists, priests and Freemasons and even the leaders of the Boy Scouts and of the Austrian Youth organizations. In Vienna alone, 76,000 arrests were made. On 2 April 1938, the first Dachau convoy already set out from the West Station with 165 leading officials including the present Federal Chancellor Figl, Education Minister Hurde, and Minister of Justice Dr. Geroe. The second convoy followed on 21 May, the third at the end of May, and so it went on. Punctually every 8 days, convoys went off to Dachau, Buchenwald, and Sachsenhausen. On 10 May 1946, the National Tribunal in Vienna sentenced to death Anton Brunner who caused 49,000 people, mostly Jews, to be sent to the extermination camps in Theresienstadt, Auschwitz, Minsk, and Riga.

And what of the defendant? He was given the cold shoulder and relegated in a corner: The victor of the Saar electoral contest, Joseph Buerckel, was instated as Reich Commissioner for the Reunion of Austria with the Reich and armed with dictatorial power. The powers of the defendant scarcely exceeded those of a higher president (Oberpräsident) in the Reich, i.e., those of an administrative authority of the intermediary level. Indeed, immediately above him was Buerckel who, under the pretext of the annexation, interfered with everything and laid claim to everything, particularly as regards matters concerning the Churches and Youth, as is evidenced by Documents 67, 70, and 91. The defendant himself opposed Buerckel's methods. Indeed, he raised objections to Hitler himself against Buerckel's action in Graz on 8 April 1938. This we know also from the testimony of Neubacher, Schirach, and Stricker and from the documents submitted by the defense. But Buerckel, whom Churchill described as the "Governor of Vienna" in his book "Step by Step", remained the stronger and the embarrassing censor, Seyss-Inquart, was moved away to South Poland as a Provincial Commissioner. This treatment at the hands of his alleged fellow conspirators shows only too clearly that Seyss-Inquart was actuated by his enthusiasm for the "Anschluss" and cannot have been a conspirator! He was not a leader, he was led or, what in my opinion is more accurate, perversely led. He was even perhaps a docile tool in the hands of the big two, Hitler and Goering, but it was solely for his political ideal, the "Anschluss", without any intention of a war of aggression.

Of course, there was something of an economic crisis in Austria after the "Anschluss". It was partly a repercussion of the rearmament. But what took place was not the "Anschluss" as the "Anschluss" enthusiasts in Austria had visualized it, especially as the war provided a motive and a pretext to level down and repress every dissenting or critical opinion to the most ruthless extent.

Austria did not cease to hope for her liberation and to fight for it. There was much distress and many died. Six thousand were executed in Austria. In the Vienna judicial district alone, 1,200 men died by the guillotine, 800 of them just for their anti-Nazi opinion! In the last days of the war, Vienna's most beautiful edifices fell in ruins and St. Stephan's Cathedral, one of the most august monuments of German Gothic, went up in flames.

DEFENSE

So the promise that Hitler had made on 15 March 1938 was fulfilled. "The pearl has the setting, which her beauty deserves." The idea of union, that is to say the wish to bring about the national unification of a nation, was not a crime, criminal however was the introduction of a system that has presumably blocked its realization forever. The defendant certainly did not wish this.

To conclude my statements regarding the Austrian question I shall now briefly proceed, from the point of view of the defendant Seyss-Inquart, to examine the question as to what there is to say against my client from the legal respect. For the clarification of his legal responsibility I will resume his behavior in the following short review; first in his political activity.

1. After the agreement of 11 July 1936, the Federal Chancellor Dr. Schuschnigg took the defendant Seyss-Inquart as a representative of the national opposition as collaborator, thus not as a political follower, as for example the witness Guido Schmidt.

2. Seyss-Inquart has always declared—for the first time to Dr. Dollfuss in July 1934—that the national opposition consisted only of National Socialists who obey solely Hitler's will, in any case will never act against Hitler's will.

3. Seyss-Inquart declared he was a National Socialist; he thus always represented the interests of the Austrian National Socialists. This is not confirmed alone by the witness Skubl but referred to by the authorities previously quoted by me.

4. To avoid any military or international conflict Seyss-Inquart pursued the following aim: Participation, for the Austrian National Socialists independently of the Reich (NS) Party, with closest collaboration between Austria and Germany.

5. Seyss-Inquart declared that this aim could only be attained if Hitler agreed to and directed the Austrian National Socialists expressly towards this policy.

6. The culminating point was Seyss-Inquart's efforts during his interview with Hitler on 17 February 1938. Although, so to say, Minister by the grace of Hitler, he represented his Austrian program. Herein lies Seyss-Inquart's mistake. He thought Hitler and Berlin would establish a policy, i.e., as Bismark said, exploit the art of possibility. Berlin, however, did not wish to establish a policy. In the face of this fact Seyss-Inquart's policy fell to pieces on 11 March. Is this mistake punishable as, moreover, the Austrian State leaders desired an agreement on the same lines and Dr. Schuschnigg, knowing his program, kept him employed? In view of the defendant's basic attitude until March 1938, details of his political tactical attitude are of secondary importance. And now to the activity of the defendant as Minister of the Interior and as Security Minister.

7. There is no trace to be found of any National Socialist influence on the Austrian executive. The witness Skubl confirmed this with unsurpassed clearness. Seyss-Inquart forbade the police to take any political position (Doc. 51) ; he forbade National Socialist demonstrations (Doc. 59) ; he avoided such occasions (Doc. 59) ; he demanded legality of the Austrian Nazis (Doc. 52).

8. On 11 March 1938 Seyss-Inquart fulfilled his duties as liaison officer in virtue of the Berchtesgaden agreement. With Glaise-Horstenau he gave Dr. Schuschnigg in the forenoon of 11 March a quite candid statement of the facts. He pointed out particularly threatening National Socialist demonstrations and the possibility of a German invasion. In the afternoon he delivered Goering's demands to Schuschnigg and the latter's answers to Goering.

9. After Dr. Schuschnigg's offer to resign, Seyss-Inquart retired. He complied in no way with Goering's demand to obtain the transfer of the Federal Chancellorship or to seize power. The ultimatums, with the threats of invasion by the Reich, were, as is known, transmitted by Embassy Counsellor v. Stein and General v. Muff to whose pressure President Miklas finally yielded. This appears from President Miklas' statements 3697-PS and from the witnesses Rainer and Schmidt.

10. Only after Dr. Schuschnigg's farewell speech did Seyss-Inquart publicly demand the maintenance of order. He does not designate himself as a Provisional Government, but, in good faith, as Minister of the Interior and of Security, as was confirmed by witness Schmidt. He took the order not to make any resistance to the German troops from Dr. Schuschnigg's farewell speech.

11. Seyss-Inquart tried as long as possible to preserve Austria's independence and that by telephone conversations with Goering (Doc. 58)—for the reasons that he requested Guido Schmidt to join his Ministry as Foreign Minister, as confirmed by witness Schmidt; according to the statements of witness Skubl; by refusing the demanded telegram (Doc. 58) ; by the request to Hitler not to invade, as confirmed by Goering; by the request to Hitler also to let Austrian troops march into the Reich.

12. On 13 March 1938 the Anschluss Law was proclaimed in conformity with Article III of the Austrian Constitution of 1 May 1934. The psychological situation of Seyss-Inquart was the same as that of all Austrians who, on April 10th, had by secret ballots voted "Yes" for the Anschluss by 4,381,070 votes against some 15,000 "No". Among other things Seyss-Inquart is reproached that—

DEFENSE

Firstly, he has used his various posts and his personal influence to promote the seizure, incorporation, and control of Austria by Nazi conspirators.

Secondly, that as an integral part of his evil intentions, within the meaning of the prosecution, he has taken part in the political plans and preparations of the Nazi conspirators for wars of aggression and wars in violation of international treaties, agreements, and assurances.

To 1. Concerning the first named accusation, I refer to above summary and can limit myself to the following short statements. As a political aim, the annexation of Austria to the German Reich is nowhere punishable, and the defendant had no other aim. The Prosecution oversteps here—as also on other points—the limits of the Charter.

To 2. Concerning the second accusation that co-defendant Seyss-Inquart has participated in a conspiracy against peace, this is to be gauged by paragraph 6, part 2a of the Charter. It is said there, among other things, that planning in common, preparation or execution of war of aggression, or war by the violation of international treaties is punishable as a breach of peace.

I leave to the examination of the Tribunal if the case of the invasion of Austria really comes under the application of this provision in spite of the fact that there was no war. Much can be said in favor of the fact that the outbreak of war is the proviso for culpability for breach of the peace within meaning of the said provision.

In any case I cannot reconcile myself to an interpretation of this provision which goes so unreasonably far as even to consider an abandoned war plan or the possible planning of an eventually bloodless war as punishable as an accomplished crime.

It must be stressed upon with the greatest vigor that no proof has been produced therefor that my client has ever imagined that a war might arise between Austria and any other Power because of the "Anschluss" or as a result thereof. On the contrary, his decision to occupy himself actively with politics after the drama of 25 July 1934 was dictated by the effort not to let the "Anschluss" question be the cause of international complications. On that point he must have been far from imagining that Hitler and his entourage had viewed such a consequence as possible. The consequences of the Austrian enterprise proved him right. The German troops were greeted on their march into Austria with flowers and cheers.

Concerning the Great Powers, France and England protested on 12 March 1938 against the "Anschluss." But this was only a very mild and platonic protest. A military support of Schuschnigg did not result; in the first place the League of Nations, which was the guarantor of Austria's independence, was not invoked.

On 14 March 1938 the British Government declared in Parliament that it had discussed the new situation with its friends of the Geneva Entente and that the unanimous opinion had been that a debate in Geneva would lead to no satisfactory result.

When the League of Nations was informed of the "Anschluss" by the German Foreign Office it took note thereof without protest, and the Austrian representative at the League of Nations, Pfluegl, received his passport. The Hague Arbitrative Court has struck its Austrian member, Professor Verdross of Vienna, from its register of judges. The diplomatic agencies were withdrawn or transformed into Consulates in the German Reich.

Only a very short time elapsed and already a few months after the occupation and annexation of this small country a State treaty concerning a second small State was concluded in Munich on 29 September 1938 with the alleged aggressor.

The French Prosecutor de Menthon recalled in his indictment speech the memory of the great politician and statesman Politis. I also wish to call him to mind. Shortly before his untimely death he wrote in his book "La morale internationale" (International Ethics) (Editions de la Baconniere, Neuchatel, Switzerland 1943) the following: "Qui menace les petites nations menace l'humanite toute entiere!" (He who threatens the small nations threatens the whole of humanity.)

The Powers of the League of Nations did not feel compelled to pay any attention to this sentence.

But there is another principle of international order which they did not see fit to apply against the annexation of Austria. I mean thereby that principle which, under the name of the Stimson doctrine, has penetrated into the science of international law and diplomatic language. It is the principle according to which the nations of the world refuse to recognize forcibly obtained territorial acquisitions. This principle has at least penetrated into the legal consciousness of present times as deeply as the prohibition of wars of aggression, which is one of the main pillars upon which the Nurnberg trials rest.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

And finally I recall to the memory of the Court the declaration of the Council of the League of Nations of 16 February 1932 in which the Stimson doctrine, devoted into a principle, found the following expression "No trespassing into the territorial integrity and no infringement of the political independence of a member of the League of Nations committed against Article 10 of the Charter of the League of Nations could be recognized as legally valid by the member nations."

DEFENSE

Nevertheless all the nations of the world have recognized the incorporation of Austria into Germany without feeling compelled to concern themselves with the Stimson doctrine.

At the same time something essential can be said against the indictment for breach of the peace in violation of treaties. Germany is supposed to have violated three treaties. First the German-Austrian agreement of 11 July 1932, secondly Article 88 of the Treaty of Saint-German, lastly Article 80 of the Treaty of Versailles. Here also it must be pointed out that all the nations concerned have not only put up with the violations of treaties, but moreover sanctioned them tacitly by their attitude. Herein lies at least a renunciation of international law, and the Powers concerned have thereby deprived themselves of any right to an ulterior reaction because of treaty violations, which would be in contradiction to any fairness.

In regard particularly to Article 88 of the Treaty of Saint-German, a violation of this provision cannot, to begin with, be charged against the German Government and therefore against Seyss-Inquart as alleged co-conspirator, because Germany was not bound by this contract which she had not signed and which for her represented a "res inter alios acta."

On the other hand the German-Austrian Treaty of 11 July 1936 was a "res inter alios acta" for any other Power than Germany and Austria; here Austria alone could have raised the objection of breach of treaty. In this connection attention is called to the fact that the reconstituted Austria is not among the signatories of the London Agreement of 8 August 1945. Therefore the four founder States of the International Military Tribunal are not justified in vindicating Austrian interest at those trials.

In regard to Article 80 of the Treaty of Versailles, I resist the temptation to discuss the question of the legal validity of this provision, in particular I will not raise the point of what significance the contradiction of this Article with the so-called 14 points of President Wilson may have from a legal point of view.

But at the conclusion of this my legal explanatory statement of the Austrian affair I cannot suppress a thought of general import. One of the great principles of international order which, in the course of the 19th and 20th centuries, fought itself through amidst much trouble, much confusion, and many makeshifts and realized its aims more and more is the right of self-determination of nations. This basic principle of the right of self-determination of nations has anchored itself into the legal conceptions of international relations of our century to such a great extent that one is forcibly led to include it among the general principles of international law, a thought that particularly appeals to democratic ways of thinking. But as a general principle of international law it would then become the standard criterion of judgment, besides the Charter, the customary international law and thirdly the treaty rights, for the Nurnberg International Military Tribunal, which at any rate must find a similar basis for other questions. And further it would become, like all other generally accepted principles of law, of imperative character and have precedence in particular over international treaty laws.

A number of States have to thank this lofty expression of democratic thought for their existence. Such grace has been denied the Austrians after the First World War. Despite the fact that the people in Austria as well as in Germany unanimously strove for union, Austria was forced to eke out an existence as an artificial unnatural State structure, able neither to live nor to die. How bitter sound the words of the Encyclical "Ubi arcano" of 23 December 1922, "We hoped for peace, but it did not bring salvation; we hoped for healing, but terror came; we hoped for the hour of recovery, but only confusion came; we hoped for light, but only darkness came."

In the year 1938 also Austria and Germany strove for union, following in this the wish of the overwhelming majority of their citizens, and this time success came. From the point of view of world history, the incorporation of Austria has no other significance than the successful integration of a mighty principle of international order, of the right of "self-determination of nations". This dynamism carried away artificial and unnatural treaty stipulations.

Who can speak here of guilt? I have nothing to state on the question of Czechoslovakia and on the question of Poland, very little. For during his short stay he was not in evidence at all to the Poles, but was mainly concerned with the organizational problems of the building up of the German administrative apparatus. In this matter it is sufficient for me to refer to the results of the handling of evidence. Nor will I say anything more about his honorary rank in the SS than that an honorary rank never stood under Himmler's commanding and disciplinary power, nor itself possessed such power in the SS. As regards his position as minister without portfolio, the importance of this function within the scope of the organizations will be discussed in the chapter "Reich Government". Therefore, without going more deeply into this interlude, I hasten to the second scene of this legal matter—the Netherlands.

DEFENSE

The Netherlands

Many know her only as the country of windmills, wooden shoes, and wide breeches, with her red brick buildings, her large herds of cattle in green meadows, and her immense varicolored tulip-fields. I know her as the country that gave to mankind a Rembrandt, the numerous masters of the Dutch School, and de Grotius the great teacher of international law, that struggled for her liberty in gory fights against Philip II of Spain and produced the great naval hero de Ruyter who won one of the most famous naval battles in history on 21 August 1673. However, in this trial here we learned that of all the occupied countries, The Netherlands offered the most united and toughest political as well as increasingly effective active resistance; we also learned that throughout these years these people never abandoned the hope that the moment of liberty would surely return some day.

The motto of the province of Zealand, "Luctor et emego" (I struggle and do not go under) had become the rallying word of the whole country!

Seyss-Inquart came to this country in May 1940 as Supreme Chief of the civil administration. Whatever he may have thought and planned, it is his tragedy that he came as the representative of Adolf Hitler and of a system hated the world over. Hundreds of laws, orders, and decrees repeatedly bore his signature and though they may have been ever so fully correct legally, in the eyes of the people they still remained measures of the enemy and Seyss-Inquart their oppressor. My client did not force himself into this office. He had rather requested permission to go to the front as a soldier. Adolph Hitler refused this. Seyss-Inquart also never contested his responsibility and gave himself up voluntarily after the collapse. In case the legal opinion of the defense concerning the superior command is not shared by the court, even in regard to paragraph 8 of the Charter, the total organization of the Reich on the one hand and the attitude of the Dutch people on the other must be taken into consideration in passing judgment on his administrative activity. The way in which Seyss-Inquart on principle came to terms with himself on his conflicting tasks, namely, to represent the interests of the Reich on the one hand and yet to take care of the population within the meaning of the Hague Convention on the other is revealed by his attitude in this respect as follows:

In the administration of Holland my client clearly allowed himself to be guided by the following legal conceptions. The development of war technique particularly in air warfare, the extraordinary extension of economic war, the expansion of the war into "total" and "indivisible war", the genesis of the conception of total blockade, partly made international law, as it was in effect in the year 1899 and 1907 at the genesis of the Hague Convention, meaningless from the viewpoint of the clausula rebus sic stantibus, and partly because of new necessities and given conditions it proved to be absolutely incomplete and useless. Only a few remnants from olden times were still valid in the Second World War.

The severity of this change is revealed particularly in respect to bombings of residential quarters made possible by the colossal development of explosives and the technique of flying and which found no justification whatever according to previous law. If they can be justified at all, it is possible only out of a concept of total war.

However, this development particularly drew the individual person into the war as an object, last but not least, under the influence of the Anglo-American concept of war. Accordingly, enemy civilian population as well as the resources of the occupied regions during this development have become the war potential of the occupying force within the limits imposed by humanity.

A further limit is constituted by the general provision of international law that requisitioning these forces must be necessary for the purposes of war and thirdly this requisitioning must ex aequo et bono be reasonable.

Moreover, the totalitarian and indivisible nature of modern warfare forbids treatment of individual areas separately. It will no longer do to requisition the personal and economic forces of a definite area only for its necessities, as it is still prescribed by the Hague Convention for Land Warfare. Henceforth these forces must be at the disposal of the whole sphere of action of a belligerent country as one unit, on the other hand they benefit from belonging to the whole.

Modern technical development, especially in the field of communications and traffic, moreover causes the attitude towards another problem of warfare, namely the so-called Partisans to be faced by new and most grave tasks.

In contrast to the period of the First World War, the Partisan organization definitely assumed inconceivable proportions in the Second World War and developed into an enormous danger for the fighting troops which at most can be compared with the Guerrilla war of attrition against Napoleon I in Spain. The old international law by no means made sufficient provisions to parry this danger. As a matter of fact the prevailing principle when fighting the Partisans must be the security of the fighting troops at any price.

DEFENSE

This means for the army as well as for the occupation administration both the right and the duty to take the severest suppressive and preventive measures within the limits of reasonable expectation and humanity. My client discharged the duties of his office in accordance with these guiding principles with the fixed notion that he was thereby complying with his duty according to the directives of the legal subject of international law, i.e., of the supreme Reich leadership. Any thought of acting illegally or even of committing punishable acts was far from his mind. That has nothing to do with the applicability in this case of the principle that ignorance of the law excuses no one for here no national penal law is concerned but international law and it is not a question on the other hand of a legal error but of a subjective conception of duty, which may have gone astray here and there, but was always credulous!

Now in investigating in detail the individual administrative acts of the defendant in accordance with this basic exposition, it must be pointed out that the National Socialist administration, as everywhere in occupied territories but particularly in Germany proper, revealed an ever greater and more penetrating superorganization and at the same time an extremely tight centralization in Berlin. Consequently there were the following authorities in the Netherlands:

1. The Reich Commissariat (Civil Administration and Protection of Reich Interests)
2. The Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht and the various Commanders-in-Chief including their own Courts
3. The Police, concerning which I shall speak later
4. Four Year Plan, Goering
5. Special Purpose Staff, Rosenberg
6. General Labor Commitment, Sauckel
7. Armament Ministry, Speer, and
8. Last but not least, the NSDAP with its offices and organizations.

Pursuant to the Fuehrer order, thus de jure, the Reich Commissioner was bound to obey absolutely the instructions of these central agencies, and he was not permitted to intervene in their measures. The record of history to be written will perhaps throw light on the question as to how great was the skill of the defendant to prevent some of them or at least how he toned them down.

As regards the Dutch population, its attitude, as already mentioned, was completely hostile and the forces of the resistance movement, organized, equipped and directed through the Dutch Government in London, grew from one year to another. The defendant's actions should be considered against this background to reach a fair judgment.

I am now turning to the indictment and in outline I shall follow the schedule of the French prosecutor.

Sovereignty

The first charge is the alleged violation of sovereignty of the country through introduction of the Reich commissariat with its four general commissariats; annulment of civic liberties; introduction of the leadership principle; and dissolution of legislative bodies and political parties. These measures cannot constitute a breach of international law. Inasmuch as Germany, which is likewise one of the signatory powers of the IVth Hague convention of 1907, based itself on the laws governing land warfare, and notwithstanding the lack of the all-embracing participation clause after entry into the war by the Soviet Union, the validity of the laws governing land warfare, with due consideration for restrictions referred to in the beginning of the above statements, must be accepted for the Netherlands as well. Its fundamental elements do not seem broken. As a result of the complete occupation of the country, the flight of the Queen and of the Ministers from the country, the highest governing power in civil affairs passed from the Crown and the Parliament to the occupying power, and with it to the Reich Commissioner. Through the unconditional capitulation of 10 May 1940, General Winkelmann, vested with special powers and left behind in the country, renounced his authority in every respect. Furthermore, it is the accepted rule for the occupying power to regulate the administration as it is demanded by its requirements, under exclusion of the right to take any step apt to deprive the country in advance of the final clarification of its fate. A specific recognition to that effect through the Highest Court of Holland took place according to the decision of 12 January 1942 submitted to me. The division of authority between the Reich Commissioner and the Commander of the Wehrmacht, as provided by the Fuehrer decree, is a matter pertaining to the internal segregation of jurisdiction applying to the occupying power. This has been specifically recognized by the British Manual of Military law (CH XIV Amendment 12 of 1936). The fact that the State Parliament was suspended, the activity of the State Council restricted to preparation of opinions in disputes on administrative matters, and that, finally, parliamentary parties were dissolved is likewise no violation of international law because during the period of occupation the occupying power itself decides how far the need for legislative measures and for amendment of the legislation of the country exists. As a rule, about 50 parties entered the contest for the 150 seats in the Dutch Parliament at every election. Due to the fact that the contesting parties not only were in accord in their antagonism toward the occupying power, but frequently were active in the various resistance movements, their suspension, and subsequent dissolution—which was only decreed on 5 July 1941—was the good right of the occupying power, all the more so as the country was on the direct path which the coming developments of the war were bound to follow and since an invasion was very likely. This made a rigid concentration in the administrative apparatus, under exclusion of all parliamentary obstructions and the potentialities which they held for enemy propaganda, imperative. If it is pointed out that this, on the other hand, encouraged the NSB, it might be answered in brief that the Reich Commissioner consistently refused the formation of a government by this party. The fact that parties, which were already in existence in the country or were to be newly formed the ideology of which was friendly to the occupying power, were encouraged by the latter is also not outlawed by international law. Inasmuch as no official administrative powers were vested in the NSB and since political organizations had no influence on the administration it is also immaterial that in the year 1943 this party announced itself as the representative of the political will of the Dutch Nation. It always has been and still continues to be the practice up to this day that occupying powers encourage and assist political parties friendly to them. The charge of Germanization is unjustified. By reason of its descent, the Dutch people always were considered to be Germanic and it is therefore not feasible to make Germans of them. A perusal of Dutch history shows us that for centuries the Dutch people always belonged to the Federation of the German Reich, and he who roves through the country can still see in Groningen's coat-of-arms the German Reich Eagle, as well as Amsterdam's coat of arms carrying the emblem of the German imperial crown since 1489. The first and the last Salic Emperors, Konrad II and Heinrich V, died in Utrecht. It is but natural that in view of the blockade against the sea and the colonies, the occupying powers desired to direct the country towards Central Europe and it never was intended, certainly not by the Reich Commissioner, to cut out the national traits and the independence of the Dutch. It was perfectly justified for the defendant to declare in his speech of 9 November 1943 in Utrecht (Doc. book 102) among other things, "We ourselves would cease to be Europeans should we fail in our mission to maintain and to promote this rich luxuriance of characteristic and blood-bound cultures of the European people."

DEFENSE

Equally unjustified is the charge of the French Prosecution in regard to pressure in the interest of Holland's entry into the war. There did not exist a ban against enlisting volunteers of Dutch nationality in the German Wehrmacht. Article 45 of the law on land warfare merely forbids compulsory recruiting for war activity against the own fatherland. This did not make obsolete the decrees of the Dutch criminal law (referred to by the Prosecution) applicable to the person who takes up arms voluntarily, a decree which was strengthened during the war by Royal edict. The same holds true as regards regulations on citizenship for these volunteers and marriage to German nationals. Inasmuch as these orders of the Reich Commissioner could have legal value only within the limits of the German Reich, the interpretation of law that they do not constitute abuse of sovereignty in the sense applied by the Prosecution can be maintained in good conscience. That a press had to be silenced which notoriously placed itself in opposition to the occupying powers goes without saying.

The French Prosecution points to another suppression of sovereignty through removal of intellectual life as a result of the closing of universities and the demand for a declaration of loyalty remains within the framework of the convention governing land warfare. Article 45 prohibits compulsion of the inhabitants of an occupied country to take an oath of allegiance. According to the wording of the declaration it is merely demanded to abstain from any action directed against the German Reich or its army. Inasmuch, however, as the population of the occupied country is bound to obey the occupying power governing the State, this statement, which does not make an active demand, cannot be considered a violation of international law.

The organization of government was taken over almost entirely and maintained, despite an attitude of pronounced rejection, even animosity; especially one refrained from interference in the field of the judiciary. The only reproach in this direction is the dismissal of the President of the Court of Justice at Leeuwarden. The defendant expressly declared to assume responsibility for this case, and he has the perfect right to do so. The occupying power can interfere in the field of the judiciary only when the purpose of the occupation is in jeopardy. If a judge refuses administration of justice—even though the cause for his complaint was eliminated as was the case in this instance—then the occupying power has the right to remove from office the judge concerned.

DEFENSE

Acts of Terror

The French Prosecution then continues, asserting that the defendant initiated a series of acts of terror. In the course of the presentation of evidence on this point, we have heard what collective punishment was about. Kammergerichtsrat Rudolf Fritsch and President Joppich further proved by their testimony that the defendant was extremely conscientious in the application of the right to grant pardon and that he restricted the infliction of capital punishment as much as possible; and as regards Police summary courts, the defendant and the witness Wimmer have proved that this was a procedure applied in a few single cases only, headed by an official of the judiciary—the respective defendant having the right to use the services of a defense counsel freely appointed, of Dutch nationality and that, furthermore, this procedure found application for two weeks only. Even at this time we still find in a considerably more severe form some such special type procedures for emergency purposes used by powers of occupation.

The elimination of regular courts and one of the main-points of the Prosecution is the question of hostages, which I must therefore discuss in detail. Dr. Nelte has already discussed its juridical aspect in general, and I refer to his statements. In RF 879 the Prosecution has now chosen two particular cases. The so-called hostage shooting at Rotterdam and the one after the attempt against the senior Leader of the SS and of the Police. Already in the course of his first interrogation by the plaintiff, the defendant referred to the first case of the Wehrmacht's demand for 25 to 50 hostages. The witness Wimmer confirmed that these hostages had been demanded by the Wehrmacht, that through the defendant's influence this number was finally reduced to 5, and that the Senior SS and Police Leader was entrusted with the shooting.

The relation between the Wehrmacht and the Reichcommissioner, as well as the relation between the Wehrmacht and the Police, is regulated by the decree dated 18 May 1940 Reich Law Gazette No. 1, page 778, 1376 PS in paragraphs 2-3. In order to convict the defendant, the Prosecution submitted the accusation but not the testimony of General Christiansen. In the course of an interrogation the defendant did not take the oath. The record proves that—

- a. The order was issued by the Wehrmacht on account of grave cases of sabotage and was analogous with the so-called "Law governing hostages" in Belgium and France.

b. The arrest of the hostages was then carried out by the German Police on the order of the Commander of the Wehrmacht in Holland. "An order is an order."

c. The German High Command or Command West persists in the execution of the orders notwithstanding all representations.

d. Execution by the Police.

e. Proclamation I made in the Juridical Department of the Headquarters of the Wehrmacht in Holland. Proclamation II drafted by the Senior SS and Police Officers.

Would the Tribunal consider the justification of the defendant as standing the test in the event of his using the arguments of General Christiansen for his justification?

As to the second so-called hostage case, it is dealing with the consequences of all attempts directed in March 1945 against the senior SS and Police leader SS Obergruppenfuehrer Rauter, the highest Police officer in Holland, who was directly subordinated to Himmler. Remembering the consequences of the murder of the tyrant Heydrich by the Czech Patriots in 1942, we can well imagine Himmler in 1945, at the height of his power, avenging the plot against one of his nearest and most important lieutenants. It is likewise understandable that the defendant, as head of the administration, ordered deterrent measures to be taken in the sense of general prevention after an attack had been made on one of his general commissioners. He, however, did not demand any hostages, but only the consummation of juridically closed criminal cases No. RF 879 proves the truth of these assertions of the witnesses Schoengarth, Lagos, Kolitz, and Gerbig, that only men sentenced to death and not 200, but 117, were shot, partly possibly before the originally fixed date of execution. This also is confirmed by the Criminal Commissioner Munt in D II of the report of the Dutch Government, and likewise Dr. Friedrich Wimmer, who was interrogated by the Court. In this case it is not at all the question of hostages in the original sense, but the justified execution of saboteur, pilferers, etc., from the viewpoint of the occupation which was called the shooting of hostages in order to terrify the population. The fact that the defendant achieved the cutting down of the number of 500 real hostages, originally demanded by Himmler, to 117 orders of execution can certainly not be a reason for calling him responsible for Himmler's cruelties! The prosecution furthermore asserts that the defendant, in his capacity as Commissioner of the Reich, had agreed in, directed, and supported the transfer of an enormous number of

DEFENSE

Dutchmen to Germany. The principal question of the employment of foreign workers has already been widely discussed by other defense counsels. May I be allowed to add a few remarks to this count of indictment? According to my information received from the statistical department, 300-500,000 men out of a population of 9 millions were out of work, a chronic situation in the economic life of the Netherlands, which were more or less rightfully considered one of the richest countries of Europe. At the time of the Reich Commissioner taking over governmental power he considered it his duty to deal with unemployment in the interests of order and peace. It was evident that this could not be achieved according to liberal principles, the more so that even in countries adhering to the liberal economic order, the demands of the war period were directed unilaterally, as necessitated by war conditions. Until 1943 the labor commitment was effected according to the voluntary principle. The defendant himself explained that a certain compulsion was used. He had found great understanding in Minister Speer in particular for his plan of enabling the workers to be used in their home country by transferring German undertakings from the Reich to Holland. In 1943, 3 classes of young unmarried men were called up by Labor offices but not by compulsion. As certified by Lammers, the Reich commissioner refused in 1944 the commitment of 250,000 workers who had been requested by the Reich. The "Man hunting project" of the autumn of 1944, i.e., the mobilizing of the entire able-bodied population was, as contested by the witnesses Hirschfeld, Schwebel, and Wimmer, a drive by the Wehrmacht for which the defendant cannot be considered responsible. On the contrary, the fact must be expressly insisted upon that the Reich commissioner diminished the hardship of these measures by the issue of 1,000,000 postponement certificates, and by urging a regulated transportation possibility as well as the mobilization of workers initiated by him, whereby it should not be overlooked that the steady growth of the opposition movement rightly caused uneasiness to the Wehrmacht, considering the grave danger for the occupation forces by the accumulation of people in the Southwestern Provinces.

To summarize, it must be juridically noted that the defendant was subject to the orders of the central administration within the framework of the Four Year Plan, that but for such orders and demands he would never have sent workers to the Reich, and that he strongly opposed it as far as its execution was not in conformity with the laws of humanity.

As to the next point of the prosecution, the so-called economic looting of the country, it has likewise to be referred to the first basic interpretations. The confiscation of raw materials was carried out in the first day of the occupation within the framework of the Four Year Plan, with the collaboration of the Dutch authorities, who thus had the opportunity of diminishing unnecessary hardship. It is evident that the defendant would have preferred to keep the stocks within the compass of his own administration. The defendant insisted in every single case of requisition on proper compensation basis, and prevented the transfer of institutions, as for instance the Margarine factory Dordrecht or the Leyden Icc. works. As, under pressure of the Reich Commissioner, Goering promised that the Dutch people should not be treated worse than German citizens, it would appear that according to a not too narrow interpretation, Article 53 of the Hague Convention of Rules of Land Warfare had therefore in this point been carried out by the defendant.

The reports of the Field Economy Officer with the Wehrmacht Commander in Holland dated 9 October 1944 (RF 132) and of Lieutenant Haupt (3002-PS, USA 196) prove that the confiscations were in the first instance the work of the Wehrmacht.

This latter shows that the difficulty of this whole position arises particularly from the fact that Reich Commissioner Seyss-Inquart is still here, notwithstanding that he has almost resigned. This merely shows that the defendant always diminished or opposed any cases of hardship in this sphere to the best of his ability. The removal of stocks of raw material and rolling stock in the course of a total war after the invasion and in view of the approaching enemy is equally justified within the framework of international law.

The emergency situation created by the war called for the reestablishment of Dutch economy in Europe. Before the war, according to official statistics, 39 percent of the gainfully employed population were engaged in trade and industry, 23 percent in commerce and traffic, and 20 percent in agriculture. By being cut off from the rest of the world, the shipping industry was completely shut down and merely as an example it may be stated that 60 percent of the trade passing through Rotterdam Harbor consisted of German goods. The highly developed agriculture was a pronounced luxury cultivation, and dependent on artificial fertilizers from South America and concentrated fodder from Canada. We have learned from the testimony of Dr. Hirschfeld, how relatively well Dutch agriculture and particularly the world famous cattle breeding have survived the war. This was only possible through understanding collaboration of the Reich Commissioner and the local administration offices, and through their support by the defendant.

DEFENSE

The alignment of economy in respect to the great space (Grossraum) of Europe, which during the war was almost exclusively governed by Germany and her allies, offered without a doubt great possibilities of disposal for Netherlands trade and industry. It was therefore natural that also in a financial respect an assimilation of the economy to conditions in the German Reich or respectively to the European economic area had to take place. A regulation of the financial economy was already necessary in view of the price policy. It would exceed the limits of these trials to state more details here. May it only be pointed out to the Prosecution that the defendant did not have any influence on the amount of the occupation costs, and did not even have any possibility of examining them; only the civilian budget was settled by the Reich Commissioner with the consent of the Reich and under the supervision of the Reich Treasury (Reichsrechnungshof). In agreement with the Dutch agencies civilian requirements were set at 3 million guilder's per month, which was not exceeded, on the contrary, at the end of 1943, a saving of 60 million guilder resulted which remained in the Netherlands. The lifting of the customs borders in interstate traffic was justified by the uniform price policy and could only have an effect favorable to the Netherlands. The relationship between Marks and Guilders was also determined by mutual agreement. A difference took place for the first time when the blocking of foreign exchange was rescinded. Here the views of the previous Dutch Chief, General Secretary Trip, and those of the General Commandant Fischbeck differed. The defendant, who after all was not a finance man, submitted this important question to the central Reich authorities for their decision, and the defendant Goering has expressively stated during the presentation of evidence that he decided in favor of Dr. Fischbeck's opinion against the opinion of Reich Minister for Economy Funk. The defendant therefore cannot be charged with any criminal responsibility, not even that of a culpa in eligendo, if in the place of General Secretary Trip, who had resigned, he now appointed Rost van Tonningen, who as former Commissioner of the League of Nations surely was an excellent finance expert. The defendant Funk has also testified here that he has always considered the clearing debts as true debts. In the Netherlands government report it is pointed out that the financial demands of the Reich reached approximately the same total in all occupied western territories and that only the methods differed. The method employed in the Netherlands would have brought the result, if the conclusion of the war had been successful to Germany, that the Netherlands would have had a real demand in the amount of 4½ billion guilders against the Reich! The whole question therefore does not belong into a criminal trial but into the peace negotiations. Furthermore, exact books were kept about everything, and so may it only be noted that the conductors of the Netherlands Tramway Associations always marked down nicely and properly when a member of the Wehrmacht used the tramway with a free ticket.

As far as the alleged looting of museums and libraries is concerned, as well as the looting of the royal property, it must be referred, for brevity's sake, to the results of the presentation of evidence which proved beyond doubt that the defendant particularly attempted to safeguard the world famous public art treasures and that he reduced arbitrary acts of the Reich offices, if such occurred, to a minimum.

As far as the seizure of objects not essential for the conduct of war, as for instance, art treasures, libraries, etc., is concerned, the defendant did not participate in it. He acquired the few pictures which he bought for Vienna on the open market. With respect to the royal property he issued such instructions that this confiscation of property remained only a demonstration. This is also evident from the Dutch governmental report. The repeatedly mentioned library Rosentaliana did not reach the Reich, as the defendant stopped the transport which had been carried out against his will at Groningen. The case Arnheim seems likewise cleared up by the witnesses Dr. Hirschfeld and Wimmer and the report of the field economic detachment (Doc. 81).

The Jewish question has also a certain connection with the economic problems. Before I deal with this main subject, I must absolutely talk about the position of the police in the Netherlands. The prosecution wants to prove that the police and namely also the German police, particularly the Security police, was subordinated to the defendant. Contrary to this attempt is the fact that in all the signatory powers, with the exception of the Soviets, the police is actually a part of the civil, particularly the domestic, administration. The situation in Germany was like this—"de facto" and not "de jure". Himmler was independent, even more powerful than any other Minister, although he was nominally State Secretary of the Interior. Disciplined and centrally directed the SS was subordinate to him in his capacity as Reichsfuehrer. The defendant Keitel testified on 5 April 1946 that since the outbreak of war the SS became more and more an independent power factor in the Reich. He and his assistants had not been informed of Himmler's full powers, and Himmler and Heydrich had usurped the jurisdiction over life and death in the occupied countries through the frequently mentioned Fuehrer order.

DEFENSE

What was the situation now in the Netherlands?

1. The Fuehrer decree of 18 May 1940 already reveals that the German Police was not part of the Reich Commissioner's organization nor was it subordinated to it. For it says in the decree "The German Police is at the Reich Commissioner's disposal", which would not be necessary if it were part of the Reich Commissioner's Office. Thus even if the Reich Commissioner is the supreme governmental power in the civil sphere, the police is not included in it!

2. The Reich Commissioner publicized the administrative agencies in decree No. 4 and that in such a way that the Dutch could clearly see what concerned them, without being affected by the differences of the Reich authorities. As regards the Police, i.e., the German and Dutch Police, a second General Commissioner as such is appointed for Security affairs (Senior SS and Police Officer). According to article 5 of this decree the Senior SS and Police officer (HSSUPF) has under his command—

a. The German Police and the Waffen SS (this statement is declaratory for the Dutch, for the Senior SS and Police officer was appointed by the Fuehrer on Himmler's recommendation without the Reich Commissioner being consulted). Rauter presented himself to Reich Commissioner as being already appointed, and in the opinion of the prosecution as well, the Reich Commissioner would never have been able to appoint the Commander of the Waffen SS.

b. The Dutch police (this fact is essential, since for the Dutch police the Reich Commissioner was competent).

The Dutch witness, Dr. Hirschfeld, who was general secretary throughout the period of occupation expressly confirmed that Rauter was directly subordinate to Himmler and that the apparent unity of the police and administration according to the decree did not exist in reality.

On page 21 of his book "Axis rule in occupied Europe", Raphael Lemkin defines the task of the police as being the liquidation of politically undesirable persons and Jews, just as the main responsibility for the seizure and deportation of labor for labor commitment in occupied countries was charged to the police.

From what has been said it is shown that the Reich Commissioner has to assume only a limited responsibility for the German police, that is to say insofar he exerted it for the carrying out of his orders in civilian matters. When the Reich Commissioner called upon their help, the police customarily got in touch first with Himmler about the matter in most cases. But in all matters which fell within the competence of the police, the Reich Commissioner could neither issue orders to them nor intervene "de jure" in their activity. This must absolutely be kept in mind when judging the Jewish question, the concentration camps, and the deportations.

The admissibility of special courts and police protective custody is even recognized in the Dutch governmental report. The arrests and management of concentration and prisoner camps was the affair of the police. As explained in detail by the defendant when examined as witness, he went, as Wimmer and Schwebel also confirmed, to great trouble to put an end to abuses in the camps which became known to him. We shall here only briefly refer to the treatment of the so-called Dutch-Indian reprisal hostages with whom the defendant concerned himself considerably and finally the fact that he succeeded in having the members of the clergy who had been imprisoned in the Reich enabled to return to the Netherlands.

After having thus briefly sketched the position of the police and their tremendous power I shall go over to one of the main points of the indictment, i.e., the Jewish question.

In the trial brief it is stated by the prosecution that Reich Commissioner Seyss-Inquart alone is fully responsible for the execution of the Nazi program for the persecution of the Jews in Holland. That in his Amsterdam speech before the members of the NSDAP on 13 March 1941 he himself had declared, "For us the Jews are not Dutchmen; for National Socialism and for the National Socialist Reich the Jews are the enemy." In that speech Seyss-Inquart also explains why, as defender of the interests of the Reich, he believed he had to adopt that attitude against the Jews. He saw in them those whose influence on the German people would paralyze its will to resist and who would appear everywhere as the enemies of the German people. But from that very speech it can be established that Seyss-Inquart considered all measures against the Jews as safety measures for the duration of the war. He speaks of his desire to create durable measures during the period of transition and that after termination of the occupation it would be up to the Dutch people to decide what the fate of the Jews was to be. It was quite natural and obvious that during the past war, as a result of the treatment they experienced in Germany and later in the occupied territories, the Jews, without distinction as to nationality, belonged among the most bitter enemies of National Socialist Germany. That had to be taken into account by every official who had to look after the interests of the Reich in occupied territories. This also makes the speech referred to in the beginning understandable. Therefore, when Seyss-Inquart was commissioned by decree of the Fuehrer to preserve the interests of the Reich in Holland, he also had to adopt some kind of an attitude toward the Jewish question. It was his intention to remove the Jews from leading positions in the government and industry for the duration of the occupation, but otherwise to refrain from any further measures against them. Actually, he also instituted only such measures whereby the Jews were sent on leave or were retired. In the meantime, the exclusive handling of the Jewish question, with full powers and for the entire sphere of German interests, had been transferred by Adolph Hitler to Himmler, that is, Heydrich, exclusively. Now, the Security Police, not satisfied with the dilatory handling of the Jewish problem by the Reich Commissioner, invoked their plenary powers and established an office in Amsterdam whose interference was the cause of constant frictions with the deputy of the Reich Commissioner in Amsterdam. The Security Police claimed they were unable to guarantee the safety of the Reich, the task entrusted to them, unless further measures were taken restricting the Jews in matters pertaining to economics and to their personal liberties. English and French people had been gathered in individual camps and had been driven over the border into the Reich after their property had been confiscated as enemy property, a treatment which Germans living abroad had likewise experienced in enemy countries. In particular, the Police pointed to the fact that very many Jews were actually involved, and often took leading parts, in all the more serious attempts at sabotage and other forms of resistance. Likewise, the Dutch Jews, whose ancestors had in part come from proud Spain, the greatest portion having come from Germany and the East as emigrants, had already been active in leading positions before the occupation in opposition to National Socialism in industry, but more especially in the press. When the enemy entered the country, they knew it would be a life-and-death battle and, contrary to Shylock's words in The Merchant of Venice, "For enduring is the heritage of my tribe" they not only placed their property at the disposal of the resistance movement but also their lives. The Reich Commissioner also could not fail to pay heed to this fact. Because of the great number of persons involved a treatment of the Jews roughly similar to that of the English and the French or other enemy aliens by confinement in a camp was simply not possible. Measures affecting personal liberty of action were taken by the HSSUPF as Himmler's direct subordinate, or by the Security Police or direct order by Heydrich. At this point also belongs the introduction of the Jewish star, which the Dutch, by the way, did not consider a mark of defamation. At the same time that measures affecting the personal freedom of action were taken, the property of Jewish organizations and Jews was also taken under management. The Reich Commissioner appointed Dr. Boemker as his special deputy, with the task of supervising the measures taken by the Police—so far as this was possible administratively—and to prevent excesses. As a matter of fact, he intervened a number of times and was able to prevent bad police measures.

DEFENSE

The activity of the Reich Commissioner's Office was largely concerned with economic measures, and the description by the Dutch Government Commissioner for repatriation (USA 195) gives a clear illustration of the entire Jewish problem in Holland. The table shows that the Reich Commissioner was able to delay measures against the Jews for almost a year and that really intensive measures did not begin until February 1941 with the formation of the Central Office for Jewish Emigration which was ordered by Heydrich and under the supervision of SS Obersturmfuehrer (SS first lieutenant) de Funte. A comparison with measures taken against the Jews in Germany itself and in other occupied territories shows a pronounced uniformity, which likewise indicated that the measures in question were not taken by the Reich Commissioner but were measures taken uniformly by national offices, in other words, by the Police. The Reich Commissioner also saw to it that sequestration of Jewish property moved in orderly channels. When it finally came to the liquidation of property, via orders from the Berlin Central Offices, liquidation proceeds were not confiscated but credited to the Jewish property custodian so that, finally, the Jewish administrative office had accumulated some 500 million guilders. In order to put an end to the constant pressure and interference of the Police through Heydrich, the Reich Commissioner together with HSSUPF (Senior SS and Police Officer) tried to stabilize the Dutch Jewish question by assembling in two sections of the city of Amsterdam and in two camps, the Jews affected by the restriction ordinances where they were to live under their own administration. One of the camps was Westerborg where they had a Jewish camp police of their own; with regard to the outside the camp was under the supervision of the Dutch Police. When, in the Spring of 1945, it was occupied by the Canadians, the English radio reported that they found the Jews housed there in good condition, contrary to other camps which were found outside of Holland. The second confinement camp was to be Vught. Himmler made a concentration camp out of it. The Jewish community of Amsterdam was under the direction of Ascher, a merchant dealing in precious stones. Funds were made available to the Jewish community, especially for school purposes; negotiations were carried out with firms to provide work in the Jewish quarters.

DEFENSE

In the beginning of 1942 Heydrich, that is Himmler, demanded transfer of the Dutch Jews into assembly camps situated in Germany. Both invoked the plenary powers given them by the Fuehrer and pointed to the fact that sooner or later an invasion had to be expected; Holland seemed a suitable territory because the ports of Rotterdam and Amsterdam provided suitable bases for reinforcements and that from here was the shortest route that the British could take into the Ruhr region, the industrial center of Germany. To permit so many people, extremely hostile to Germany, to remain in a territory which would see future operations in the battle against England was inconsistent with the safety of the Reich. The Police persisted in its stand and the Reich Commissioner was able to intervene only by taking steps to make the evacuation by the Police more humane. The Reich Commissioner was able to bring about that thousands of Jews were exempted from evacuation and were so able to remain in Holland. The defendant had the internment camp inspected by his agencies and in particular corrected bad conditions through the intervention of the Christian church, so far as this was within his power. The order for evacuation was not given by the defendant but by Himmler or Heydrich. The defendant did not even give his consent to the evacuation. As a result of steps taken by the defendant, a part of the Jews was taken to Theresienstadt, considered a place of encampment, ostensibly under the supervision of international agencies, such as the Red Cross and where the Jews were said to be well treated. As a result of exemption regulations brought about by the Reich Commissioner, a great many Jews could be exempted from evacuation. The above-mentioned Dr. Boemker was charged with supervision of the transport of Jews in Holland and it became possible to correct abuses repeatedly through HSSUPF. The greater part of the Jews was taken to Poland and it is probably one of the most terrible sentences, found in USA 195, one of the documents submitted by the prosecution, which reads, "Total number of those deported 117,000. After they had left Holland every trace of them was lost; they merged into a mass of deportees coming from all occupied countries and no longer could be identified as an individual group."

Now comes the cardinal point of the entire indictment, the dramatic climax in the trial against this defendant. Did the defendant know of the destiny of these many unfortunate and innocent people; did he intentionally approve it or does he become guilty because he did not prevent it? The defendant has again and again, even when questioned as witness under oath, solemnly declared that he did not know anything about this, and that he was of the opinion that the Jews would actually be resettled in the East for the duration of the war. When the defendant once had the opportunity in the year of 1942 or 1943 on the occasion of a report to talk to Adolf Hitler himself, he turned the discussion to the Jewish question. When the Reich Commissioner pointed out that the evacuation of the Jews was causing serious unrests in the Netherlands, Adolf Hitler replied that he had to segregate the Jews as destructive elements from the body of the German people, and that he wanted to resettle them in the East. When Himmler, the Chief of the SS and of the German Police, was questioned by the defendant in the beginning of 1944, he replied to the apprehensions of the Reich Commissioner with the words that he should not be worried about his Jews, his Dutch Jews were his best workers.

The representatives of the government sent into some camps returned with the reports that the Jews were doing well and that they were satisfied. News from the deportees also arrived in the Netherlands at regular intervals, although they decreased later on. Today, when the heavy curtain which was spread over the horror of these mass murders has been lifted we know the connections and the truth. Especially by the conscientious researches in these trials, it has been established that Hitler and Himmler have undertaken in a practically fiendish way to obscure and to cover the knowledge of their criminal intentions concerning the final solution of the Jewish question. When I read the Dutch report about the Jewish question for the first time, I myself was deeply moved. It is this document and the so-called Hossbach last will of Hitler (Hossbach'sche Hitlertestament) from the year of 1937 which I have especially submitted to my client. Dr. Seyss-Inquart told me about the Hossbach document in which the evacuation of 1 million Austrians was demanded, "that he has never seen this document and never heard about it, either. If I had known such an intention, I would never have participated!"

When I further presented to him the document concerning the Jews, he stated in a convincing way not to have known anything about the final solution and the happenings in the extermination camps! When I then expressed my opinion, why he did not quit, after he could not prevail with his views upon Himmler and his accomplices especially concerning the Jewish question, he told me that, after all, he was a soldier and knew that a soldier must not desert in wartime. He had come to the conviction that he, besides the other tasks charged to him, also remained on his post for the reason that something better would hardly have followed for the Netherlands! In my duty as defense counsel and jurist, I can add the following, one could not count on the extent of extermination which the prosecution mentions. If it has taken place in the stated extent, these are actions of a special group of Himmler's hangmen which correspond to a desperate situation only. But in penal law, the principle applies that the causal chain is interrupted, if an independent criminal act is interposed in the latter. This is the case here.

DEFENSE

Before I conclude the most difficult chapter of the entire accusation, I should still like to examine the question, if the defense of the defendant that he actually could not have had any knowledge about the terrible crimes which happened in the extermination camps is credible. To this point I should first like to present the testimony of a French doctor who himself was a prisoner in an extermination camp for a long time. This is Goutbien, M.D., from Montgeron (Seine-et-Oise) who writes in RF 107.

"It is difficult for a normal man to conceive an exact picture about a concentration camp which is designated in the German language by the two letters 'K.Z.'

"It is difficult for various reasons; first of all, a man educated according to the principles of our civilization which is completely ruled by the elementary Christian humanitarian doctrine cannot believe the truth of the statements made by the victims of so many atrocities; the sadism, the exaggerated refinedness concerning sufferings is above the normal capability of perception; furthermore, the Nazis have tried to disguise their crimes in a hypocritic way, so that a foreigner who would have inspected a concentration camp two or three years ago would have been impressed by the order and cleanliness in it.

"If a jurist had examined the execution cases, he would always have found at least sufficient reasons, if not valid ones, for their justification. Finally, if a doctor had searched for medical documents, he could have very easily concluded normal causes of death.

"That is how heavy the curtain was which covered the concentration camps, and which the SS kept carefully and jealously down. The SS tried to give a legal appearance to their crimes; the thing in question here is a characteristic appearance of Hitlerian hypocrisy."

In a similar way the Jesuit father Kuehle also expresses himself in his books "The concentration camps, a question of conscience for the German people." He writes: Page 19 * * * "and he believed to be able to prevent the self-unmasking by an absolutely tight ring of silence with which he surrounded his works. This ring was closed so tightly that a German had to travel abroad in order to learn something concrete about the camps and to read there about the 'Soldiers of the Peatbog' (Moorsoldaten). At home books like these did not exist, and one learned only very little from mouth to mouth. Nobody got out of the worst camps, and the perpetrators of the crimes themselves were 'liquidated' from time to time, so that they could not tell anything. But the few who got out of the more moderate camps were so much intimidated that they gave only quite general, obscure hints, quite enough, in order to create in the entire people a general feeling of horror of these mysterious places.

"But even the little which went from mouth to mouth never came to the knowledge of higher officials of the Third Reich. Because if they went after these things, the police learned about it and the latter then took care of it that the bearers of such 'atrocity propaganda' kept silent. Therefore, as time went on, one refrained from telling something to such officials."

But the most important testimony is that of one who knows, who himself had an active share in the liquidation of the Jews. On 25 June 1946 Dieter Wisliceny, the special representative of Eichmann who was in charge of the liquidation of the Jews, was questioned as witness by the appointed judge of this Tribunal. He stated that commissions of the International Red Cross or foreign diplomats were guided to Theresienstadt, in order to simulate the normal status of the accommodation. The Jews who were brought to Auschwitz were forced to write postal cards before they were murdered; these postal cards were then mailed at long intervals, in order to create the impression, as if the persons were still alive. He has invited different representatives of the press. To the explicit question "Under whose jurisdiction was the Jewish question in the occupied countries, under the commander of the regular police, the Security Police, or the Security Service?" he gave the answer "According to my knowledge, the Jewish question in the other occupied countries was an affair of the Senior SS and Police Officer, pursuant to a special order by Himmler!"

In order to make the deception even more intensive, 500 Reichsmark were for instance demanded by the Slovak government for every Jew as settlement contribution. I have reproached the defendant with this, and he told me that Himmler also demanded from him a settlement contribution of 400 Reichsmark for every Dutch Jew. He as Reich Commissioner refused this in consideration of the incomplete statements concerning the actual settlement of the Jews and with the reference that the final settlement would have to be left for the time of peace.

DEFENSE

At his own initiative the defendant has also pointed during his examination to individual cases of sterilization. The suggestions I made to have the letters written by Seyss-Inquart to Himmler procured as evidence show the following fact, in conjunction with the statement of the defendant.

Contrary to the statement of the then 18 year old informant Hildegard Kunze, Seyss-Inquart never reported through any sort of official channels to Himmler about the Jewish question.

Seyss-Inquart rather demanded of Himmler not to aggravate the situation of the Jews in the Netherlands any further, and he referred in this connection to the measures which had been carried out in the meantime against the Jews and which exceeded the measures in the Reich, pointing out at this occasion the cases of sterilization.

Seyss-Inquart took immediately a stand against the sterilization of women and stated to the Christian churches that no coercion must be exercised. As a matter of fact, no further cases occurred after a short period.

With respect to the case itself, the defendant can only be made responsible so far as he did not take a stand against it immediately, without being certain, however, to be able to prevent the act. The reasons for the attitude of the defendant becomes evident from the letter which was requested as evidence it was the worry that the situation of the Jews could be made worse and the supposition that these Jews would be spared further attention from the police in the future.

In any case, so far as measures against the Jews originated from the defendant, they were issued only as measures against enemy foreigners for reasons which the defendant mentioned in his speech of 21 March 1941 in Amsterdam. Whatever happened beyond that, took place on the express order of the Reich Central Agencies, especially Heydrich and that primarily through organs of these Reich Central Agency themselves.

A further point of the indictment is the claim that the defendant as Reich Commissioner, in accordance with the planned extermination and weakening-policy toward the occupied countries, had deliberately neglected the food supply of the Dutch, which had finally resulted in a starvation catastrophe. Claims to this effect appear to be refuted by the testimony of witnesses Dr. Hirschfeld and von der Wense, as well as by those of the defendant himself. The whole food supply machine remained from the very beginning under Dutch direction in the interests of the population, although it was known to the Reich Commissioner, that it was just in this field that leading cells of the resistance movement had established themselves. The food supply in the Netherlands was most assuredly not worse than in Germany, from where in particular bread grains were supplied. As late as the year 1944, the food value consisted of 1,800 calories, before that 2,500 calories, to which there were still additions of the utmost variety.

The Reich Commissioner also succeeded in bringing to a halt the knapsack traffic of the Wehrmacht which was mentioned in the cross-examination, through intervention with the Reich Food Administration, even if it was only in the year 1943.

To what extent the Dutch food economy was supported by the defendant, as for example by furthering the N.O. Polders, by countering the extremely great demands of the Reich is confirmed by the witness von der Wense.

That the Dutch manufacture of nitrogen could be reserved for Dutch agriculture until September 1944 is the exclusive achievement of the defendant. From autumn 1944 on, the situation in the field of food supplies deteriorated considerably. The country for a large part had become a war zone after the invasion, and the transportation routes had been smashed through innumerable air attacks. This had the result that a difficult food situation was caused, particularly in the West of Holland, where millions of people were compressed into a small area in three major cities. Considering the small number of occupation troops, it would already have been a giant blunder in itself to drive these crowded masses intentionally to desperate resistance through starvation.

When now in September 1944 a strike of railway workers and shipyard workers broke out, caused by the London government-in-exile, which was counting on a favorable conclusion of the battle near Arnhem and with a German collapse in the very near future, then viewed from the standpoint of international law, this was an emergency in which the country had placed itself toward the occupant. It was natural that the Wehrmacht occupied all available shipping space in order to secure their food supplies for their own defense. In order to avoid repetition, may I refer to the testimony of von der Wense and Dr. Hirschfeld and state here as the most important fact that the witness Dr. Hirschfeld testified that the Reich Commissioner gave the order for rescinding the blocking of shipping traffic already on 16 October 1944. He had been able to count on the fact that the blockade of 4 weeks, which was not planned as a reprisal measure, would not cause any damage because sufficient food stocks were on hand or could be sent into Holland in the months of November and December. He actually effected already the rescinding of the embargo at an earlier time, the establishment of a special transport organization and the importing of food stocks from the north-eastern provinces by means of German means of transportation. As the failure of the Dutch transport organization, the constant day and night attacks of enemy planes, sabotage of the resistance movement, and last of all a great shortage of coal hampered the supply action, the emergency caused by the strike still cannot be in any way charged against the defendant as a criminal offense. In any case, the statistics presented by me have shown that during the entire period of occupation until the middle of 1944, the population steadily increased and that general living conditions under wartime considerations did not suffer a considerable deterioration at all.

DEFENSE

As the food situation deteriorated more and more throughout the war, the defendant cared for the importing of food stocks on German transport trains and also furnished them for children from German Wehrmacht stocks. He demanded supporting actions of the churches and of the Red Cross, although the Geneva insignia was repeatedly misused by the resistance movement. The Crown Prince of Sweden, as President of the Swedish Red Cross, expressed his special gratefulness to the Reich Commissioner. The Reich Commissioner finally contacted the Dutch government-in-exile through its trustees and in this manner initiated the conclusion of an agreement with the Allied Supreme Command, whereby the subsistence of Holland was secured and the occupation was effectively brought to an end.

In Allied military circles at that time one still figured on 60 days' resistance. The German occupational troops in the Netherlands would certainly have been able to do this, although this would have caused the destruction of the country and its population.

I come now to the last point of the French indictment, to that of the floods and destruction caused by the occupying power. If the Prosecution had not brought up this point, then I as defense counsel would have discussed this matter before the Tribunal, because this matter especially gives the defendant the opportunity of appearing, for him, in another light. In referring to the testimony of the witnesses Wimmer, Schwebel, Dr. Hirschfeld, and General von Kleffel, I should like to state the following briefly: It should be known to the Tribunal that 40 percent of the total land level in the Netherlands lies below sea level. In the course of hard work for centuries, soil was wrested from the sea again and again and changed into fertile farming land. Powerful dikes protect the land; locks and pumping installations regulate the entry of water and water traffic in the interior of the country. The constant struggle against storms and water have turned the Dutchman into a proud and freedom-loving character. "God has created the earth, we have made our land ourselves," says a Dutch proverb.

When the Canadian troops thrust forward toward the North, the Reich Commissioner, contrary to the expectations of many persons, did not take the way into the Reich from Groningen, but returned to The Hague in order to carry his responsibility until the end. He feared that the collapsing Reich might reach a policy of catastrophe which would lead to destruction in an exposed country like Holland where 271 people live in one square kilometer.

The Gothic battle, in which everything is exterminated, became a fixed idea in many heads. Goebbels, after all, has declared braggingly that if they must go, they would slam the door with such a bang that the whole world would hear it. The Reich Commissioner admonished such ideas. The "Scorched earth" order actually came, and it would have meant the destruction of all technical facilities, including dams and lock facilities in Holland and of two-thirds of the country. In unison with Minister Speer and Doenitz all this was prevented. This has also been confirmed in my questionnaire by Commander-in-Chief General von Kleffel and been acknowledged by the Chief of Staff of the American Army, Bedell Smith. Historical structures were also to be destroyed, as has been testified by Schwebel. The defense counsel of General Christiansen informed me that besides the technical troops of the Wehrmacht which carried out detonations and floodings justified by the war situation, men sent by Himmler also appeared in order to carry out destructions behind the back of the Wehrmacht. All this was prevented by the intervention of the Reich Commissioner, who was conscious of his responsibility, and the country was saved to a great extent from destruction which could never again have been repaired. Since May 1932 there has been a simple memorial on the dam of the Zuidersee, the largest water structure which has ever been constructed, which bears no name whatsoever, only the proverb: "A nation that lives builds on its future." Regardless of how the trials may end, perhaps some day the time will come when the brief words will be added under this proverb "Saved from destruction by Seyss-Inquart."

DEFENSE

And so I have also reached the conclusion of the second accusation complex.

Slowly the curtains are beginning to fall in the act of the supposed conspiracy. I ask you, however, Is a man, who in the middle of a struggle for life and death of his nation is placed at the head of the administration of an enemy country and has tried again and again to prevent or decrease attempted excesses, a creature who could accordingly be described as a ruthless and arbitrary despot and war criminal?

However, I would not want to bring my discourse to a conclusion without also expressing some general thoughts on the trials. I esteem France and her old culture, and I have considered it an honor to be allowed as an attorney to cross swords with Frenchmen in these proceedings. I have listened to the speech of the French Chief Prosecutor Francois de Menthon with deep attention and inner sympathy. However, it cannot remain quite undisputed. De Menthon has described Germany as the eternal enemy of France and alone demanded the most severe penalty, death, against all defendants without exception! He thereby places one of the weaknesses of these trials into the foreground, namely that it will always remain a trial of the victors over the vanquished. One is reminded too strongly of the Gaul Brennus, who with his vae victis, throws the sword onto the uneven scale. Menthon with this presentation unintentionally obstructs the road to a lasting peace.

The sin against the spirit is the basic error of National Socialism and the source of all crimes, says Menthon. National Socialism is based on racial theory, a product of German mentality. But Menthon rightly explains that National Socialism is the farthest point of a doctrinaire development. There are no direct transitions in History but all is rooted in preceding ideas and undercurrents. The events of the 20th Century can only find their explanation in the developments of the preceding century. The final periods of the 19th Century are under the influence of exaggerated Nationalism, and in connection therewith it is important to confirm that it was not Germans, but French who first established the racial theory. Count Gobineau in his essay sur L'inegalite des races humaines (Essay concerning the inequality of the Human Races) and George Sorel in his Reflexion sur la violence (Reflections on Violence).

M. Menthon cites at the end of his statement "La morale internationale" (International Ethics) the work by Politis which I have also mentioned. Politis describes this exaggerated Nationalism being a real international disease, deriving from the 19th Century. He in particular mentions the case of the Frenchman Maurice Barres. He sees in the sentence "Que la patrie et-elle tort, if faut lui donner raison" (my country right or wrong) the negation of all ethical laws. I wish to refer to another Frenchman in contrast with M. Menthon. He is an unknown professor of history. The Gestapo, the German, and the French police are pursuing him. He frequently changes appearance and name. He is everywhere, we find him in the Massive Centrale, in the Auvergne-District, in the mountains near Grenoble, on the coast at Bordeaux, and in Paris. Whenever he appears army trains are derailed, ammunition depots are blown up, and vitally important industrial plants are shut down. He always remembers the words of de Gaulle: "Our country is in mortal danger, join us, everybody, fight for France!" The name of this man is Georges Bidault. The first thing he did after the enemy had been driven out of the country was to visit severely wounded soldiers in the hospitals. But he does not only go to the French. He also visits the German casualties in their wards, saying to them "Comrades, I wish you speedy recovery and a happy return to your homes." These words of the man who today is leading France, indicate to us the path towards peace in honest and free collaboration of people and nations.

Hitler wished to create a new Europe through his own methods. He failed in his efforts. Germany is beaten down to defenselessness, her towns are destroyed, her economic life annihilated. France, one of the oldest countries of Christendom, the country which at the end of the 18th Century revealed the rights of men, has therefore today the particular mission and responsibility of saving the culture of the Occident. For this achievement, however, it is necessary that distrust, poisoning the life of all countries, must be eliminated. All this in short and common to the trial.

Into your hands, my very esteemed judges, I trustfully put the fate of my client! I very well know that you will consider all the facts which speak for Seyss-Inquart.

But once more I wish to walk through the streets of Nurnberg, as I have done so often during the long months of this Trial, and from the imperial castle, now destroyed, look down on the German countryside. Out of the ruins of the old town rise, hardly damaged, the monuments of the Painter Albrecht Duerer and the Geographer Martin Behaim. They are the prophets of German Art and Science! May those two names be symbols for the future, and like a pillar of fire, lead the German people from dark misery to the luminous heights of a lasting peace!

DEFENSE

2. FINAL PLEA by Artur Seyss-Inquart

Mr. President, with my final words, I should like to make my own contribution to the clearing up of the evidence submitted here by explaining the personal motives and considerations responsible for my actions.

I have little to say concerning the Austrian question. The "Anschluss," separated from the bulk of later events, I regard as a purely domestic German affair. For every Austrian, the "Anschluss" was a goal in itself and never, even remotely, a preparatory step to a war of aggression. For that the idea of the "Anschluss" was too important a goal for the German people, it was its noblest aim. To the German people I make the report of the German people, it was its noblest aim. To the German people I make the report of the greatest success of my life. I believed in these words of the Fuehrer when he spoke on the 15th of March 1938 in the Hofburg in Vienna. They were true. The question of the "Anschluss" became of a peace-endangering nature, far beyond its domestic significance for Germany; and when I have followed the way prescribed by Berlin in March, the reason was the following: The unjustified opposition against the carrying out of orderly elections opened the doors to a radical procedure, practically as well as psychologically. I asked myself whether I had the right to be opposed to these methods, after my way had apparently not been practicable, precisely because of the stubbornness of the opposition within and without Austria.

If this procedure, however, seemed justified, I felt it my duty to give my cooperation in the measure, and I could give it in the face of these circumstances. I am convinced that it is due mainly to my cooperation, that this fundamental change, in particular during the night of the 12th of March, took place quietly and without bloodshed, despite the fact that strong hatred was stored within the hearts of the Austrian National Socialist.

In any case, it was indifferent for the unification of the Germans, whether Germany was a monarchy, a democracy, a socialistic republic, or a National Socialist Fuehrer State. I believe that the prosecution in the various documents regarding the "Anschluss", interpret them in such a manner as to read from them my aggressive intentions towards the annexation. These are documents regarding the Danube sphere of influence, and Czechoslovakia, all dated after the 1st of October 1938, and after the Munich agreement, and regarding the Vistula district after the 1st of September 1939. I admit these statements; their correctness has been proved in the meantime. As long as the Danube area was incorporated in the Austrian-Hungarian Monarchy its development was prosperous to all, and the German element did not deploy an imperial activity but rather promoted culture and economy. Since this area is broken up through the integral carrying out of the national principle it has not settled down in peace. This recollection made me imagine a reshaping of a common Lebensraum, which, as I openly declared, must give such a social order to all, that is, Germans, Czechs, Slovaks, Hungarians, and Rumanians, which would make life worth while to every individual. In this connection I also thought of Czechoslovakia, because of the coordination of languages in Moravia which I myself had witnessed.

If, after 1 September 1939, I spoke of the Vistula area as a German area of destiny, I did so out of my striving to take precautions against future dangers which had become obvious by the outbreak of war, and which have today become a terrible reality to every German. These statements have no other evidential strength to prove the intention for a war of aggression than for instance the factual carrying out of the decisions of Teheran concerning the German territories of the East.

This war which I immediately and always recognized as a struggle for life and death of the German people had now become a fact. I could oppose but an unconditional "no" to the demand for an unconditional capitulation. I believe in the words of Rathenau "Courageous people can be broken but never bent".

In connection with the defeat, I should like to say only the following with reference to my interference with the political administration. Nobody in the Netherlands was forced to a political confession nor limited in his freedom or his property because during the occupation he had held an attitude hostile to the Reich or to National Socialism.

I have already explained that I had serious humane and legal objections to the evacuation of the Jews. Today I realize that there must be a justification for large-scale and permanent evacuations, for such evacuations are today affecting more than 10,000,000 Germans, who had been settled in their homes longer than most of the Jews in Amsterdam, for hundreds of years.

From the middle of 1944, the activity of German courts in the Netherlands was stopped on the basis of a direct Fuehrer order. Saboteurs and terrorists were to be shot by the police if their activity was proved. I heard only of such shootings at this time, never of shootings of hostages in the true sense. The Dutch patriots who lost their lives during the occupation are today rightly considered fallen heroes. Does it not put this heroism on a lower plane to represent them exclusively as the victims of a crime, thus implying that their conduct would not have been so hazardous if the occupying power had conducted itself in a proper manner? They were all in a voluntary and active relationship to the resistance movement. They share the destiny of front-line soldiers; the bullet hits him who is active in a danger zone.

DEFENSE

Could I have been the friend of the Dutch, the overwhelming majority of whom were against my people which was struggling for its existence? I only regretted that I had not come to the country as a friend. But I was neither a hangman nor, of my own will, a looter, as the Soviet Prosecution contends. My conscience has been assuaged by the fact that the biological situation of the Dutch people during the period of my full responsibility—that is, up to the middle of 1944—was better than in the First World War, without occupation and blockade. This is testified to by the statistics of marriages and births and by the mortality and illness figures. This is certainly due in part to the effects of a number of measures instituted by me, for example, an extensive health insurance, marriage and baby houses, social graduation of the income tax, etc. Finally, I did not carry out the order which I received to destroy the country, and on my own initiative, I put an end to the occupation when resistance in Holland had become senseless.

I have two more statements regarding Austria.

First of all, if the Germans in Austria wish their community of fate with the Germans in the Reich to become a reality inwardly and outwardly, then no authoritarian obstacles may be opposed to this wish, and no cause given for interference of non-German forces in this decision. Otherwise, the whole German people would follow the most radical "Anschluss" tendency without consideration of how the rest of the political program of such a movement might be constituted.

Secondly, on the question of the effectiveness of provisions of international law during a war, Germany cannot desire any war in her own true interest. She must even see to it that no weapons are forced into her hands. The other peoples do not want a war, either, but the possibility of one is not absolutely out of the question unless the peoples abhor it. It is therefore wrong to try to minimize a future war enough to reduce the defensive forces in the nations by awakening the impression that a future world war could in some way be kept within the framework of the Hague Conventions on Land Warfare, or other international law agreements.

And now I have, no doubt, to give you an explanation regarding my relation to Adolf Hitler. Did he prove himself inadequate to fulfill a task decisive for the German people, for Europe itself, or was he the man who struggled, although in vain, and to unimaginable excesses, against the course of an inexorable fate? To me he remains the man who made Greater Germany a fact in German history. I served him and remained loyal to him. And then? I cannot today cry "Crucify him", since yesterday I cried "Hosanna".

My next thought is that of gratitude to my Defense Counsel for the high effort he has made in defending me.

My last word is the principle on which I have always acted and to which I will hold unto my last breath! I believe in Germany.

XXI. ALBERT SPEER

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Hans Flaechsner, Defense Counsel

Mr. President, may it please the Tribunal:

The Prosecution has charged defendant Speer with violations of all 4 points of the indictment, which essentially coincide with the stipulations of par. 6a-c. The French Prosecution which has substantiated more definitely the individual charges against defendant Speer desists from charging defendant Speer with a violation of par. 6a of the Statute of the Penal Code and demands only the application against Speer of par. 6b and c. However, since the legal concept of conspiracy during the oral proceedings has frequently been clarified by referring to the person of the defendant Speer, and since the assertion was set forth that the defendant Speer also had made himself guilty within the meaning of the Penal Code paragraph of a violation of figure 6a of the Statute, the details must be entered into by way of precaution.

The defendant Speer has therefore been charged with the planning, preparations, launching, and conduct of a war of aggression or a war violating international treaties, and this, indeed, at a time when the defendant assumed the office of Minister of Armaments, which was expanded to a Ministry for Armament and War Production 1½ years later when the German Reich was at war with all countries to which she capitulated in May 1945. At the time the defendant assumed Government affairs, all the facts mentioned under par. 6a had altogether taken place and defendant Speer's activity did not alter the actually existing situation to the slightest extent.

DEFENSE

The defendant had not contributed in the least to bring about this situation. His previous activity was that of an architect, who occupied himself exclusively with peace time construction and did not contribute by his activity, either toward preparation nor launching of a war violating international treaties. (Compare Doc. 1435-PS USA 216, p 29.) If under the circumstances which par. 6a of the Statute materially and legally characterizes as a punishable act it were a case of generally prevailing international law, and if individual culpability of persons who bring about these facts of the case were generally recognized in international law defendant Speer in my opinion could still not be held responsible for these facts, for not the slightest evidence has been produced during the proceedings that Speer contributed towards bringing about these facts. In this connection we must consider that culpability of an attitude requires that the person in question must have contributed in some way or other towards the bringing about of the facts which have been declared punishable, i.e., he must have caused the result which was declared punishable to be brought about. If, however, as in the case under consideration, defendant Speer entered the Government without having contributed anything at all towards the so-called crimes against peace, he cannot be charged with criminal responsibility for this, even if such responsibility could be applicable to other members of the government. The Prosecution used the expression that the defendant had accepted and/or approved the preceding crimes against peace by joining the government. Such a concept taken from the field of civil law cannot be applied to criminal law. Criminal law applies only to circumstances consisting of actions which serve to bring about the circumstances declared punishable. Nor is this altered by the introduction of the legal concept of conspiracy. In this connection reference may be made to Dr. Stahmer's detailed statement on conspiracy. The legal views set forth in that statement are also made the subject of my detailed statement. In order to avoid repetition, reference is made to it as well as to the full statements of Prof. Jahrreiss. It can, therefore, be confirmed that defendant Speer cannot be charged with a so-called crime against peace.

The personal interrogation of the defendant and the cross-examination regarding his activity have shown that Speer, by virtue of his position as architect, exercised exclusively architectural—artistic functions also in the Party set-up. Speer was the commissioner for construction in the Hess staff; here it was a matter of a purely technical task, which had nothing at all to do with any form of preparation for war. The Party, which strove to seize and influence all the vital functions of the people, had created the position of commissioner for construction, to execute and shape the Party structures uniformly. For their construction projects, the regional leaders of the NSDAP (Gau-leiter) and the other Party offices were to apply to this office for consultation; however, they availed themselves of this only to a very slight extent. Naturally it was a purely architectonic task, when the Party acted as person for whom building was performed (Bauherr). It strove to give its buildings a uniformly representative character. Considering the peculiarity of architectonic will to fashion things, each architect naturally pursues his own intentions in solving the problems put to him. The activity of the defendant as commissioner for construction was therefore relatively restricted and of secondary importance, since he did not even have an apparatus of his own at his disposal. It would be erroneous to try to assume therefrom any participation on the part of the defendant in any crimes against the peace. The same holds true for the defendant's remaining functions prior to and during the war up to his assumption of office as minister (Compare Spe. Exhibit 1). When the defendant was given the job of reshaping the appearance of the towns of Berlin and Nurnberg, this activity had nothing at all to do with any crime against the peace; on the contrary, his activity was rather to be regarded as a prevention of war preparations, as this task of his required raw materials and equipment to a very great extent, from which rearmament might otherwise have benefited directly or indirectly. The construction projects assigned to Speer were, moreover, calculated and planned far ahead. They could only cause the impression in Speer that Hitler reckoned with a long period of peace. It is, therefore, out of the question for the defendant prior to his assumption of office as Reich Minister to have contributed directly or indirectly to the realization of facts, which are characterized by par. 6a of the Statute as crimes against peace.

The fact too that the defendant was a member of the Reichstag from 1941 cannot be quoted in support by the Prosecution, because as the Prosecution itself pointed out, the Reichstag in the authoritarian regime has sunk to complete insignificance and had become merely an institution that accepted and applauded the Fuehrer's decisions. In this respect also responsibility for the guilt of war is out of the question for no activity whatever of the Reichstag is recognizable in extension of the war to the Soviet Union and the United States.

DEFENSE

The special French Prosecution, therefore, justly desisted from reproaching the defendant with an offense against par. 6a of the Statute.

The Prosecution further charges defendant Speer with having participated during his term of office through the fact that workers were transferred against their will from the occupied countries to Germany where they were employed for the purpose of the conduct of war or production of war material. It should be said in this connection:

The Prosecution reproaches the defendant with violations of paragraph 52 of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare insofar as according to this convention services can be demanded of nationals of the occupied country only for the necessities of the occupation army; moreover, they have to be in proportion to the resources of the country and must not imply the obligation of the persons concerned to take part in military actions against their native land. The Hague Convention on Land Warfare establishes in paragraph 2 that all countries participating in the war in question must have joined it (General participation clause). The Soviet Union not having entered into the Convention on Land Warfare, the latter could be applicable to the conditions created by the war against the Soviet Union only if the legal principles laid down in the Convention could be considered as universally valid international law. Above all we have, therefore, to start from the principle that a different legal judgment has to be applied to those areas belonging to states that were partners of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare, and for such areas whose states are not to be regarded as treaty partners.

In examining the question, the point is to be determined whether deportation of laborers from territories occupied in wartime by an enemy power can be justified in virtue of Article 52 of the HLO. Article 52 constitutes a limitation of Article 46 of the HLO, inasmuch as the principle is stipulated that fundamentally the population of occupied territories and their property are to be involved as little as the necessities of war will allow. Starting from this principle, it is now necessary to examine whether, in virtue of it, a deportation for the purpose of securing labor potential for the essential war economy of a belligerent country is prohibited to any extent. In this respect, the question must be considered, and it makes a difference whether the deportation carried out by the occupying belligerent State is in accordance with conventions agreed upon with the Government of the country occupied by the belligerent State. The Prosecution has defended the view that such conventions are legally void because they were made under the constraint of occupation, and because the Government existing in France during the time of occupation could not be considered as representative of the French Nation.

The first point of view cannot support the contention of the Prosecution. International juridical conventions will always be influenced in their contents by the respective centers of gravity of the contracting parties. In every peace treaty concluded between a victor and a vanquished State, this proportion of centers of gravity will be reflected in the contents. This is not, however, contrary to the nature of treaties.

The second point, in virtue of which the Prosecution rejects the plea of an agreement between the German and existing French government relative to the assignment of labor potential, is equally ineffectual. The so-called Vichy Government existing at the time was the only Government existing in French metropolitan territory; it was the lawful successor of the government in office before the occupation, and internationally acknowledged by the fact that states then not yet involved in the war preserved diplomatic relations with it.

Moreover, it cannot be taken for granted that the disposition manifested in the conventions by the French Government to co-operate with the then victorious German Reich was in contradiction to the genuine popular opinion of the French Nation. Reference can be made in this respect to Document R-124, page 34 of my Document Book. Particular attention must be given here to the economical situation of occupied France at the time. After France's withdrawal from hostilities, the whole of French metropolitan territory was included in the total blockade, with the result that those raw materials not home produced were no longer forthcoming, and production came to a standstill. Thus, a considerable proportion of the French productive potential was put out of action and a number of workers deprived of a living. Moreover, the French Government did not pledge itself to an unreserved dispatch of labor potential to Germany, but subordinated this to compensational provisions such as the liberation of prisoners of war, etc.

Whether, and in what measure, the expectations which conditioned the conclusion of the convention by the French Government were actually fulfilled is immaterial to the matter of determining whether the conventions in question were authentic treaties or not. That these agreements have the character of a treaty cannot be juridically doubted. In virtue of them, the accusation of the Prosecution that the removal of workers from the occupied French territories was carried out against their will and therefore illegally can have no justification. Agreements such as those concluded between the German and French Governmental departments cannot be introduced as a criterion for the judgment of the legal background relative to the workers from Belgium and Holland, since in those countries the Government had deserted and consequently there was no existent political authority. The remaining General Secretaries of the Government could not be considered as Government representative and the decrees, in virtue of which the dispatch of workers to Germany was carried out, were enacted on the directive of the Reich Commissioner in the person of the military Commander-in-Chief.

DEFENSE

That particular rules must apply to those countries and to the dispatch of laborers effected by them has already been explained by Dr. Steinbauer in his exposition concerning the activity of defendant Seyss-Inquart in Holland. To avoid repetition, I refer you to these explanations.

Where the Eastern countries are concerned, we must start from the principle that the Soviet Union did not become a contracting party to the HLO. It remains, however, to be examined whether the principle set down in Article 46 of the HLO with reference to the treatment of civilians in war, and in the case of occupation of a belligerent country by the enemy, is not to be considered as a universally valid international law and therefore applicable even if the belligerent country concerned is not specifically party to the HLO. On examination of this question, the deportation of workers from occupied territories would prove to be illegal, which means that a particular circumstance must come up to cancel this illegality.

The case of emergency stipulated by international law can be considered as one such circumstance. Of course, the theory international law is controversial as to whether and in what measure such an emergency can legalize an intrinsically illegitimate practice, but the admissibility of such an emergency must be envisaged in those cases when the State is fighting for its bare existence.

After the unconditional capitulation of Germany had been made the declared goal of the Allies, such a state of emergency was to be considered by the German State as having arisen, since there remained no doubt but that it was the intention of the enemy to destroy the German State to its very foundations.

Indeed, this emergency can be considered to have been already existent at an earlier stage, after it had become clear that the war had ceased to be, as conceived by the Hague Convention of Land Warfare, a settlement of differences between two States, and become a war in which it was sought not only to strike at the fighting forces of the belligerents but primarily the economic forces of the belligerent Nations and thereby what is termed as their war potential. The HLO rests upon a conception of war which was overwhelmed in the first World War and much more so in the second World War. If in the first World War the belligerents sought to strike at each other's economy by blockade and counter-blockade, in the second World War they have moreover, in addition to the more indirect effect of blockade, introduced direct damaging action against the enemy by the destruction of its production installations by means of aerial war. Against the conception of war at the base of the HLO, a complete change has come about. In view of the consideration that a country can only resist a technically well equipped adversary if it has, itself, at its disposal a potential of uninterrupted production, the object of this war was primarily to destroy this productive potential of the adversary. This was the aim of the British blockade, not only of Germany but of every country in the German sphere of influence. Dr. Kranzbuehler has already discussed the questions related to this subject. Reference can be made to his statement as far as it is concerned.

Accordingly, aerial war was primarily waged, not only to include the regions belonging to the German national territory but also to destroy the production potential and possibilities existing in the occupied territories. Aerial war with continuous air raids was directed against economic targets in France, Belgium, and Holland, the Czech Territories, Poland, Austria, and had as its further aim the interruption and putting out of action of the whole communications system, not only on the front and its immediate rear but hundreds of kilometers behind it, with the purpose of paralyzing the adversary's vital functions. The air offensive of the Allies against Japan is particularly clearly indicative of this. This war overlapped the bounds of the HLO. It does not make any more difference between the national territory of the adversary and the occupied territories which are likewise included in the enemy blockade. In this war, which made it its purpose to destroy not only the national existence but the economic productive capacity of the adversary, one can speak of a real national emergency. When defendant Speer was appointed Minister, the economic war we have just described was in full swing on either side. It was indeed the task of Speer's department to solve just the production problems resulting from it. Thus, Speer was placed in the middle of this economic war. It must be further examined whether and to what extent the measures taken on the German side were expedient in remedying the state of emergency.

DEFENSE

In the course of the trial, the Prosecution had claimed on several occasions that the imported labor was intended to be used as labor for service at the front. This is certainly one of the points of view which induced Germany to resort to foreign workers, but it is by no means the only valid, not even indeed the overwhelmingly decisive, point of view. It is a fact that the total blockade of the German Reich carried out by the adversary compelled the Reich to an increasing extent to build plants for the production of substitutes in order to carry on the war in its now definitely technical form. It is another fact that the disturbances of economic life caused by aerial warfare made it necessary to resort to an increasing use of labor. Merely as an example, allow me to mention how much additional labor was necessary for the repair of air raid damage. This situation involved a state of emergency, inasmuch as the pursuit of a war of self-preservation would not have been possible without the erection of such additional production plants.

Should it be contended that there is no point in speaking of an emergency cancelling the illegality of the proceedings since the War was begun as a war of aggression and was therefore illegal from the outset, the answer is that, as far as defendant Speer is concerned, this much may be said in his favor, that he believed in the existence of such a state of emergency and had reason to do so. The examination of evidence has revealed that the backgrounds of the origin of the war, so far as they have been exposed here by the Prosecution, were not known to most of the defendants, but least of all to defendant Speer.

Insofar as the deportation of foreign workers to the Reich constitutes an objectively illegal measure according to international law, it remains to be examined what share of it can be charged to Speer. At his interrogation, prior to the beginning of the Trial on 18 October 1945, defendant Speer has admitted having known that, at least as far back as September 1942, foreign workers had ceased to come voluntarily to the Reich. He said he had countenanced the compulsory measure because there was no other possibility of meeting the labor requirements in a different way. It must be concluded from this declaration that the defendant was convinced of the necessity of this emergency measure. Subjectively, it must therefore be considered in his favor that he believed in the existence of such a state of emergency excluding illegality. But in the first place it must be examined, as to what extent defendant Speer has actually contributed to the institution of deportations to Germany. In this respect, we must start from the principle that defendant Speer had a purely technical task which he has sufficiently described in his evidence. Reference can be made thereto. For the fulfilment of his task, he stated his labor requirements. How these requirements were met has been told in detail by witnesses Schieber and Schmel. Requirements were submitted as a whole and it was incumbent upon defendant Sauckel to satisfy them.

These requirements included the totality of labor required, and it was the co-defendant Sauckel's task to meet these requirements according to possibilities and to his best judgment. It was for him to carry out an exhaustive round-up of domestic labor potential as well as the procurement of foreign labor. That defendant Speer made it a point to procure German labor in the first place for the tasks to be carried out by him and for which he was commissioned by the Government has been told by witnesses Schieber and Kehrl (Doc. Book II, Pages 109, 115, 117, 118, 129) at their interrogation. That the satisfaction of his labor demands for the achievement of his task, the increase of armament production, was admittedly of considerable though not decisive importance is evidence by the testimony of witness Saur (Doc. Book II) according to which an increase of 4 to 4.9. million workers was achieved for the armament finishing industry (for the whole armament industry) during the defendant's activity as Armament Minister, while the production of armament parts increased in the proportion of 5½ and up to 7 in many departments. It must therefore be born in mind that the increase of armament production incumbent upon defendant Speer was primarily achieved, not through increase of labor potential, but thanks to technical and organizational measures. It must be once more inferred from this that, for the defendant, procurement of labor potential was admitted an important though not the decisive element in the carrying out of the task assigned to him. The defendant has quite plausibly stated that he had demanded workers from Sauckel but that he had insisted upon having German workers first of all. In the defendant's opinion, the increase of labor potential in the economic sector controlled by him could have been achieved without resorting to foreign labor to the extent in which it was done. The measures taken by the defendant for the purpose of preventing the deportation of workers from the West into the Reich have been adequately described by the evidence. In taking those measures, namely the removal of consumer goods production and manufacture of vital armament parts such as, for instance, forged parts, railway equipment, etc.,

DEFENSE

to the Western countries and installation of protected industries there, Speer was actuated by the knowledge that the conscription of workers from France as well as from Belgium would be stopped. The consequence of his talks with the French Minister Bichelonne was, as the defendant explained at his interrogation, practically the end of the deportation of workers to Germany. The results have been accurately described by the General Labor Commissioner at the session of the Central Planning Board on 1 March 1944 (b.f. p. 32/33 Speer Doc. Book). In spite of every resistance opposed to this policy (Cf. Sauckel's letter to Hitler dated 17 March 1944, Doc. 3819-PS) Speer persevered in his purpose. The report of Hitler's conference on 4 January 1944 submitted by the Prosecution under 556-PS shows too, by the decision adopted, that the protected industries, the abolition of which Sauckel tried to obtain, were to remain inaccessible to seizure by Sauckel's labour conscription. (Compare also Speer Exhibit 10, page 26.) Speer wanted to employ French workers in France in the effort to transfer production of consumer goods and products which did not represent arms production to the occupied Western territories. He wished to utilize for armament production the German workers made available through the closing down of German plants. (Doc. R-124, pp 33/34 of Speer document book). In this manner he was able to increase production, because German workers as a result of elimination of language difficulties could more easily be retained and because food difficulties were eliminated. (Compare Kehrl, page 110, Speer document book, answer to question 9.)

The result of this policy was that the workers of the Western areas were preponderantly used in the production of civilian goods, but not in armament production.

On the question of employment of foreign labor in the protected industries it must also be said, the statute is derived from two factual circumstances—deportation for forced labor and forced labor itself. Compulsory labor in France was ordered through a decree of the French Government. According to international law there could be no objection to this, unless one would take the position that the French Government was not entitled to take such measures and issue such decrees. As was deposed by defendant Speer, French economic leadership obtained its independence through the agreement with Bichelonne, naturally with the restrictions which resulted from the agreement. As established by Bercks (Doc. book I, p. 381), co-worker of defendant Sauckel, from the protected industries of France 20% went to French economy, on the other hand more than 40% went from consumer goods industry into French hands. This shows that the French armaments industry did not manufacture weapons and direct implements of war, for the German authorities would surely not have left them to the French offices.

If in the session of 20 June 1946 the Tribunal summarized its misgivings as to the manner in which we presented our evidence, to the effect that purposeful questions were irrelevant, then the viewpoint of the defense on the contrary may be established that this speech is only for the purpose of clarifying the question of legality.

If the French Government was justified in decreeing compulsory labor service and if plants, employing French workers on the basis of this decree or on the basis of voluntary labor contracts, were provided with orders on German accounts, no legal objection could be raised. The establishment of protected industries which hindered withdrawal of laborers and their transfer to Germany, and the removal of some individual branches of production to France, Belgium, and Holland led to the objective of satisfying the requirements of German Economy in a legally unobjectionable manner. Although defendant Speer did not completely check the transfer of workers, he nevertheless did succeed in decreasing their commitment appreciably. Instead of the policy of transplanting foreign workers to the Reich, which was pursued by other Reich offices, the defendant pursued the objective of committing the labor for his purposes in their homeland. (Speer Exhibit 9, p. 24 and Speer Exhibit 11, p. 27 of the Speer document book.) To this extent he worked against the tendency of deporting workers from their homeland.

In order to prove the assertion that Speer had decisively participated in the intensification of deportation for forced labor, the Prosecution refers to Document 556-PS which represents a file memo by Sauckel concerning a telephone conversation with Speer on 5 January 1943. In contrast to this, the copy of the Fuehrer protocol of 3 to 5 January 43, which was the object of the telephone conversation, has been submitted. Even if here also sharp remarks by Hitler are repeated it nevertheless does not reveal the tendency which was noted by Sauckel in his file memo. The defendant Speer was already at that time on bad terms with Sauckel. The order issued to Speer in this Fuehrer protocol for the management of the French armament industry gave him a pretext for the establishment of protected industries. The termination of labor commitment from France was thereby accomplished, consequently therefore, the opposite of what the prosecution would like to prove. Reference must be made hereby to Document book RF 22. There it is confirmed that due to the Speer-Bichelonne agreement, labor commitment to Germany as of October 1943 had been decreased about 1/10. (Compare p. 41 Speer Document book.)

DEFENSE

In weighing the question as to what extent this exonerates the defendant, it is of no importance whether he acted in such a way for reasons of expediency or because he considered the other procedure as illegal. What solely matters in this case is the success which actually brought to an essential standstill the transfer of labor forces to Germany, as evident from the Document quoted RF 22. It is finally evident from the Fuehrer Protocol of 19/22 June 1944, Speer Exhibit 12, page 19 of Document Book Speer, and the testimony of Seyss-Inquart (11 June 46) that in spite of the loss of industry in the Western territories and the intent of other departments to bring the unemployed workers to Germany, Speer carried through the maintenance of his protected industries, and that the plan of further commitment of foreign workers in Germany collapsed definitely. The duty to examine the measures of Sauckel as to their international legal admissibility cannot be invoked in the case of the defendant Sauckel and this for the following reasons:

When he took over his post in the year 1942, the transfer of foreign labor to Reich Territory had already been practiced for some time. He relied on the assumption that the legal foundations for these measures had been examined before their introduction. He did not have the legal duty of examining independently the legal basis; he could rely on the assumption that the offices handling labor commitment had examined the legal basis of their activity. He had it confirmed to him repeatedly by the Plenipotentiary for Labor in the course of his activity that the transfer of labor to the Reich was carried out strictly within legal limits. He could rely on it that the authorities charged by the State direction with the tasks of procurement of labor would on their part examine the measures carried out by them for the execution of these tasks as to their legal admissibility. The activity of the defendant within the framework of the State direction could, if transferred to civil law, be compared with that of the technical works manager of a factory, where Sauckel's position would correspond to that of a director of the personnel office. In such a case the technical works manager's duty is not to examine if and to what extent the employment contracts concluded with the individual workers conform to legal regulations. He has only to see to it that the labor forces put at his disposal to carry out his tasks are being employed in the right place in the right manner. This cannot be countered with the argument that the defendant Sauckel merely considered himself as the deputy of the defendant Speer. This would not present a just picture of the distribution of tasks between the two co-defendants as carried out by the State direction. The fact cannot be overlooked that of all the sectors which put in their requisitions to the defendant Sauckel, the ones presented by the defendant Speer were the most important for the conduct of the war, and therefore had priority over the others. This does not mean, however, that it was Sauckel's duty to satisfy absolutely all the demands of the sector represented by Speer before all the others. He did not do this, as evident from the collective evidence, particularly the testimonies of the witnesses Schieber (Doc. book II, p. 114) and Kehrl (Doc. book I, p. 106), and could not even do this, as the demands of the other sectors, which were all designated as "Bedarfstraeger" (users), were very often equally urgent, and the labor potential at hand was not sufficient to fill all the demands equally. Had Sauckel not been more than a "deputy of Speer", a tool who had only to carry out the instructions of Speer the profound differences between the two could never have come into existence.

It has been emphasized by the Prosecution that the appointment of the defendant Sauckel as Plenipotentiary for Labor was made possible through the intervention of the defendant Speer, and that this gave reason to believe that Sauckel had been more or less a tool of the defendant Speer, or depended on him to a large extent. This assumption does not correspond with the facts.

When he assumed his functions as Armament Minister, the defendant Speer discovered that the procurement of labor for the plants which had up to then been carried out by the Ministry of Labor could not fill the demands made on them. This activity represented, within the frame-work of the Ministry of Labor, only a small fraction of its overall functions.

The defendant Speer declared in the course of his interrogation that the Ministry of Labor could not overcome sufficiently the tendencies of the Gauleiters in the various "Gau" (districts), because every Gauleiter had the ambition to prevent the transfer of workers from his Gau to another to the best of his ability. The department of the Ministry of Labor, with its pure red-tape, did not appear to be capable of this task, and the suggestion was made to the State direction to charge a Gauleiter with this mission. The demand connected with this suggestion of Speer, namely to put the Gauleiter charged with the procurement of labor under him, was not granted by the State direction, and this because of other existing competencies. The person proposed by Speer was also turned down, and the defendant Sauckel appointed instead. Therefore only organizational reasons were involved in Speer's endeavors to create a Plenipotentiary of Labor, the purpose of which consisted in overcoming the above-mentioned opposition directed against the activity of the Labor Procurement Office of the Ministry of Labor. To draw from these facts the conclusion that the defendant Speer was responsible for all the measures ordered by the defendant Sauckel would be erroneous.

DEFENSE

The fact that the defendant participated in the sessions as a member of the Central Planning Board, in the course of which the problem of the Procurement of Labor was discussed, cannot be used to support the claim of the Prosecution. The Prosecution attempts to prove, as a result of the session of the Central Planning Board, that the defendant Speer had played a leading part in the procurement of labor from foreign countries. To counter this the following must be stated: The Prosecution has only submitted the texts of the Minutes of the Central Planning Board i.e., the Minutes which were taken down regarding the course of the session, but not the decisions which were made on the basis of this session. These are, however, decisive.

As, however, all the defendant Speer's reports include also resolutions of the Central Planning Board and contain notes placed at the disposal of the Allied authorities, it would have been easy for the Prosecution to present such conclusions, from which a decisive cooperation of the defendant in the procurement of labor could be deduced. Such conclusions do not exist, however, and cannot therefore be drawn from the fact that at the conferences of the Central Planning Board questions of labor mobilization were mentioned which the Central Planning Board had taken over in its sphere of activity. The decree regarding the establishment of the Central Planning Board is given in Speer Exhibit 7 under 42. In it the labor sphere of the Central Planning Board is firmly outlined. The procurement and distribution of labor should not be included in the sphere of competence of the Central Planning Board as the new office was created just for that purpose. It follows also from the testimony that—when the co-defendant Sauckel discussed fully the question of policy of labor commitment before the Central Planning Board—he underlined sharply his independence of the Central Planning Board and laid weight thereon that his decisions are accountable only to the Fuehrer in the last instance. For this I refer to the testimonies of the witness Kehrl and the witness Schieber (Speer Exh. 36, 37). Nothing contradicts the fact that attempts were made in the Central Planning Board to influence the sphere of activity of the General-Plenipotentiary for Labour. These attempts, however, did not lead to any results.

In principle it results that the responsibility of the defendant Speer for the transportation of labor from the occupied territories to the Reich cannot be deduced from his activity within the framework of the Central Planning Board.

If the Prosecution charges the defendant with having known that a great portion of the workmen made available to him by Sauckel were brought to Germany against their will and that he used these workmen in the industry under his supervision, this conclusion encounters legal criticism. If and insofar as the removal of labor to the Reich was a violation of international law, such crime would be terminated with the removal of labor to the Reich. The fact that the persons removed into Reich territory were assigned for work establishes, legally speaking, a new set of facts to which the Prosecution applies the concept of "slave labor". In this connection the following should be considered: By reason of the Reich Compensation Law and the enactment decree there existed for every German a liability to make his services available for war purposes. Through the Labor Office as highest instance, the State leadership could dispose of the labor of every State national for any purpose it deemed appropriate, and it has done so. Foreign workers who were removed to Germany became likewise subject to this regulation. There is no attempt made on our part to deny that no provision is found in Hague Convention for Land Warfare itself which would support labor compulsion in force for German nationals to be extended to inhabitants of the occupied territories. Since HLO reflects the influence of a different concept of warfare, it could not yet take conditions into consideration which were brought on by economic warfare. Yet it is not possible to answer affirmatively the question whether HLO conclusively regulates the summariness of all powers incumbent upon an occupation authority. An affirmation is contradicted by the practice of all nations who participated in this war. But in this respect also the angle of the above-mentioned State emergency situation can be resorted to for a correct evaluation and appreciation of the case. It should be admitted that the Prosecution is right in that this extension of labor liability can be justified from that point of view only.

Assuming the Prosecution's contention of a lack of legal justification for the extension of labor liability to foreign nationals of occupied territories, there remains the need for checking the extent to which culpability could be claimed for the defendant Speer because of the employment of labor held under such compulsion. That the defendant Speer, although he was not responsible for this, still attempted to facilitate the living conditions of these workers and that he has also helped to correct bad conditions—insofar as these came to his attention—is shown by Exhibits 3, 4 and 5 of the Speer document book (pp. 7, 8, 9, of the Doc. book). Reference should also be made to the testimony of the defendant himself in direct examination as well as in cross-examination when he described his activity in that field.

DEFENSE

Justice Jackson, the American Chief Prosecutor, when placing before the defendant Speer during his cross-examination a series of documents, purportedly to prove the bad treatment of foreign workers by the firm of Krupp in Essen, himself stated that he does not hold the defendant Speer responsible for such individual incidents.

The documents involved were the affidavit of Dr. Jaeger (Doc. D-288), discussed by Dr. Servatius; a letter of the Locomotive Manufacturing Department of the firm of Krupp, dated February 1942, just after the defendant Speer had taken office as Reich Minister. Conditions as described therein had called for Speer's intervention with Hitler in March 1942 (Speer Exhibit 3, p. 7 of Doc. Book Speer). Another document also submitted, Document D-321, describes conditions as they prevailed when Russian laborers came to Essen in 1941, in other words, before the defendant Speer took office. Document D-258, USA Exhibit 896, which came up during cross-examination was not produced as proof of charge against the defendant, as stated by Justice Jackson. Further documents then submitted all deal with incidents in the Krupp Works. To the extent to which he was able to do so, the defendant explained all of them. These documents show that improper conditions of a general nature for which the firm of Krupp might be held responsible resulted from the effects of air bombardment and demolition of living quarters incidental thereto. But even if the incidents cited should have actually occurred with that firm—which the defense is not in a position to verify—these incidents would not supply adequate ground for the assumption that the conditions under which foreign laborers worked in armament industries were uniformly the same. Picking out only one firm and examining it does not permit the drawing of conclusions as to a whole system. But only findings covering the system as such would yield evidence.

It is true that this activity of the defendant Speer would not essentially influence criminal evaluation of his actions in principle, but it would be of decisive import in establishing the measure of his participation.

When the defendant took office, the practice of employing foreign labor and prisoners of war was already in existence; it is not he who introduced it. Thus he should not be considered as the originator, which may likewise deserve to be taken into account for the establishment of judgment, since it did not seem possible to abrogate the practice after its establishment. The employment of foreign labor in German economy was not something unusual. In peace times also a great number of foreign laborers were employed in agriculture, in mining, in surface, and in underground workings.

During the war foreign laborers from the East as well as from the West had already been brought to Germany to a considerable extent, even before the defendant Speer took office, and only a portion of them belonged to the sector under Speer's control.

In order to divide off the spheres of jurisdiction of the two defendants, Sauckel and Speer, how assignment and distribution of workers into the establishments most recently under the control of the defendant Speer was handled will be described below. Acting in behalf of the Speer Ministry, commissions and pools assigned to the individual establishments certain production tasks as part of the armament program. The factory then figured out the number of workers needed. This was reported to the Armament Command and at the same time also to the Labor Office where labor requirements of all works were recorded. The Armament Commands examined all requests for workers received from all works under their jurisdiction and passed them on to the Armament Inspection Offices. Labor requirements reported to Labor Offices were forwarded by them to the Gau Labor Offices. Armament Inspection Offices collected the requests and forwarded them to the Speer Ministry, Labor Mobilization Division. The Gau Labor Offices directed applications which they received to the General Commissioner for the Commitment of Labor (Gb.Arb.). In this connection it is noteworthy that in 1942 the Speer Ministry controlled only construction work and Army armament. Navy and Air armament handled their requests for labor independently. In the spring of 1943 Navy armament was assigned to the Speer Ministry; from then on Navy handled its labor requisitions by way of the Labor Commitment Division; in the fall of 1943 the rest of production was added while Aircraft armament continued to handle its requisitions independently through the General Commissioner for the Mobilization of Labor until August 1944.

An account of these details is indispensable in order to show that the Prosecution's assumption, according to which Speer is seen as the main beneficiary of Sauckel's mobilization of labor, can be disproved. Incidentally, it is mentioned that alongside of the Speer Ministry there existed essential industries and agencies of equal importance, for instance the Wehrmacht Administration, the Transport System, and so forth; this has also been confirmed by the testimony of witnesses. The General Commissioner for the Commitment of Labor (Gb.ArB.) distributed the labor at his disposal among the various essential industries and agencies, assigned the required labor to the Gau Labor Offices who, in turn, referred them to the local labor offices where allotment of individual laborers to the individual establishments was handled, on the strength of applications which had undergone examination through the branches of the Armament Offices. Exceptions to this cumbersome type of procedure were possible through the introduction of the so-called "red-slip process" which was applied in the case of exceptionally urgent production assignments (Speer Exhibit 37, p. 122 of Doc. Book). A certain number of red slips were made available monthly by the General Commissioner for the Commitment of Labor to the Armaments Ministry, for distribution by the latter to the individual industrial works under its supervision by way of the industries self-administration agencies. The individual factory then presented these red slips to the Labor Office, and these requests for workers covered by red slips were acted upon without regard for the requirements of other essential industries and agencies, and not until then could allotment of labor be made to other establishments. In all instances where normal requests for labor are involved, allotting was exclusively in the hands of labor authorities under direction of the defendant Sauckel, so that neither the individual factory nor the offices of the defendant Speer nor the latter himself had any influence on the distribution. The question whether local labor or foreign labor or prisoners of war were used to satisfy requisitions was left for the Labor Authorities to decide (Doc. Book II, pp. 108, 109).

DEFENSE

In concluding the presentation of evidence, the Prosecution submitted the decree of 1 December 1942 (Doc. 4006-PS), issued jointly by Speer and Sauckel. The Prosecution contends that this document and the decree of 22 June 1944, simultaneously submitted, furnish a basis for appraisal of the power ratios between Speer and Sauckel. Therefore, some comment on this is appropriate.

From the decree of 1 December 1942 it is clear beyond doubt that the General Commissioner for the Commitment of Labor was authorized to examine requests for labor to the extent to which they came from the armaments industry. If then a case arose that a factory asked for the additional laborers required to carry out the production job assigned to it, the General Commissioner for the Commitment of Labor reserved to himself the right of examination as to its necessity. The intention was to make the individual factory exert the greatest possible economy in the use of labor within its own works. Another purpose of these commissions was to establish the extent to which an establishment might be in a position to spare of its own labor for work in other plants, without impairing the task assigned to it. It was the task of the Armaments Ministry and of the agencies under its authority to determine the priority range in the consideration of requests for labor received by establishments under its jurisdiction. They also had to determine which of the plants were in a position to make workers available to other plants whenever both made the same product for the same Wehrmacht requirements. As an example, supposing the supply program to be modified for a plant manufacturing vehicle supplying articles, it was left to the Armaments Commands to decide whether the labor power thus set free should be assigned to another factory in the same line of production. In general, the allotment of labor remained in the hand of the General Commissioner for the Commitment of Labor. The agencies of Speer's Ministry were merely concerned with directing the labor already available to these branches of industry as assigned to these establishments through the General Commissioner for the Commitment of Labor.

The procurement of other labor was now, as before, in the hands of the Plenipotentiary General for Labor, and furthermore the Plenipotentiary-General for Labor participated authoritatively in the examination of the question as to what extent plants could release labor in order to make it available to others. (Combining-out action.) The authority of the Plenipotentiary General for Labor was therefore not limited to any extent through this mutual agreement between him and the Reich Minister for Armament and War Production. His task was merely now as before to procure labor for the plants, he was even given a considerable amount of authority in labor questions, to look over the armament plants subordinated to the defendant Speer and to examine if and to what extent these plants could make labor available for other plants. The decree of 22 June 1944 ordered that labor which was already available was to be used in accordance with directives of the Central Authorities or according to the orders of the Chairman of the Armament Commission. It must also be noted in this respect that it was not a matter of using new labor unskilled in armament work which, now as before, was procured through the Plenipotentiary General for Labor, but solely so-called transfer-actions from one armament plant to the other. The Sauckel Agencies therefore could no longer, in accordance with this decree, check the demands for labor on the part of the plants subordinated to the Speer Ministry, if the Chairman of the Armament Commission had recognized these demands. This decree did not bring any change in the basic distribution of authority, according to which the Plenipotentiary General for Labor had to procure the required labor and handled the whole allocation of labor.

DEFENSE

If the agencies of the Plenipotentiary General allocated labor on a demand for labor which had already been checked, then it was left to their decision as to what labor, if native or foreign, etc., was to be furnished. The authority of the agencies of the Minister for Armament in questions of the commitment of labor were limited to a large extent to the execution of so-called transfer-actions, i.e., assignment of labor from one armament plant to another. It would be wrong to try to conclude a considerable limitation of the authority of the Plenipotentiary General for Labor and a fundamental expansion of Speer's authority from these decrees. It would be just as wrong to conclude from this that the influence of the Armament Ministry had been increased over other authorities of the Plenipotentiary General for Labor.

In order apparently to characterize the relationship between Speer and Sauckel, the Prosecution has finally submitted a file note of General Thomas, the Director of the War Economy and Armament Division in the OKW, regarding a discussion between the defendant Speer and himself on the one hand, and the Directors of the Armament Offices of the three branches of the Wehrmacht on the other hand of 24 March 1942, in which Thomas states that the Fuehrer considered Speer as his main authority and his trustee for all economic spheres. This note can only be understood in connection with the report of the account which General Thomas gave regarding his activity as Director of the War Economy and Armament Office, and which has been presented in excerpt form to the Tribunal under the file 2353-PS. Prior to Speer's appointment as Minister for Armament, Thomas had tried to effect that the position of the General Plenipotentiary for Economy, which had been provided in the Reich Defense Law, would be expanded to an Agency which would control the whole war economy. When now the armament economy was confronted with high demands in connection with the first winter campaign in Russia and the losses which had been sustained there, and Hitler, after the death of Dr. Todt, appointed Speer to be his successor in the Ministry for Armaments and Munitions, Thomas thought to see in Speer a personality who would receive the authority which he had striven to obtain for the General Plenipotentiary for Economy. This, however, did not occur. As has been shown from the evidence, Speer only received the army equipment and the construction system. The subordination of the new agency of the Plenipotentiary General for Labor under his Ministry, for which the defendant Speer was striving, was not sanctioned by Hitler. Speer's rights as Minister for Armament are stated by the decree. The generally maintained expectations of General Thomas, which the latter had linked with Speer's appointment, were therefore not fulfilled in any way. Speer only received an increased authority when, in the year 1943, he took over industrial production from the Ministry of Economy. But even then he was still far from having the sphere of work which General Thomas had expected for Speer. Based on this expectation General Thomas thought to see in the person of Speer, the man, appointed by Hitler, who would be decisive for all economic questions. In the file note of General Thomas, which confined itself to generalities, it is a matter of an expression of opinion which was not justified by the actual state of affairs. It offers no basis for the reply to the question, how the responsibility for the policy of the commitment of labor objected to by the Prosecution can be distributed.

In summarizing it must be stated to this count of indictment—

Speer is not responsible for the means employed for the procurement of foreign labor, nor for its removal to Germany. He is at the most responsible for the utilization of part of this labor in Germany.

As a further count of indictment it has been stated that the defendant had employed prisoners-of-war in the economic sector which was under his direction, and that he had thereby violated Article 32 of the Geneva Convention of 1929 regarding the treatment of prisoners-of-war used in plants under his control; this, however, cannot be regarded simply as a violation against Article 31 of the previously mentioned Agreement. The expression "armament economy" and/or "armament plant" does not have the same meaning as plant and/or economy, whose task is the manufacture of arms and direct war requirements. The term "armament plant" can only be understood from its development. When at the beginning of rearmament the limitation of raw materials began, plants which were working for rearmament were given preference in obtaining raw materials. These plants were subordinated to the armament inspections established by the Wehrmacht, and were called "armament plants". In addition to all other plants, those which served the manufacture of iron, steel and metals, as well as those plants which manufactured machine-boilers and vehicles and appliances, also the entire manufacture of raw steel and the first stage of preparation (foundries, rolling works, forges) as well as the whole remaining subsidiary supply industry were included in it. So, for example, electro-technical plants, plants which produced optical products, plants which manufactured ball-bearings, cog-wheels, etc. This is shown by the testimony of the witness Schieber. (Exhibit 37, Question 9, Doc. Book, p. 114.)

DEFENSE

Approximately 30-35% only of the whole iron production was used for the production of armament to the extent as previously described, and 60% for the maintenance of production or for other consumers (Reich railroads, construction of merchant vessels, agricultural machine-export-goods, appliances for the chemical industry). We refer to the testimony of the witness Kehrl, which has been submitted under Speer Exhibit 36, and particularly to his answer to question 5. Since the iron quota assigned to the armament industry also includes the manufacture of raw steel and the stages of manufacture, it can be safely presumed that of all the plants which were combined in the armament inspections, only approximately 20-30% manufactured armament products within the meaning of the Geneva Convention. The details had to be treated individually in order to gain an idea as to what extent Article 31 of the Geneva Convention could be violated by the employment of prisoners-of-war. The Prosecution has presented an Affidavit of the American economic statistician Deuss under No. 2520-PS, in order to prove thereby how many prisoners-of-war and foreign workers were employed in the armament industry.

The compilation, which is principally supported by numbers taken from the documents in the possession of the defendant Speer, does not, however state in which branches of the armament industry the individual prisoners-of-war worked. A big enterprise, which, because it falls under one of the above-listed categories and as the result thereof was considered an armament plant in its entirety, needs only to manufacture a fraction or perhaps no weapons or equipment which stand in direct relationship to war activities. If prisoners-of-war were employed in it, then this occupation does not represent a violation of Article 31 of the Geneva Prisoner-of-War Convention. Such a plant, however, appears collectively in Deuss' Affidavit. The Affidavit thereby loses its value as evidence as to, if, and to what extent Article 31 of the Geneva Convention was violated by the employment of prisoners-of-war in armament.

The French Prosecution has represented the point-of-view that the employment of French civilian workers who had been released from prisoner-of-war confinement and who were employed in the armament industry was also to be considered a violation against Article 31. This is not applicable. Beginning with the time of their release, the former prisoners-of-war were free people, unlimited in their freedom of movement, and only limited by the obligations embodied in the contract of employment. In addition to this no French prisoner-of-war could be forced to agree to his release with the obligation to make his labor available to German industry. It was his free decision if he preferred to accept his release as a prisoner-of-war under these conditions; from that moment on he was no longer a soldier, no longer subject to military discipline, received his working wages like every free worker, and was not subjected to any camp discipline or any other similar circumscribing regulations. To those among the prisoners-of-war who preferred to agree to their release under these circumstances, these advantages apparently appeared more valuable than the protection which they enjoyed as prisoners-of-war. If they did this then their occupation, even in work which in itself is prohibited for prisoners-of-war in accordance with Article 31, cannot be considered a violation of this Article. The employment of prisoners-of-war in the industry of the country which is holding them prisoner is not prohibited by the Geneva Prisoner-of-War Convention. Only that work is prohibited which is directly connected with military operations, for example, the use of prisoners-of-war for fortification works for the combat unit. The defendant Speer cannot be accused of anything of this kind—the manufacture and transport of weapons of all kinds as well as transportation of war materiel for the combat units. In the armament economy under the control of the defendant Speer the only thing which could be considered as a violation of the afore-mentioned rule is the manufacture of weapons and ammunition of all kinds. Such a violation, however, has so far not been proved by the Prosecution at all.

It must furthermore be examined how the assignment of prisoners-of-war to plants took place. According to the testimony of the defendant Sauckel, this was done by the War Economy officers with the Military District Commanders submitting the number of prisoners-of-war available for work to the District Employment Office, and the transfer of the prisoners-of-war to the plants then took place in the same manner as with usual labor. A difference only existed in that the camp officers—the prisoners-of-war were billeted in so-called enlisted men's camps (Stammlager)—were responsible that the directives issued by the OKW for the employment and the treatment of prisoners-of-war were complied with. It was the responsibility of these camp-officers that, in the employment of prisoners-of-war, a violation of Article 31 of the Prisoner-of-War Convention was rendered impossible. The Commitment Officers (Einsatzoffiziere) appointed by the camp commanders had constantly to control and examine the working conditions and the kind of occupation of prisoners-of-war used in armament plants, and they had to watch and see that no prohibited work was imposed on the prisoners-of-war. The defendant Keitel has given an exact description of the manner and procedure in which the control of prisoners-of-war in the home area was exercised. Documents have also been submitted which give information about the treatment of prisoners-of-war.

DEFENSE

The prisoners-of-war who were confined in Assembly Camps (Sammellagern) were constantly examined by Camp Commitment Officers (Lagereinsatzoffiziere) to see that the employment of prisoners-of-war was in accordance with Articles 31 and 32 of the Geneva Prisoner-of-War Convention. As far as French prisoners-of-war are concerned a special competence existed in the person of Ambassador Scapini, who had to forward any probable complaints against the use of prisoner-of-war labor in violation of international law to the OKW.

Complaints of this sort by Ambassador Scapini were immediately investigated, and if they were found to be justified, improvements were made. It is of course possible that in such a large organization as the large number of French prisoners-of-war made necessary, mistakes would also occur occasionally. Measures for the correction of mistakes of this kind are after all provided by the Geneva Prisoners-of-War Convention itself in its regulations. These regulations were also effective in the last war. The representatives of the Protecting Powers have intervened against bad conditions, which had been brought to their attention on the basis of complaints, and they have also demanded and achieved their abolition. If such mistakes were recognized and reported, they were then immediately remedied. It would be incorrect to try to conclude a premeditated system from individual occurrences. The protection of prisoners-of-war which they found in the Labor Commitment Officers (Arbeitseinsatzoffiziere) even laid defendant Speer open to criticism by individual plant directors, as being too extensive.

As far as the legal relations of the defendant Speer in this respect are concerned, it must first be examined, if the employment of prisoners-of-war in the armament industry is to be fundamentally regarded as a violation of the rules of international law. After the previously mentioned statements regarding the character of the plants which were combined in the armament industry, this must be answered in the negative. Only insofar as prisoners-of-war were actually employed on the production of arms and on the production of immediate war material could we speak of a violation of Article 31. That this regulation may have been violated in individual cases will not be denied by us. If, for example, the photographs submitted by the American Prosecution show that near the front lines prisoners-of-war were used to unload munition-trains, then this doubtlessly represents a violation of the regulation of Article 31. The defendant Speer, however, cannot be accused of such incidents, as they do not fall under his competence. To conclude a violation of the regulations of the Geneva Prisoners-of-War Convention on a large scale that the employment of prisoners-of-war in the armament industry did take place is not applicable.

A further reproach of the Prosecution refers to the violation of Article 32 of the Prisoners-of-War Agreement, according to which prisoners of war were employed in unhealthy work, insofar as prisoners of war had been employed in mines. For this a reference is made to the minutes of a Central Planning meeting where the employment of Russian prisoners-of-war in mines is discussed. The employment of prisoners-of-war in mines is not to be considered as forbidden in itself, and it has been practiced in all industrial nations. The employment of Russian prisoners of war in mines is, therefore, not to be objected to, insofar as the prisoners concerned were in a physical condition that enabled them to do heavy mining work. It has not been established here and proved by the Prosecution, that these prisoners-of-war were not physically fit for the work given them. From the fact that the employment of prisoners-of-war in mines was discussed and approved, it cannot be concluded that Article 32 of the Prisoners-of-War Agreement was violated. The treatment of prisoners-of-war has to be examined legally from various points of view. The German Government has taken the point of view that Soviet prisoners-of-war should be treated on a different legal basis than the subjects of the Western States, who were all parties to the treaty of the Geneva Prisoners-of-War Convention of 1929, whereas the Soviet Union had not signed this agreement. The Soviet Prosecution has presented Document EC-338, USSR 356, an investigation according to international law of the Foreign

DEFENSE

Counter-Intelligence Office (Amt Ausland/Abwehr) in the High Command of the Wehrmacht, concerning the legality of the regulations issued on the treatment of Soviet prisoners-of-war, and levelled sharp criticism at the latter. The essential point is that in this report the view is expressed that, as a matter of fundamental principle, Soviet prisoners of war cannot be treated according to the rules of the Geneva Prisoners-of-War Agreement, because the Soviet Union did not participate in this, and that this report refers to the decree of the Soviet Union of 1 July 1941 concerning the treatment of prisoners-of-war, concerning which the opinion of the High Command of the Wehrmacht, Foreign Counter-Intelligence, establishes that on essential points it agrees with the rules of the Geneva Prisoners-of-War Agreement. It is, however, characteristic that in this decree it is ordered that non-commissioned officers and enlisted men taken prisoners of war may be put to work for industry and agriculture, inside the camp or outside, and that the only restriction is that the use of prisoner-of-war labor is forbidden (a) in the combat area, (b) for personal needs of the administration, as well as the needs of other prisoners-of-war (Orderlies). An order restricting the use of prisoner-of-war labor according to Article 31 and 32 of the Geneva Prisoner-of-War Agreement is not to be understood from the above-mentioned command. It now remains to investigate whether the stipulations of Article 31 and 32 of the Geneva Prisoners-of-War Agreement flow from general rules of international law, which should be observed, even if there were no special ruling by treaty, such as the Geneva POW agreement represents. This cannot generally be affirmed. The above-mentioned treaty regulations cannot be regarded as the prescription by treaty of a generally valid legal concept, if so important a member of the family of international law as the Soviet Union does not accept a ruling of this sort. Proceeding from this idea, the employment of Soviet POW in work that was not forbidden by Article 31 of the POW Agreement is not to be objected to. The Italian military persons interned in Germany after Italy's fall do not come under the regulations of the Geneva POW agreement since no state of war existed between Germany and Italy. Moreover, these military internees did not come under the restrictions of Article 31 in their employment as manpower. It must, however, be pointed out that these military internees are comprised in the enumeration by Mr. Deuss of POWs occupied in the armament industry.

In conclusion, the following is to be said on this point—

The procurement of prisoners-of-war for the factories was effected exclusively through the offices of the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment. The control of the proper allocation in accordance with the POW agreement depended on the Labor Commitment Officer of the Stalag, who in return was himself finally responsible to the General for POW matters at the Army High Command. It was not possible for the defendant Speer to have any influence on the distribution of prisoners-of-war and their occupation. The Prosecution has not been in a position to bring any proof from which the participation of defendant Speer to unlawful occupation of prisoners-of-war might be deduced. These assertions of the Prosecution have remained unproved.

The Prosecution has now further brought against the defendant, the charge that the Todt Organization, at the head of which Speer was placed in February 1942 after Dr. Todt's death, had used native workers to build fortifications in the French coastal areas. As far as the Todt Organization is concerned, it is a purely civilian institution of the General Construction Inspector for road maintenance. It worked on a private economical basis, that is, that it gave out the construction work that it intended to carry out to private firms, also to foreign firms, which were established in the respective countries, and merely supervised the execution of the constructions. The private firms could undertake the procurement of the necessary materials and labor themselves. For the very reason that native construction enterprises were used it was possible to eliminate the difficulties which otherwise would have opposed themselves to the execution of the work. The work-yards of the Todt Organization enjoyed a certain favor with the natives because the workmen had the assurance that they could not be compelled to go to Germany to work in industry there, because these places of construction were considered as urgently important. The workers went voluntarily to the firms which were active for the Todt Organization to obtain this security. The example quoted by the defendant Speer during cross-examination of 50,000 Todt Organization workers who were once taken from France to Germany to repair damages caused to two West German valley dams by air attacks made such a bad impression on the workers employed in other Todt Organization construction sites that there was nothing else left to do but to send these 50,000 workers back to France. In the meantime, many workmen of the Todt Organization construction sites in France disappeared, because they feared to be taken to Germany sooner or later against their will, while up to then they had regarded employment in enterprises which worked for the Todt Organization as insurance against an eventual transfer to Germany. Only the return of the above-mentioned 50,000 workers to France, which was brought about by the defendant Speer when these unfavorable consequences developed, restored the hitherto existing state of confidence. Here also the reason should be emphasized that the fact results from the event described that the Todt Organization workers were free to go where they wished; in any case, that no coercion was used against them. The consequence of this was that when the protected plants (Sperrbetriebe) were established in France, all enterprises working for the Todt Organization were declared protected plants and therewith removed from the possibility of being employed on other work. This instance shows that the view of the Prosecution that the workers of the Todt Organization were forced into the Todt Organization plants against their will is a wrong interpretation.

DEFENSE

As it is established that the French government agreed to the use of French workers in construction sites under administration of the Todt Organization, as well as in any other armament industries in Germany and occupied territories, every illegality is excluded. It should not be left unmentioned here, that after the conclusion of the Armistice Agreement with France the latter had no more part in military hostilities. The Armistice Treaty certainly did not mean an agreement for a truce but de facto, a final stopping of hostilities, and served as a preparation for the conclusion of peace. It was a situation, which no longer signified war, but also did not yet mean the definite return to peacetime conditions, regulated by treaty. A resumption of hostilities was, however, according to both partners to the armistice, completely out of the question. The armistice was to regulate exclusively the situation until the definite conclusion of peace. Prescriptions of the Hague Convention, as well as of the POW Agreement, concern the restriction that performance of services cannot be allowed to violate the loyalty towards one's own country, which is still fighting, because the country is no longer at war. After a general armistice, the production of arms and munitions can no longer be directed against the party which has retired from hostilities, but only against other partners still in the field. The aforementioned principle of respecting the duty of faithfulness to one's own country can in such a case no more be applied.

It must moreover be pointed out that the Organization Todt was in no way a para-military organization as has been falsely asserted. Apparently this false assumption has been strengthened by the fact that the German members of the administration of the Organization Todt abroad wore a uniform. These people were considered as Wehrmacht followers, but on the other hand the labor engaged by the firms and the construction workers of the firms as well as the technical personnel were in no such relation.

The reproach cannot be made, therefore, that these native workers were indirectly incorporated into a Wehrmacht organization.

A further reproach against the defendant Speer consists in the fact that prisoners from concentration camps were employed in the economic sector controlled by him. The defendant admitted this. A penal responsibility because of this fact does not, however, stand the test of a legal verification. The employment of convicts for work of an economic nature has always been a practice in Germany. It could be carried out in various ways, partly by employment within the convict prison itself, partly outside. Owing to the lack of labor due to the aggravation of the economic war, it was necessary to draw upon the labor available in the concentration camps.

The Prosecution has submitted documents from which can be seen how much trouble the offices subordinate to the Reich Minister Himmler took to use the reserves of labor contained in the concentration camps for the construction of their own SS plants, and the defendant Speer has supplied information during his hearing before the Court on 20-21 June regarding the efforts of Himmler tending towards building up a separate armament industry of his own, and subordinate to him only, which would have had the result that any control over the production of arms in these intended SS plants would have become impossible, so that the SS could have provided themselves with weapons without the Army or any other offices being able to control them. The defendant Speer successfully fought against this. It was agreed that Himmler would release a part of the inmates of the concentration camps to be employed in the armament industry. Hereby the inmates of the concentration camps gained an improvement of their situation, since in the first place they obtained the higher food rations provided for workmen or for those doing long shifts or heavy work, as has been attested by witness Riecke; moreover, they left the large concentration camps, and were no more under SS control during working hours, but in the plants they were subject to the control of foremen and skilled workmen appointed by the plants. It is true that to avoid transportation and marching difficulties special camps were erected near the plants or working places where they were employed, and these were not accessible to the control of the plant managers nor to the offices of the defendant Speer, but stood exclusively under the control of the offices in charge of the administration of the concentration camps. For the conditions prevailing in such camps neither the plant manager nor the offices of the defendant Speer can be held responsible if abuses occurred there. In general, as attested by the letter of the department chief Schieber of 7 May 1944 to the defendant Speer (Doc. book II, p. 88), the inmates preferred work in such plants to an occupation given by the administration of the concentration camp itself; and Schieber quite clearly states in his letter that for these reasons more room should be given to the employment of concentration camp inmates, in order to improve their lot. But he further states that the number of concentration camp inmates employed in the armament industry amounted to 36,000 and that this figure was decreasing. Against this the defendant's assertion at his interrogation that the total number of concentration camp workers employed in the armament industry amounted to 1% of the total number of workmen employed in the whole armament industry is calculated too high. Of 4.9 million workmen engaged in the final processing of armaments the figure of 36,000 represents only 7 per thousand. The number of concentration camp inmates employed in the armament industry represents a very small part of the total labour employed in the final processing of armaments, that is of the total labor employed in the plants manufacturing finished products.

DEFENSE

These figures show how misleading the assumption of the prosecution is that the employment of such prisoners in the armament industry had resulted in an increased demand for such labor, and that this increased demand was satisfied by the sending into concentration camps of persons who under normal conditions would never have come there. The opinion that the fact of the employment of prisoners from concentration camps in the armament industry led to an increase in the number of concentration camp inmates is disproved by the already mentioned letter of Schieber (Exh. 6, p. 88) and by his testimony, also submitted as Exhibit 37, Document 51. According to this, the employment of concentration camp inmates in the armament industry occurred for the first time in the autumn of 1943 and the number of prisoners employed there reached its peak with the maximum figure of 3,600 in March 1944 and from that time on not only did not increase, but on the contrary decreased. The conclusions of the Prosecution in no way bear examination. Not even the proof has been brought forward that Speer had attempted to have people sent to the concentration camps.

At his interrogation the defendant admitted that everywhere in Germany people were afraid of being sent to a concentration camp. This dread in the population of concentration camps was quite justified, for it depended only on the judgment of the police authorities led by Himmler whether a person was sent to a concentration camp or not, further because there was no legal authority which might have made it possible to check the charges resulting in transfer to a concentration camp and finally, and this is the main reason, because it lay entirely within the discretion of the concentration camp authorities to decide for how long one was to be sent to a concentration camp.

The Prosecution has further asserted that Speer went on having concentration camp inmates employed in industry after he had obtained knowledge of the conditions prevailing in the Mauthausen camp from a visit he made there. That this was not the case is proved by the evidence of the defendant on this point. As it was only a hurried visit, the purpose of which was merely to instruct the camp administration to desist from tasks undertaken in defiance of the prohibition of which served purely peacetime purposes, and instead of this to place labor at the disposal of the armament industry, the defendant Speer could only obtain a superficial impression of the living conditions in the camp. Up to this point his evidence may be referred to.

Moreover through witnesses for the prosecution detailed reference has been made to the fact that during such visits to concentration camps by personalities of high standing the camps were shown from the best side only, and that any signs of atrocities, etc., were carefully removed, so that the visitor should not get a bad impression of the camp (cf. statement of witness Blaha of 1 January 1946).

In connection with this question we will deal with the further reproach of the Prosecution, which asserts that Speer had approved of the use of Hungarian Jews as labor for the construction of the bomb-proof aeroplane factories ordered by Hitler. In respect to this, reference must be made to the evidence of the witness Milch and that of the witness Franck. Milch stated that Speer who was ill at that time, strongly opposed these constructions, but that Hitler, who demanded the undertaking of the work, gave the commission directly to Dorsch, the leader of the Organization Todt (OT), to carry them out. So that the controversy between Hitler and Speer should not become known to outsiders, Dorsch officially remained subordinate to Speer, but in this matter he had to deal directly with Hitler alone and was immediately subordinate to him. In his evidence Milch further stated that those building intentions were never actually carried out. I have submitted Hitler's order to Speer of 21 April 1944 as Exhibit 34, page 52, Document book. This order clearly shows that Hitler shows Dorsch as being directly responsible to him, since the appointment of Speer, who was given the duty of adjusting these building tasks to the building plans under him, was of a purely formal nature. The evidence given by Field Marshal Milch is thus confirmed by this letter.

DEFENSE

To support the opinion of the Prosecution that the defendant Speer had contributed to sending people to concentration camps, a statement is quoted which was made at a sitting of the Central Planning Board of 10 October 1942 on the question of shirkers. In this connection one must look at the evidence of the defendant Speer in the witness-box, in which he declared that upon this statement no steps to stop this evil were taken either by the Central Planning Board nor by himself with the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment. Effectively nothing was done about it. It was only in November 1943 that Sauckel issued a decree against shirkers. The term "shirker" is applied to those workers who, in order to evade the fulfilment of their working obligations simulate illness or stay away from work under the pretext of reasons that do not stand the test or even without any reason at all.

It may incidentally be mentioned here that economic warfare did not neglect even this question. Efforts were made in every imaginable way to undermine the willingness to work of the working people. By dropping leaflets and through other channels of information, advice was given to the workers as to how they could report sick, as to what means they were to use in order to succeed in feigning illness at medical examinations, they were invited to work slowly, etc. At first this propaganda succeeded only in isolated cases. As however such isolated cases very easily have unfavorable influence on the working discipline of the personnel as a whole, the defendant Speer discussed the possibility of police intervention. Speer did not, however, take any initiative of any kind which would have led to a practical action on the part of the police. It was not until a year later that a decree was issued by the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment, first making an obligation for the employer to use disciplinary penalties; in particularly grave cases indeed the trustee of production could ask for court punishment. Based on this decree sentences could be pronounced providing for transfer to a worker's training camp for a term of 56 days. Only in exceptionally grave cases of infractions of the working law did the decree of the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment provide for transfer to a concentration camp. It must here be mentioned that this decree was applicable both to national and foreign workers in the same way, for in no case were national workers to be treated differently. In the cross-examination of defendant Sauckel the French Prosecution produced the document about a sitting of Sauckel's labor authorities at the Wartburg. At this sitting Dr. Sturm the specialist on questions of labor law at the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment gave a lecture on the punishment of workmen and it was thereby established that only an infinitesimal percentage of workers had to be sentenced to penal punishment.

But from this it results again that the Prosecution has brought forward no proof for the assertion that, as a consequence of Sauckel's decree concerning shirkers, the concentration camps had been filled up, so that a conclusive proof is lacking that Sauckel, or respectively, the defendant Speer contributed by any measures they took to the filling of concentration camps. In his statement before the Central Planning Board of 22 May 1944 (p. 49 Doc. book, USA Exh. 179) Speer pointed out that the escaped prisoners of war who were apprehended by the police had to be brought straight back to their work. From this remark we see the basic attitude of the defendant Speer who did not want to see these escaped prisoners of war thrown into a concentration camp, but demanded that they be immediately incorporated into industry. So far the Prosecution has not been able to bring forward a proof that will stand the test for the assertion that Speer had the concentration camps filled in order to obtain labor from them.

Mr. President, perhaps now I may go into the question which you asked me at the beginning of my plea as to how I interpret paragraph 6a of the Statute in regard to the defendant Speer, especially in regard to the terminology, "The waging of a war of aggression." I should like to say the following: The Charter, under 6a, cites, among other punishable actions, the execution of a war of aggression. As for the definition of a war of aggression, I need say nothing here. Professor Jahrreiss has already done that in detail. Here it is only the term "the execution of a war of aggression" that is in question. My point of view is that a war of aggression can be waged only by the person in command. All others are only led, which makes a considerable difference in their participation in the war.

In the case of the defendant Speer, as a result, the waging of a war of aggression can not be applied. I should like to point out the following as well: In a session on about the 28th of February or the 1st of March, one of the judges told Justice Jackson that the prosecution had represented the point of view that the charge of a war of aggression was concluded with its outbreak. I can only share this opinion.

DEFENSE

During the hearing of evidence I had ample opportunity to state the activities of the defendant Speer during the last phases of the war from June 1944. I can, therefore, confine myself to proving now in regard to this detailed chronological description that the entire testimony of Speer is covered almost in its entirety by testimonies of other witnesses and by documents. The written depositions of witnesses which I refrained from reading before the court, run along entirely the same lines, although the witnesses came from different camps and expressed themselves in a completely unbiased manner.

Beginning with June 1944, the defendant Speer readily reported to Hitler on the situation of his armament production and pointed out vigorously at the same time that the war would be lost if such decline of production were allowed to continue. This is proved by the memoranda of Speer to Hitler submitted as Speer Exhibits 14, 15, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24. As stated by the witness General Guderian, Chief of the General Staff of the Army (compare Q. 6, p. 179 of the Doc. Book Speer) Hitler defined since the end of January 1945 any such information as high treason and subjected it to corresponding punishment. Nevertheless, as it appears also from the deposition of Guderian (Q. 9, p. 179, v. Poser, question 22, p. 11) Speer stated clearly time and again to Hitler as well as to Guderian his opinion about the prospects of the war.

Hitler had forbidden especially to inform third persons about the true situation of the war. Notwithstanding this, Speer informed, after the severest orders of destruction had been issued by Hitler, the Gauleiters and the Commander-in-Chief of various army groups that the war was lost and achieved thus that Hitler's policy of destruction was at least partly prevented. This is evident from the testimonies of the witnesses Hupfauer, Kempf, and von Poser (Hupfauer, Q. 24, p. 138; Kempf, Q. 10, p. 171; v. Poser, Q. 6, p. 4).

Hitler declared to Speer on 29 March 1945 that the latter would have to take the consequences customary in such cases, if he continued to declare that the war is lost, i.e., to be shot. This conversation is contained in the testimony of the witness Kempf (Q. 10, p. 171). In spite of it Speer travelled already 2 days afterwards to Seyss-Inquart (on 1 April 1945) in order to explain also to him that the war was lost. * * * The witness Seyss-Inquart and the witness Schwebel (Interrogation 11 June 1946, witness Schwebel; interrogation 14 June 1946) stated here unanimously that this conversation with Speer of 1 April 1945 occasioned the conferences of Seyss-Inquart with the Chief of the General Staff of General Eisenhower, General Smith. This led finally to the handing over of undestroyed Holland to the Allies. On 24 April 1945 Speer flew once again to Berlin which was already besieged in order to persuade Hitler that this senseless battle should be given up, as is evident from the testimony of the witness Poser (Q. 22, p. 11). In his last will Hitler dismissed Speer on 29 April 45. (Doc. 3569-PS, p. 87 of the Doc. Book.)

The American chief prosecutor, Justice Jackson, has therefore been obliged to confirm to the defendant Speer during his cross-examination, that he evidently was the only man who told Hitler the whole truth.

The representatives of the prosecution have produced no evidence that destruction of industries took place in Poland, the Balkans, Czechoslovakia, France, Belgium, Holland during the German retreat. This is in the first place a merit of the defendant Speer who prevented the destruction of the industries of these countries as ordered by Hitler, partly even through a false interpretation of existing orders. That Speer was convinced as early as the summer 1944 that these destructions should be prevented in the general European interest is evident from the testimony of the witness von Poser (Q. 2, pp. 1, 2; Q. 22, pp. 10, 11). It would have been easy by relevant execution of the orders to cripple completely the industries of high standing of Central Europe and of the occupied Western European countries for 2-3 years and with it the entire industrial production and civilized life of these peoples, in fact to make rebuilding by own force quite impossible for years to come.

The witness Seyss-Inquart has stated (testimony of 11 June 46) that the prepared destruction of only 14 points in Holland would have absolutely destroyed the basis of existence of this country. The destruction of all power plants in these countries would have produced a similar effect as in 1941 the destruction by the Soviets of 2 or 3 power plants in the Donetz territory had shown. It was not until 1943 that production there could start again. Similar and still further reaching consequences had to be expected from the carrying out of Hitler's orders on the European continent.

After the success of the invasion of these occupied territories Speer gave the authorization to undertake no destructions, as is confirmed by the witnesses v. Poser, Kempf, Schieber, Kehrl,

DEFENSE

Rohland, Seyss-Inquart, Hirschfeld in Speer Document 16. Immediately after the appointment of the co-defendant Doenitz as successor to Hitler, he submitted to him orders prohibiting any destruction in the still occupied territories of Norway, Czechoslovakia, and Holland, as well as Wehrwolf activities, as is shown in the testimony of the witness von Poser and Kempf.

Although Speer had no direct authority for carrying out the destruction of industries in the occupied territories, he had to accomplish this task at his own responsibility and through his agencies within the borders of the so-called Greater German Reich. He had to keep especially busy in this connection in order to obstruct the total destruction of all real values which was obstinately demanded by Hitler. Information on this will for destruction on the part of Hitler and many of his Gauleiters is furnished in the testimonies of witnesses Guderian, Rohland, Hupfauer, von Poser, Stahl and Kempf.

The most important document in this regard is the letter of Speer to Hitler of 29 March 45 submitted as Speer Exhibit 24, in which Speer repeats again Hitler's remarks during the conversation on 18 March 45. This document shows clearly that Hitler had made up his mind to destroy completely the foundations of the life of the German people. This document should be especially rich in information about Hitler's time for any future historian.

In connection therewith follows the evidence of the General Colonel Guderian who certifies that in February 1945 Hitler—

1. Confused his inevitable fate with that of the German people.
2. Wished by all methods to continue this senseless fight.
3. Ordered the reckless destruction of all things of real value.

At the same time the demolition and evacuation orders of Hitler and Bormann, which were issued the day after the conference with Speer and are of impressive clearness, have been submitted to the Tribunal as Documents under Speer Exhibit 25-28.

Already since the middle of March 1944 Speer—considering this war inevitably lost—was determined to undertake everything in order to maintain the most urgent vital necessities for the German people, as can be confirmed by the witness Rohland. Notwithstanding the growing danger, he repeated this determination with increasing urgency to his collaborators as the witnesses Kempf, von Poser and Stahl can certify for the months of July and August 1944 and the witnesses Stahl, Kempf, von Poser, Rohland and Hupfauer for the critical period from February 1945 onwards. Numerous orders of Speer dealing with the preservation of industrial plants issued between September 1944 until the end of March 1945 can be submitted to the Tribunal without any gaps. They were at first partly issued without Hitler's authorization, but until February 1945, by a clever use of Hitler's hope that these territories could be reconquered, were subsequently approved by him.

The testimonies of the witnesses Rohland, Kempf, and von Poser, as well as Speer's numerous memoranda regarding the war situation prove that he without sharing it profited by Hitler's illusion in order to prevent these demolitions.

Since the beginning of February 1945 Hitler no longer lent his ear to any such argumentation. The introduction to his demolition orders of 19 March 1945 on the contrary show that he considered it necessary to oppose actively such argumentation. In false orders as those of 30 March 1945 (Speer Exhibit 29) to all industrial plants, as well as those of 4 April 1945 for all sluices and dams, Speer gave instructions—contradictory to the intentions of the orders submitted by Hitler—not to undertake any industrial demolitions. This likewise is corroborated by the witnesses Kempf, Poser and Rohland.

During the month of March the executive power for the demolition of industrial plants and of other objects of value was transferred from Speer to the Gauleiters. During this period Speer acted in open insubordination, and on trips to the danger zones he arranged for the sabotage of these orders. As for instance by clever planning he withdrew the stocks of explosives from the possession of the Gauleiters—which was stated by the witnesses von Poser, Kempf and Rohland—and gave orders that the so-called industrial explosives should no longer be produced, as is proved by the statement of the witness Kehrl, the chief of the Office for Raw Products of Speer's Ministry.

It seems important that Speer had urgently drawn Hitler's attention to the consequences which the demolitions would have for the German people, as is shown in Speer's submitted memorandum dated 15 March 1945 (Speer Exh. 23). In this Speer, for example, has established that by the planned demolition of industrial plants and bridges, in the Ruhr for instance, the reconstruction of Germany by her own forces after this war would be made impossible.

It is without doubt mainly to Speer's credit that the industrial reconstruction of Western and Central Europe can progress already today, and that in France, Belgium, and Holland according to their latest reports, production has already reached the level of the peacetime production of 1938.

Speer was the Minister responsible for the means of production, i.e., the factories and their installations. Thus he sat in the transmission center through which Hitler's intentions for the carrying out of these demolitions must necessarily pass. We have noticed in this trial how in an authoritative system such centers are in the position to carry out on a big scale the orders of the Head of the State. It was a fortunate coincidence that at this decisive period a clear-thinking man like Speer directed this office where the industrial demolition must be directed. But with increasing intensification Speer took measures beyond his sphere of action in order to ease the transition for the German people and at the same time to shorten the war. Speer thus tried to prevent the destruction of bridges. Every German knows that up to the last days of the war and to the farthest corner of the German Reich, bridges were destroyed in a senseless way.

DEFENSE

Nevertheless his efforts were doubtless only a partial success. The numerous conferences which Speer held in this connection with military commanders are testified to by the witnesses Kempf and Lieutenant Colonel von Poser. This witness was Speer's liaison officer with the army, and accompanied him on all trips to the front.

These conferences were only partially successful. Finally in the middle of March 1945 the Chief of the General Staff of the Army Generaloberst Guderian and Speer tried on the latter's proposal to obtain Hitler's agreement to alter his demolition orders regarding bridges, as is confirmed by the witness Generaloberst Guderian but without success.

Knowing that the consequences of those bridge demolitions could not be foreseen, Speer finally issued on 6 April 1945 six orders in the name of General Winter of the Supreme Command of the Wehrmacht which should arrange for the sparing of the bridges of important railway lines in the Reich and in the entire Ruhr territory. These unauthorized orders were confirmed by the statements of the witnesses von Poser and Kempf.

Noticing at the end of January 1945, that, from a long range view, the guarantee of sufficient food supplies for the German people and the spring preparations for the harvest of 1945 in particular were endangered, Speer allowed the requests for armament and production, which were in his jurisdiction, to be superseded and gave priority to the interests of food supply.

That this did not only deal with the actual food situation but merely in order to relieve the transition period after the occupation by the allied troops is proved by the statements of the witnesses Hupfauer, Kehrl, Rohland, von Poser, Riecke, Secretary of State in the Ministry of Food, Milch, Kempf and Seyss-Inquart. When Speer believed that renewed apprehensions that Hitler, induced by his close collaborators in Party circles, would use poison gas in the fall of 1944 and then in the spring of 1945 were justified, he opposed this determinedly as it is proved in his cross-examination by the U.S. Prosecutor Justice Jackson and by the testimony of the witness Brandt. Speer's statement that out of this apprehension he had shut down the German poison gas production as early as November 1944 was confirmed by the witness Schieber. Speer at the same time established that the military authorities unanimously opposed such a plan.

Finally since the end of February 1945 the defendant Speer had tried by the planning of a conspiracy to bring the war quickly to an end.

The statements of the witnesses Stahl and von Posen show that Speer had planned other forced measures. Chief Justice Jackson likewise has established in the course of Speer's cross-examination that the prosecution knew of further plans, which were to be executed under Speer's leadership.

Speer's political attitude, apart from all these activities, is illuminated by two facts:

1. In Speer's memorandum addressed to Hitler, submitted as Exhibit 1, the defendant establishes that Bormann and Goebbels marked him estranged from the Party and hostile to it, and that a continued collaboration would be impossible should he and his collaborators be judged by Party-political measures.

2. In their Government list of 20 July 1944 the Putschists quoted Speer as Armament Minister and as the only Minister of the Hitlerite System, as the witnesses Ohlendorf, Kempf, and Stahl stated.

Would these circles have proposed Speer as Minister, if he had not been considered an honest and unpolitical expert in Germany and abroad? Is not merely the fact, that he, as one of the closest collaborators of Hitler, was chosen for this post, a further proof for the high respect which the opposition thus paid him?

Honorable Judges, let me say a few more fundamental words about the Speer case itself. When the defendant took over the office of Minister at the age of 36, his country was in a life and death struggle. He could not evade the task with which he had been charged. He devoted his entire energy to the solution of the task, which seemed almost unsolvable. The successes which he obtained there did not cloud his view to the actual condition of things. Too late he realized that Hitler was not thinking of his people, but only of himself. In his book "Mein Kampf" Hitler wrote that the government of a people always had to remain conscious of the fact that it could not plunge the people into disaster. Its duty was rather to resign at the right time, so that the people could continue to live. Naturally, such principles were valid to Herr Hitler only for governments in which he had no part. For himself, however, he was of the point of view that if the German people should lose this war, they would have proved themselves the weaker ones and would no longer have any right to live. In contrast to this brutal egoism, Speer had preserved the feeling that he was the servant of his people and his nation. Without consideration for his person and without consideration for his safety, Speer acted as he considered it his duty towards his people to act. Speer had to betray Hitler in order to remain faithful to his people. Nobody will be able to withhold his respect from the tragedy which lies in this fate.

DEFENSE

2. FINAL PLEA of Albert Speer

Mr. President, may it please the Tribunal: Hitler and the collapse of his system have brought a time of tremendous suffering upon the German people. The useless continuation of this war and the unnecessary destruction, in addition, make it difficult for the work of reconstruction. Privation and misery have come to the German people. After this trial, the German people will condemn Hitler as the proven originator of its misery, and despise him.

Yet the world will learn from these happenings not only to hate dictatorship as the form of a state, but to fear it.

Hitler's dictatorship differed in one principle from all its predecessors in history. His was the first dictatorship of an industrial state in this time of modern technical development, a dictatorship which, for the domination of its own nation, availed itself of all technical means in a perfect manner.

Many of the apparently improbable phenomena of this trial would not be possible without these technical developments. Through the means of these developments like the radio and the loudspeaker, 80,000,000 people were deprived of this power to think independently. Through these means they were subjected to the will of one man. The telephone, the teleprinter, and radio made it possible that, for instance, orders from the highest sources could be transmitted directly to the lowest ranking units, where because of their great authority, they were carried out without criticism. Of it was achieved that numerous departments and agencies came into direct contact with the top-ranking leaders from whence they received their sinister orders directly. Or it happened that there was a far-reaching supervision of the citizen of the state and a high degree of secrecy of criminal events.

Perhaps to the outsider this machinery of the state may appear like the cables of a telephone exchange—apparently without system. But just like this, it could be served and dominated by one single will.

Earlier dictators during their work of leadership needed collaborators, with the highest qualities even at the lowest level, men who could think and act independently.

The totalitarian system in a time of modern technical development does not depend on them; even the instruments of communication alone place it in a position where the work of the lower ranking leaders can be mechanized. As a result there arises the new type of the recipient of orders who does not criticize.

We had only reached the beginning of the development.

The nightmare of many a man that one day technical developments might domineer entire peoples had merely been realized in Hitler's totalitarian system.

Today the danger that technical developments may terrorize them overshadows every country in the world. In the modern dictatorship, this to me, seems inevitable.

Thus, the more technical the world becomes, the more the counter-balancing influence of the advancement of individual freedom and self-possessedness of man is essential.

Hitler not only used technical developments to dominate his own people—he had nearly succeeded, by means of his technical lead, in subjugating the whole of Europe. It was merely due to some principal shortcomings of organization, such as are typical for a dictatorship because of the absence of criticism, that before 1942 he did not have twice as many tanks, aircraft, and submarines.

But, if a modern industrial state uses all its intelligence, its science, and technical developments as well as its entire production for a number of years in order to gain a lead in the sphere of armament, then it can also, by the use of its manpower and because of the established lead in the technical sphere, completely overtake and conquer the world, particularly if other nations during that same period employ their technical abilities in the service of cultural progress of humanity.

The more technical the world becomes, the greater will be this danger and the more serious will be an established lead in the sphere of the modern means of warfare.

This war has ended on the note of radio-controlled rockets, aircraft developing the speed of sound, novel submarines and torpedoes, which could find their own target, of atom bombs, and with a prospect of a horrible type of chemical warfare.

DEFENSE

By necessity the next war will be in the shadow of these new destructive inventions of human minds.

In five to ten years this technique of warfare will offer the possibility of firing rockets from continent to continent with uncanny precision. Through the smashing of the atom it will be in a position to destroy, in the center of New York, perhaps 1,000,000 people in a matter of seconds with a rocket serviced, perhaps, by ten men. Invisible, without previous warning, faster than sound, by day and by night. The scientists of various countries are able to spread among human beings and animals various diseases and destroy the harvests. Chemistry has at its disposal terrible weapons with which it can inflict unthinkable sufferings upon helpless human beings.

Will there once again be a nation to use the technical of this war for the preparation of a new war, while the remaining world exploits the technical of this war for the benefit of humanity, thus attempting to create minute compensation for its horrors?

As a former minister of the highly developed armament system, it must be my last duty to state this.

A new large-scale war will end with the destruction of human culture and civilization. Nothing will prevent the unleashed technique and science from completing its work of destruction of humanity, which it had begun in so dreadful a way in this, the last war.

That is the reason why this trial must be a contribution for the prevention of such distorted wars in the future and for the establishment of principles for human cohabitation. What is the significance of my own fate after everything that has happened, in the light of this high goal?

During the past centuries, the German people has contributed much towards the creation of human culture. Often it has made this its contribution in times when it was just as powerless and helpless as it is today. Valuable human beings cannot be driven to despair. They are bound to create new, lasting values and, under the tremendous pressure brought to bear upon everyone today, these new works will be of particular significance.

But if the German people in the inevitable times of its poverty and powerlessness—but simultaneously also the time of its reconstruction creates new works of culture, then it has, in that way, made its most valuable contribution to the happenings in this world which it could possibly be in a position to make.

It is not the battles of war alone which shape the history of humanity; they are, in a higher sense, the cultural contributions which one day will become the common property of all humanity. But a nation believing in its future will never perish. May God protect Germany and the culture of the Occident.

3. DOCUMENTS

[Following are translations of documents which were introduced in evidence, in whole or in part, as part of Speer's defense. They are published because of their unique historical importance.
—Ed.]

SPEER DOCUMENT 004

Teletype from Speer to General Studt
Paris of 4 January 1944

In a conference which took place today the Fuehrer has ordered Gauleiter Sauckel to procure the labor needed by the German war economy from the European territory after more exact planning. In this task he is to be supported by all agencies of my field of command. Gauleiter Sauckel will for the time being start negotiations with the appropriate agencies with regard to the occupied western territories, in order to clear up the manner and possibility of the execution. In this respect it must be secured above all circumstances that an endangerment of the economy of these territories does not take place through the reductions.

The Fuehrer has additionally ordered that—

1. The labor which is presently employed in restricted war plants [Sperrbetrieben] and which will arrive in future through voluntary recruiting or through mediation in the occupied territories and Italy are to be protected from any transfer to Germany, and
2. The labor which is still lacking in the restricted war plants [Sperrbetrieben] is to be procured for them expeditiously and with priority.

[signed] SPEER

SPEER DOCUMENT 008

[Excerpts from the Fuehrer Conferences of 19–22 June 1944]
* * * * *

8. Reported to the Fuehrer the raw steel shortage in the month of May, and at the same time indicated the gravity of the shortage in the occupied Western territories.

9. At the same time I called the Fuehrer's attention to the fact that in my opinion, in spite of present transportation difficulties at the Front, there was by no means any question of giving up industrial capacities there, even if the manpower is at times unemployed. Production in the occupied Western territories is to be brought to its peak as speedily as possible. The Fuehrer agreed with this opinion and himself determined that decisive measures which might be inferred from the present traffic emergency are not to be executed.

DEFENSE

[signed] SPEER

SPEER DOCUMENT 009

Fuehrer minutes of 11/12 September 1943

The Fuehrer sets forth that the most important Italian production plants (defense armament plants) must maintain their feeding at about the level of German food rations in order to attain high performances. Dependents of workers must also be taken care of adequately.

LEYERS: Name defense armament plants.

HUPFAUER: Have Sauckel do what is necessary.

[signed] SPEER

SPEER DOCUMENT 011

Fuehrer minutes of 21/22 March 1942

The Fuehrer declared quite clearly in a lengthy statement that he did not agree with the poor feeding of the Russians. The Russians must absolutely receive sufficient food and Sauckel is to see to it that this food is now guaranteed to Backe.

The Fuehrer is surprised to hear that Russian civilians are treated like prisoners of war behind barbed wire.

I explained to him that this was a consequence of an order given by him. The Fuehrer does not know anything about such an order. I request the particulars about this to be given to me for the next Fuehrer portfolio and at the same time to have Sauckel see to it that the Russian civilians are no longer treated like prisoners of war.

[signed] SPEER

SPEER DOCUMENT 013

Fuehrer minutes of 30 May 1943

Furthermore the German miners are if possible to be treated better than before as far as food is concerned. The Russians are to receive plentiful additional food which is to be distributed individually by the plant manager on the basis of performance.

Furthermore the Germans as well as particularly the Russian prisoners of war are to be allotted bonuses in the form of tobacco and similar things for special performance.

SPEER

[signed] SPEER

SPEER DOCUMENT 014

Letter from Hitler to Speer on 21 April 1944

Fuehrer Headquarters, 21 April 1944

The Fuehrer

To the Reich Minister for Armaments and War Production and Chief of the Organization Todt

Mr. Reich Minister SPEER

Berlin W.8

I order the manager of the Central Office of the Organization Todt, Ministerial Director Dorsch, while retaining his other functions within the limits of your sphere of tasks, to carry out the construction of the 6 fighter planes [Jaegerbauten] ordered by me.

You will see to it that all conditions necessary for prompt execution of this construction will be created. In particular, you will secure as perfect synchronization as possible with other construction of war importance, if necessary calling upon me for a decision.

[signed] Adolf HITLER

SPEER DOCUMENT 015

[Memorandum of Speer to Adolf Hitler of 30 June 1944 on production of fuels]

* * * By this the enemy succeeded on June 22d in increasing the shortage of aviation gasoline to 90%. * * *

* * * But then perforce in September of this year the flow of the quantities necessary to cover the most urgent needs of the Wehrmacht cannot be guaranteed anymore, which means that from that time on there will be an insurmountable gap, which must lead to tragic consequences.

SPEER DOCUMENT 016

[Memorandum of Speer for Adolf Hitler on 30 August 1944 concerning the Situation in the Chemical Industry]

* * * * *

Page 10

If the attacks on the chemical industry will be of the same strength and of the same accuracy in September as in August, chemical production will further decrease and the last stocks will be exhausted. Thus those materials are lacking in the most important fields, WHICH ARE NECESSARY FOR THE CONTINUATION OF A MODERN WAR.

DEFENSE

SPEER DOCUMENT 017

[Memorandum from Speer to Adolf Hitler on situation of coal production and supply, dated 11 November 1944]

* * * * *

Page 8.

* * * Since my verbal report of 3 November the production situation has become extremely critical and is drifting towards conditions which MUST LEAD TO THE MOST SERIOUS BOTTLNECKS * * *

Page 9.

* * * ON ACCOUNT OF INADEQUATE DELIVERIES, THE STOCK OF COAL FOR OFFICIAL USE FOR THE REICHSBAHN IS REDUCED AT THE PRESENT, BY A DAILY AVERAGE OF APPROXIMATELY 40,000 TONS * * *. Especially the main offices of the Western German Reich Railway, with the exception of the ones located directly in the Ruhr territory, but also others show stocks far below average, most of them for only 5 more days (Berlin 5 days, Stuttgart 2 days) * * *

Page 11.

* * * The Reich Commissioner for sea navigation weeks ago already reported a critical situation in Hamburg, the ports of Schleswig Holstein, and the serious damage caused to sea navigation thereby * * *.

* * * Many electrical plants were fighting to go on with inadequate opportunity for delivery and with stocks declined already below the ten day limit * * *.

* * * Especially critical is the supplying of gas works, particularly as other coal districts cannot in the least make up for the loss of Ruhr fuel.

Page 17.

* * * For weeks there has been actually a technical traffic blockade of the Ruhr territory from its market outlets to an increasing degree.

Page 18.

* * * The supplies of the industry of the suffering territories, which still amounted at the beginning of September to an average of from 4 to 5 weeks, have decreased at present according to reports on hand to LESS THAN 8 TO 10 DAYS, IN THE TERRITORIES SUPPLIED BY THE WESTERN GERMAN COAL PITS. They will be exhausted by the end of the month of November if no decisive improvement of the deliveries can be achieved

* * *

Page 27.

* * * According to the whole structure of the Reich economy it is obvious that a failure of the territory of the Rheinish Westphalian Industry in the long run will be unbearable FOR THE WHOLE GERMAN ECONOMY AND THE SUCCESSFUL CONTINUATION OF THE WAR. In fact at the present the Ruhr territory, with the exception of the products manufactured within the sector, is a TOTAL LOSS for the German economy.

Page 29.

* * * It is not necessary to discuss the consequences for the whole German Reich which will result from a long deprivation of the Ruhr territory * * *.

SPEER DOCUMENT 018

[Memorandum of Speer to Adolf Hitler 30 January 1945 regarding the Economic Situation]

* * * * *

Page 5.

* * * IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO MAINTAIN GERMAN ECONOMIC LIFE IN THE LONG RUN WITH THE COAL STILL ON HAND AND THE CAPACITY FOR RAW STEEL PRODUCTION * * * This threatened German economic collapse can be delayed for a few months * * *.

THUS THE ARMAMENT PRODUCTION IN JANUARY, FEBRUARY, AND MARCH IS MERELY THE COMPLETION OF AN EARLIER PRODUCTION, WHICH WAS ESTIMATED ON A MUCH HIGHER SCALE.

THE ACTUAL PRODUCTION FIGURES, CORRESPONDING TO THE PRESENT RAW STEEL PRODUCTION, CAN ONLY BE A FRACTION OF JANUARY'S PRODUCTION.

AFTER THE LOSS OF UPPER SILESIA, GERMAN ARAMAMENT WILL NOT BE IN A POSITION TO COVER EVEN PARTIALLY THE REQUIREMENTS OF THE FRONT IN MUNITIONS, WEAPONS AND TANKS, THE LOSSES ON THE FRONT AND THE NEED FOR REPLACEMENTS.

DEFENSE

THE MATERIAL SUPERIORITY OF THE ENEMY CAN THEREFORE NO LONGER BE COMPENSATED EVEN BY THE BRAVERY OF OUR SOLDIERS * * *.

SPEER DOCUMENT 019

Speer's Speech in Hamburg on 16 April 1945

Never before was a civilized people so hard hit, never before were destruction and war damages so extensive as in our country, and never before did a people endure the hardships of war with greater endurance, tenacity, and faith than you.

Now you all are dejected and shaken to the utmost. Your love turns into hate and your endurance and tenacity into weariness and indifference.

THAT MAY NOT BE.

The German people have displayed a united attitude in this war that in future times will arouse the admiration of unpartial history. We must not at the present moment mourn and weep over the past. Our fate can only be borne further through desperate work. But we can only help ourselves if we determine on a sober basis of realities what is required at the present moment.

There is here only one task of importance: Avoid anything that may take away entirely from the German people its already so greatly reduced basis of living. The preservation of our places of labor, our communication system, and all other installations vital to supply the nation's needs is the first condition for the maintenance of our people's power. Therefore everything must be avoided during this phase of the war that may unleash further destruction of our economy.

As the Reich minister responsible for the maintenance of roads, waterways, power plants, and the restoration of traffic I therefore order as follows in agreement with the supreme commanding offices [Kommandostellen] of the Branches of the Wehrmacht:

1. Any destruction or crippling of a bridge, a plant of any kind, a waterway, or of railway or news services is from this moment prohibited.
2. All bridges are to be demined. All other preparations for any other destruction and paralyzing measures are to be removed. Where paralyzing actions have already been carried out, the individual items removed are to be returned to the plants.
3. Protective measures for plants, railways, and news services are to be taken locally at once.
4. These directives are valid as well for the German Reich territories as for occupied Norway, in Denmark, in Bohemia and Moravia, and in Italy.

5. Anyone disobeying these orders consciously and decisively harms the German people and is therefore its enemy.

The soldiers of the Wehrmacht and the Volkssturm are hereby instructed to take action against these enemies of the people with all means, and if needed with firearms * * *.

In order to avoid injustices and grave lapses in this last phase of the war, it is ordered in the interest of the German that—

1. Prisoners of war and foreign workers are to remain at their place of work. Whenever they are already on the move, they are to be directed towards their own home.

2. In the concentration camps the political prisoners and with them the Jews are to be segregated from the anti-social elements. The former are to be surrendered unharmed in camp to the occupying troops.

3. Execution of sentences for all political prisoners, including Jews, is to be deferred until further notice.

4. The service of the "Volkssturm" against the enemy is voluntary. Moreover the Volkssturm is duty bound to preserve peace and order in the country.

The members of the NSDAP also are duty-bound to participate in the tasks of the "Volkssturm" up to the time of occupation, in order to show that they are to render service to the people up to the very end.

5. The activity of the "Wehrwolf" and similar organizations is to be halted at once. It gives the enemy a justified occasion for reprisals and moreover it impairs the conditions required for preserving the strength of the people.

Order and fulfilment of duty are an essential condition for preservation of the German people * * *.

* * * The military blows which Germany has received during the last few months are staggering. It no longer rests with us to determine whether our fate is turning.

Only a more favorable providence can change our future. We ourselves however can contribute our share by doing our work resolutely and diligently, by meeting the enemy honorably and with self-confidence, and by becoming inwardly modest and applying self-criticism, and finally by trusting unflinchingly in the future of our people, which will survive for ever and ever.

May God protect our Germany.

DEFENSE

SPEER DOCUMENT 021

14 September 1944

KR-Teletype

The Gauleiters Hoffman, Schlesmann, Florian,
For information: to Gauleiters Buerckel, Wagner, Simon, Grohe.
Chairmen of Armaments Commissions VIa, VIb, XIIa, XIIb, Vb.
Subject: Paralyzing of plants.

The present situation makes it necessary to provide in detail measures for the possible paralyzing of the plants in the Rhenish-Westphalian industrial districts.

For the industrial district as for the South West the directive applies, that basically it is only permissible to paralyze, that is that by removal and transfer of any essential machinery aggregate mostly electrical, the working capacity is temporarily disrupted, without the installations themselves being damaged.

As in view of congested conditions in these districts it can hardly be expected that the parts essential for paralyzing parts can be removed and transported from all plants at the same time, care is to be taken that the machinery aggregates for immediate armament production, that is shell presses, ordnance shops, etc., are removed before anything else. The actual raw material producing plants, the mines, and the steel working industries take only second or third place in the carrying out of such measures.

I have appointed the chairmen of the armament commissions as deputies for the paralysis and evacuation and request you to get into touch with them in all problems pertaining to this.

[signed] SPEER

SPEER DOCUMENT 022

15 September 1944

KR-Teletype

To the Reichsleiter Martin Bormann
Dear Party-member Bormann!

I deem the following teletype of mine necessary for the unification of opinion concerning the removal or paralyzation of industries in the Western Gaus therefore I request its transmission with a short directive to—

The Gauleiters Wagner, Buerckel, Simon, Grohe, Florian, Schlossmann, Hoffman, Meyer.

The Fuehrer has established that within a short time he can effect the recapture of the territories which are now lost.

Considering the great importance of the Western provinces for armament and war production, all measures anticipated for the evacuation must be aimed at enabling the industry of these zones to again run at full capacity within a short time.

Therefore far reaching destruction must be refrained from.

The following general directions which I have already brought to your knowledge through the chairmen of the armament commissions are still valid in certain items and I briefly summarize them once more.

1. In endangered areas the stores of raw materials and half-finished products are to be reduced to the minimum which is necessary for the maintenance of production. Finished goods are to be shifted immediately from these areas.

2. I permit the evacuation only of plants whose output amounts to over 50 percent of the total German production. All other enterprises must maintain their manufacture on the spot until the last minutes, as it is impossible to transfer these plants in their totality to the Reich. It is of greater advantage for a plant to carry on its armament production for another 4 weeks in its old location than for it to be sent traveling and on account of the scarcity of factory space in other parts of the Reich, it would require some months before it could assume production. Moreover the extent of the evacuation, notwithstanding the restrictions, is so great that the means of transportation will hardly be sufficient.

3. Therefore these plants must be assured of being supplied as long as possible with all necessary electricity, gas, and water, etc. Moreover the premature abandonment or destruction of powerplants leads to danger to the troops. It must be considered, that even far behind the frontline the news network of the mails depends on the powerplant of a city, so that failure of a power station would make news transmission to the troops partially impossible.

4. Only in the last minute will industrial installations be made useless for a longer period by "paralyzing" the plants. This paralysis consists generally in the dismantling of important electrical aggregates and in their removal with an exact description. There is less sense in the destruction of electrical power stations because due to the great damage done to the German electrical industry by air attacks, replacement after the reoccupation will only be possible under the greatest difficulties.

5. In mining areas electric plants must be maintained in order to allow the water supply of the mining pits to be kept in order.

DEFENSE

It takes months for the mines to resume work after pumps have failed and pits have been inundated.

6. In planned evacuation of mining areas care must be taken that these vital power stations remain occupied and that the other works, the evacuation of which has not been anticipated, are to be kept working as long as possible.

[signed] SPEER

Will you please ascertain from the Fuehrer whether the presuppositions of this letter according to which these territories are to be reoccupied by us within a short time are still correct. The loss on the left bank of the Rhine in the long view is hardly bearable for the armament and war production. I therefore consider it correct that the three principles of this letter—

1. That production must be maintained to the last minute,
2. That the plants must only be "paralyzed", and
3. That evacuation must be effected only in the most important cases will be approved by the Fuehrer.

Will you please telephone me after receipt of this teletype.

Yours,

[signed] SPEER

SPEER DOCUMENT 025

1. To Gauleiter Simon

Berlin W.8, 5 Sept. 44

(1121)

Koblenz

* * *

In any case provisions must be made that the Minette, the Luxembourg area, and also the other industrial districts, if they should fall in enemy hands, are only paralyzed in their industries, that is that their operation is interrupted for a few months by removal and transfer of any essential machinery aggregates, mostly electrical, without the plant itself being damaged * * *.

The Reich Union Coal and Iron will be instructed accordingly.

[signed] SPEER

2. Copy to Gauleiter Grohe

Copy to Gauleiter Buerkel

3. Mr. Dr. Rohland

with the request to provide similarly for the Saar district, Meurthe et Moselle, etc. Enclosure: Letter Simon.

4. To the Reich Union Coal attention of Mr. Pleiger with request to provide similarly for the endangered coal districts of Belgium, Holland, and the Saar district. The pumping installations for the pits must remain in working order.

Enclosure: Letter Simon.

SPEER DOCUMENT 026

BERLIN, 15 MARCH 1945.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS MARCH-APRIL 1945
AND INFERENCES

THE ENEMY AIR FORCE HAS CONCENTRATED FURTHER ON TRAFFIC INSTALLATIONS. ECONOMIC TRANSPORTATION HAS THEREBY BEEN CONSIDERABLY REDUCED.

THROUGH THE TRANSFER OF THE FRONT TO THE RHINE NUMEROUS SOFT COAL REGIONS AND LARGE SOFT COAL POWER PLANTS HAVE BEEN LOST.

THE IMMEDIATE EFFECT OF ARTILLERY ON THE RUHR AREA AND INCREASED AIR ACTIVITY BY DAY AND NIGHT, DUE TO THE PROXIMITY OF THE FRONTS HAVE RESULTED IN FURTHER INROADS IN THE RUHR AREA.

WHEREAS THE RUHR AREA IN FEBRUARY STILL PRODUCED 8100 CARLOADS OF COAL DAILY, THE PRESENT PRODUCTION HAS DECREASED TO ABOUT 2-3000 CARLOADS DAILY. THE TRANSPORTATION OF COAL FROM THE REMAINING UPPER SILESIAN TERRITORIES COULD NOT BE INCREASED.

QUALITY COAL PRODUCED DAILY IS—

AT THE PRESENT TIME	COMPARED TO	NORMAL DELIVERIES
FROM THE RUHR AREA	3 000	20 000
FROM UPPER SILESIA	3 700	24 000
FROM THE SAAR AREA	1 000	24 000
TOTAL	7 700	68 000

WITH THESE PRODUCTION FIGURES, NEITHER SEA NAVIGATION, REICH RAILROADS, GAS AND ELECTRICAL PLANTS, FOOD ECONOMY, NOR, IN THE LAST ANALYSIS THE WAR ECONOMY, CAN IN NO WISE ANY LONGER BE SUPPLIED WITH COAL (SEE ENCLOSURE 1—REICH COAL ASSOCIATION REPORT OF 7 MARCH 45). SINCE THE LOSS OF UPPER-SILESIA THE REICH'S ECONOMIC COLLAPSE IS TAKING PLACE WITH INCREASING RAPIDITY, THROUGH THE RENEWED DE-

DEFENSE

CISIVE RETRENCHMENTS IN SUPPLY OF COAL THIS PROCESS HAS BEEN CATASTROPHICALLY ACCELERATED.

WITHIN 4-8 WEEKS ONE MUST THEREFORE COUNT WITH CERTAINTY ON THE FINAL COLLAPSE OF GERMAN ECONOMY.

NEITHER AN ARMAMENTS OUTPUT CAN THEN BE GUARANTEED, NOR WILL RAILWAY AND SEA NAVIGATION THEN BE IN A POSITION TO TAKE CARE OF THE TRANSPORTATION ASSIGNED TO THEM, WITH THE POSSIBLE EXCEPTION OF THE OPERATING TRANSPORTS. AFTER THIS COLLAPSE THE WAR CAN ALSO IN A MILITARY SENSE NO LONGER BE CARRIED ON.

THE NATION HAS DONE ITS DUTY IN THIS WAR AND HAS CARRIED OUT ITS TASK UNDER CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH WERE FAR MORE DIFFICULT THAN IN ANY PREVIOUS WAR.

IF THE WAR IS LOST IT WILL DEFINITELY NOT BE DUE TO ITS FAILURE.

It is the responsibility of us leaders to help the nation in the dark hours which are to be expected.

WITHOUT REGARD FOR OUR FATE, WE MUST QUESTION OURSELVES SOBERLY IN THIS MATTER HOW THIS CAN BE ACHIEVED ALSO IN THE MORE REMOTE FUTURE.

If the opponent wishes to destroy the nation and its basis of life, then he must do the job himself. WE MUST DO EVERYTHING TO MAINTAIN, EVEN IF, PERHAPS IN A MOST PRIMITIVE MANNER, A BASIS OF LIFE FOR THE NATION TO THE LAST.

Measures must be taken everywhere to carry out this viewpoint.

Local disaster can be prevented by clear directives. Nobody may adopt the point of view that the fate of the German people depends on his personal fate.

It must be ascertained that in these weeks it must be the principal duty of the leadership to help the people wherever possible.

For the partial field of German production and transportation FOR WHICH I AM RESPONSIBLE the following must be initiated:

1. It must be guaranteed that, if the battle advances further into the territory of the Reich, nobody has the right to destroy industrial plants, coal-mines, electric plants, and other supply facilities as well as traffic facilities, internal shipping routes, etc. While previously plants have been paralyzed for one or two months because individual parts had been removed in order to make possible their utilization within a short time after their recapture, this system must now also be carried out IF RECAPTURE DOES NOT SEEM POSSIBLE. The industrial plants and the basic industries are just as much part of the vital strength of the German people as agriculture. Neither would anyone harbor the thought of rendering the German fields infertile for years by virus. IT IS JUST AS IMPOSSIBLE ON OUR PART TO TAKE FROM THE MINER AND THE INDUSTRIAL WORKER THEIR EXISTENCE.

2. Preparations for the detonation of bridge structures of the Reich Railway or of road constructions have already been made extensively. It is of course necessary to detonate the bridge-structures over the large rivers, if this can serve to prevent a further advance of the enemy. However, it cannot possibly be in accordance with the idea of warfare in the homeland to destroy so many bridges that with the limited facilities available after the war it will take years to reconstruct the traffic network. These destructions of bridge-structures and traffic facilities are to be carried out only if absolutely necessary and only in places which are tactically outstanding and appropriate for the extensive defensive positions. They are only to be initiated by the OKW or by the army groups. With a detonation of the bridges to the extent planned, the traffic facilities would be destroyed more effectively than the air attacks of the past years were able to achieve.

THEIR DESTRUCTION MEANS THE REMOVAL OF ANY FURTHER POSSIBILITY FOR EXISTENCE OF THE GERMAN PEOPLE.

3. The distribution of all stores of clothes and other consumer goods, insofar as they can be used by the civilian population, must be prepared without delay and must be taken care of by code word. Stocks are still large. Insufficiencies, which occur because of transportation difficulties, must be accepted. Furthermore, the order is to be issued to prepare also for the stores of the Armed Forces—including the food dumps—such a distribution action, which will be initiated by code word. A DISTRIBUTION OF THE CIVILIAN AND MILITARY STORES CAN HELP THE PEOPLE SOMEWHAT TO OVERCOME THE SERIOUS TIMES WHICH MUST BE EXPECTED.

4. IT IS MATTER OF COURSE IN SUCH A SITUATION THAT THE PROTECTION OF THE GERMAN FOOD SUPPLY —FOR THE REMOTE FUTURE ALSO—MUST BE IN THE

DEFENSE

FOREGROUND OF ALL EFFORTS. IT HAS THEREFORE ALREADY BEEN ORDERED THAT THE MEASURES NECESSARY FOR THE FOOD SUPPLY ARE CARRIED OUT IN THE COMMUNICATION SYSTEM AS WELL AND ALSO IN ALL OTHER FIELDS. The devastations of this war in the German cities can only be compared to those of the Thirty Years' War. It cannot be forecast whether the events which follow a defeat will also have as consequence a decrease of the population figure similar to that period. The people will have to bear the greatest burdens, which however will bring severe selection, and thus will retain a good core of this unique people for the remote future. WE ARE NOT ENTITLED TO CARRY OUT DESTRUCTIONS ON OUR PART AT THIS STAGE OF THE WAR, WHICH MIGHT AFFECT THE LIFE OF THE NATION. IF THE ENEMIES WISH TO DESTROY THIS NATION, WHICH HAS FOUGHT WITH A UNIQUE BRAVERY, THEN THIS HISTORICAL SHAME SHALL REST EXCLUSIVELY UPON THEM. WE HAVE THE OBLIGATION OF LEAVING TO THE NATION ALL POSSIBILITIES, WHICH IN THE MORE REMOTE FUTURE MIGHT BE ABLE TO INSURE IT A NEW RECONSTRUCTION.

[signed] SPEER

SPEER DOCUMENT 027

Hitler's order for destructions dated 19 March 1945
TELETYPE

To Reich Minister Speer

Duplicate to: * * *

The Fuehrer on 19 March 1945 issued the following command:
Re: Measures for destructions in Reich Territory.

The struggle of our nation for existence also forces the utilization of all means to weaken the fighting power of our enemy and to prevent further advances. Advantage must be taken of all opportunities to inflict the most enduring damage to the striking power of the enemy directly or indirectly. It is a mistake to believe in the possibility of work resumption for our own purposes of undestroyed or only temporarily paralyzed traffic, communications, industrial, and supply installations after the recapture of lost territories. On his retreat the enemy will leave behind only scorched earth and refrain from any consideration for the population.

I therefore command—

1. All military traffic, communications, industrial, and supply-installation as well as objects on Reichs territory, which the enemy might immediately or later utilize for the continuation of his fight, are to be destroyed.

2. The military commands are responsible for the execution of this destruction of all military objects including traffic and communications installations. The Gauleiters and Commissioners for Reich Defense are responsible for the destruction of the industrial and supply installations as well as of other valuable objects; the Gauleiter and Commissioners for Reich Defense are to be given necessary assistance by the troops in carrying out this task.

3. This command is to be transmitted as promptly as possible to all troop commanders; orders to the contrary are null and void.

[signed] : Adolf Hitler

OKW/WFST/Op/Qu No 002711/45 Top Secret [signed] WINTER Lieutenant General and Deputy Chief West

SPEER DOCUMENT 028

Teletype—KR

R V M

In execution of the Fuehrer's order, High Command of the Wehrmacht West/OP/Qu 2 No 271.45 top secret of 19 March 1945 as to demolitions in the Reich territory, the following is ordered for traffic installations:

1. In future installations are to be destroyed effectively on the abandonment of an area. Deviations in special cases are ordered by the High Command of the Wehrmacht. All restrictive orders including those reservations contained in the decree OKW/West/Qu 2 No. 07069/45 secret of 15 September 1944 Ziff. 4 are void.

2. Commando authorities are responsible for the destructions of all traffic installations. They order the preparation, release, and execution.

3. The General in charge of the transport system is hereby made technical adviser to the Commando authorities. In cooperation with local offices of the Reich Minister of Communications (RVM) he suggests objectives and extent of the demolition of traffic installations. (Railroad and Inland Shipping.)

4. Demolitions are effective only when they are carried out on the widest scale. Execution must therefore be effected through the RVM by its own forces and the auxiliary forces at its disposal. For objectives which represent technical difficulties, railway engineers are to be used, and whenever they do not suffice military engineers or other troops units are to be utilized. Co-operation between these various forces is to be insured by the General in charge of Transport in agreement with the competent local offices of the RVM.

DEFENSE

5. The object is the creation of a transportation desert in the abandoned area. Scarcity of explosives demands inventive utilization of all possibilities of lasting destruction. (Utilization of all kinds of ammunition, also captured ammunition, fire, smashing of important parts.) Besides all objectives vital for the transport system (all kinds of artificial constructions [Kunstbauten] rail factory and work shop installations) as well as the entire rolling and floating stock (in particular locomotives, tugs, draisines) whenever they cannot be removed are to be destroyed completely by means of every possible expedient. In this way strong barriers and obstacles will be created by the concentration of rolling stock and fire. Lack of locomotives and carriages is effective, particularly against the Eastern enemy dependent on booty.

6. The RVM and the Reich Ministry Speer are asked to advise their subordinate offices in accordance with the directives given above.

Chief of the transport system of the Wehrmacht — Planning Department III Br. 0433/45 top secret

By order of Hartel, Colonel on the General Staff.

SPEER DOCUMENT 029

Decree of the General of the Signal Corps of March 22, 1945

KR—Teleprint

M 1518/45 gRs.

Reich Minister for Armament and War Production,

Reich Minister Prof. Speer

gltf. Chief of the Army General Staff—

Supreme Command—West

Gen. Plenipotentiary for the Reich Administration, Secretary of State STUCKART

Reich Minister for Armament and War Production

Supreme Command of the Air Force Command Staff

Supreme Command of the Navy SKL

Reichsfuehrer SS—Field command post

Reichsfuehrer SS — Fuehrungshauptamt — Commander of Operational Staff

Supreme Command of the Armed Forces/ Chief F. Wi. Amt

Supreme Command of the Army/ Chief WNV

Trp. Chief

For inf. military commander Denmark

Enactment decrees (communications installations) to the Fuehrer order of 19 March 1945.

1. Are responsible—

a. Units of the armed forces for the destruction of their own communications installations,

b. Reichsfuehrer SS for the destruction of the communications installations of the Waffen SS of the depot armies, of the remaining SS, and Police,

c. The Commander-in-Chief of the theater of operations and the Supreme Commands of the Army Groups in the East for the destruction of the communication installations of the Field Armed Forces and the Reich authorities. (RP. RB Reich water ways administration Reich Labor Service (RAD), (OT) (Todt Organization) and electrical overland works) within their territory.

The responsibility for timely preparation and through execution rests with the Senior Reich authorities and their subordinate offices. The Department Chiefs who during the operations can not receive orders from the troops are to be instructed to carry out the demolitions on their personal responsibility. Close co-operation between the Commando authorities, the field armed forces and the locally competent offices of the Reich authorities must be secured.

2. The Commander-in-Chief of the theaters of operation and the High Commands of the Army Groups in the East have at their disposal all necessary forces of the units of the Armed Forces, the subordinate units of the Waffen SS and Police and the personnel of the Reich authorities for the execution of the plan.

3. The communications installations are to be destroyed by blasting, fire or demolition: The telephone, telegram, and amplifier offices and intersection centers, cable installations, switchboards, line and cable branch points, telegraph poles and if there is time enough, also overland wires and cables. The stocks of telegraph construction material and telegraph apparatus of all kind, cable and circuit material, industrial records (cable plans, switch plans, descriptions of tools, etc.) high power radio stations (transmitting, operation-receiving stations, masts and antennae). Efforts must be made to evacuate specially valuable parts.

4. Special orders will follow for the Reich capital and environments, especially the high power radio stations, NAUEN, KOENIGSWUSTERHAUSEN, ZEESEN, REMATHE, BEELITZ.

By order of

[signed]: HEPP, Colonel General Staff
OKW/FST. Chief WNV—No 002922/45 top secret.

DEFENSE

SPEER DOCUMENT 030

Letter of Speer to Hitler on 29 March 1945

* * * "When on 18 March I transmitted to you my letter, I was of firm conviction that the conclusions which I had drawn from the present situation for the maintainance of our national power would find your unconditional approval. Because you yourself had once determined that it was the task of the government to preserve a nation from a heroic end if the war should be lost. However during the evening you made declarations to me the tenor of which, unless I misunderstood you, was clearly and definitely as follows: If the war is to be lost the nation will also perish. This fate is inevitable. There was no necessity to take into consideration the basis which the people would need to continue a most primitive existence. On the contrary, it would be wiser to destroy even these things, because this nation had proved to be the weaker one and the future belonged solely to the stronger Eastern nation. Besides, those who remain after the battle are only the inferior ones; for the good ones have fallen.

After these words I was profoundly shaken, and when on the next day I read the order for destruction and shortly after that the strict order of evacuation, I saw in this the first steps toward the realization of these intentions" * * *.

SPEER DOCUMENT 031

Executory decree of Hitler, 30 March 1945

The Fuehrer Headquarters of Fuehrer, 30 March 1945
For unified execution of my decree of 19 March 1945 I command:

1. The ordered measures for destruction of industrial plants serve exclusively the purpose of making impossible the use by the enemy of these plants in order to augment his fighting forces.

2. In no case must the measures adopted weaken our own fighting forces. Production must be maintained to the last possible moment, even when there is danger due to swift movements of the enemy that the plant may fall into his hands undestroyed. Industrial plants of all kinds, including industries of supply, can only then be destroyed, when they are threatened imminently.

3. Where the total destruction of bridges and other traffic installations makes their use impossible by the enemy for a long period, the same result can be obtained by lasting paralysis of industrial plants, including industries of supply. The total destruction of especially important plants will be determined by the Reich Minister for Armament and War Production by my orders

(for instance, munitions works, most important chemical plants, etc.).

4. The selection for paralysis and destruction of industrial plants and other works is made by the Gauleiter and Reich Commissioner for Defense, who supervises their execution. The execution is dealt with solely by the Offices and Organizations of the Reich Minister for Armament and War Production. In this connection all offices of the Party, the State, and the Army are to render assistance.

5. The provision for execution is published with my assent by the Reich Minister for Armament and War production. He can give individual instructions to the Reich Commissioner for Defense.

6. These principles are valid according to their purport for the plants and installations in the immediate fighting zone.

[signed] ADOLF HITLER

SPEER DOCUMENT 032

Pariser Platz 3, BERLIN W 8, 30 March 1945
Executive Decree, dated 30 March 1945
The Reich Minister for Armament and War Production ZA/Org.
372-381/45 secret

SECRET!

Subject: Executive regulations for the Fuehrer Decree, dated 30 March 1945, concerning measures for crippling and destroying.

For the execution of the Fuehrer decrees dated 19 March 1945 and 30 March 1945 I decree:

1. My present decrees and directives concerning the crippling of industrial installations of all kinds and public utilities (electric power, gas, water, food economic enterprises of all kinds) continue to apply as before. The preparations for crippling which have been ordered are to be pursued with all intensity in order to guarantee the execution when necessary in the shortest possible time. These crippling measures must make it impossible for the enemy to use our industrial installations and supply facilities for the increase of high fighting power right now and in this foreseeable future.

I emphasize once more the necessity of absolute secrecy concerning all preparations.

2. Total destruction of the most important installations or their most important parts will take place upon an order by the Fuehrer, which I will have issued. I shall name these plants, along with the appropriate directive, to the chairmen of the armament commission or sub-commissions.

DEFENSE

Insofar as the intermediary authorities should have suggestions for their part, then these are to be forwarded to me as quickly as possible.

3. The time for the execution of my appropriate directive will be determined exclusively from the battle situation. It is only to be issued when an immediate danger of occupation by the enemy exists. In connection with this, I refer to my repeated order "to continue to manufacture even during the most difficult situations until the last possible moment".

Since all these measures are to be executed in accordance with the principle of not weakening own fighting power one moment too soon. I demand that all departments (armament offices and plant managers) show the highest sense of responsibility. Pursuant to the Fuehrer decree, the Party, the Wehrmacht, and the nation have to assist in the destruction itself on request.

4. The execution of the orders for crippling or destruction, delegated by the Fuehrer to the Gauleiters and Reich Commissioners, extends to the territorial limits, and must be effected in coordination with the military command posts according to the battle situation.

5. Since, pursuant to Fuehrer decree of 30 March 1945, concerning the execution of these measures, the armament authorities are responsible even in the immediate combat zone, my decree of 17 October 1944, point 4, corrected on 6 November 1944, is rescinded. Supreme Command of the Armed Forces/ Armed Forces Operations Staff (OKW/WFSt) will give identical orders to its commands.

The military headquarters have territorial jurisdiction for the execution of the crippling and destruction of the combat zone.

6. Within the framework of the territorial execution of these orders, the chairmen of the armament commissions or sub-commissions are responsible for the execution of individual orders for the crippling of factories or their destruction. They can delegate their powers to the armament authorities responsible for sub-areas of their territory.

[signed] SPEER

Official

[signed] GOTTSCHALK

Oberinspektor

[Seal]

Distribution :

Highest Reich authorities and Armed Forces Offices according to a special distribution list.

Plenipotentiary General for Reich Administration with duplicates for the Reich Defense Commissioners.
Regierungspraesidenten, Landraete and Chief Mayors
Chief of the Party Chancellery with duplicates for the Gauleiters
Armament Commissioners
Chairmen of the Armament Commissions with duplicates for the Armament Inspectorate.
Armament Detachments.
WKB, LWAE, Rue-Obm., Organization Todt Einsatzgruppenleiter
Chiefs of the Main Commissions, Main "Rings" and Production Main Commissions
Reich Minister of Communications with duplicates for the General Plant
Directorates and the Reich Railroads Directorates
Reich Food Minister with duplicates for the state farm leaders.
Inter Office Distribution A2

SPEER DOCUMENT 043

Extract from Memorandum from Speer to Hitler dated
20 September 1944

* * * "So now I am confronted by the fact that at the present stage of the war, in which with growing concern one seeks negligence everywhere, the self-responsibility which I built up in industry and in my ministry is being designated as 'alien to the Party', as a 'reservoir of reactionary economic leaders' or even as 'hostile to the Party'." (Remarks by Dr. Goebbels and Reich Leader Bormann)

The task which I have to fulfill is a non-political one. So far I have enjoyed my work, since I personally and my work were evaluated strictly according to professional achievements.

I must assume that this professional achievement is still meeting with approval even today.

I do not feel strong enough to carry out without hindrance and successfully, the technical work to be accomplished by myself and my co-workers if it is to be measured by Party political standards.

* * * * *

20 July caused great lack of confidence on the part of the German people. A feeling of insecurity as to whom one could still rely upon, and as to who would stand at one's side with active achievement and spiritual preparedness, is generally widespread.

DEFENSE

It has fostered anew a lack of confidence in the reliability of my large circle of co-workers from industry.

The fact that I was on the Ministerial list of 20 July is probably known since the Gauleiter meeting to every Gauleiter and even a large circle to the Party.

As my achievements are pretty well recognized there is no danger in this. However the conviction that I am being influenced and carried along by a circle which in its composition is reactionary, economically biased, and alien to the Party is comparatively widespread.

I do not believe that the second system which might be applied in our economy—the system of compulsion by Industrial Commissioners, or extensive proceedings and punishment when output is insufficient, can lead to success." * * *

SPEER DOCUMENT 048

Excerpt from the Fuehrer Protocol of August 18/20, 1944

* * * * *

Point 8: "The Fuehrer agrees to the instructions we propose for paralyzing instead of destroying industrial or power plants falling temporarily into enemy hands."

XXII. CONSTANTIN VON NEURATH

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Otto von Luedinghausen, Defense Counsel

Your Lordship, your Honours:

"Never before has war impressed me as quite so abominable." This is what Napoleon Bonaparte wrote to the Directorate in the year 1799 after the victorious capture of Jaffa—where he had ordered the shooting of 2,000 captured Turks. This statement by one of the men most outstanding in the conduct of war stood for unqualified condemnation, not merely of war as such, but also of all means for the conduct of war considered as unavoidable and permitted at that time. The perception which this word reflects and its ethical condemnation of war were not uttered in vain. As early as the middle of the last century, morally and ethically high-minded personalities made efforts tending to ameliorate and eliminate, some at least, of the horrors of war. The founding of the Red Cross in Geneva was the first result of such endeavors, casting its luminous light afar, the first fruits of Napoleon's word. But I dare to say, this word is, so to speak, also the actual hour which gave birth to this present trial. It, too, was caused and dictated by the aspiration, not only to circumscribe war as regards the manner in which it is waged, the independence of selection of means and actions, but beyond that to find means and ways to eliminate war as a political measure altogether from the relations of the peoples. It strives for the same high goal, to create an international law to govern all peoples of all States, as they live alongside and together, and to which all States and peoples who wish to rank as civilized States will submit and by which they will be forced to abide in the same manner as the individual national of a State must abide by the law his State has established for the common existence of its people. And if you, your Honors, and if the entire world will learn to understand how infinitely painful it is for us Germans that it is just our State and our people who have furnished cause for the creation of such international law by a war in which we were engaged, yet my client, the defendant von Neurath, and I could not help but welcome the attempt inherent in this trial, because the highest effort during the entire official activity of my client, from his first day in office to the last, was the endeavor to avoid war and to serve peace. And I do not hesitate to emphasize this, although it is because of an entirely new principle of law that my client is facing this Court. Because for the first time in history the idea is to be carried into practice according to which this or those statesmen of a nation are to be held personally responsible and be punished for the wars of aggression caused by them, and the inhumane and cruel means therein applied. This thought, which this High Court is about to carry into practice as a principle of law, is absolutely novel in the history of international law. But if the present Court Trial and the Charter on which it is based is to be more than a single procedure, worked out and intended for this one case, in other words for this war just ended; if it arose not merely from the thought of vengeance because of harm and damage done to the victorious nations and is intended to atone for them, but if it really was brought forth by the will and the decision to eliminate war in itself for good; through the stipulation of the personal responsibility of the statesmen of the nations, then this constitutes a deed which the sincere conviction of every peace loving person will welcome. It furthermore contains two elements apparently suited to revolutionize all that was heretofore known in this world for handling and directing the foreign policy of States, and to raise it onto a new and undoubtedly higher ethical basis.

DEFENSE

It has been an anciently established postulate for the policy of a statesman and his rating before history—which has been so since the speech made famous by Pericles and since Plato's State doctrines, making it the foremost, I would almost say the only postulate—to exert every endeavor to obtain for his people, for the State under his stewardship, the highest possible level of existence, of maintenance, and improvement of its standard of living, of its position among nations, irrespective of the means it might require. Every nation on earth includes in its history statesmen who, seen in this light, are being extolled and honored as shining examples, and who went down in history as such merely because they were successful, and without testing whether the means used by them to obtain success were in harmony or not with the ethical principles not only of the Christian but of all high-ranking moral philosophies. To this maxim the Charter of this High Tribunal opposes a new maxim in that it stipulates that every war of aggression places culpability on the person responsible for the war, without regard for the question of success or failure in the war. However, this means nothing else but subjection to the moral law—which rejects application of force of any kind as a means of policy—of every state stewardship, even the most successful and the most victorious. If, however, this is to have practical meaning and success, there follows the subjection of every State stewardship to the test and judgment by all other civilized States in the world. On that principle the Charter established by this High Tribunal would call for the testing and possible judgment of all innerpolitical measures which, in retrospect, might be seen as actions of preparation for this war. To discuss consequences resulting from this would lead too far; this must rather be left to discussion by scholars of State Law and to further developments, and I wish therefore to confine myself to pointing to one consequence only, that consequence that the statesmen involved in the war of aggression—through planning, preparation, and carrying through of a war of aggression—will be subject to such judgment of a future International World Court and with it liable to punishment, even in the event of that war of aggression ending in victory. Perhaps this is the main point, reflecting the highest ethics of the stipulations and principles established in the Charter.

If I particularly stress these factors this is not done because my client or I entertain doubts that the framers of this Charter failed to be equally and fully aware of these consequences. But the fact that this new tenet of international law is to find application for the first time in the World Forum and by the Allied Governments not through a power dictate but through a Court procedure equipped with all reservations for objectiveness and impartiality, wherein my client and I see proof of the fact that this Court procedure was born and is being motivated by the ideal aspiration of mankind to free it from the scourge of war.

And even if my client and I myself in no way fail to recognize the important issue in this trial as based on the Charter, namely that in sharp contrast to the principles of law of all democratic States, of every democratic-liberal principle of law, it proposes to pass judgment on and inflict punishment for many actions for which at the time they were committed there undeniably did not exist a law or a precedence governing them, my client and I nevertheless are confident, because of our conviction that this High Tribunal will not base the establishment of its verdict on individual and incoherently united actions, on single bare facts, but that it will scrutinize and examine with particular care the motives and aspirations which moved each individual defendant. If then you, Your Honors, will establish, as I am convinced you will, that from the first to the last day of his official activity, as Reich Foreign Minister or as Reich Protector, my client was moved by one desire only, all his deeds and actions governed by one aspiration, to prevent a war and its cruelties, to maintain peace, and that the very reason for his remaining in office was to prevent through his influence war and its inhumanity, and that he did not withdraw from his post until he was forced to conclude that all his efforts were vain, and that the will and determination of the highest ruler of the State, Hitler, to war were more powerful than he. In that case the fact of his membership and continuance of office in the Reich Government until that moment cannot possibly be construed as approval, much less as assistance and co-partnership in the planning, preparing, or waging of war, thereby placing upon him joint-responsibility for the war, or even for cruelties and atrocities committed during its course. By reason of the very fact of the application, in international law and in Democratic States—an application made for the first time in this trial—of the legal doctrine that an action already committed can subsequently be made punishable by law, results in the imperative demand that the question of the subjective guilt of the defendant, in other words the consciousness, not only of the amorality and the presumed criminality of the deed in question but also the intent to commit the deed or at least to offer active assistance despite such awareness, be examined and answered before a verdict is arrived at. Disregard of this postulate would not only rob this trial of its high ethical importance, but would open wide the door and gate to arbitrariness, making such Court procedure appear before the world, not as a real Court within its truest and profoundest meaning, but making it a power dictate wearing the robe of justice.

DEFENSE

An extraordinary responsibility is thus placed upon your shoulders, so great as has never before been placed on the shoulders of any Court in the world. Carrying out the will and the vision of the father of this trial, President Roosevelt, who too early passed from this world, it is your task, Your Honors, to lay the first corner stone for the temple of peace of the nations of the earth. You are to build the foundation for the attainment of the ideal he envisaged, perpetual peace. On your judgment coming generations are to continue to build. You are to give the directives according to which those who come after us must continue to aspire to this high goal. It is not a precedent you are to establish, not an individual case you are to judge and to punish the guilty men according to your judgment; but you are to lay down the fundamental principles of a new international law which is to govern the world in the future. This alone, this task assigned to you, establishes the meaning of this Tribunal, its justification, and its high ethical inspiration, to which we yield. At the same time, however, this also includes the recognition that the verdict to be established by you in regard to these defendants is not a verdict in the ordinary meaning of the word; it is not merely a judge's sentence pronounced on behalf of individual defendants and their deeds, but it is the new fundamental law itself, the source from which all future Courts are to draw in accordance with which your verdict is to be established.

It is therefore your task, Your Honors, to interpret the provisions of the Charter according to their principle, and to establish in practice and for all time to come, the rules and principles of the Charter. The responsibility which you thereby assume before history gives you two questions to answer, which answer is all the more complicated because the legal concept of conspiracy incorporated in the Charter and forming the legal foundation of the indictment is a concept foreign not only to the majority of peoples, especially the European peoples, but also because in one or the other country it owes its existence to its previous application to the combat against common crimes and offenses against the legal provisions governing domestic affairs and those alone. The postulate necessarily follows that the modus of interpretation and application of this legal concept in international law can and must never be the same as employed in the fight against common bands of gangsters, guilty of a breach of the social order of a particular country and of the laws promulgated for its protection. The latter ordinarily involves individuals of a more or less amoral disposition, who act for reasons of selfishness, lust for money, or other unethical instincts, placing themselves outside the existing social order. In the last analysis, however, and particularly when wars of aggression are involved, international law does not deal with individual statesmen but much rather with whole peoples. The age of absolutism—where the will of the ruler determined alone the destiny and acts of a people—has definitely passed. In this age it may be said that no avowed dictator, no omnipotent despot who can rule without or against the will, or at least the tacit approval of the nation, at least its majority, is conceivable. And so—it is necessary to make this known once to the world—invisible behind the defendants there sits also in the prisoners' dock our poor, beaten, and tortured German people, because it placed upon a pedestal and selected as leader a man who led it to its doom. From this follows of necessity the inescapable demand that contrary to the concept of conspiracy applied in regard to ordinary criminals, application of the concept of conspiracy applied in international law must firstly proceed by investigating and examining how it came about—how it could come about—that a people ranking high intellectually, a people who gave so much to the world in terms of gifts of culture and of mind as the German people did—that it could hail a man such as Hitler, following him into the bloodiest of all wars, giving him its last and best. Not until you, your Honors, have incorporated this in the field of your considerations and examined this question will you be able to establish a just verdict in regard to the individual defendants themselves—with due consideration for their dissimilarity—a judgment which will stand the test of history. Because of such reasoning and not merely by reason of my right as defense counsel of the defendant Freiherr von Neurath, but also because of my duty as a German, I deemed it necessary to explain in mere outline the fact of Nazi domination which the world outside of Germany cannot grasp, to make you visualize how it happened as a result of the effects of the Versailles Treaty and, finally, because of the manner of its application, how it was bound to happen, true to historical necessity.

In view of the short amount of time made available to me through decision of the Tribunal, I must refrain from reading that part of my final pleading, and express my definite hope that the Tribunal will go to the trouble of subsequently reading it itself and that it will consider its arguments when establishing its verdict. I now continue with page 44 of my final pleading, and should first of all like to give you a brief description of the personality and of the thoughts and feelings of that man who is today before you as prisoner.

DEFENSE

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Born as a scion of an old family which gave its small country of Wuertemberg so many faithful high government officials, he grew up with a simple and strict education in a parental home filled not only with a real Christian spirit and true love for mankind, but also with a flourishing, devoted love for his German people and Fatherland. From his tenderest age and during his whole life his thoughts and actions had implanted in him the desire and will, the holy duty, to place all his powers, all his ability, all his gifts and capacities at the service of the welfare of his people, to subordinate and even sacrifice all his personal interests to this. But, and this must certainly be emphasized in this place, aside from this aspiration there was alive in him and woven into his being to an equally strong extent a deep religious feeling, love of the truth and love of mankind that made him from the beginning adverse to the use of any form of violence, not only in his private life, in his relations with his fellow men, but which ruled rather to the same extent his entire official activity, even after the treaty of Versailles. His acts bore the stamp of this feeling and it became the law governing his official dealings as representative of the Reich in other countries, as well as Foreign Minister and lastly as Reich Protector of Moravia and Bohemia. Not only by his conciliating amiability, his commanding appearance and demeanour, so understandable in a man of his origin and education, but also primarily through the love of peace and sincerity which permeated all his actions as a diplomat and statesman he won the unlimited and sincere respect and sympathy of all the people he came into contact with the world over, even of his political opponents. As an unequivocal proof of this fact, the truth of which, your Honors, may be confirmed by your own diplomats, it will suffice to refer to the fact that, as you know from the sworn affidavit of my client, no less persons than King George V and King Edward VIII of England received the defendant in private audiences upon the occasions of his presence in London in 1933 and 1935, that the British Government in the summer of 1937 and again in 1938, when he was no longer Foreign Minister, invited him to visit England for political discussions, and lastly that on his 65th birthday on 2 February 1938 the entire diplomatic corps called on him to congratulate him and to express through the then dean, Monsignore Orsenigo, its thanks and its appreciation for the reasonable and understanding manner in which he always discharged his duties. Do you, your Honors, credit your own diplomats and statesmen with so little knowledge of human nature, so little experience and knowledge of the world that in the course of the defendant 6 years' activity they would not have found out, if the assertion of the Prosecution were true, that Herr von Neurath had knowingly let himself and his good reputation be used as a covering shield by the Nazis, and that all his statements and assurances as Foreign Minister were more camouflage, that is to say, a deliberate deceiving of the whole world? In this connection, it may well be pointed out as quite obvious that such old and experienced democracies as England, America, France, as well as the Vatican, had delegated to the then very important post of Ambassador in Berlin their cleverest and most experienced diplomats. And I attempted to assume that the Prosecution possibly did not realize quite clearly what a dubious compliment it paid to its own diplomats by its assertion about the defendant, while it produces in proof of said assertion only the highly fantastic report of the American Counsul Messersmith. I am moreover unshakeably convinced that you, your Honors, based on the very reason of your long judicial experience, have far too much knowledge of human nature not to see at first glance that my client by his entire personality is absolutely incapable of such a perfidious and lying way of acting, let alone capable of play-acting to such an extent that for six long years he could have fooled the ablest and most experienced diplomats in the world. A man who for 60 years has led an honorable and absolutely decent life, like the defendant, would never in the world at the end of such a life have lent himself for such a disavowal and negation of all that he had so far held highest. That would be contrary to anybody's personal experience.

And on the same level stands the Prosecution's assertion that the defendant von Neurath, by joining and remaining in Hitler's cabinet, served as a fifth columnist in the conservative circles of Germany, for the express purpose of winning them over to National Socialism. This slander of the defendant, which moreover was brought forward without any attempt at justification, is contradicted by the sworn statements of all witnesses and the affidavits submitted, which unanimously tend to prove that the resignation of the defendant from the office of foreign minister was viewed in just these circles with the greatest dismay and concern; because these circles considered that this withdrawal of the defendant from the government was in itself a sign that from then on his pronounced peace policy would be replaced by another, more belligerent, tendency in foreign policy, which was quite rightly considered as a national calamity. For, like everybody else, they shared the conviction of Reich President von Hindenburg, that Mr. von Neurath was the exponent of the peaceful foreign policy of the Reich and the guarantee for a consistent continuation of this peace policy, and was against any possible, undesired aggressive experiments by Hitler and the Nazi party and that for this reason the Reich President had made it an express condition that the defendant should remain in the Cabinet as Foreign Minister when Hitler was called to the Reich Chancellery. This fact is confirmed beyond doubt by the sworn statements of all the witnesses heard, as well as by the carbon copy submitted by me of the letter of the witness Dr. Koepke on 2 June 1932 to Ambassador Ruemelin (Doc. Book I, No. 8), and the affidavit of Baroness Ritter (Doc. Book I, No. 3). But the latter proves also at the same time how unwillingly and after how long a struggle the defendant finally decided to accept this call and therefore supports the defendant's own sworn statement, that he only decided to do so after the Reich President whom he so highly venerated, appealed to his love of country and reminded him of the promise he had made two years before not to leave him, the Reich President, in the lurch whenever he needed him. There is certainly no need for further proof for the utter groundlessness and inaccuracy of the further assertion of the Prosecution, also submitted without proof, that the defendant had used his position, his reputation, his connections, and his influence to lift Hitler and the Nazi Party into the saddle, to help them to secure supreme power in the Reich. Therefore, I hardly need to refer again to the statements of the defendant Goering and other witnesses, particularly Dr. Koepke, from which it appears beyond doubt that at the time there were absolutely no relations between Hitler and the Nazis and the defendant, and therefore even less could the defendant have taken any part in the negotiations which took place before Hitler's call to the chancellorship. Love of his country, deepest concern over the weal and woe of his people, and his promise not to leave Reich President von Hindenburg in the lurch in this time of need were the only reasons which moved this man to leave the post of Ambassador in London he had come to like so much, to assume at that critical and fateful hour the heavy charge of Foreign Minister of the Reich, and the task assigned him as such by the President of the Reich to continue the guidance of the foreign policy of the Reich in peaceful ways, even eventually against the will of Hitler. The defendant von Neurath can claim fully and rightly that he carried this heavy task at all times, even after the death of Reich President von Hindenburg, with all his strength and with the pledging of the full force of his personality. Up to the time he was forced to admit that this task was beyond his strength, that Hitler no longer let himself be influenced by him but had decided to pursue a line of foreign policy along which the defendant, owing to his inmost convictions and his personal point of view, could not follow.

DEFENSE

Up to 5 November 1937, the date of the famous speech of Hitler to the commanders of the various branches of the Wehrmacht, the defendant von Neurath remained at his post, in the most faithful performance of his promise to the Reich President von Hindenburg, even after the death of the latter. Out of this faithfulness to the dead Reich President he has assumed the odium in many cases concerning Hitler's home politics of having been compelled as a member of the Reich Cabinet to allow in silence things to take place which were contrary to his own convictions, did not agree with his views, and were in direct contradiction to them. It was not in his power to prevent them. So he was forced to be satisfied with trying as far as was possible to mitigate their effects and consequences, as you could see from the Affidavit of Provincial Bishop Dr. Wurm (Doc. book I, No. 1), and the statements of the other witnesses heard in this connection.

The reproach of the Prosecution, that he did not make such cases an excuse to lay down his office of Minister, but that through his remaining in office he had consciously approved and abetted, is entirely irrelevant. The first law governing his action was the carrying out of the duty assigned him by President von Hindenburg to secure the continuance of the Reich's peaceful foreign policy. He would have considered himself false to his word if he had resigned his post of Foreign Minister before this was accomplished or before there was no possibility of its accomplishment. What person thinking objectively could bring himself to reproach him regarding this or even, as does the Prosecution, identify him with the Nazis.

But this attitude of the defendant, however, is the only reason why he did not refuse, as did the Minister Eltz von Ruebenach, his nomination to the rank of Honorary "Gruppenfuehrer" of the SS in September 1937 and the presentation by Hitler of the Party badge in gold at the Cabinet Session of 30 January 1937, which facts are made a reproach by the Prosecution into a reproof and a proof of his alleged National Socialist sentiments. For, as the statement of the defendant Goering concerning the latter, such a refusal by the defendant von Neurath, as was the case with Eltz von Ruebenach, would have been resented by Hitler as an act of rudeness which would without any hesitation have been answered by the immediate dismissal of the defendant. But it was just this that the defendant wished to avoid, for at that time he was still in a position to carry out to the full extent the task assigned him by the President of the Reich, to be the guarantor of peace in the foreign policy of the Reich because he was fully justified in his conviction that his influence over Hitler was still strong enough to insure his agreement with the peace policy he was then fostering. The evidence submitted proves beyond doubt that in both cases it was not a question of actual membership of the SS and the Party, but in the first case it was only a matter of uniform, an external vanity of Hitler in regard to the men of his retinue during the impending visit from Mussolini; and secondly that it was a matter of a visible recognition for the services rendered by the defendant as Foreign Minister, which at the same time implied a proof of the unlimited agreement of Hitler with the peaceful foreign policy followed by the defendant, in other words, an entirely normal awarding of decorations as is practiced in every State. The conferring of decorations in the ordinary sense was not yet possible, because at that time they did not yet exist in the Third Reich. That the defendant in both cases nevertheless expressed at once that under no circumstances did he wish to prove his entry or admission into the SS or the Party by accepting this investiture intended by Hitler as a mark of honor has been proved by the affidavit of the defendant.

DEFENSE

Moreover, he never took the oath required to become a member of the SS; he never exercised even the slightest activity in the SS and wore the SS uniform only twice in his life at Hitler's explicit request. This has also been confirmed by his affidavit. Both cases actually concerned a personal sacrifice of the defendant made to the promise which he had made to Hindenburg. If the Prosecution consequently believes it must infer a National Socialist conviction, the defendant's agreement with Hitler's ideas and his entire governmental system from both these events, it is altogether off the track. And the conferring of the Order of the Eagle supports the Prosecution's assertion even less. For this Order was not conferred on him as well as on the defendant Ribbentrop as a personal distinction for services rendered, but it was merely valid for the position of the Reich Minister of Foreign Affairs and for that of the Reich Protector as such; this was done in order to give this Order, which was intended to be conferred on foreign personalities only, a special significance in the eyes of people abroad, which is even shown by the fact that it had to be returned when he left. The presentation of evidence, through the affidavits of all the witnesses examined in this connection, unequivocally resulted in the fact that the defendant's attitude towards the National Socialist system and its maxims was negative from the beginning to the end, and that therefore certain Party circles continually bore him ill-will and opposed him. For these circles knew quite well that the defendant von Neurath, as is proved by his own statement and by those of the witnesses Dr. Koepcke and Dr. Diekhoff, energetically and successfully opposed to the last day all attempts to introduce members of the Party as officials into the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and in so doing open it up to Nazi influences; and that in spite of various intrigues he could not be dissuaded from definite peace policy. The defendant also took upon his own shoulders this enmity and these intrigues from his inviolable sense of responsibility and his patriotism endeavouring only to steer German Foreign policy into those channels, which were alone the right ones according to his convictions, formed by long years of most successful diplomatic activity. He was fully convinced that when he resigned his office it meant the collapse of the last bulwark against the infiltration of members of the Party and of the Nazi spirit into the Reich Ministry of Foreign Affairs; it also meant that the danger of the renunciation of the peace policy embodied in him became threatening, as happened immediately on his resignation on 4 February 1938.

It was therefore for the defendant one of the most grievous, perhaps the most grievous, disillusionment in his official life, when he was forced to recognize by Hitler's speech on the ominous day of 5 November 1937 that all his efforts, his entire struggle, all his personal sacrifice in the last 5 years appeared to be in vain, and his influence with Hitler was broken; that the latter had decided to abandon him and the policy of peace and agreement advocated by him, and, if the occasion arose, to make use of military means in order to carry out his more than Utopian plans and intentions set forth in this speech. The acknowledgment struck him like lightning from a clear sky, since up to then nothing had intimated that Hitler might no longer agree on the peace policy advocated by the defendant. The heart attack which he had the next day may testify to the fact how seriously he felt his blow, which seemed to shatter all his hopes, all his efforts to protect Germany from the dangers of this foreign policy, the military entanglements, and a possible if not probable catastrophe. But from his consciousness of responsibility, his burning concern regarding the future of his people, before drawing upon himself the last self-evident consequences and resigning, he considered it his duty to try once again, by very detailed and serious conversations, to dissuade Hitler from persevering in his fatal plans and intentions. Yet, having to recognize from this conversation, that Hitler's decision was unalterable, he did not hesitate for one instant to tell Hitler that he had decided under no circumstances to take part in this pernicious policy and that for such a foreign policy Hitler must find another Foreign Minister. Hitler accepted his resignation by his letter of 4 February 1938.

DEFENSE

I ask you, Gentlemen, is there a more unequivocal and clearer proof than this resignation, for the absolute inaccuracy, the entire instability of the charges made against my client at this trial of having assisted or wished to assist by his foreign policy in the planning and the preparation of wars of aggression which took place 1½ years later? Is there a more unequivocal and clearer proof of the absurdity of the application of the principles of conspiracy to the acts and deeds of statesmen and in particular of the defendant? Finally, is there a more unequivocal and clearer proof of the absurdity of a retrospective judgment of the policy of States, such as they constitute here one of the main bases of the whole Prosecution?

All of you Gentlemen, who are here to do justice, know from your own activity and experience at least as well as I do, how dangerous conclusions a posteriori are regarding the actions of a man, regarding the thoughts, views, and deeds of this man at a time going back several years. Tempora mutantur et nos in illis. Each of us has surely, more than once in his life, experienced the truth of this sentence. Convictions and views, intentions and resolutions, which we have held and carried out at a certain time, have in the course of years become changed and altered, partly because of the transformation of one's own personality, partly because of exterior circumstances of change of conditions. Does one really wish to expound this thesis and draw conclusions retrospectively, that the former views, assertions, and actions were only camouflage, and that the person already intended to do and was determined to do, what he did years later under quite different circumstances? Why should you demand a different standard of a politician, a statesman, he also is only a man and is subject to the same changes of ideas, opinions and intentions, as any one else. He is even more subject to exterior influences, exterior conditions so certain imponderable circumstances than the ordinary man. Just one example for this. What would you say to a man who would earnestly dare to assert that Napoleon Bonaparte, when he went to Paris during the great Revolution, or later on when taking over the supreme command of the French armies in Northern Italy, already had the idea or even the plan or the intention of making himself in 1804 Emperor of the French and of marching on Moscow in 1812? I believe whoever adopted this attitude would stand alone in the world. And an able dialectician with more or less apparent logic and right could still base this opinion on the historical development of events, like the Prosecution with regard to their opinion that Hitler, at the time of his assumption of power, yes, already with the presentation of the Party program in 1920, had not only the intention but even the plan ready for conducting his later wars of aggression, and everything which Hitler and the Nazis and/or his collaborators did, from the moment of the assumption of power, both in domestic and foreign politics, was the conscious preparation for these wars of aggression.

Your Honors, I believe whoever follows the Prosecution and its principle, which still stands on a very weak basis, and its retrospective consideration of things esteems too highly probably not only the spiritual, but also the statesmanlike abilities, not only of his satellites, but also of Hitler himself. Because, after all, it is in any case already evidence of a certain mental limitation, if a person, and particularly a statesman, founds his policy on the basis, as Hitler indisputably did, that the governments and statesmen of the remaining States would again and again let themselves be fooled and bluffed, that they would again and again stand for actions which they considered to be violations of treaties, and that they would watch quietly until Hitler believed himself to be so far as to be able now to attack almost the whole world by force of arms. And is it not all the more proof of a mental limitation, if a statesman in this way underestimates the abilities and cleverness, but also the power instruments of his opponents as Hitler has done? In addition to all this, however, there is something which must not be underestimated either, that is, the violence of the sudden transition of the thoughts and the decisions resulting therefrom which was a trait of Hitler. I do not consider it necessary to have to give you any further evidence thereof, they are generally well-known. Hitler, however, was also a man who did not stand for any argument, or any resistance, and who, when he encountered such and met obstacles which he could not remove through an emphatic word, changed his plans and intentions like lightning and let himself be led to decisions which were frequently just the opposite from what he had wanted, planned, and done previously.

All this speaks against the intention of the planning and the preparation of wars at the time of the seizure of power, and even already in previous years which the Prosecution has ascribed to Hitler. The impossibility of this charge is yet underlined, if the following is considered: To this Hitler has not only indisputably testified in public speeches, addresses, and diplomatic notes on several occasions from the day of the seizure of power until 1937, as can be seen from documents presented by me, but he has also made positive suggestions for the practical execution of the limitation of armament of all States, therefore also that of Germany, from which it can be indisputably seen that, with regard to the German Armed Forces and its strength in relationship to the armament of the Western Powers, he declared himself satisfied with a relationship, which from the very beginning excluded any aggressive war against the other States. And now just suppose that one of these offers of Hitler had been accepted by the remaining States, then the war of aggression which Hitler supposedly had been planning and preparing for years would never have been possible. All efforts, work, and expenses in connection with it would have been in vain. Or do you perhaps consider it probable that Hitler looked ahead and figured that his offers would be refused, and that he only made them in this realization? Then he would really be an almost demoniacal genius, a prophetic seer of the first rank. Do you really wish to presume this and to affirm from it the claim of the Prosecution of the planning of the aggressive war in the year 1939 already a long time before the seizure of power? And even if you should answer this question in the affirmative for the person of Hitler, do you also ascribe such a gift of second sight to his collaborators, his servants, yes even all Party members? To ask this question is to answer it in the negative. With this question alone also falls the whole painfully constructed and artificial construction of the motivation of the Prosecution. And along with it falls also the classification of the whole charge, and in particular the co-responsibility of all collaborators of Hitler generally under the conception of the conspiracy, at least until the period of time when it could be recognized by the most extensive circles of his followers, that Hitler finally wanted war and had decided on it. Simultaneously with this, however, the unvarying correctness of the postulate advanced by me at the beginning of my statements, after examining the subjective co-guilt of every single defendant, after the refusal of the co-responsibility of each individual only from the fact of his participation in the actions which are considered as preparation for a war of aggression by the Prosecution at any period of time, simply without examination and investigation of his knowledge of Hitler's aims and intentions, becomes evident.

DEFENSE

To waive and disregard this postulate, as the Prosecution does, would be to contradict every sense of justice, the most primitive as well the most highly developed, in every nation on earth. The "sumnum jus" sought in this trial would become a "summa injuria".

The best evidence of the truth of this assertion is personified by the defendant von Neurath himself. Is it not pure folly, is it not "summa injuria" to accuse this man of connivance in planning and preparing wars of aggression; this man who deemed it his exclusive duty, a duty to which he has made many a personal sacrifice, to prevent every form of entanglement involving war; and who, the moment he realized that the task was beyond him, forthwith resigned his function and demanded his dismissal? The Prosecution obviously feel this themselves, otherwise they would not have brought, as evidence of the defendant's alleged joint culpability, his presence at Hitler's conference on the 5 November 1937, wittingly omitting however, that it was this conference and Hitler's deviation from a peace to a war policy which determined the defendant to refuse further collaboration and thereby make it clear that he has never concurred in the past and is not prepared to concur in the future in, or approve of, the planning, preparation, or waging of a war of aggression. Thus, every charge of guilt made in the Indictment against defendant von Neurath is originally void, once and for all. For should he be further accused of having broken international treaties while responsible for the conduct of German foreign policy, it must be pointed out, in answer, that according to the clear wording of the Charter, the breach of international treaties does not constitute a punishable crime in itself, and becomes a punishable crime only when it serves the purpose of preparation for wars of aggression. If such a breach of treaty serves this purpose, it must be intended to do so by its author, or at least its author must have conscience of the fact. That defendant v. Neurath had no such intention nor indeed the faintest conscience of the above implication is quite clearly proved by his resignation from the office of Foreign Minister. But I shall moreover demonstrate to you that even the charge of violation or breach of international treaties is without foundation.

When, on 2 June 1932, defendant von Neurath took over the Foreign Office at Hindenburg's request, there were two questions that far surpassed in importance every other European problem and awaited an urgent solution; they were the problem of the German Reparations and the problem of the disarmament of the victor Powers and of German equality of rights, inseparable from it. The first question, the defendant and the then Reich Chancellor von Papen managed to conduct towards a satisfactory solution at the Conference held by the Powers in Lausanne on 10 June 1932 a few days after the defendant's assumption of office. At the closing session of the Conference on 9 July 1932, Germany was acquitted of the financial servitude established by the Treaty of Versailles against a single final payment of 3 milliard marks. The Young Plan was obsolete, and only Germany's obligations deriving from the loans granted her remained in force. Thus came for Germany the political achievement that Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles, in which the Reparation obligations were contained in virtue of article 232 became obsolete.

DEFENSE

The first breach was made. Matters differed as regards the disarmament problem. This arose from the obligation for disarmament imposed on Germany according to part V of the Treaty of Versailles which, I presume, is well known. In case of its fulfilment, the preamble to this part likewise prescribed disarmament for the highly-armed victor nations in reciprocity. Germany had disarmed; it had already fully met its obligations in 1927, an uncontested fact which the League of Nations also had expressly recognized. This was the basis for Germany's request for reciprocal compliance by the other partners to the Treaty, as provided in the Preamble to Part V. And Germany had announced its request for disarmament by the highly-armed States and in conjunction therewith recognition of her equality of rights a considerable time before the defendant took office. However, during the so-called Disarmament Conference the negotiations not only had made no progress by the time the defendant took over the Foreign Office, but just at that time, the summer of 1932, they had become considerably more difficult. In view of the short time allotted for my disposal, I again refer for details to the German Memorandum of 29 August 1932 (Doc. Book II, No. 40) and to my client's interview of 6 September 1932 with a representative of the Wolff Telegraph Office, to be found in the same document book under No. 41. Lastly, I should like to refer to the defendant's declaration of 30 September 1932 before the German Press, submitted to the Tribunal under No. 45, my document book II. These declarations, all of which were made preparatory to the resumption of negotiations by the Disarmament Conference on 16 October 1932, and in order to demonstrate the seriousness of the situation to the world and to the Western Powers, prove clearly and unequivocally the great, fundamental tendency of the defendant's ideas, his trend of thought and the intentions as a human being, as a diplomat, and as Foreign Minister which dominated his entire policy from the beginning until his resignation, and which can be summarized in the statement, "to avoid and prevent the settling of differences through force of arms; to realize all goals and tasks of German Foreign Policy by peaceful means only; to reject war as a means of policy; in a word, to strengthen and safeguard peace among the nations." It is the same tendency which M. Francois Poncet, the former French Ambassador to Berlin, so succinctly referred to as a characteristic of the defendant in his letter which I submitted to the Tribunal as per No. 162 of my Document Book V and which was unanimously confirmed by all witnesses and affidavits. While the opening of negotiations at the Disarmament Conference expressed what really might be termed an affront to Germany which caused the head of the German Delegation to declare that under such conditions it would not be possible for him to continue to attend the negotiations, the Western Powers in the end could not close their minds to the ethics of a policy inspired by such tendencies and, following a suggestion by the British Government, on 11 December 1932 the conclusion of the known Five-Power Agreement was brought about (see Doc. Book II, No. 47 a) in which England, France, and Italy, with the admission of the United States of America, recognized Germany's equality of rights. On 14 December 1932 the Main Committee of the Disarmament Conference expressed its pleasure in taking cognizance of this agreement and the German Delegate expressed his readiness to resume participation in the deliberations of the conference, stressing also that the equality recognized on 11 December 1932 in regard to Germany was the condition "sine qua non" for this continued participation by Germany. It seemed that a great step forward had thus been made in the path leading to an understanding on the question of disarmament.

However, things were to take a different turn. Immediately following the opening of the conference meeting again in Geneva on 2 February 1933, serious clashes occurred between the German and the French Delegation, in the course of which M. Paul Boncour, the French Delegate, even went so far as to declare the Five Power Agreement of 11 December 1932 legally invalid because it involved five powers only. To the astonishment not only of Germany, the cause for those increasingly acute differences was the fundamental change in France's attitude as regards the basic question of the entire armaments problem as laid down in the French Plan of 14 November 1932 as a basis for these negotiations. Contrary to the stipulations of the Treaty of Versailles and its own attitude heretofore, France suddenly took the position in this plan that armies made of professional soldiers with a long period of service were aggressive in character and, consequently, meant a threat to peace and that only armies with a short period of service were defensive in character. I regret that for a lack of time I must desist not only from reverting at greater length to the details of the French plan but also to the sequence of the differences which became constantly more critical between Germany and the other Powers. Rather must I presume that they are known and confine myself to stressing that the new French thesis, which the Disarmament Conference adopted as its own, was clearly and unequivocally directed against Germany and the Reichswehr as it had come into being in accordance with the disarmament provisions of the Treaty of Versailles, a thesis which if it was to be carried into effect would have required the transformation of the Reichswehr into a militia army with a short period of service, thus signifying a still further reduction in its armament, inadequate as it already was for an effective protection against attack. The establishment of this thesis, however, also proved clearly that France was unwilling to disarm, which was also shown by the statements of the French representative himself. This new plan of France, just as also her attitude particularly in the question of the ratio in the reciprocal reduction of the individual armies, was merely a new expression of her old thesis, first security, then disarmament, which brought about the failure of not only the previous negotiations but also that of a new plan of mediation, the so-called Mac Donald plan, proposed by England to prevent the threatening break-down of negotiations. Germany's reference to consideration for her own security and her demand for general disarmament as a result of the right to equality by reason of recognition accorded her on 11 December 1932 were received by the other parties as presumptive; indication being given that should negotiations fail, responsibility would rest with her. In the interest of the clarification of these things and of the presentation of the increasing gravity of the whole situation before world publicity, my client felt it necessary to publish in the well known Geneva periodical "Voelkerbund" on 11 May 1933 (Doc. Book II, No. 51) an article in which he discussed the result which the conference had so far achieved, described the German attitude in detail, and finally established that the German demand for the practical realization of the equality of rights of Germany by disarmament of the heavily armed countries was wrecked by the lack of will of these countries to disarm, and that therefore Germany in the interest of her own security was forced to start completing her armament, should the general limitation and disarmament within the frame work of the English Mac Donald plan not satisfy her justified demands for security.

DEFENSE

This conclusion was wholly justified in view of the entire foreign political situation at that time. These aggravated events which had intensified the crisis at the Disarmament Conference were only a small part, so to speak, of the expression of the international tension which prevailed since Hitler's assumption of power. Domestic events occurring in Germany were first observed abroad with astonishment but also with a certain lack of comprehension. Soon after Hitler had assumed power on 30 January 1933, an opinion was formed abroad, the discussion of which would lead too far here about the so-called German Revolution, which made it appear a European danger not only in France and in her allied countries, but also in England.

The fear of such a danger affected the attitude of the Western Powers at the Disarmament Conference to an ever increasing degree, where Germany's completely logical and consistent point of view was regarded as provocation. But these worries of theirs, their insecurity in face of the new Germany, led to even much more extensive measures and threats. With England's consent France began military preparations in the first days of May 1933; placing the border fortifications, which had already been provided with increased garrisons during the winter in a state of alarm, alerting the large camps in Lorraine, the deployment area of her army of the Rhine, and carrying out a large trial mobilization between Belfort, Muehlhausen, and St. Ludwig, at which the Chief of the French General Staff, General Weygand, appeared in person, and at the same time the French Foreign Minister Paul Boncour ostentatiously declared in his speech on 12 May 1933 before the French Senate that, in view of the revolutionary explosions in Germany, Italy would have to be kept firmly among the group of Western Powers; and, in response to Germany's attitude at the Disarmament Conference, he added that Germany must adhere strictly to the Treaty of Versailles if she wanted to keep the Reichswehr. And these words of the French Minister, which could only be understood as a threat, were still further emphasized and confirmed by similar statements of the British War Minister Hailsham and the otherwise so pacifist minded Lord Cecil in the English House of Commons; the latter even encouraged France to carry out further military operations. The situation was so strained that Europe seemed to be standing directly on the brink of a new war.

This increasing gravity of the situation, this obvious crisis which was leading Europe close to disaster, is one of the basic reasons for the entire subsequent policy of the defendant von Neurath during the following years. Therefore, the question must be examined as briefly as possible to see what consequences it was bound to have, and did have, for German foreign policy, from a German point of view. One thing is undeniably clear. In this spring of 1933 Germany was in no condition whatsoever to fight a war; it would have been complete madness, a sheer desire for self-destruction, to fight a war against the armies of France and her allies, which counted millions of men and were excellently equipped with the latest weapons of attack, with the small Reichswehr of one hundred thousand men which had at its disposal no motorized weapons of attack whatsoever, no tanks, no heavy artillery, no military airplanes. Fear of an imminent warlike attack from the part of Germany could, therefore, from the point of view of the Western Powers, under no circumstances be the reason for their position and attitude. The one plausible reason could lie only in the attitude of the Western Powers in regard to the question of disarmament as such, that is, in their unwillingness to carry it out, to continue to discriminate against Germany, to continue to refuse her the realization of her equality of rights, and to continue to keep her down. In this alone, for the leader of German foreign policy, lay the reason for the final proposals of France as well as England in the Disarmament Conference, which were unacceptable to Germany for reasons of justice as well as for reasons of her own security and her national honor. Because even in spite of Germany's equality, which was recognized by the Western Powers in the Five-Power Declaration, the French plan of 14 November 1932 as well as also the English plan of 16 March 1933, the Mac Donald plan, and the resolutions of the Disarmament Conference included therein lacked any practical realization of equality, even from the most objective standpoint.

DEFENSE

What justly and objectively thinking person can and wishes to reproach the German State leadership, if it drew the conclusions from all this, and recognized that this behavior of the Western powers contained not only a violation of existing treaties, and also the Treaty of Versailles with regard to disarmament, but also the will of the Western powers to prevent Germany from maintaining her demands, justified by treaty, by force of arms if necessary, and furthermore to keep her as a second-rate State, and also to refuse her the security guaranteed to her also in the Treaty of Versailles. Can you, your Honors, reproach a state leadership which was aware of its responsibility towards its people, if this realization from now on had to be decisive for the continued direction of foreign policy? Because the highest duty of every State leadership which is aware of its responsibility in foreign policy is the securing and maintenance of the existence and the independence of its State, the regaining of respected and free position in the Council of Nations. A statesman who neglects this duty sins against his own people. This realization should carry all the more weight because on the part of Germany nothing had happened which might have been interpreted as a threat against the Western Powers. On the contrary Hitler, in his first program speech in a Reichstag still elected in accordance with Democratic principles, had emphatically declared on 23 March 1933, punctuated by unanimous applause, his will for peace, particularly emphasizing this with regard to France, and confessed himself prepared for peaceful collaboration with the remaining nations of the earth, but emphasized also that as the prerequisite for this he considered the final removal of the discrimination against Germany, the division of the nations into victors and vanquished to be necessary. To these declarations of his, however, not the slightest attention was paid by the Western Powers although they corresponded throughout with the given conditions and contained nothing less than threat. Unfortunately they were unable to effect a change in the attitude of the Western Powers, and to prevent an acceleration of the crisis.

A discernible relaxation only then took place when Hitler, under the influence of the defendant von Neurath, at the climax of the crisis repeated once more to the world with the greatest emphasis his and the German people's will for peace in his great so-called peace address before the Reichstag on 17 May 1933—it is in excerpt form in my Document Book II, No. 52—and expressed his conviction that, as he declared literally, no new European war would be in the position to replace the unsatisfactory conditions of today by something better; the breaking out of such an insanity, as he described the war, would be bound to lead to the collapse of the present social and State order.

This speech of Hitler, whose honesty and sincerity cannot be denied according to the evidence and whose power of conviction also proved irresistible to the Western Powers, effected a general relaxation of the situation, the danger of a new international war was averted, and the world took a deep breath. This, however, also marked the end of the isolation and the loneliness of Germany, which caused her inner change and every kind of revolution, and German foreign policy took the opportunity gladly and with sincere will for active collaboration in the political state gamble, which was offered to her by the suggestion of Mussolini to unite the great Powers, England, France, Italy, and Germany in a so-called Four-Power Pact. This treaty, which was signed on 8 June 1933 in Rome and which was signed in the middle of June 1933 also by Germany, and which in its preamble also referred expressly to the Five-Power Agreement of 11 December 1932, was to place the participating Powers in such a position that if further negotiations in a larger circle, as for example in the Disarmament Conference, should reach a stalemate, they could meet at a smaller conference table. For Germany the main motive lay in the fact that she again became an active member in the totality of European policy in which she was participating as a partner with equal rights in an international agreement, which contrasted the discrimination against Germany in its contents as well as in its character.

DEFENSE

As a matter of fact, this part was concluded at a time when a new international tension was already arising and increasing which again threatened to isolate Germany's position. This time it had its source not so much in the Disarmament Conference, the proceedings of which, after the customary fruitless endeavors for progress, were again suspended on 29 June 1933 until 16 October 1933, as in the contrasting position of Germany and Austria in the World Economic Conference which opened in London on 12 June 1933. The Austrian Prime Minister Dollfuss made use of this conference to call the attention of the Powers to a purported threat to Austria's independence by Germany, in that he accused Germany of lending support to the Austrian National Socialists in their fight against his (Dollfuss') Government. Making the Austrian question the center of gravity for European policy and calling on the Powers for protection against alleged threat to Austria's independence by Germany, which the former considered an important stone in the construction of European power relations, he aggravated their mood anew, which had been quieted down only a short time before with some trouble. What the mood was then in the summer of 1933 is shown in my Document Book I, under Nos. 11 and 12, reports of the defendant to Reich President von Hindenburg and Hitler, dated 19 June 1933; but reference is also made to the speech by the defendant on 15 September 1933 (Doc. Book II, No. 56) before representatives of the foreign press, which also comments on the consequences of such a mood for the prospects of the proposed negotiations to be resumed by the Disarmament Conference on 16 October 1933 and which is reflected in his words, "Judging by certain indications, the readiness of highly armed States to carry out disarmament obligations for which they pledged themselves seems to be smaller today than ever. Finally, there is only one alternative, realization of the right to equality or else a collapse of the entire idea of disarmament, with incalculable consequences, for which responsibility would not rest on Germany".

This scepticism of the defendant as regards the political situation in general, and prospects of the Disarmament Conference in particular, were only too well founded. For the new so-called Simon Plan—submitted even before the Conference started by Sir John Simon, head of the English Delegation, as a basis for negotiations—and to a no less degree the statement relative thereto made by Sir John, made it clear beyond doubt that the attitude of the Western Powers still continued to be the same as in the spring of 1933 and that they were even still less disposed to justify Germany's demand for an equality of rights. For Sir John declared in plain language that in view of the present non-clarified conditions in Europe, and considering the seriously shaken confidence in peace, a disarmament conference, even after the pattern of the MacDonald Plan which Germany in the spring had declared unacceptable, is an impossibility. This not only meant bringing an unjustified accusation against Germany—which had done no more but stand on the rights accorded it by treaty—but it also was a clear denial of any kind of realization of Germany's equality of rights and of disarmament. As a matter of fact, this Simon Plan falls even farther short than previous plans in doing justice to Germany's rightful demand for equality of right and disarmament, that is, a voting of all states among each other including Germany.

Time being too short, I once more have to refrain here from going into detail and must confine myself to pointing out that it meant an increased restriction and reduction of German armament in favor of the other nations. Because it provided that during the first half of the 8 years' duration of the proposed disarmament, Germany alone, through the conversion of its Reichswehr into an army with a brief period of service, would as a practical matter be still further disarmed, subjecting herself, in addition, to an armament control by the Powers, while the highly-armed powers were not scheduled to begin disarming until the fifth year, and then only in terms of manpower reserve, not in terms of arms. These provisions demonstrated clearer than ever that not only did the Western Powers not intend to disarm, but that they wanted to weaken Germany still more and make her tractable to their power interests. There was no more mention of the fact that the Five-Power Agreement of 11 December 1932 had agreed to recognize Germany's equality of rights.

DEFENSE

It really should have been clear to the Western Powers as well that such a plan depriving her of a chance to participate in further negotiations at the Conference was bound to be unacceptable to Germany from the outset. However, on the strength of the lessons which German foreign policy learned in the spring of 1933 when Germany came very near having the Western powers threaten her with war because she was unwilling to renounce her just demands, nothing was left to her this time but to answer the new threat which this plan undoubtedly involved, not only by rejecting the plan but also by withdrawing from the Disarmament Conference as well as the League of Nations. Further negotiations during the conference under such conditions were doomed and could only result in a still greater heightening of contrasts.

It is difficult to understand why the Western Powers failed to foresee Germany's attitude and took her withdrawal from the League of Nations and the Disarmament Conference as a surprise. In Hitler's speech, an appeal for peace delivered on 17 May 1933 and already cited here, he expressed in unequivocal terms that notwithstanding the sincere will for peace and honest willingness towards still further disarmament, provided it were mutual, entertained by the German Government and the German people they would never consent to further humiliation and to renunciation of her claim for equality of rights but that, if such was the demand, they would rather assume the consequences without hesitation. Still more incomprehensible is the fact that in all earnestness the Prosecution places the blame for this withdrawal by Germany on the defendant von Neurath, as head of Foreign Policy, and that it believes it can find evidence of deliberate action by him in preparation for future wars of aggression. This can only be explained by the fact that the Prosecution preserves a complete silence on the reasons and happenings which led up to this withdrawal, and thereby tries to create the impression that Germany's withdrawal occurred entirely without cause. The extent to which the Prosecution's attempt to interpret the withdrawal as an action in preparation for war is contrary to objective history becomes clearly apparent from the fact—which the Prosecution also passed over in silence—that concurrent with its declaration of withdrawal the German Government, through Hitler's speech of 14 October 1933 as well as also through the speech of the defendant von Neurath of 18 October 1933 (Doc. Book II, Nos. 58a and 59) not only declared with all possible emphasis its unchanging desire for peace and readiness to negotiate in the case of any disarmament plan which would consider Germany's equality of rights, but also tried to carry into practice this willingness to negotiate by submitting on her part practical proposals for general disarmament, as set forth in the memorandum prepared by my client and submitted to the Powers on 18 December 1933 (Doc. Book II, No. 61). The interview granted by the defendant to the representative of the New York Times in Berlin (Interview Doc. Book II, No. 62) is an expression of the same wish. A government or foreign minister who intends to prepare, or even plan, an aggressive war is hardly likely to make proposals for limiting, or even still further reducing, the armament of countries, including his own.

Diplomatic negotiations between Germany and the individual Western Powers which followed the memorandum of 18 December 1933 ended, as I may presume to be well known, with the Note of the French Government to the English Government of 17 April 1934 (Doc. Book III, No. 70), which closes the door to further negotiations as proposed in an English memorandum of 29 January 1934 as well as another memorandum of the German Government of 13 March 1934, as this was fully stated in the speech of the defendant von Neurath on 27 April 1934 (Doc. Book III, No. 70).

The fact which appeared in the preceding discussion is interesting and must be emphasized here, that in the course of the same an indisputable change was shown in relations between France and Russia, the further development of which became more or less authoritative, not only for the German foreign policy, but also for the entire European policy in the coming years. The Russian representative in his speech to the Office of the Disarmament Conference on 10 April 1934 took the stand, contrary to the point of view always previously represented by Russia, that the task of the Disarmament Conference is to decide on a most wide-reaching reduction of armaments, as through this security will be best provided for, and the non-success of their disarmament efforts, but did not, however, draw the conclusion therefrom that the Conference had failed, but on the contrary defined the creation of new security instruments of international law as the sole task of the Disarmament Conference, a point of view which was underlined further by the Russian Foreign Minister Litvinov on 29 April 1934. With this thesis Russia had made the point of view of France her own—First security, then disarmament; but beyond that the door is opened to the increased disarmament exertions of all the nations. It becomes evident immediately of what far-reaching importance this fact was, if I refer to the French-Russian Assistance Pact which was signed 1 year later which induced the reestablishment of German armed sovereignty occasioned by this and by the increase in armament of all the remaining States. A direct route leads from this declaration of the Russian Foreign Minister via the expletive negotiations in the summer of 1934 regarding the project of the so-called Eastern Pact to the Franco-Russian Assistance Pact of 2 May 1935 and the Russo-Czech-Slovak Assistance Pact of 16 May 1935.

DEFENSE

The French Note of 17 April 1934 with its categorical "No", signified the closure of an epoch and the beginning of a new one in international policy. France finally gave to understand that she was no longer willing to carry on with a general agreement between all States aiming at a solution of the questions of disarmament and security, but decided to go her own way from now on. The reason for this lay, obviously, in the fact that she recognized or thought she had recognized that the most important of the participating Powers, England and Italy, were not prepared to follow her unconditionally any more, and to continue to refuse Germany the equality of rights theoretically granted her on 11 December 1932. This was expressed through the far reaching approximation of the English and Italian points of view in the English Memorandum of 29 January 1934 and in the declaration of Mussolini to the English Minister on 26 February 1934, which dealt with the clearly outlined German point of view in the Memorandum of 13 March and 16 April 1934. Similar tendency was shown in the Memorandum of the so-called Neutral Powers, namely Denmark, Spain, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland of 14 April 1934, but also, above all, the speech of the Belgian Minister President Count Broqueville of 6 March 1934 (Doc. Book III, No. 66) showed the same tendency.

With this note of 17 April 1934, to which the defendant von Neurath referred in his speech of 27 April 1934 (Doc. Book III, No. 74) before the German Press explained his attitude thoroughly and convincingly, France, as was soon too apparent, finally abandoned the basis and the principles of the Versailles Treaty, the preamble to part V of which has fixed in unmistakable manner the general disarmament of all States of the League of Nations as the basis and the counter-obligation for the disarmament of Germany. The new French policy set up immediately after the note of 17 April 1934 let it soon be known that it had decided to do exactly the opposite of the basic idea of the Versailles Treaty regarding German disarmament.

The French Foreign Minister Louis Barthou began on 20 April 1934 his journey eastwards, which took him to Warsaw and Prague and first of all, as it soon transpired, tried to prepare the ground for the resumption of diplomatic relations between the States of the so-called Little Entente with Russia, which so far did not exist, and thus prepare the way for the inclusion of the greatest military power of Europe in European politics on the side of France. This succeeded. Czecho-Slovakia and Rumania, the most important States of the Little Entente, recognized the Russian Government on 9 June 1934 and renewed diplomatic relations with it.

In this way France had made the first breach in the ideological and psychological aversion of the European States against the Soviet Russia of that time, and the French Minister for Foreign Affairs could now on his second journey to the East, not only win the consent of all States of the Little Entente to the so-called Eastern Pact which had long ago been negotiated with Russia, but could subsequently place it openly on the agenda of international policy in London in the beginning of July. With this—as the Czechoslovak Minister for Foreign Affairs Benes justly stated in his speech of 2 July 1934 (Doc. Book III, No. 81)—a regrouping of the European Powers which appeared capable of overthrowing to a certain extent all former relations on the Continent was announced in advance.

England, which already on 18 May 1934, had stated through the mouth of Stanley Baldwin who at that time was Lord President of the Council, before the House of Commons, that in view of the question a system of so-called collective peace, which of necessity would have to contain the need for sanctions, she stood before one of the most difficult decisions in her history. He coined the phrase “Sanctions are war,” gave his agreement in the beginning of July 1934 on the occasion of the visit of Barthou to London, not only to the Eastern Pact but in addition also to the entry of the Soviet-Union into the League of Nations, which had been suggested by France. On 18 December 1934 the League of Nations officially resolved to accept Russia into the League. Thus France had for the most part already reached her goal, the inclusion of Russia, the strongest military power, into European politics, and indeed on her side as would shortly be shown.

In spite of this advised change of European Power conditions, German foreign policy under the direction of the defendant not only continued unaltered and consequently its peaceful struggle for the practical recognition of German equality, even after the French note of 17 April 1934 which it considered disastrous, but also its policy of peace. In his speech of 27 April 1934 already previously quoted, my client has once again and unreservedly expressed the will of Germany, that she was also in future prepared for any sort of an understanding even at the price of further armament limitations by agreement, if this would correspond with her demand for equality. She did not, however, limit herself to this alone. In order to resume the international discussions and negotiations regarding the disarmament question, which had been interrupted by France's "No" of 17 April 1934, Hitler had a meeting in Venice with Mussolini in the middle of June 1934. The purpose and contents of this meeting were at that time summarized by Mussolini with the words, "We have met in order to try to disperse the clouds which are darkening the political horizon of Europe". May I for the sake of prudence recall the fact that Italy at that time was still entirely on the side of the Western powers. Several days later Hitler used the opportunity to emphasize again his and Germany's unshakable wish for peace in his speech at the District Day ("Gautag") in Gera on 17 June 1934 (Doc. Book III, No. 80) when he stated literally among other things: "If anyone tells us, if you National Socialists wish equality for Germany, then we must increase our armaments, then we can only say, as far as we are concerned, you can do so, because after all we have no intention of attacking you. We just wish to be so strong that the others will have no wish to attack us. The more the world speaks of the formation of blocks, the clearer it becomes to us that we must concern ourselves with the maintenance of our own power".

DEFENSE

It was the same change of the power relationships which was constantly taking more clearly defined shape, and the realization of political tendencies, which were the bases of the English air armament program which was announced before the House of Commons on 19 July 1934, and which the French Minister President Doumergue expressed in his speech on 13 October 1934 at the coffin of the assassinated Minister Louis Barthou with the words, "The weak nations are booty or a danger". No matter how irrefutably correct this idea really was, it received, as far as the attitude of the Western Powers toward Germany was concerned, as little consideration as all attempts of German foreign policy to carry on the negotiations regarding the disarmament question and as the repeated declarations of Germany about her preparedness for understanding. Germany was denied now as before the recognition of her equality. This fact also made it impossible for German foreign policy, apart from the encirclement policy of France which became more discerning every day, to join the Eastern Pact. The reasons for this refutation of the Eastern Pact have been presented in detail in the communique of the German Government of 10 September 1934 (Doc. Book III, No. 85). They culminate in the diagnosis that Germany, in view of her indisputable military weakness and defeat, could not take on any treaty obligations towards the highly armed States, which might involve her in all possible conflicts in the East, and could make her a probable war theater. It was not the lack of preparedness to participate in international treaties or even a lack of a will for peace, which caused Germany to maintain this attitude, but first and foremost her notorious military weakness. In addition to this came the true character of France's policy which showed itself more and more, and that of the Eastern Pact as an instrument of the French policy of encirclement directed against Germany. This character became clear to all the world when, in the session of the Army Committee of the French Cabinet on 23 November 1934, the reporter Archimbaud described as an undeniable fact that a formal Entente existed between France and Russia, on the basis of which France would be prepared to furnish a considerable, well-equipped and well-trained army in the event of a conflict. (Doc. Book III, No. 89.) This fact, however, was clearly and openly proved through the declaration of the French Minister for Foreign Affairs Laval of 20 January 1935 before a representative of the Russian newspaper Istvestja, in connection with the Franco-Russian Record of 5 December 1934 (Doc. Book III, No. 91) and the interpretations of Litvinov of 9 December 1934 given thereto. For those well-informed there could exist no further doubt of the existence of a close French-Russian alliance, even if the ratification of its final text only took place on 2 May 1935 and was then immediately followed by the ratification of the Russo-Czechoslovak Aggression-Pact of 16 May 1935.

It was, of needs, forced upon the mind of every clear-thinking person that such a perfect system of French alliances bore a desperate likeness to the one which had opposed Germany once already, in the year 1914. This involuntary parallel was bound to make every German statesman draw the conclusion that those alliances could only be directed against Germany and constituted accordingly, in every case, a menace to her. And this so much the more as these alliances, this obvious encirclement of Germany, were by no means the only alarming events. Coupled with it, a vast increase in military armaments of nearly all non-German countries had been carried out in the course of the last months. Not only had England begun to carry out her large-scale armament program, as shown by the British White Book of 1 March 1935, the submitting of which does not seem necessary, it being an official document, but in France too the efforts to reinforce her army had begun, under the guidance of her, at that time, most popular general, Marshal Petain, while in Russia an increase in the peacetime figure of her army from 600,000 to 940,000 men had taken place, under joyful acquiescence on the side of France. Czecho-Slovakia had introduced, in December 1934, a two years compulsory service (Doc. Book III, No. 92) and Italy also was continually increasing her armaments.

DEFENSE

After the bitter experiments of the latter years, all this was bound to be felt from the point of view of German politics—as I have shown you, my Lords—as nothing but a vast menace, and interpreted accordingly, a menace which left Germany all but defenseless. A foreign policy, conscious of its responsibility, had to reckon at each moment with the danger that such a concentrated and continually increasing power of France and her allies could fall upon Germany and crush her. For nothing is more dangerous than a concentration of power in one hand; it is bound, according to old experience, to lead some day to an explosion, if not counter-balanced by some other power; and this explosion is then directed towards the country nearest-at-hand considered as an enemy. This latter was and could be only Germany, as only this country was considered by France as a foe, no other country in the world besides her. And now I beg leave to ask you, my Lords, whether it was not an obvious command of self-defense, an obvious demand of the most primitive instinct for self-preservation of any living being—and the nations too are living entities, they too possess such an instinct for self-preservation—that now the German government and the German people took back the military sovereignty which had constantly been denied it, and tried to take measures of a security against the menace pending upon Germany by organizing a military aviation and by establishing a peacetime army of only 36 divisions on the basis of compulsory military service. I refer to the proclamation of the German Reich government concerning the restoration of German compulsory service of 16 March 1935 (Doc. Book II No. 97).

However, Germany had waited herewith, in view of the negotiations concerning a general agreement on disarmament which had started again with the so-called London communique of 3 February 1935 of the British Government and in which the German foreign policy, faithful to its readiness for peace which it had constantly proved, had at once consented to participate, and it was ready to wait even longer, until one could see whether or not these new negotiations promised to succeed, when suddenly, before even the negotiations had actually begun, the French government submitted, on 1 March 1935, a new defense bill concerning prolongation of military service, and the British government published at about the same time its afore-mentioned White Book. In view of both these documents, the German government could not do otherwise but take the measures mentioned before if it did not want to become a traitor to its own people.

The effect of these German measures on the Western powers was a different one. England and Italy, it is true, at once protested against them as an alleged unilateral cancellation of international treaties, but they did by no means cut the threads for further negotiations. The British protest note contained the explicit inquiry whether the German government was ready to carry on further negotiations of the kind and extent provided for in the London communique, an inquiry which the defendant von Neurath at once answered in the affirmative by the German communique of 18 March 1935 (Doc. Book III, No. 98). And the then British foreign Secretary Eden went to Berlin at the end of March 1935 in order to hold conversations about the possibility of an agreement on the naval question. In this connection, I particularly want to refer to the deposition of the witness, Ambassador Dr. Diekhoff, who has been examined here. France only consequently pursuing its attitude toward the League of Nations and the latter's exclusive legitimation for collective solution of the problems of disarmament and, therefore, of peace took the initiative to submit to the League of Nations, on 20 March 1935, the measures taken by Germany, and to induce the League to establish a violation of the duty incumbent to all nations of carrying out assumed obligations. It goes without saying that the German government refused to accept, in a note of 20 April 1935, the renewed discrimination contained in this resolution of the League of Nations.

However, the German foreign policy did not let itself be kept back by this resolution to continue trying very actively to establish an agreement with the Western powers, nor did the signature, on 2 May 1935, of the aforementioned Franco-Russian Assistance Pact and of the Russian-Czechoslovak Assistance Pact supplementing the former. On 21 May 1935 Hitler proclaimed in the German Reichstag a new peace program in which he declared once more, and to the largest possible extent, his readiness—most strongly stressing his and the German people's will for peace—to participate in any system of collective cooperation to secure European peace, and to re-enter the League of Nations, as well as to comply with any of such restrictions of the German Wehrmacht's armaments, which other countries also would adopt, provided the equality of rights for Germany was recognized. This speech of Hitler and the diplomatic discussions with other powers initiated at the same time had the promising result that between England and Germany the well-known naval convention of 18 June 1935 was agreed on which established a fixed ratio of the respective naval forces.

DEFENSE

This German-English agreement is of the greatest importance in a double sense. On the one hand from a political point of view, it signifies no less and no more than the implicit acknowledgment of German military sovereignty by England, a negation of the League of Nation's resolution and, at the same time, of the French point of view, and the acknowledgment and approval by England of the German act which had been stigmatized by the League of Nations as a violation of treaties. For the first time, therefore, the equality of rights for Germany had been recognized not only de jure, but also de facto by one of the Western powers, and by one of the most important too. On the other hand, it proves, from the point of view of this trial, irrefutably that the prosecution's contention, that one had to see in Germany's rearmament an act of preparation of the future wars of aggression of Hitler, is erroneous. On the contrary, this naval agreement shows clearly and unambiguously that the German foreign policy at that time, when still under guidance of my client, did not have any warlike intentions, much less plans, that the re-assumption of military sovereignty under no circumstances had any warlike purposes, but nothing but a decidedly defensive character.

I may ask which statesman who carries in his heart warlike intentions or plans would voluntarily consent to a restriction of his armament and, therefore, of a successful execution of his designs and plans, and, moreover, to an extent as provided by the naval agreement? Even the most malevolent mind cannot earnestly contend that the naval power allowed to Germany by this agreement would have been in the least sufficient for a war of aggression; that has been unobjectionably established by the evidence of this trial. Hitler himself had by this agreement robbed himself of the possibility of creating a navy which would have been able to wage a war of aggression. It is clear that any transgression worth mentioning of the agreed ratio of the two navies, which, as things were, could under no circumstances and by no means have been kept secret, would beyond doubt either have induced England to increase her own navy accordingly, or would have caused her to obstruct this German intention, and this could have been done any time. From whatever point of view one may look at this naval agreement, the fact that it was and is an irrefragable proof of the absolute honesty and sincerity of the repeated declarations of Germany's will for peace, an irreversible proof against the presence of any, even the most secret warlike designs or plans of German foreign policy and, therefore, of its leader, the defendant v. Neurath is not to be shaken.

In France this Naval Agreement met with general opposition. It was regarded as an arbitrary act of England, a departing from the common line that was still kept to in the resolution of the League of Nations, and that was bound to interfere with the French plans. So France was very reluctant and reserved with regard to the negotiations started by Britain for the conclusion of general air-pact negotiations, which ran parallel with the negotiations about the Naval Agreement. Hitler's speech of 21 May 1935 had also been causative for these negotiations. Because in this speech, Hitler, referring to the London report, held out his hand for an agreement on limiting of air armaments. And the German government themselves, taking up the English suggestion, presented a project for such an air pact on 29 May 1935. Negotiations lasting for nearly 3 months between the English and French governments were necessary before England succeeded to induce France to agree to participate even in these negotiations. This consent, however, was in reality no consent at all because, among other things, it was tied to the condition that the realization of this air pact must keep pace with the negotiations about the East pact. As this pact, however, had then to be rejected by Germany for reasons of its own security, as already mentioned, it was clear that the French condition in reality blocked the way to successful negotiations from the start. When at the beginning of the Soviet Union sponsored Komintern congress on 25 July 1935 it became unequivocally clear that the Komintern's aim was the world revolution, Germany's opposition—as will be understood—stiffened.

It could not surprise that the defendant von Neurath on 16 September 1935 communicated to the English Ambassador that the German foreign policy did not consider opportune an answer to the memorandum of the British Government of 5 August 1935, which demanded answers to a number of questions of France, that were hardly connected with the air pact. Besides the Italy-Abyssinia conflict had already thrown its shadow ahead, whereby alone the further negotiations about the air pact were suspended. How could a political agreement between the five powers of the Pact of Locarno be possible, and German foreign policy very reasonably pointed to the fact, if the collaboration of these powers was in dissolution and individual powers of this pact were facing each other in military readiness. On 7 September 1935, as it is known, the English home fleet set out for the Mediterranean, and negotiations between England and France about the application of sanctions against Italy were in full swing. On 3 October 1935 war broke out between Italy and Abyssinia.

DEFENSE

The German foreign policy succeeded in keeping out of the now following events in Africa and the efforts of the powers to apply sanctions against Italy. But nevertheless the events that followed became important for the German foreign policy; because it was these events and specially the question of sanctions which prepared a new constellation of powers, which on one hand led to a closer union of England and France and the point of view taken up by her and which, on the other hand, brought Germany, who was again defamed by the resolution of the League of Nations of 17 April 1935, naturally closer together with Italy who was defamed by the sanctions being taken against her.

The consequence of these sanctions was at the same time logically the dissolution of the Pact of Locarno, because it was not possible to consider a pact as being still legally in existence if its participants were opposed to one another in so hostile a way, that the danger of war-like actions was present at any moment.

The efforts of the French Government, already begun with its note of 10 September 1935, to draw also England into the net of its pacts and their obligations, clearly showed the tendency of French policy, and inevitably confirmed German statesmen in their conviction that France consistently followed only its policy of encirclement which was felt as a menace to Germany. However, Germany's leaders and the defendant von Neurath still hesitated to draw the last conclusions from this and from taking the absolutely necessary step for Germany's most primitive security. German foreign policy still kept hoping, in its unshakable desire for peace and readiness to negotiate, that an agreement could be reached, that France would abandon its course, and that a really honest and sincere understanding with France could be reached. This hope, however, was soon found to be a delusion. On 16 January 1936 French Foreign Minister Laval announced that after his return from Geneva in the beginning of February he would present for ratification to the French parliament the pact of assistance concluded with Russia. And at about the same time the defendant von Neurath heard from reliable sources that the French General Staff had worked out military plans for an attack on Germany, providing for the advance of French troops from the Rhineland and following along the line of the River Main so as to join hands via Czechoslovakia with the Russian armies. Hereby the offensive character of the Franco-Russian pact was proved even to the most naive. There was all the less ground for doubt, if one took into consideration the negotiations that took place inside and outside the French chamber before the pact's ratification. For even in France resistance to this pact, specifically on account of its offensive character, was not small. The French veterans of the 1st world war headed the opposition. The Union Nationale des Combattants declared, in a resolution of 8 February 1936, that this pact contained more certainties of war than possibilities of peace. And the speech of deputy Montigny, in the French chamber on 13 February 1936, was a single flaming protest. It is contained in my Document book IV 107. The pact opened even further, so Montigny said, the breach between France and Germany, and Germany must more than ever gain the impression of encirclement, if a party depending on Moscow like the communists party followed the policy of Delcasse, the policy of revenge and of the former Russo-French pact. The greatest danger of war would arise, if France were to convey the impression that she enjoyed the secret protection of Moscow. Even the German government made a last attempt to keep France from ratifying the pact. In the interview that Hitler gave to Bertrand de Jouvenel, the correspondent of the French Newspaper "Paris Midi", on 21 February 1936 (Doc. Book IV 108) Hitler once again held out his hand to the French people for an understanding, for lasting peace and friendship. "I want to prove to my people", so Hitler literally declared "that the idea of hereditary enmity between France and Germany is nonsense" and Hitler once and for all in that interview, finished off the reference to his book "Mein Kampff", that was brought up then as it has been continuously been repeated in this court, by stating: "When I wrote this book I was in prison. At that time French troops occupied the Ruhr, it was a moment of greatest tension. Yes, we were enemies, and I stuck to my country as it should be, just as I stood to my country against yours in the trenches when I was for 4½ years in the war. I would despise myself, if in case of a conflict I were not a German first of all. But today there is no reason anymore for any conflict. You would like me to correct my book like a writer. But I am no writer. I am a politician. I make my corrections through my foreign policy which is directed towards an understanding with France. If I achieve the German-French understanding, it will be a dignified correction. At the same interview, however, Hitler drew attention most clearly to the inevitable consequences of the Franco-Russian pact: "My personal efforts to such an understanding will never cease. However, this more than regrettable pact would, in fact, create a new situation. Are you not conscious, in France, of what you are doing? They let themselves be drawn into a diplomatic game of a power which wants nothing but to bring the great European nations into a chaos from which this power alone derives advantage. One must not lose sight of the fact that Soviet Russia is a political factor which has at her disposal an explosive revolutionary conception and a gigantic armament industry." He concluded this interview emphasizing again that France could end this alleged German danger for good if it so desired, because the German population had complete confidence in him, their leader, and he, this leader, desired friendship with France. The hearing of evidence has proved that Hitler meant these declarations to be honest and sincere.

DEFENSE

But it was all in vain. The French Government could not be moved any more to relinquish its rigid attitude and on 27 February 1936 the French Chamber voted to ratify the pact in spite of all warning.

The die was cast; on 7 March 1936 German troops marched again into their previous garrisons in Rhineland Zone, which had been demilitarized until then, the German Reich had won again its full sovereignty over the entire Reich territory, the last of the restrictive barriers of the Versailles treaty had fallen. This reinstatement of the full sovereignty of the Reich over the Rhineland, however, was of importance for one reason, which by far surpassed its political and prestige significance as seen from the standpoint of existence of the German State and nation, and also was the sole and therefore the more pressing reason and cause for the important resolutions made by the German Government. This was the security of the Reich. As long as the Rhineland was demilitarized not only one of the most valuable and most important provinces but the Reich itself, and especially its life source the Ruhr territory, was without protection against any military attack from the West. The only protection for Germany against the latent terrible danger lying in this fact existed in the Locarno pact, made in 1925 firmly guaranteed by Great Britain and Italy in which France and Belgium on the one hand and Germany on the other hand underwent the obligation not to wage war against each other. Therefore it was—if the German Reich was to put up in future with the vulnerability of its Western frontier by having the Rhineland demilitarized—a matter of life and death that the protection given by this treaty would not be falsified. Such falsification of its meaning and its essence, the protection of Germany, however, occurred at the moment when the political conditions and constellations which existed at the time of the conclusion of the treaty had changed fundamentally. When the Locarno pact had been concluded the political conditions in Europe and therefore also in Germany were governed and determined solely by the four powers, England, France, Italy, and Germany acting in unison, and therefore, the men who made the Locarno treaty for Germany could legitimately rely on the faithfulness of France and Belgium as sufficient protection. This supposition however ceased to exist and the meaning and essence of this treaty and with it the protection for Germany was bound to be changed, i.e., to be falsified, when France definitely changed the political conditions of Europe through concluding her pact of assistance with Russia created a situation which frustrated the aim and purpose of the Locarno treaty, namely, to give Germany protection against the permanent danger caused by the demilitarization of the Rhineland. The political constellation of Europe had been completely changed by this pact, by the fact that the world's greatest military power, which was openly revolutionary minded at that, had entered the political arena. In the face of the not clarified situation in the East, amply laden with conflicting material, the pact could lead easily to the possibility that France, because of her duties toward Russia, became drawn in a war and would attack Germany, should the latter get entangled in a conflict in the East. One has to admit that it was in no way sure, in any case highly problematic, whether the guaranteeing powers, England and Italy, would consider the case for which the guarantee was given as arisen and would actively assist Germany against a French attack, or would rather prefer to stay neutral. That this possibility positively existed also from the legal point of view was shown already in the German note of 25 May 1935 about the French-Russian pact (Doc. book III 105) and was emphasized again in the German memorandum to the signatory powers of the Locarno pact of 7 March 1936 (Doc. book IV 109). As I have already described to you, this possibility, this danger became even greater and more imminent through the events up to the ratification of the French-Russian pact by the French Chamber and by the ratification itself. Therefore, it was a command, a self-evident act of self-defence and self-preservation when the German Government, realizing this threatening danger, took steps which were the minimum of what was necessary to meet this danger, namely, to establish the military sovereignty of the Reich in 1935 and to re-occupy one year later the demilitarized zone of the French Armies, and thereby to move forward the defense line against any attack from the West to the border of the Reich. With all due respect to the rights and rightful interests of other nations, the highest all overriding duty of every government, every responsible statesman, has been, is now, and always will be, to maintain and safe-guard existence and life of his own State and nation. A statesman who neglects this duty commits a sin against his nation. Re-establishment of military sovereignty, rearmament, and reoccupation of the Rhineland were the natural reactions, the answer of the German statesmen is duty bound and therefore also that of the defendant von Neurath to the policy of the French government, in which after all that had happened before, they had to see and saw a threat to Germany.

DEFENSE

Far be it from me, and I wish to state this here emphatically, to reproach the French government morally or otherwise for the policy followed by it as I have described it above. Moreover, I am of the conviction—in agreement with the defendant von Neurath—and recognize fully, that the French policy was dictated solely by France's interest and the French statesmen surely have done only what they believed was just from the French point of view. And if they proceeded thereby from an incorrect premise according to German conviction, namely, the premise that a Germany which had regained its strength presented a danger and a threat to France, that from times of old the German people had faced in a blind rage of hatred and enmity the French people and were animated only by the furor to attack and the craving for revenge, then my client and I can only sincerely deplore this, but we can not condemn it. But on the other hand I too must claim the same right for the German statesmen, for the defendant von Neurath, that their deeds and actions be judged according to their motives, according to the then prevailing circumstances which of necessity from the viewpoint of German interests led to these motives, and that not an, in itself most, improbable interpretation which was the farthest from them be given to their motives. Politics, diplomacy are history which has come to life. Like the entire universe, like everything that lives and moves in it, so too is this living history subject to an unchangeable law, the law of causality. And I believe in my deliberations to have given irrefutable evidence to you, Your Honors, of the following facts: that the two actions charged to the defendant by the prosecution and which are said to incriminate him in particular because they represent breaches of contract in preparation of war, namely, the recovery of the military sovereignty of the Reich and the remilitarization of the Rhineland were, according to the iron rules of logic and necessity, the outcome of the events and the political developments during the years of my client's activity as Foreign Minister due to the politics of the Western Powers, that neither he nor Hitler have consciously, intentionally, and according to a preconceived plan brought them about, but that they were the inevitable consequence of the French policy. They can therefore not only, as is asserted by the prosecution in its retrospective consideration of things, not have an aggressive or even war-preparing character or tendency, but to the contrary by serving only the purposes of defense against and the warding off of a possible attack, they have an outspoken defensive and hence peaceful character. That alongside of this there is no room for their interpretation for a future war of aggression by Germany, I guess I need not emphasize. The assertion of the prosecution proves only the absolute unsuitableness, the whole absurdity of a retrospective interpretation of, and conclusions drawn from certain historical events torn out and abruptly lined up without any coherence. With the investigation of historical truths, which should be the first pre-supposition and duty of this high Tribunal not only for the forming of its judgment, but also for its duty to direct the ways of a new international law controlled by ethical principles, this manner of thinking has nothing whatsoever in common.

But a critical examination of the two steps charged against the defendants as breaches of international treaties does not prove sound upon closer scrutiny of the connections. For the Treaty of Versailles as well as the Treaty of Locarno had in the course of time and events not only lost their signification and therewith their inner justification, but both of them had long since been breached by exactly the French policy and thereby de jure annulled, the Treaty of Versailles by France's obstinate refusal of the disarmament obligations imposed upon her as well as upon the other contracting nations in return for Germany's disarmament, the Treaty of Locarno by the agreement with Russia which was incompatible with the Locarno pact. History, as often before, had passed over them too, and had thus shown the nonsense of applying rigidly the dogma of "Pacta servanda sunt" as France tried to maintain against Germany. This fact will not be altered, not even by the League of Nations resolution of 19 March 1936 which had been proposed by France and which is not astonishing in view of France's dominating position in the League of Nations, in which the latter declares that Germany, through re-militarizing the Rhineland, had violated article 45 of the Treaty of Versailles. History passed over these too.

I believe no further comments are needed upon this resolution and the explanation and parleys between the participating nations which preceded and followed it, for gradually in the course of events they petered out. Europe finally put up with the accomplished facts. * * * And even on the supposition of the correctness of this resolution: According to the Charter of this high Tribunal the breach of an international contract is punishable only when it serves the purpose of preparation for a war of aggression. And in the course of this trial one of the American gentlemen of the prosecution stated expressly that it was absolutely legal and justifiable by peaceable means to bring about a revision or the end of treaties. But the German policy has been nothing else. The military action of the re-occupation of the Rhineland was in view of the small force of troops of only one division without participation of the air force in reality only a symbolic act for the restoration of the sovereignty of the Reich, and has been proved already by the fact that as early as 12 March 1936 the German government through its ambassador in London in a statement contained in my Document book IV, No. 113, made the proposal in the case of reciprocity to abandon the re-enforcement of troops and their closer approach to the borders. The proposal was rejected by France. The German policy has throughout and in every respect held to its line of peace policy for which it had stood consistently for many years, and in reality it only wanted to serve and has served the purpose of peace and its maintenance in Europe. Both steps, the restoration of military sovereignty as well as the re-occupation of the Rhineland, were, as I want to especially emphasize here, nothing else than the visible expression and effluence of the full and unlimited sovereignty of the Reich. This sovereignty in its part has already been recognized by the Western powers in the often mentioned Five-Power Agreement of 11 December 1932 by the recognition of German right of equality. More conclusive evidence of the love of peace and the absolute peace policy of the defendant von Neurath could hardly be found than the fact that for years he waited with the realization of this recognition, in the interests of avoiding complications which due to the French policy by reasons of its former attitude might possibly arise, up to the moment when in consequence of the changed balance of power, this realization became an undeniable necessity for the security of the Reich, a necessity for self-defense. And the German foreign policy continued in practice to follow this tendency unchanged, even after and in spite of this resolution. In the German memorandum of 31 March 1936 (Doc. Book IV, No. 116) German foreign policy once more submitted to the powers, on behalf of the Reich Government, a new great peace plan for a quarter of a century of peace in Europe, by which, as is stated in conclusion, it wanted to make a contribution to the building up of a new Europe on the basis of mutual respect. It thereby again gave clear and unmistakable evidence of its immutable will for peace. That this German peace plan, the absolute honesty and sincerity of which had been affirmed upon oath by the defendant, was also not successful, and did not lead to the building up of a new pacified Europe, was not Germany's fault.

DEFENSE

These same peaceful tendencies and intentions continued to dominate the defendant's policy during the years 1936-37, in spite of all the disappointments he had experienced to date. This was expressed above all also by the treaty between the German Reich and Austria, which was concluded on the 11 July 1936 as the result of negotiations which had been carried on for some time by the defendant von Papen. Not only the defendant's own testimony but also the testimony of the witnesses Koepcke and Diekhoff proved beyond doubt that the standpoint on the Austrian question which the defendant consistently took up and supported from the very beginning was that a closer cooperation between the two countries—both in the political and particularly, in the economic field—had indeed to be striven for, but that Austria's independence had under all circumstances to be respected and remain intact.

Therefore the defendant was a strict opponent of any attempts of interference by Germany with the internal politics of Austria and the attempts of the party to support the Austrian National Socialists in their fight against the Austrian governments of Dollfuss and Schuschnigg and he had protested again and again against them with Hitler and not without success. That he, this Christian minded, honorable man, abhorred and condemned from the bottom of his heart the murder of Dollfuss need not be emphasized. And just from that viewpoint he welcomed the agreement of 11 July 1936, as it corresponded throughout to his own opinion. This alone contradicts the assertion of the prosecution that the agreement was concluded with intent to defraud, that is with the intention to lull the Austrian government into security and hereby to prepare and facilitate for the future the intent already existing at that time of incorporating Austria by force into the German Reich. The definite sincerity and honesty of the defendant at the conclusion of the agreement is confirmed by the sworn testimony of the then Austrian foreign minister, Dr. Guido Schmidt. That the defendant Neurath had no reason to doubt Hitler's honesty and sincerity is demonstrated unequivocally by Hitler's statements as deposed by the witness Koepcke to the British Foreign Minister Simon on his visit in Berlin in March 1935 in connection with the fact that Hitler immediately after conclusion of the agreement urged on the leaders of the Austrian National Socialists, Rainer and Globocnik, strict adherence to the agreement by the Austrian Nazis as shown by the testimony of the defendant. And thus, from his viewpoint, he considered this agreement another step to the appeasement of Europe as the recognition of Austria's independence proclaimed in it eliminated the European danger point comprised in the Austrian problem.

In the same way the defendant worked on an improvement of the relations between Germany and the Czechoslovakian Republic since it was only with this aim in mind that he mentioned so often to the Czechoslovak Ambassador, Dr. Mastny, that the Czechoslovak government must at last meet the demands still very moderate at that time of the Sudetan Germans, which were based on a promise in that matter given already in Versailles by the Czechoslovak government but not kept by her.

Nothing was further from the defendant's mind in both questions than the idea of their solution by force as later, after he had left his position as Foreign Minister, Hitler thought it the right thing to do.

And his efforts to improve the relations between the Reich and the European Southeastern nations and to make them closer were served just as little aggressive intentions or even plans to partition Czechoslovakia with the help of these nations. If in Messersmith's affidavit it is alleged that Germany in order to secure this aim had promised to the Southeastern states, and even to Poland, parts of Czechoslovakia and even of Austria, one can call these definite fantastic ideas which do not contain an iota of truth. What can be thought of these assertions is shown by the fact that the prosecution could not submit a single report from one of the diplomats of the Western powers accredited States which would confirm their accuracy or even only indicate it. Should only Mr. Messersmith have been so clever to have learned of such plans? In reality the defendant's efforts and his trip to Budapest, Belgrade, and Sofia served exclusively peaceful purposes, namely the exchange and the strengthening of the economic relations of Germany with these states, an endeavor which, as shown by the testimony of the witness Koepcke, was close to the defendant's heart and influenced his policies.

How far from him was any policy which even in the remotest sense seemed to him in accord with his policy of peace and international understanding is proved best by the fact that he rejected the negotiations with Japan, entered into and carried on by the defendant von Ribbentrop in London without his assistance and completely independent of him, on direct instructions by Hitler; and objected to the Anticomintern Pact finally concluded with her and expressed this clearly by refusing to sign this pact. It was, as is well known and something quite extraordinary, signed by Herr von Ribbentrop as Ambassador. The objection of the defendant to this kind of policy could hardly be expressed more strongly.

The defendant v. Neurath adhered faithfully and constantly to the last moment to this, his consistent peace policy in spite of the influences of other circles, especially from the Party, noticeable during his last years in office. He hoped until the last moment to be able to check successfully these influences, to eliminate them, and to further direct the policies of Germany along peaceful lines, faithful to his own convictions and to his promise to Hindenburg. When, on 5 November 1937, through Hitler's speech and his subsequent conversation with Hitler about it in January 1938, he came to the conclusion that his influence on Hitler had disappeared, that Hitler would not shrink back from forceful, warlike measures, he drew immediately the consequences and submitted his resignation which was accepted.

His task, entrusted to him by Hindenburg, had become impossible to fulfill. He would not and could not have anything to do with a policy which did not shirk from warlike measures. It was completely out of the question to cover such a policy with his name, it would have been the negation of his entire life work, he would have betrayed himself and his people.

But this did not exclude that the defendant, who placed the welfare of his people above everything even above personal interests and desires, made himself available again when need be or when he believed to be able to spare Germany warlike complications, the danger which was brought about by Hitler's policy made along different lines. And out of this, his attitude, it is only too understandable that when Hitler summoned him on 11 March 1938 to inform him of the march of the German troops into Austria and because of Reichsminister v. Ribbentrop's absence in London to ask for his advice and for the answering of the protest letter of the British Embassy, he declared himself willing to do it. But if the prosecution now accuses him that the content of this reply was actually incorrect the following must be said against it: The defendant had in this letter only stated what Hitler himself had told him about the events. The defendant himself knew just as little about the actual events as the rest of the world, as, since his resignation as Foreign minister, he no longer received any political information whatsoever. Hitler's announcement about the marching in of the German troops surprised him just as much as it did everybody else and as the order for it had surprised even the highest commanders of the German armed forces, as admitted by Henderson himself in his well known book, with the addition that Hitler's decision to march in could only have been made a few days before. There was all the less reason to doubt the accuracy of the description of the preceding events given to him by Hitler, as it was given in the presence of Goering and not contradicted by the latter. With his true and pure character and in view of his entire previous official activity under clean and honest governments, it did not even occur to him that the head of the state, Hitler, could lie to him and give him, at such an important moment, information for answering the British protest, the incorrectness of which was inevitably bound to be demonstrated within a very short space of time. And whom could he really have asked? Only very few men besides Goering had real knowledge, and those he could not ask, if only because they were not in Berlin. Goering did not contradict Hitler's description. He also did not—and this I would like to draw particular attention to—sign in his own name, nor on behalf of the absent Foreign minister, the reply which he caused to be drafted on the strength of this description of Hitler's, for which he also did not use the letterheads of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, but as the wording of the document discloses, forwarded the description of the events by order of the Reich Government. The Reich Government, however, was Hitler, or rather on this day, Goering. Thus he unmistakably expressed that he did not write on behalf of himself, taking the responsibility himself, but that rather, like an attorney, he only forwarded the reports of a third person, in this case of Hitler. He cannot be reproached for not having doubted their actual accuracy and for not having re-examined the official description given by the Head of the State—who was Head of the State after all—aside from the fact, that he would not have been in position to examine them.

DEFENSE

Just as little can he be reproached for the statement made a short time later to the Czechoslovakian Ambassador, Dr. Mastny. Aside from the fact that according to the statement by the defendant given under oath the discussion in question came off in a different fashion as was portrayed by the report of Ambassador Dr. Mastny, aiming ostensibly at greater emphasis and effect, the penultimate paragraph of this report (Doc. Book V No. 141) singularly discloses that even Mastny interpreted the statement of the defendant—that Hitler had no intention to attack Czechoslovakia and saw himself bound by the provisions of the agreement of arbitration now as before—to imply no permanent guarantee for all future, but only for the immediate moment, that is, until the action against Austria had been terminated. In view of the insufficiently prepared state of the Wehrmacht for war, as confirmed by the defendant Jodl, there was absolutely no reason to doubt the accuracy of this statement, that is, to doubt that it actually corresponded with Hitler's wish at that time, in spite of the fact that the prosecution pointed out Hitler's statements in his speech on 5 November 1937 with regard to the conquest of Austria and Czechoslovakia. For these statements applied only to the possibility of war with other states and to a much later period. Thus the accusations raised against the defendant by the prosecution in this point are also unfounded. That Hitler, already a few months after his speech on 5 November 1937, decided to incorporate Austria into Germany, came as a surprise to all, even his closest collaborators. Aside from the development of trends in Austria this, however, was brought about not at least by conferences held between Hitler, the defendant, and Lord Halifax, the then Lord Privy Council, in November and December 1937, in which, according to the deposition upon oath of the defendant, Lord Halifax declared that the British people would not understand why they should enter into a war because two German countries united.

Once more, in the fall of 1938, the defendant v. Neurath took the opportunity to intervene on behalf of the German people, in order to stave off the immediate danger of war. I need not go into details after the coinciding testimony of Goering and other witnesses of how the Munich conference was made possible toward the end of September 1938. It is a fact, that its bringing about and its success, i.e., reaching an agreement with Britain and France in the Sudeten question was due not to a small measure to the initiative and cooperation of the defendant. That, however, he was able to accomplish this is due to but one circumstance which, in complete misunderstanding of the situation, is also made a point of accusation by the prosecution, that is, the fact that upon his resignation as Foreign Minister he was appointed President of the Cabinet Council, which had been newly created by Hitler at the same time.

Without being in this position it would not have been possible for him to get to Hitler in September 1938 and to persuade him to agree to the Munich conference. For, contrary to the allegation of the prosecution, even though maintaining the title of Reich Minister he was no longer an active Minister, i.e., a member of the Reich Cabinet as from the day of his resignation, which is discernible from the fact, that his salary was decreased by one third.

DEFENSE

Consequently any co-responsibility of the defendant for the policy of the Reich ceased as from that day. For, contrary to the statement of the prosecution, as President of the Secret Cabinet Council he was not a member of the Reich Cabinet and he had no access, leave alone a seat or a vote in the Cabinet sessions. This has been established beyond doubt already by the wording of the decree of Hitler's, creating this secret Cabinet council, for it says there expressly that its mission lies in rendering advice to Hitler personally, that is, solely to Hitler and only in affairs of foreign policy. Even the book of Huber "Constitutional law of Greater-Germany", quoted by the prosecution under 1744-PS, in its attempt to prove the contrary, shows that the Secret Cabinet Council and its President had nothing whatsoever to do with the Reich Cabinet and were not a branch or an organ of it, but nothing but one of the several of the Fuehrer's personal offices. As it has been proved by the testimony of Goering, Lammers, and other witnesses, the Secret Cabinet Council never started work and was not meant to do so from the beginning. In point of fact its creation was to bestow a personal honor upon him and was meant to efface the impression that differences had arisen between Hitler and the defendant. That he himself did not look upon his appointment in any other way is proved by the fact that the defendant lived on his estate in Wuerttemberg from 4 February 1938 on as a private citizen according to his own personal inclinations and only very rarely came to Berlin, where, however, he was not and could not be active in any official capacity since he was deliberately kept from all information on political affairs by the Foreign Office.

If the prosecution believes that it can conclude from the documents submitted by it under 3945-PS that the defendant received sums of money from the Reich or the Reich Chancellery for the gathering of diplomatic information, this is refuted, apart from the defendant's own testimony on oath, by a letter among these documents dated 31 May 1943 from Amtsraat Koeppen, the Head of the office of the secret Cabinet council, which was conducted for appearances sake—a letter which proves conclusively that these payments of not very large amounts, made at great intervals to this office, were to cover the cost of maintaining this office and were not intended for any secret purposes or information.

Little as the defendant made use of his position as President of this secret Cabinet council, with one exception in September 1938, just as little was he active as a member of the Reich Defense Council, to which he was appointed by the Laws for the Defense of the Reich.

Here too the Prosecution is making a mistake in turning this membership into an accusation against him and in using it to foist upon him war-like intentions or the support of such intentions. In view of the manifold discussions about this Reich Defense Council during the course of the hearing of evidence, I believe I can dispense with a more detailed examination of this attempt by the Prosecution and limit myself to pointing out that no aggressive tendencies of any kind were contained in these Reich Defense laws, but that, on the contrary, as their contents state, they merely contain—as is the custom in any state that has to reckon with the possibility of a war—the necessary provisions for the event of the Reich being attacked or being drawn into a war in some other manner. How one can deduce there from war-like intentions or plans on the part of the defendant is, however, utterly incomprehensible. The defendant furthermore never participated in a single one of the sessions of this council and no reports about the decisions of this council were ever forwarded to him. The document 2194-PS submitted by the prosecution as alleged counter-evidence was not sent to the defendant at all but to a department of the Reich Ministry of Transport (Reichsverkehrsministerium) attached to the Government of the Protectorate, namely, the transport department, and was intended for the latter. And its sender was not the Reich Defense Council (Verteidigungsrat) but the Ministry for Economy and Labor of Saxony.

With all these and similar efforts the prosecution will never be able to prove that the defendant, by his policies, was at any time directly or indirectly guilty of the crime of planning or preparing an aggressive war or even of approving or assisting such. The opposite is the case.

All his efforts were bent to one and only one end, to attain the aims by peaceful means and in a peaceful way only which already had been aspired to by all former democratic governments since 1919, namely, the removal of the stipulations of the Treaty of Versailles, which were discriminating for Germany, stamped the German Reich to a second class State, and to bring about a general pacification of Europe. Not one of his diplomatic actions served any other purpose or contained any other intention which would involve a crime in the sense of the Charter.

With full justification therefore, his resignation as Reich Foreign Minister was received by the whole world with anxiety and dismay, inside as well as outside Germany, especially in conservative circles—I refer to the statement of the witness Diekhoff—by which for itself the assertion of the prosecution is refuted, that he was active in these circles as a fifth columnist. What the Prosecution points out to all this with regard to Hitler's speech to his generals in November 1939 and still less with regard to the speeches by the defendant himself of 29 August and 31 October 1937 will alter none of those facts at all.* Hitler's speech was held at a time of the first military successes and was calculated as laying claim to the success of his, Hitler's state-leadership, and should only be valued for this face-value. The speeches, made by the defendant however, say just the opposite of what the prosecution likes to interpret into them. For both speeches, contained in my Document book IV, Nos. 126 and 128, emphasize quite expressly the successful pacific intentions of the German Foreign policy, conducted by the defendant, and emphasize especially that the gained successes were obtained exclusively by peaceful means and not by means of force. Especially the speech of 31 October 1937, the last public speech of the defendant as Foreign Minister, frankly represents a resume of his policy of peace. And that this resume was and is correct, the prosecution itself had to admit in this room when, in the words of one of the prosecutors, it expressly denoted Hitler's speech of 5 November 1937 as the turning-point in German foreign policy, a speech, which had been taken by my client as an excuse for his resignation; and the prosecution thereby acknowledged unequivocally that, up to that day, German foreign policy had not been aggressive, had not been a policy of force, nor pursued any plans or intentions of war, but had been thoroughly peaceful and could not have been other, in accordance with the defendant's confession of political and human faith which has been confirmed by all witnesses questioned here and in all of the questionnaires and affidavits contained in my document books.

DEFENSE

This declaration of faith was founded upon three basic pillars: human love, love of the fatherland, and love of peace, all three born of and supported by a very deep sense of responsibility, towards himself, towards his God, and towards his people.

When a few days after the occupation of Czechoslovakia, Hitler called the defendant to Vienna from his well-deserved otium cum dignitate on his farm, and revealed to him that he had been selected as Reich-protector for Bohemia and Moravia, he felt himself obliged to answer this call, as a result of his sense of responsibility. He resisted it to begin with and struggled with himself a long time, as he had always been the strictest opponent of interference, not to speak of a more or less forceful annexation, of other nations to the German Reich.

For this reason he also condemned the annexation of Czechoslovakia and the so-called protective alliance (Schutzvertrag) signed by President Hacha, and this without the least knowledge at that time of how it really came about. The true details of this incident became really known to him first here in Nurnberg. Although the more he opposed to accept a public office once more and at his age at that and again to take service under Hitler and his regime of which he heartily disapproved, he became convinced due to his sense of responsibility towards his people and his humane principles, that he should not deny himself to this call. When Hitler explained to him that he had selected him as the sole personality suited for bringing about successful reconciliation intended by him of the Czechoslovakian people with the new conditions and with the German people, he could not close his eyes to the knowledge that he would be given a task, which he could not evade in the interest of the German people, as well as humanity and international understanding. And was it not a task indeed, worth of the "sweat of noble", through a humane and just government and treatment to appease a people which would regard every restriction and encroachment on its liberty and autonomy as the worst injustice imposed, and which would be filled with the bloodiest hatred and resentment against a people perceived as the intolerable oppressor, to reconcile with just this people and the conditions directly created by it. But was not this aim along the same lines as the tendency of insuring and preserving peace? And he could and had to say to himself with justification that, if he refused this task, another man from Hitler's entourage would in all probability be nominated Reich-Protector, who was not able or willing to appease the Czech people by humane and just treatment, and was on the contrary much more inclined to hold it down by force and terror, as actually happened 2½ years later. It was only as a result of these thoughts and reflections that he decided to accept the appointment offered him—eliminating all personal interests and even setting aside the risk that this might be interpreted and held against him in some quarters as an act of approval and support of Hitler and of his regime—after Hitler had explicitly and firmly promised him that he was at all times willing to support his (the defendant's) intended policy of appeasing and reconciling the Czech people by humane and just treatment, which did justice to the interests of the Czech people to the greatest extent. He was conscious of the weight of this task he had accepted. I do not hesitate to admit that it was here a question of a decision, to justify which could—from the point of view put forward here by the British prosecutor that it was immoral to remain in a government which should be rejected because of its amorality—cause embarrassment in the case of a personality formed differently from and with a different attitude in thought and action than that of the defendant v. Neurath, but that, in view of the personality of v. Neurath which I hope has been described to you sufficiently and clearly, and in view of his profound sense of responsibility, this decision was the only possible and logical one. It is actually pertaining to an antique tragedy that the failure of this mission, which had been assumed out of the highest ethical motives only, has brought the defendant v. Neurath into this dock.

DEFENSE

I should like to declare, what follows at this point already, concerning the prosecution's attempt to present as unworthy of belief the defendant's assertion that he had assumed his office as Reichs-protector only with the purpose and the object to appease the Czech people by safeguarding to a large extent its interests and its nationality and accordingly to be of service to this people and to its national prosperity, as being disproved by the photostatic documents submitted by the prosecution under No. 3859, consisting of a letter of the defendant to the Chief of the Reich chancellery Lammers dated 31 August 1940.

I believe that the second examination of the defendant, which has been readily granted to me by the Tribunal, has proved that these documents, particularly the two reports annexed to the letter to Lammers, which indeed are not consistent with the designs and tendencies of the defendant as mentioned above, do not form any evidence. Not only do those photostatic copies by no means correspond, according to the definite statement of the defendant, to the contents and the form, e.g., the length, of the originals annexed to the Lammers letter, which had been submitted to the defendant for signature, respectively approved by him, but they provoke more than reasonable doubts whether the photostatic copies of said documents are indeed identical with the annexes to the Lammers letter, owing to the following facts:

In contrast to the custom of all administration offices, both photostatic copies do not contain the references (Aktenzeichen) of the Lammers letter, not even a note that they are annexes to a third paper, let alone to the Lammers letter. And the photostatic copy of the first copy does not bear the defendant's signature, which, according to his definite statement, he had added, when signing the latter to Lammers, beneath the report annexed to the Lammers letter, which report had been done by himself or by his office according to his instructions, and which had been submitted to him in a fair copy. It is striking that it only bears a remark stating the correctness which should have been, but actually was not, signed by a SS-Obersturmfuehrer working in the office of Secretary of State Frank. Those facts warrant the defendant's assertion that, if the reports whereof the photostatic copies have been made have indeed been annexed to the Lammers letter, they have been substituted to the original report of the defendant and to Frank's report as approved in the draft by defendant, in the office of Secretary of State Frank, either by the latter or by his order. Furthermore, the defendant's statement is quite worthy of credit, made in order to explain the fact and the purpose of this Lammers letter and its annexes, viz., that he wanted to try, just as according to the plan contained in General Friderici's report dated 15 October 1940, submitted under USA 65 L-150, to induce Hitler by both reports sent to him as well as by oral report to abstain from a division of the Protectorate territory and from a germanization of the Czech people in any form whatever and to prohibit any similar plans at all, a course which the defendant expressly refused to sustain, for all possible reasons, not in the least in the interest of the Czech nation entrusted to him, and of its national character and unity. These assertions of the defendant are confirmed by the statements of the witness von Holleben in the questionnaire answered by him (Doc. Book V, No. 156) of the witness Dr. von Burgsdorf, as well as by the letter of the defendant to Baroness Ritter, as literally quoted by the latter in her affidavit (Doc. Book No. 3). And the defendant has actually succeeded in carrying his point, as proved by the report of his conversation with Hitler submitted by the Prosecution. As long as he was in Prague, no steps have been taken for any germanization of the Czech nation, the defendant has even prohibited the discussion of this entire question, as proved by Document 3862-PS submitted by the Prosecution. By this prevention of any division of the Protectorate territory and of any more or less forcible planned germanization of the Czech nation it is actually proved, in the clearest possible manner, how sincere the aims and endeavors of the defendant were to save and to keep the Czech nation and its nationality in its national unity and character, true to his principles and designs, as stated publicly in his article reproduced by the Frankfurter Zeitung of 30 March 1939 (Doc. Book V, No. 143) concerning the new order of Central Europe, as forming the rule of conduct for the accomplishment of his duty. He himself defines in this article his task as a fine one, but as a difficult one too. How difficult it really was, how nearly impossible, was to be proved unfortunately but a little while later.

DEFENSE

The reason was in the first place that from the beginning not only the full power in the Protectorate had not been transferred to him, that never—quite aside from his subordination under Hitler—had he received a solely decisive and overruling position, but also that his competences and power were not defined sharply enough. It is true that Hitler's decree of 16 March 1939 establishing the Protectorate, and the supplementing decree of 22 March 1939 (Doc. Book V, Nos. 144 and 145) had decreed that the Reichprotector was put under the control of the Fuehrer and Reich chancellor, that he was to be the Fuehrer's and the Reich government's sole representative and was to receive his directives from the Fuehrer and Reich chancellor. But at the same time not only certain administrative branches, such as Wehrmacht, communications, postal, telegraphic, and telephone services, were from the beginning placed out of his competence, but also the Reich government and the Reich itself had been given the right to take under their own administration, as Reich administrations so-called "reichseigene"—independent of the Reichprotector, administrations which actually were Reichprotector offices, and to establish, if necessary, Reich offices which did not fall under the Reichprotector's competence. The Reich had also received the right to take measures necessary to maintain security and order in the Protectorate over the head of the Reichprotector. Furthermore—and this is the most important point of all—the right was granted to every one of the many supreme Reich authorities, i.e., not only to the Reich ministries, but, e.g., to the Reichsbank, the Four-Year Plan, the Council of Ministers for Reich Defense and others, to decree laws and organizational measures on their own authority quite independently of the Reich Protector, and thereby to interfere in branches of the administration which, by their nature, belonged to the competence of the Reich Protector, without the Reich Protector having either the right or the possibility to protest against, or prevent such decrees or measures should they be in opposition to his own decrees, measures, and policy. On the contrary it was his duty not only to publish them in the protectorate if asked to do so, but also to supervise their execution. So the position of the Reich protector was—using an example as explanation—by no means the same as, e.g., that of the British Viceroy in India, but corresponded far rather—though to outward appearances a somewhat higher level—to the position of a Reich Governor or the President of a province. This position therefore did not correspond to what had hitherto been understood constitutionally by a protectorate, nor could it, because this so-called Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia belonged, according to Article 1 of the above mentioned decree of 16 March 1939—and to this I wish to draw particular attention here—to the territory of the German Reich, that is to say it was a part of the German Reich. And it only possessed a certain amount of self-administration and limited autonomy within the Reich as a part of it, whereby the introduction of laws and regulations valid in the rest of the territory of the Reich was a priori understood.

It is self-evident that the greatest difficulties were bound to result very soon from this so vague and indefinite delimitation of the powers and competence of the Reichprotector; difficulties not only for a homogeneous policy directed according to homogeneous points of view and guiding lines, but also for the defendant himself as Reich Protector in governing in the way he wished and which he had embarked upon difficulties and resistances which became more and more acute in the course of time. On the other hand it also follows from the above that the responsibility of the defendant can only be judged from this point of view, i.e., only by taking into account these various competences of all kinds of other authorities. He can never be made responsible for decrees, measures, and actions which he did not decree or order himself, which on the contrary were decreed without his co-operation, without his knowledge, even against his will, by authorities or other offices outside his sphere of power and influence—decrees, measures, and actions which he had neither the right nor the power to prevent and for which he was at most a transit office.

This holds good in the first place for the joint responsibility attributed to him by the Czech prosecution (USSR 60-a) for all the actions of Hitler and of the Reich Government before and after the creation of the Protectorate. The assertion which forms the foundation and presupposition for this—the prosecution assertion that Herr v. Neurath, after having given up his post as Reich Foreign Minister, remained a member of the Reich Government—is factually wrong.

I have already proved elsewhere beyond doubt that he was not a member of the Reich government, neither as a minister without employment nor as president of the Secret Cabinet council. And he was just as little a member of the Reich government as Reich Protector. That, too, is certain and has never been claimed by the prosecution before this court. Therewith any part responsibility of the defendant for any actions or measures which preceded or prepared the setting up of the Protectorate is out of the question. I have also already proved elsewhere that his statement to the Czechoslovak Ambassador on 12 March 1938, which he has been reproached with here again as being such a preparatory action, was not false, not deceitful, and was therefore not an action preparing the march in to Czechoslovakia.

DEFENSE

If the Czech prosecution further draws the conclusion from Article 5 of the above-mentioned decree of 16 March 1939, that, as Reich Protector, he was responsible without distinction for everything that occurred in the Protectorate during the time he was in office, i.e., from 17 March 1939 to 27 September 1941, this conclusion is also factually wrong and false in view of the actual position with regard to competence in the Protectorate as explained above. There is no system of law in the world according to which one can charge a person with criminal responsibility for occurrences and acts by third persons, in which he did not participate, or cooperate, or which even occurred against his will.

Thus he cannot be made responsible for the fixing of the rate of exchange between the Reichsmark and the Czech crown, because this rate had already been fixed when he took over office, he neither had any hand in fixing it nor had he the power or right to change the rate of exchange, we can here very well leave aside the question whether, as the prosecution maintains without proofs, the rate of exchange was detrimental to the Czech people or not. That, by the way, even if the latter were the case, this would not be a crime according to the charter, and only as such would it be punishable, hardly needs to be stressed.

He can just as little be made responsible for the creation of the customs union and for its execution. This had already been laid down in Article 9 of the decree of 16 March 1939 which says literally: "The Protectorate belongs to the customs area of the German Reich and is subject to its sovereignty as regards customs." This regulation was a natural consequence of the already stressed fact that the Protectorate was a part of the territory of the German Reich. However I would like to draw special attention here to the fact that the defendant, because he regarded the absorption of the Protectorate into the customs area, the customs sovereignty of the Reich, as detrimental and harmful to Czech economy, managed to postpone the execution and realization of this absorption for a year and a half, till 1 October 1940 in spite of all the urgings of the Reich Finance Minister, which is clear proof that the defendant put the interests of the Czech people who had been confided to him above the interests of the German Reich. He had absolutely nothing to do with the economic measures consisting in the alleged transfer of Czech banks and industrial enterprises and the alleged filling of the key positions in them with Germans. Those measures were taken by other offices, especially by the Reich bank and the Plenipotentiary for the Four-Year's Plan, behind his back without his collaboration. Besides, they were the natural result of the circumstance that already in earlier times very important German capital had been invested in these banks and enterprises, and this capital increased after the occupation, because the credits given by other countries were withdrawn by them and taken over by German firms.

Lastly, he had nothing whatever to do with jurisdiction. The latter was under exclusive control of the Reich Minister of Justice. He alone established the German courts including summary courts and prosecuting authorities, he only appointed judges and prosecutors. Herr v. Neurath himself had nothing to do with this and still less with the jurisdiction of the courts, as clearly shown by the ordinances and decrees which established them, especially the decree concerning the execution of criminal jurisdiction of 14 April 1939 (Doc. Book V, No. 147).

At this point too, however, it must be emphasized that neither the economic measures nor the establishment of German courts in the Protectorate, which was a part of the German Reich, even remotely fall under the category of crimes punished by this Charter. Just as little do fall under these crimes the alleged intrusions into Czech school organization, the appointment of German school inspectors, measures with which the defendant has been charged in the Czech indictment, and also were not taken by him, but by the German Reich Ministry of Education and Instruction. And the closing of a large number of Czech secondary schools has not been ordered by the defendant at all, nor by the German Reich Ministry, but actually by the Czech government itself, according, it is true, to a suggestion made by the defendant. This measure turned out to be useful and in agreement with the interests of the Czech youth and, therefore, of the Czech intelligentsia and people, by preventing the formation and growing of a large educated proletariat. This danger had become acute because, after the incorporation of the Sudeten German territory into the German Reich in autumn 1938, a very large number of Czech officials and members of the free professions had streamed into the territory of the Protectorate, which, in conjunction with the already existing overcrowding of all higher professions, and in view of the diminution of the Protectorate territory owing to the separation of the Sudeten territory and Slovakia still more diminished the possibilities for getting employment and remuneration for the upgrowing pupils of secondary schools. In addition to this came the closing of universities, in the middle of November 1939, according to a personal order of Hitler. The Czech government could not deny the truth of such considerations of the defendant, and decreed itself the closing of quite a number of schools. The defendant did not exercise any pressure on the Czech government. This has been proved by evidence. The dissolution of Czech gymnastic and sports clubs and similar organizations however was done without knowledge or participation of the defendant, by the police, which was not controlled by him, neither did the confiscation and the use of their assets. It is not even certain, by the way, whether this dissolution has taken place while the defendant was holding office or but after his departure. The dissolution of the Sokol, it must be said, was a real necessity for the government, to protect German interests, and moreover a measure which was taken in the interest of the pacification and reconciliation of the Czech nation too, as the Sokol was, beyond doubt, the focus of anti-German efforts and of the incitement to the Czech people toward an active resistance against everything which was German.

DEFENSE

The preceding arguments show how manifold were the encroachments of other administrations and offices on the administration of the Protectorate and, accordingly, the difficulties and resistances against a uniform policy of the defendant. Those were, however, by no means removed, but on the contrary, aggravated by the decree of 1 September concerning the organization of administration and of the German Security Police (Doc. Book V, No. 149). This decree was issued, without any previous contact being made with the defendant, by the Council of Ministers for the Reich Defense. Especially in its first part, it is absolutely obscure and misleading. True, it placed all German administration offices and their officials in the Protectorate under the control of the Reichprotector, but this subordination was an administrative one only, i.e., a purely external one, but not at the same time an actual one with a view to the administrative duties which they had to perform. In this respect, things remained unchanged, as results already from the power of the supreme Reich offices according to article 11 of the decree of 16 March 1939 and of the ordinance of 22 March 1939. The difference was only that from now on all administrations and offices established or to be established by other offices were formally attached to the Reichprotector's office and were officially to be known as departments of the administrative designation "The Reichprotector of Bohemia and Moravia". However, this did by no means insure that such attached departments were put in fact under control of the Reichprotektor himself, i.e., the defendant, that they received from him their actual directives and orders and had to work according to his views and following his directives. On the contrary, they received their instructions, just as before, from their original Reichoffices and had to observe and to obey only these. For instance, the so-called transportation department constituted accordingly at the Reichsprotektor's, which dealt with the communication system already taken out of the Reichsprotektor's jurisdiction by ordinance of 16 March 1939, was controlled, just as before, by the Reich Ministry of Communications, and not by the Reichsprotektor, and had to get instructions not from him but from the Ministry in Berlin. And the same applied to other sectors, also concerning purely interior administration.

According to this ordinance of 1 September 1939 of the Council of Ministers for the Reich defense, and not, as the Czech prosecution erroneously contends, by a decree of the defendant, a new division of the Protectorate territory was created, into Oberlandratsbezirke with an Oberlandrat at their head, which official is, according to paragraph 6 of the ordinance, the competent administrator for all administrations of interior administration, and subordinate to the Reichsprotektor in an administrative sense; as such he is invested with far-reaching authority, and also controls the Czech authorities in the Protectorate, and this, not by order of the Reichsprotektor, but of the concerned Reich Ministry in Berlin. This too was bound to cause very serious differences and oppositions between the measures taken by those Oberlandraete according to the directives issued to them by the Reich Ministry of the Interior in Berlin and the policy pursued by the defendant. In how far this latter affected and influenced the Czech administrative offices can remain out of consideration, as this decree too and its result, the switching-in of Reich German officials into the activity of the Czech administration, is no crime punishable according to the Charter of this Tribunal. This decree too is but a result of the belonging of the Protectorate to the Reich.

On the other hand, this decree clarified the question of the position of the police within the Protectorate territory, as well of the political as of the security police. This question was quite unsettled until the decree came into force and had led to differences and inconveniences between Herr v. Neurath and his Secretary of State Frank from the first day of the former's activity.

At the time Hitler charged the defendant with the office of the Reich Protectorate, he had, according to the defendant's testimony, assured him of a great plenitude of power, especially for the protection and fullest assistance in such policies of the defendant as were intended to achieve conciliation and balancing of the radical aspirations of the party and other shauvinistic circles. The defendant deduced from this, that as the representative of the Fuehrer in the Protectorate he must and will have a decisive influence in the activity of the police also. According to his own testimony he could not visualize at that time, that by the fact that the police had not expressly and from the beginning been subordinated to him, a large part of the sphere of activity expected by him became illusory from the beginning. By simultaneously appointing Frank—who had just been made higher SS and Police Fuehrer in the Protectorate—to the position of Under Secretary and as such subordinating him to the defendant, he could however derive Hitler's intention to centralize power of authority over the police, if not in his own person, at least under his jurisdiction, e.g., his Under Secretary. In practice however this relation worked out entirely different, since Under Secretary Frank had not the slightest intention to include his superior, the defendant, into the sphere of activity of the Police and recognized only the jurisdiction and power of authority of Himmler, of the Main office for security of the Reich (Reichssicherheitshauptamt), his superior as SS and Police Fuehrer.

DEFENSE

This actual condition was determined by law in a decree on 1 September 1939. For this decree unequivocally expresses that the German Security Police, and thereby also the Gestapo, was not subordinated to the Reich Protector. This is already evident purely outwardly from the fact that the decree completely separates both departmental spheres—Administration and Police—by dealing in part I with the building up of a German administration in the Protectorate subordinated to the Reich Protector and dealing in part II completely separately with the German Security Police. This Security police is not under the jurisdiction of the Reich Protector but, as was already reserved in Article V, paragraph 5 of the decree of 16 March 1939, is taken over by the administration of the Reich itself, that is to say, it receives its orders direct from the Chief of Police in Berlin, i.e., Himmler and in part also by the interpolation of the higher SS and Police Chief in Prague. For the relations of the police with the Reich Protector, the second sentence of paragraph II is authoritative. Its wording is as follows: "The organs of the German Security Police are to collect and exploit the results of their investigations in order to notify the Reich Protector and his subordinated offices accordingly about important events and to keep him informed and give him suggestions."

This signifies that the Reich Protector was legally and actually unable to influence the activities of the police in any form whatsoever. He could not oppose their orders, emanating from Berlin, prior to their execution; quite apart from the fact that he never got to see them, he had no authority to oppose them either. He had but one claim and that was to be subsequently informed by the police about measures already taken by them and even that happened—as was proved by the evidence—only in the rarest cases. He did not have the right or the possibility to issue orders to the police himself.

In consequence of this separation of powers and in view of the totally different attitude of Frank as compared to Herr v. Neurath's the sharpest differences and contradictions were inevitably bound to result. For Frank, as a Sudeten German and one of the leaders of the Sudeten Germans, was filled with hatred and revenge against anything that was Czech. He did not want to hear of a reconciliation or an understanding between the German and the Czech peoples, and gave free rein to this anti-Czech frame of mind of his from the first day of his activity.

At first, that is to say, up to the time of the outbreak of the war, the activity of the police was actually slight, so that these opposing viewpoints were not so apparent. Herr v. Neurath could consequently assume that this opposition would gradually diminish and that Frank would conform to his wishes and aspirations and would show himself to be accommodating and he, the defendant, did not yet recognize the necessity of exerting a lawfully founded influence upon the police through Frank. When, however, he finally had to realize—from the gradually increasing activity of the police and their excesses—that his expectations were not being fulfilled, he protested to Hitler orally and by letter, time and time again—as confirmed by the testimony of the witnesses Dr. Voelckers and von Holleben—and implored him to alter this ominous state of affairs and to subordinate the police to him, and him only.

However, all Hitler's promises and assurances proved false and the subordination of the police to Herr v. Neurath did not take place. Yet, he did not want to relinquish the fight so soon, nor despair of the task taken over by him. Now more than ever he wanted to try to impose his ideas and policy and, should he not be successful, at least to diminish and alleviate subsequently the consequences and harshness of the measures taken by the police in general and individually. That, for this purpose, he had the most detailed account given to him personally in all cases of measures and action taken by the police, such as arrests and other excesses insofar as he received information about them, mostly from Czech sources, and that, wherever he could, he exerted his influence for the release of arrested persons and other mitigations is evident from the testimony of all witnesses produced by me, above all from the testimony of Dr. Voelckers, who, as Head of the defendant's office, was continually engaged in receiving such complaints.

DEFENSE

This is moreover evident from documents submitted by the prosecution themselves, such as the notes of the defendant about his conference with President Hacha of 26 March 1940 (App. 5 to supplement No. 1 USSR 60) and even from the testimony of Bienert, added to the special accusation, who himself was arrested by the police and again released in a very short time upon the intervention of the defendant.

With the one exception of the testimony of Frank of 7 March 1946 submitted during the hearing of evidence, the testimony of all witnesses corresponds on the question of the responsibility of the defendant for the measures taken by the police. This, however, is directly contradictory to Frank's earlier statement. At his interrogation on 30 May 1945 (Doc. Book V No. 153) Frank said: "The police, however, was not under the control of the Reich protectorate. Both Gestapo and Security police received their directions and orders directly from the Reichssicherheits-hauptamt in Berlin." Frank's statement of 5 May 1945 concerning the students' riots (Doc. Book V, No. 152) is also typical for the manner in which the police received its instructions directly from Berlin leaving out the Reich Protectorate. Frank speaks therein of the report about the first demonstrations he had sent to Berlin and in which he had asked for instructions and had received them directly from the Fuehrer's headquarters through the Security Police in Prague to which they were sent by Berlin directly and he, Frank, received them from there. There is no mentioning whatever of the person or even the office of the Reich Protectorate during the entire proceedings, it is an internal affair of the police taking in Frank, the leader of the higher SS and police. Because of the importance of this point I would like to refer explicitly to the statements made by the witnesses von Burgsdorff and Voelckers, who both were, on the basis of their official position, thoroughly conversant with this question during the entire time the defendant was in office, Burgsdorff testified that the police was under Frank who received his orders directly from Himmler. Voelckers said that the defendant had no influence on Frank's activity and thereby on the police. In practice the police and, therefore, also Under Secretary Frank were from the beginning completely independent from the defendant. This was legally sanctioned later through the order of 1 September 1939. All witnesses, also in their written testimonies, testify that the relations of the defendant to Frank had been as bad as imaginable.

It is entirely impossible in this case that the chief of the SD and the Security Police should have been active as political adviser to the defendant. The defendant cannot at all remember a decree from May 1939 about the appointment of this man to which reference is taken in the document by the chief of Security Police (USSR 487). In any case, according to his definite statement, he never carried out any function. The document USSR 487 therefore does not appear to have any proof of evidence. The copy submitted to me by the tribunal is dated 21 July 1943. That alone proves that the appointment of the SD leader, if it occurred at all, was not given any effect during the defendant's entire time in office. Aside from the date, however, the result is that, in "Reference to the letter * * * ", this appointment does not at all concern a political adviser to the Reich Protector in person but the Under Secretary for the Security Service, namely Frank. The address "Der Herr Reichs-protector" is to be understood in a way, that is, does not mean the person but the office. In the German government circles it was customary to speak of the "Herr" Reichsminister, etc., even though he was not meant personally but any department of his office. It is entirely credible and probable that the SD leader was appointed political adviser to the Under Secretary, who at the same time was Under Secretary to the office of the defendant and independent Under Secretary to the Security Service.

Just from the so-called "warning" given at the end of August 1939, with which the tribunal reproached my client, can be seen how he himself felt about the ways and means of easing the minds of the population and to hinder, that is, prevent violence and insubordination. According to his sworn testimony, the defendant thereby succeeded in discouraging the population from committing acts of violence and especially prevent acts of sabotage, which were to be expected in this time of political high tension before the war, and thus in preventing harsh police and legal measures which would embitter the population even more. It is doubtlessly more human to issue such a warning and thereby to prevent the committing of crimes instead of letting crimes be committed without previous warning and afterwards give severe punishment. That acts of sabotage, if it was impossible to prevent them, were severely punished in those times, would certainly have been acknowledged also in any other country and is a matter of course. As the defendant testified the warning had fulfilled its purpose. No special punishments were threatened or determined, it contained no special threats of punishment whatever, but referred, as the wording proves, to criminal law already in force.

DEFENSE

The sentence, that the responsibility for all acts of sabotage affected not only the culprit but the entire Czech population, is, of course, concerned only with the moral responsibility and not the legal one, as was also confirmed by the defendant.

It means that in the case of repeated heavy acts of sabotage general measures would be taken in the respective territories, as for example, earlier curfew, ban on going out, or general stoppage of traffic or electric current, under which the entire population would have to suffer. A collective responsibility in the legal sense would have had to be formulated much more concretely. It was expressly mentioned at the beginning of the proclamation that everyone who commits the cited crimes thereby proves himself to be an enemy of the Reich and has to be punished accordingly. This sentence especially shows that the legal treatment of such sabotage acts would have been carried out individually. At that time nobody in Prague not even the chief of police would have thought of the idea to decree a general punishment, or even, the prosecution asserted without any evidence whatever, to establish the hostage system. In this connection I also wish to refer to the statements made by the witness von Holleben (Doc. Book V, No. 158) in which he states: "Neurath therefore always refused to make a person responsible for acts committed by somebody else."

From all that has been said previously, results further show that the defendant von Neurath cannot be made responsible for the arrests made at the time of the occupation of the Czech territory, nor for the arrests of, as the prosecution asserts, 8,000 prominent Czechs as hostages and their being taken to concentration camps, or their execution at the outbreak of the war.

The arrests, according to the defendant's testimony with which Frank's testimony agrees, were made on direct order from Berlin without knowledge and information of not only the defendant, but also of Frank himself. Bienert's contradicting testimony presented by the prosecution is objectively incorrect and is based on completely illogical and false deductions. His deduction that this entire action was under the defendant's direction because his order for Bienert's release had been issued already four hours after his arrest is without any logic and is objectively wrong.

On the basis of the evidence it is finally irrefutable that the defendant is not responsible for the order to shoot nine students and to arrest approximately 1,200 students during the night from the 16th to the 17th of November 1939, that these measures actually to be called terror actions had been ordered during his absence from Prague without his knowledge by Hitler personally and had been carried out on his direct order by Frank, and that also the proclamation of 17 November 1939 announcing it was neither issued nor signed by him, that on the contrary his name under it had been misused. As it is unanimously proved by the testimony of the defendant himself, by that of the witness Dr. Voelckers, who accompanied the defendant on his trip to Berlin on 16 November 1939, the day of the students riots, and had returned from Berlin to Prague with him together but on the afternoon of the 17th, furthermore by the written testimony of Mr. v. Holleben and finally by the affidavit of the defendant's secretary, Miss Friedrich (Doc. Book V, No. 159) and of the Baroness Ritter, the defendant was in the night of the 16th to 17th November when the shootings and arrests took place not even in Prague but in Berlin and the publication of those incidents was already posted to the house walls of Prague when the defendant returned to Prague. The defendant is not in the least responsible for these atrocities. The order for it as well as the simultaneous order for the closing of the universities had on the contrary been given directly to Frank by Hitler in Berlin, and this as the witness Voelckers expressly confirms, in the absence and without the knowledge of the defendant. What value can, in contrast to that, be ascribed to Dr. Havelka's testimony presented by the prosecution is self evident.

The credibility of this witness Havelka, as well as of all the other Czech testimonies submitted by the prosecution, must in general be examined with the very greatest caution. They are subject from the first to two very serious objections. Firstly, all these witnesses are members of the former autonomous Czech government, i.e., so-called collaborationists who are in jail to-day for this reason and are awaiting sentence. It is humanly only too readily understandable if to-day they not only see the conditions then in a different light, judge them differently from what they really were, and involuntarily mix in their memory the terrible things which happened after Herr v. Neurath had left Prague with the events while he was there. This results in a haziness of their memory. We must also not overlook the fact that, in a quite natural effort, they hope by incriminating Herr v. Neurath to clear themselves. Added to this is the fact which is almost more important yet, that they had no knowledge whatsoever and could have none of the internal factual and legal conditions within the office of the Reichsprotector and that they therefore are not able to judge to what extent the defendant himself was really the man who issued the individual decrees and orders or brought them about. One example shows this very clearly: In the witness Kalfus's testimony it is alleged that the defendant was responsible for the customs union between the Protectorate and the German Reich. I hereby wish to refer only to the fact that already in Hitler's decree of 16 March 1939 it had been expressly announced that the Protectorate belongs to the customs district of the Reich. The witness Bienert further asserts that it was Herr v. Neurath who subordinated to the Germans the political administration of Bohemia and Moravia—which means state as well as communal administration. This is, however, also objectively wrong. As I have already proved, this subordination was ordered by the decree of 1 September 1939 which was not issued by the defendant but by the ministerial council of ministers for the defense of the Reich. These examples should suffice to show how little credible all these testimonies are and how little the witnesses were informed about the actual organization and competences within the office of the Reichsprotector. The repeated assertion of the witnesses that the arrest and many other measures of force by the Gestapo against the Czech population was done on the order or instruction of the defendant personally is for example either a deliberate falsehood or proof of their ignorance of even the published official decrees which were announced in the Czech official gazette. Because the Gestapo, as I have already proved, was not under the command of the defendant. The conclusions from this for the credibility of the witnesses are self evident. It is obvious that in contrast with it the sworn testimony of the defendant and of the witnesses, presented by me, together with the pertaining decrees submitted deserve much more credibility.

DEFENSE

The allegation of the Czech indictment and of the testimony on which it is based that Herr von Neurath, in the middle of November 1939, ordered the closing of the universities has thus been disproved as objectively wrong. In fact, the closing of the universities took place on the express order of Hitler. As the evidence has shown beyond any doubt the defendant has immediately protested to Hitler and succeeded in obtaining his promise to reopen the universities after one year instead of only after three years. The defendant cannot be blamed for the part that Hitler then did not keep his promise. His efforts for the revocation of the closing of the universities prove however how much he was interested in maintaining the educational standard and the intellectual class of the Czech nation.

And just as in this case the defendant worked wherever he could for the Czech nation in its entity and for the individual. This applies specially to the harmful activity of the police and the Gestapo as far as he received information about it. According to his own testimony which is confirmed by that of the witness Dr. Voelckers, he had, immediately after the arrest of the students in the middle of November 1939, used all his influence with all energy and continually for their release and as we have heard here not only out of his own mouth, but also from Dr. Voelckers, he succeeded in obtaining the release of almost all the students up to the time he left Prague on 27 September 1941. And he worked in the same way continuously for the release of about 8,000 prominent Czechs who were arrested at the beginning of the war. As proved by his own testimony these arrests were not ordered by him, as is asserted contrary to the truth by the Czech witnesses Bienert, Krejci, and Havelka, not even by Frank or by another higher SS or police chief in the Protectorate, but by Berlin directly. It is due, by the way, to the defendant that in 1941 the order Hitler issued at Frank's and Himmler's instigation for the removal and arrest of the then Czech Prime Minister General Elias was rescinded by Hitler because of his personal intervention. Only after he had left was Elias arrested by Heydrich and later condemned to death by the peoples court.

Definitely wrong is the allegation of the Czech witness Bienert that the defendant had arranged the transportation of Czech workers into the Reich, that is, deported Czech workers by force into Germany. It is rather true that during the whole term of office of the defendant not a single Czech worker was deported by force to Germany. For the rest, until 27 September 1941, no compulsory deportations of laborers had yet taken place in any territory occupied by Germany. That happened but later. But many Czech laborers have voluntarily and gladly gone to the Reich and accepted jobs there, as they earned, owing to the established currency exchange rate and to higher wages, much more than in Prague, and could send to their relatives in the Protectorate very important parts of their earnings.

When, further on, the Czech prosecution wants to charge the defendant with the sending by the Gestapo of arrested persons to concentration camps, and with the ill treatments committed there on these individuals, then it must be established with the utmost precision that until 27 September 1941, the end of the official activity of the defendant in the Protectorate, there was not even a single concentration camp in the Protectorate. They all have been established under his successor only after his departure. The decree too concerning security and preventive custody, which the Czech prosecution appears to charge him with too, has as shown by the copy annexed to the Czech report (USSR 60) been issued, but after his departure, viz., on 9 March 1942.

DEFENSE

Lastly, concerning the charges of the indictment about the alleged measures taken by the defendant against the Jews, in this point too the representation of the indictment does not fit the facts and is shown to be erroneous on closer examination of the documents submitted by the prosecution itself.

Of all the 21 decrees contained in the British Document Book 12 B, only 4 have been signed by the defendant himself, 6 have been issued by the Reich Ministry directly, and 10 by secretary of state Frank or his direct subordinate Dr. v. Burgsdorff, 1 by the Czech State President Hacha. The first decree signed by Herr v. Neurath himself, of 21 June 1939, which contained nothing but the introduction of the regulations concerning treatment of Jewish property, valid for the entire German Reich, into the Protectorate, which, since 16 March 1939, was a part of the German Reich too, had been prescribed to the defendant from Berlin at the very beginning of his assuming of office. The fact however, that it was published, but on 21 June 1939, 3 months later, proves the correctness of his statement that he wanted to give the Jews time to prepare themselves for the introduction of the Jewish legislation as in force throughout the Reich. Its postponement to that day took place in the very interest of the Jews. The 2d decree issued by the defendant himself of 16 September 1940 only prescribed an obligation to declare securities, i.e., mortgages, which were Jewish property, and corresponded to the decrees of the same or similar kind issued in the German Reich too and which were applicable to all German nationals. The 3d decree issued and signed by himself, as well as the 4th, of 14 September 1940, aimed at rendering possible and facilitating Jewish emigration, as clearly shown by their contents; an emigration which the development of happenings in the Reich had made inevitable. Both decrees had accordingly been issued in the interest of the Jews themselves, and prove that the defendant had no antisemitic views. All the documents submitted by me which refer to this matter, especially the newspaper report concerning the boycott of the Jews in the spring of 1933 (Doc. Book I, No. 9) and the submitted depositions of witnesses, show that he did not approve of the measures taken against the Jews, particularly of the violent ones, but opposed them. As shown especially by the deposition of the witness Dr. Koepcke, such measures would have been in contradiction with his completely Christian and human attitude and ideology. It is a matter of fact that until his departure from Prague not a single synagogue has been closed and that no religious restrictions against the Jews have been decreed. It does not need any particular proof that the defendant cannot be made responsible for the six ordinances issued by the Reich Ministry of the Interior. But neither does he bear any responsibility for the decrees signed by Frank and by Herr v. Burgsdorff, in view of the independent position of Secretary of State Frank and the competence of the police concerning all Jewish matters, which I have described. In opposition to the assertions of the indictment it must be particularly emphasized that, according to his own sworn deposition, no persecution of the Jews has occurred during his entire tenure of office.

His aforementioned human and Christian attitude and ideology makes the assertions of the Czech report of September 1945 (998-PS) concerning an alleged hostility of the defendant against the Church appear from the beginning as hardly likely. It is true that the Czech indictment of 14 November 1945 (USSR 60) does not make this report an object of an accusation, but nevertheless, I should like to speak about it in a short way. It is proved by evidence that the relations between Herr v. Neurath and the Archbishop of Prague have been very good, even friendly and that the latter has explicitly thanked the defendant for his support of the churches, and this would certainly not have been the case if he had been opposed to the Church or if he had suppressed the churches, their organizations, and clergymen or persecuted them in any way. It is certainly not an extraordinary occurrence that there may have been differences in administrative matters, as has obviously been the case according to the letter of the Archbishop submitted by the prosecution—State and Church always have had differences with one another at all times and in all countries—but this cannot be construed as implying, on the defendant's side, a policy opposed to the Church. It may be right that clergymen have been arrested, but firstly these arrests have been ordered not by the defendant, but by the police, which was not under his control, and secondly—insofar the defendant has known them at all—not because of any church activity, but because of political intrigues. Neither is it clear from the mentioned Czech report whether the alleged actions against the Church, its organizations, and ministers have actually taken place during the defendant's tenure of office. The evidence has shown that he did not decree any antieclesiastical or antireligious measures, pilgrimages to the Czech religious relics, e.g., were especially permitted by him.

DEFENSE

Here I would also like to emphasize that the defendant is not to be charged with any offense against Czech national feeling. In contrast to the statement of the prosecution he did not destroy or close any Masaryk houses, nor did he destroy or remove any monuments of national personalities, what the prosecution would like to reproach him with. Insofar as Masaryk houses were closed, the SS and the police which were not under his jurisdiction are exclusively responsible for it. His attitude towards the Czech national feeling is best illustrated by the fact that he especially permitted the deposition of wreaths at the foot of Masaryk monuments.

Just as little did the defendant take measures hostile to culture in spite of all efforts made in that direction by radical elements. The Czech theater life was not touched and remained free, as well as Czech literature which was not suppressed or encroached, with the natural exception of forbidding such things that were of an anti-German or revolting character. Also the press, which by the way was not controlled and censured by him but by the Reich Ministry for Propaganda, was not submitted to other limitations than the German press, as all in all the defendant's efforts were directed towards conserving and encouraging Czech national cultural life in its characteristic qualities and independence. I believe it is not necessary for me to go still further into details about that subject and that I can confine myself with referring to the defendant's own statements and the statements of the German witnesses heard on this subject.

From these statements it will, however, also be clearly seen what difficulties and resistance from certain radical circles and authorities, and not least from his own Under Secretary Frank, he was up against in his above mentioned efforts and in all his policy towards the Czech people. If one wishes to draw up a summary of his official activities, we may say that his entire life in Prague was one single fight against the forces inspired and led by Himmler, a fight that was the more difficult because he did not actually possess full powers in the Protectorate, and the offices and authorities which were the most important and influential ones in the field of home politics, the entire police and Gestapo, were not under his authority. Nevertheless he did not abandon this fight, and he did not get tired of protesting to Hitler repeatedly and demanding redress, in many cases successfully, in others not. He fought up to the end, and did not let himself be discouraged by failures and remained faithful to his policy of reconciliation and settlement, of pacification and conservation of the Czech people, and of its national characteristics. And when he had to recognize in Autumn 1941, here again, that any further fight was hopeless, that Himmler's influence on Hitler was greater than his own, and that Hitler had now decided to change over to a policy of force and terror and to send to Prague for the purpose Heydrich who was known as a bloodhound, he immediately drew his conclusions as in the winter of 1937-1938 as Minister for Foreign Affairs, and resigned.

He left Prague and finally retired to private life. What an impression this resignation made on the Czech people and even in circles hostile to Germany, and what people took it to mean, follows with a clarity which can hardly be surpassed from the fact that the Czech report (USSR 60) which was truly not dictated by pro-German sentiments or love for my client, characterized this departure of my client as a "geheiger Schlag" in the German text, "a heavy blow" in the English text, a fact which fundamentally disavows its own accusations against Herr von Neurath. And in fact I believe I have proved that, during and as a result of his administration, the defendant was not guilty personally of a single crime against humanity punishable under the charter of this Court and only such a crime could, after all, come into question here. And here the basic question of this trial also arises, which is whether the defendant rendered himself guilty of supporting or aiding Hitler and his helpers—in a manner punishable under the Charter—in committing their crimes, by accepting the office of Reichprotector and by keeping it, in spite of the war launched by Hitler a few months after his assumption of office and in spite of the events in November 1939 and several other occurrences. The prosecution answers this question in the affirmative. But can an objective, unprejudiced judgment of things really answer this question in the affirmative? One thing should be unassailably certain after what we have heard here from the defendant himself and from the witnesses questioned on the subject by me and from the affidavits presented. Just as little as external, material reasons moved Herr von Neurath at that time to enter Hitler's government and remain in it, just as little did such reasons enter into his acceptance of the Reich protectorate. Evidence for this is found already in the fact alone that he declined the endowment which Hitler had intended for his 70th birthday in 1943, and when this was not possible, he had this endowment placed in his bank as I have proved to you through the letter from his bank (Doc. Book V, Nos. 160 and 161) and never touched one penny of it. And how little the pomposity of the position of the Reich protector attracted or much less suited him can unmistakably be seen from his letter of 14 October 1939 to the witness Dr. Koepcke (Doc. Book V, No. 130) in which he calls it an absolute prison. In both cases, as has been proved not only by the defendant's own statements, but also by the statements of all the witnesses and documents which I have introduced, the motive and the reason for the acceptance of his position and his endurance in it was not per chance that he approved of the ideologies of the Nazi regime with all its methods and wanted to support them, to the contrary, his high ethical and moral convictions which sprang from his deep sense of responsibility towards his people as man and statesman, these caused him to do it. Since he was not in the position to and had not the power to remove Hitler and the Nazi government, he considered it as his duty at least in his small sphere within the compass and limits of his power in the field under his leadership to fight the Nazi tendencies which he also despised and to prevent their materialization, as far as his strength permitted. Can one, so I ask, really reproach Herr von Neurath for this, can one condemn him because the task he had assumed with a sense of moral duty and a consciousness of responsibility was beyond his strength and he was frustrated by it?

DEFENSE

For once, Your Honors, free yourselves from all juridical and political prejudices, from all the retrospective considerations of things with their in any case very uncertain deductions and think yourselves into the soul of this man, into the world of thought, into the conception of life of this man. Brought up in the house of his parents which was filled not only with Christian, humane, and through and through decent ideas but also with the sense of responsibility towards its German people, he had grown up and reached the age of 60 in civil service under the various governments, first under the imperial, then under the changing governments of the republic. Without caring for their political trends, without asking whether they were conservative, democratic, or social democratic, he had served them, he carried out the tasks assigned to him in his sphere of labor. As diplomat, as official of the Reich's Foreign Service the field of internal politics was remote from him, he considered it his only duty to serve his people as such, regardless of its momentary governments and their inner-political attitude. And thus, much against his personal wishes, upon Hindenburg's call in the hour of distress, he took over the Foreign Ministry and thereby entered the government of the Reich and remained in it also after Hitler was appointed, not as the representative of a certain political party, but as Hindenburg's special confidant in the field of Foreign Politics. He was the guarantor of the Reich's peace policy, the rock of bronze in this field. His whole education, his sense of responsibility towards his people would not permit him to do anything else than to remain at his post when he was drawn into the whirl and dynamics of the National Socialistic movement and had to see how this movement turned in directions and made use of means which he too could only condemn. But exactly as was the case with other respectable and patriotic Germans whose sense of responsibility and duty to their own people had driven them to the decision to remove Hitler and the Nazi regime by force, so it was with the defendant whose sense of responsibility and sense of duty not only towards himself, but also towards his people, forced him to set aside his personal abhorrence of the immorality of this regime and, by remaining in office and continuing to conduct it according to his principles, to fight actively against this immorality and thus to keep it away at least from the section controlled by him and to protect his German people from this immorality of the Nazi regime and its consequences, namely war, as long as he had this possibility. And when then one and one-half years later, after his resignation, the call came to him again to accept a position, this time as Reich-protector of Bohemia and Moravia and Hitler declared to him that he had selected expressly him for this position, because he considered him the only suitable person to carry out his intended policies of a conciliation and reconciliation of the Czech people with new conditions and the German people, the very same sense of duty and responsibility forced him to follow this call, for would he not have to deduce from the fact that Hitler, in spite of knowing about his declining attitude toward the National Socialist regime, his policies, and his expedients, desired to intrust him with this task, that he really and honestly meant to effect a reconciliation and appeasement of the Czech people? Thus he confronted a task, the achievement of which would not only be of the highest benefit to his own, but also to the foreign people. A task, which was not only to serve the conciliation of two nations, but also the ideal of humanity and Christian brotherly love as well as to protect the Czech people from the pernicious methods of the Nazi regime. And now I ask: Is it not at least just as moral and ethical to pledge one's self and one's person for such a goal, to actively if only to a limited extent work against this regime, recognized as immoral and corrupt by a cooperation, outwardly appearing as such, to prevent the use of the expedients of this system, thereby saving innocent people from misery and death, as to grumbly retreat because of personal aversion and to watch inactively how this regime rages against humanity without restraint.

DEFENSE

Not everyone is of a violent nature, is a revolutionary, who would use force against the hated system and its executors. And do not forget, Your Honors, that at that time, under Hitler's autocratic regime only these two possibilities existed, to work really actively and positively against the Nazi regime and its terror. Under this regime no other possibilities existed to fight against a hated and accursed government, as this is the case in democratic free countries with free and independent selected parliaments. In Hitler Germany any form of active or even public opposition only meant a completely useless sacrifice. And therefore I beg you, Your Honors, in the judging of the matter and in answering my question, separate yourselves from the democratic conditions and circumstances which are so familiar to you, but which are completely incomparable with the German conditions under Hitler at that time. A fact, the non-consideration of which, already caused some disaster up to date. And did not the defendant v. Neurath save the freedom and lives of thousands of people whose freedom and lives would have been irretrievably lost without him, especially by accepting the office of the Reich protector and which he kept, despite the fact that he had to realize that he could not accomplish this task without being guilty himself, that he did not have at his service the necessary means for its accomplishment, but that he in spite of it continued his fight against the terror of the Nazi regime? Is this not worth a thousand times, is it not more, much more, moral and ethical than if he had retired right away, full of abhorrence and moral indignation?

I do not hesitate to answer this question in the affirmative, like my first question, and to express my conviction that no one can condemn me for this. Or shall a Sophoclean tragedy be unfolded before us, here in the fate of the defendant in which a man becomes guilty owing to no fault of his own, because he obeyed his conscience and his sense of responsibility?

Your Honors, I believe I have shown and proved in my preceding statements that not one of the actions of which the Prosecution accuse my client is criminal in the sense of the Charter and that not one of these actions by the defendant aimed intentionally at committing a crime in the sense of the Charter of this high tribunal, that, in other words there is no criminal action either objectively or subjectively. But I believe I have shown also, over and above this, that all my client's actions in their totality aimed at just the opposite of what the Prosecution imputes to them, namely, not the perpetration, but the prevention of just such actions as the Charter defines as punishable crimes, be they crimes of planning, preparation, or the waging of aggressive wars; be they war crimes or crimes against humanity.

But there still remains one thing for me to do. To draw the conclusion to all that, how impossible, how paradoxical even the principles of the conspiracy are with regard to my client. For the conspiracy has for its indispensable supposition, that each participant not only wants the criminal objective, but also that he upon entering into the conspiracy, by his participation, sanctions or will sanction from the start, the preparatory actions, or those in any way connected with it of the other members. But when, as the prosecution intentionally is doing, one regards this as evidence of approving the criminal objective and all preparatory actions for its achievement by each one of the other members in their official capacity—in international law proved alone by the fact of simply accepting or remaining in office in spite of knowing the criminal aims—and for this fact alone constitutes a criminal co-responsibility of each individual, the consequence inexorably follows with forceful logic, that the application of the principle of co-responsibility due to the acceptance of an office or of simply staying therein without any consideration as to the extent of his decent and ethical reasons, not only calls for motives and purposes for the punishment of the one, who disapproves these criminal intentions, plans and actions of the others, but even fights it actively and for this reason only accepted his appointment or remained in his position, as it was the case with the defendant v. Neurath.

I do not need to prove, My Lords, that such a result is contrary to any not only natural, but also legal sense and thought, that it is contrary to that which this high Tribunal has to strive for and is striving for, that it is contrary to any moral and ethical postulate. This Tribunal not only represents Justice, the legal and ethical conscience of all civilized nations on earth, but ought to show the way to universal Peace to the coming generations. But only then can this task be fulfilled, when you show mankind once more that any generalization, any leveling, any treatment, including judgment and conviction of people and of their activities based on corporative, I should like to say, even gregarious concepts and not on the personality, the will, and the designs of the individual, is of evil. Such treatment denies the holiness of the individual and is bound to lead to the adoration of mere Might. And such adoration of Might, such belief in Might has actually been the deep cause of the terrible events which once more have been unrolled here. You can only then do justice to your double task—to punish there where chastisement should be applied according to divine and humane law, and at the same time to show Mankind the way to international Peace—if by your sentence you take away from Mankind the belief in Might and give back, instead of this belief, to all nations on earth and, not in the last, to the German nation, the belief in and the respect to the holiness of the individual, which the Lord once created in his image. Convinced by the truth of such knowledge, I now place with confidence the fate of my client, the defendant Baron von Neurath, in your hands.

DEFENSE

2. FINAL PLEA by Constantin von Neurath

Firm in the conviction that truth and justice will prevail before this High Tribunal over all hatred, slander, and misrepresentation, I believe that I should add only this one thing to the words of my defense counsel: My life was consecrated to truth and honor, to the maintenance of peace and the attainment of understanding among peoples, to humanity and justice. I stand with a clear conscience not only before myself but before history and the German people.

Nevertheless, if the verdict of this Tribunal should be guilty, I shall be able to bear even this and shall take it upon myself as a last sacrifice on behalf of my people, whom it was the meaning and substance of my entire being to serve.

XXIII. HANS FRITZSCHE

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Heinz Fritz, Defense Counsel

Mr. President—Your Honors!

The result of the evidence in the case of Fritzsche is a relatively clear one. Although I am one of the last to plead it cannot be avoided to go into legal problems more closely. Above all these problems arise from the fact that Fritzsche was characterized by the Prosecution in a particularly striking manner as an accomplice.

However, at first I must examine what position Fritzsche had in the Propaganda Ministry and what part he played in the German propaganda in general. It is these facts which ought to be conclusive in determining what he supposedly played in the alleged conspiracy.

At the beginning of the trial Mr. Albrecht submitted as evidence the organizational structure of the government of the Third Reich as of March 1945 in the form of a diagram. Mr. Albrecht admitted himself that Fritzsche's name did not appear in it in the position of one of the main leaders of the Propaganda Ministry. It is true, he added, that his importance had been greater than one would be led to think from his position as shown on this diagram. He closed his statements by saying that evidence to this effect would be submitted to the Tribunal.

Has this been done and could the hearing of evidence really prove that Fritzsche had greater importance?

At the session of 28 February 1946 Sir David Maxwell-Fyfe introduced as evidence a "compilation of the elements of guilt" which in a particularly impressive manner demonstrates in how far the individual defendants are connected with the facts of which they are to be guilty in the opinion of the prosecution. The classification of the individual defendants follows from the table which is attached to this compilation as appendix A. The Tribunal will have noticed that the defendant Fritzsche is the only one not to appear on this table at all. From this follows that he does not belong to any of the organizations which are to be declared criminal here.

A look at the organizational plan of the Propaganda Ministry which was submitted in Brief E by the Prosecution also shows especially clearly that even in his last position as ministerial director and chief of the broadcasting division he was only one of 12 officials of the same rank. Such a position in itself excludes a priori the assumption that he could have determined the principles of policy, the principles of news presentation, and the principles of what may or may not become known to Germany and the world. It is true Captain Sprecher pointed out—evidently in order to raise Fritzsche's importance—that the chief of the German press division held a "unique" position, but he did not pass over the fact in silence that he had predecessors and successors in this allegedly unique office.

When in November 1942 Fritzsche was appointed by Goebbels as chief of the broadcasting division, he did not obtain a higher position in the civil service hierarchy as a result of it. His activity was purely administrative. It concerned technical-organizational questions. In his affidavit of 7 January 1946 my client describes the administrative work connected with it, he also mentions his numerous predecessors. Did it occur to anybody to indict also these persons as major war criminals or to call them supreme commanders of a propaganda instrument? Since this is not the case, the conclusion must probably be drawn that it was not Fritzsche's official position which formed the basis for the indictment.

DEFENSE

Justice Jackson, too, pointed out that within the framework of the organizations under indictment here, not all administrative civil service employees and division chiefs or state officials have been included as a whole; only the Reich Cabinet was named. Therefore, it can also not be imputed to Fritzsche—as is allegedly possible in the case of the members of the organizations—that from his position alone and the close connection of the individual members of the organizations it follows that they must have known and been completely clear about the plans of the alleged conspiracy by virtue of their membership alone.

During Fritzsche's cross-examination an attempt was also made by the Russian prosecution to magnify Fritzsche's position. It introduced three protocols as evidence, namely the interrogations of the witnesses Schoerner, Foss, and Stahel. However, these documents did not produce any supporting evidence. It is true that these depositions were only used to hold isolated passages from them against the defendant. Because of this limitation I could forego the cross-examination of the three persons who signed these protocols. But Fritzsche did not fail to express his opinion on those passages which were held up to him while he was being questioned on the witness stand. In this connection I have to point to only one more thing: These three persons did not even claim to have had any insight into the internal organization of the Propaganda Ministry. None of the three depositions contains any definite statement by Fritzsche. On the contrary, these depositions contain mere judgments, judgments which we do not want to know from witnesses, especially not in a case where they cannot furnish any kind of substantiated facts. For this reason alone their value as evidence must be denied. But aside from that aspect, they represent completely wrong judgments. They can by no means be derived from Fritzsche's own statements which were submitted in this trial by the Prosecution—namely from his radio addresses.

If evidence against the defendant Fritzsche bearing out these mere judgments could have been submitted, then, in view of the fact that the Prosecution could have obtained all of his radio addresses, it would have been more to the point to submit here those statements made by him which would have enabled the Tribunal to form its own judgment. The transcripts of the interrogations only contain the shortly summarizing statement that Fritzsche was Goebbels' "deputy." I confronted the witness von Schirmeister with this assertion and he termed it as pure nonsense. Fritzsche had to say the same on the witness stand. There can be no doubt that the concurring testimony of both witnesses is correct. Finally, there are still hundreds of others who formerly worked in this ministry who could verify the truthfulness of these statements with their own knowledge.

I can state therefore that the attempt at enlarging Fritzsche's position—contrary to the facts given in the organizational chart of the Propaganda Ministry as submitted by Mr. Albrecht—is a complete failure.

Beyond that, the hearing of evidence has shown that Fritzsche was not the creator of the great control apparatus for the German press, as was furthermore claimed by the Prosecution. On the contrary, it was Dr. Goebbels and others of his associates. Fritzsche could not have been the creator because of the time element alone.

In the first place, he had been a regular employee for years, he then became a consultant (Referent) and it was only since the winter of 1938-39 that he was one of the twelve division chiefs of the Ministry. When he became chief of the German press division, the policy of the press was set by Reich Press Chief Dr. Dietrich. As has been said already, he became chief of the broadcasting division only in November 1942 and could not create anything fundamentally new there. Neither Goebbels nor Dietrich ever allowed the control of the German press and radio to be taken out of their hands. With regard to the details I want to refer to the testimony of the witness von Schirmeister.

The fact that Fritzsche could have been neither the creator of the press division nor a leader of the German propaganda as far as it emanated officially from the Ministry is also shown by the other numerous statements both by Fritzsche, when questioned about it on the witness stand, and by the witness von Schirmeister.

During his entire activity, Fritzsche actually never possessed any authority to give orders in these fields, and could not have had it owing to his rank in civil service, which would justify his being called the creator or leader of the press and radio in the Third Reich. On the contrary, between Dr. Goebbels, Dr. Dietrich, and him there were quite a number of other higher intermediary posts. In this connection I can also refer to what Lieutenant Meltzer stated in general about the importance of a state secretary in the Reich Propaganda Ministry and a Reich Press Chief when he referred to an affidavit by Amann of 19 December 1945: He pointed out that the holders of these positions exercised complete control over the news service in Germany. Fritzsche never held any of these positions. Incidentally, the Propaganda Ministry did not have only one, but three state secretaries. Besides, Dr. Goebbels had surrounded himself with a Ministry Staff (Ministeramt). I believe it is appropriate to point here to this low rank because the Prosecution thought, as it did in other cases, for instance in the case of the defendant Goering, to be able to conclude a special responsibility from a high rank, i.e., from a defendant's external position alone. Therefore, one can by no means start from the assumption that Fritzsche exerted any decisive influence upon propaganda in general and upon the policies which were pursued by the press and radio.

The tasks which Fritzsche accomplished on the technical side of the news system involved him only as a journalist and expert. They had nothing to do with the contents of the propaganda which was pursued by the state leadership. In this respect, too, he was only a person who carried out directives. It is true that he set up the technical organization of the journalist news offices. He thereby modernized and perfected them. It is also true that this news system played an important part later in the war. In that respect Fritzsche's work extended only over the period from 1933 to 1938. But it is a fact that in those years he did not have the least influence upon the contents and political trend of the news, particularly in view of the fact that he was a mere employee at that time.

I make these references to Fritzsche's official position within the Propaganda Ministry also for another reason. In admitting what he did and said and wanting to assume full responsibility for it—Fritzsche had an opportunity to explain in detail the cause for and contents of all the excerpts from his radio addresses submitted to him—he cannot, on the other hand, answer for theses which were championed by other offices of the state propaganda apparatus—also for those in his own Ministry. All the less can he answer for the unorganized propaganda of the party. Fritzsche described the various controlled and uncontrolled kinds of propaganda of the Third Reich and pointed out their effects. May I remind the Tribunal that the witness von Schirmeister testified to the effect that even Goebbels could not do anything with the "party doctrines" and the "myth" in the field of propaganda. According to the witness, Goebbels did not regard them as things with which to lure the masses. When the defendant Speer mentioned the secret agitation about the miracle weapons, he could point to other sources of unorganized party propaganda. For all that, Fritzsche does not bear any responsibility. His official position was not influential enough to be able to fight effectively against all faulty conditions and abuses. Therefore, his repeated attempt to have the "Stuermer" prohibited—he considered this paper an excellent means of anti-German propaganda—remained without success. The party propaganda with all its practical consequences played a much more important part than that which Fritzsche with his comparatively limited functions could ever have played. I recall the fact, that according to Fritzsche's testimony, even Dr. Goebbels was afraid of Bormann. This was explained by the portentous sentence according to which, it was not the state which had to give orders to the party, but inversely the party to the state.

The hearing of evidence—especially the examination of the witness von Schirmeister—has thus shown without any doubt that the decisive directives for the propaganda of the third Reich came from other agencies. Goebbels, with regard to whom Fritzsche kept his distance personally, did not allow any of the subordinate officials in his ministry to interfere with his plans. It has been seen that he carried out his plans with the authority of his position, with the adroitness of his arguments, which the world knows, and if necessary by means of fraud. The leadership of the German press policy—let us consider only this narrow sphere—was and remained in the hands of Dr. Goebbels and Dr. Dietrich. The same thing happened with the radio as the witness von Schirmeister has stated, when Fritzsche took over its direction in November 1942. Dr. Goebbels, one of the oldest and closest of Hitler's collaborators, and Dr. Dietrich, Hitler's permanent escort—during the war he was present almost uninterruptedly in his headquarters—never allowed the leadership of the press and radio to be taken out of their hands, especially by a man, who like Fritzsche, had no connections of any kind to Hitler, and had not even had a single conference with him. Ultimately, Hitler's will was decisive here, too.

We have furthermore heard, what influence—it is of no importance here whether it was due to Hitler, Goebbels, or Dietrich—other governmental agencies too successfully exercised on the press and radio. Here, I will mention the Foreign Office, the High Command of the Wehrmacht, and other ministries, the heads of which were much more closely connected with the three aforementioned personages than for instance Fritzsche.

In order to avoid a misunderstanding I would like to point out that the assertion of the indictment that Fritzsche was closely connected with the party propaganda apparatus, e.g., with the so-called Reich Press Agency of the NSDAP has been expressively withdrawn by the Prosecution in the course of the trial. With this,

DEFENSE

I think that I have sufficiently established the limits of the defendant's responsibility. This definition shows the inaccuracy of the widely spread opinion that Fritzsche occupied a very important and influential position in the "gigantic propaganda apparatus" of the Third Reich. This limitation not only takes into account the legal but also the moral facts which have been clearly exposed by the production of evidence. Thus to a certain extent I have already taken stand against the reproach that Fritzsche was a member of the alleged conspiracy. The Prosecution has repeatedly tried to incorporate Fritzsche's work, at its different stages, in the alleged group of conspirators and has drawn from it conclusions which go so far as to say that Fritzsche was also responsible for war crimes, for crimes against humanity, and even for crimes against peace. Already in the arguments of the indictment these attempts seemed to have little relevant justification. It is certainly no improper criticism, if I declare here, that it caused the Prosecution a certain embarrassment to display Fritzsche's subordinate position as an official as so important and full of meaning. Today, now that the hearing of evidence is complete, it seems to me, that the attempts to include Fritzsche in the circle of conspirators has miscarried. Fritzsche cannot be found at any of the sessions at which Hitler discussed any plans or actions with the closer or wider circle of his collaborators. And apart from this, he never actually took part either in any discussions which might have been capable of plunging the world into a blood bath of wars of aggression. He was neither an "old party fighter" nor was he "decorated" later on with the golden party badge. He did not belong, as I had to emphasize especially, to any of the organizations which are to be declared here as criminal. Up to the end he fulfilled the functions of an official in a ministry and received directives like any other official. He could never be a political advisor.

In view of the circumstances the bridge between him and the alleged conspiracy could have been spanned only by the person of Dr. Goebbels. The witness von Schirmeister has repudiated such an assumption. According to his testimony, Fritzsche did not even belong to the closer circle around Dr. Goebbels. Indeed, von Schirmeister could even state that Fritzsche often had to apply to him, because he could not get Dr. Goebbels' opinion on any question other than through him, as he was Dr. Goebbels' personal press assistant. The relations through the state secretaries—e.g., Dr. Dietrich, Dr. Naumann, to mention only a few—also involved certain difficulties. That is not the method by which conspirators usually communicate.

Moreover, the witness von Schirmeister has said that it was out of question that Fritzsche could ever have embarked on an exchange of ideas with Dr. Goebbels with a view to forming plans. Now, it would have been the task of the Prosecution to prove to the defendant Fritzsche, where his participation in the conspiracy can be seen. I say that one cannot consider any count of the indictment as proved.

I think that it was not Fritzsche's official positions at all which led to the bringing of an indictment against him. I rather assume that the latter is solely to be traced back to his broadcast speeches, which made him and his name known—but only during the war—both in Germany and perhaps also in a part of the rest of the world. All the serious charges levelled against him lead back therefore only to these addresses. The other assertions concerning his position within the state or party apparatus are only based on assumptions or combinations without any factual basis, as appears for example especially clearly from the purely personal and refuted judgments of Schoerner, Foss, and Strahel. But his name has only become so well known, because of the technical means he utilized. Only the great significance of the radio for the modern transmission of news made him appear in a special light. But because of this, it shall not be argued that he thus had a great influence on the German people. Out of our own experiences of Nazi-ruled Germany, I can well say, that every Gau orator, many a district leader (Kreisleiter) used a much more far-reaching language. But, as a rule, the speeches of the latter were only published by the local press.

With respect to these addresses, the defense was handicapped so far as they could not be made available with their entire wording. Unfortunately, the excerpts quoted during the cross-examination by the Russian prosecution could not be complemented either by the entire text of the respective speech. Thus, all possibility disappeared of reproducing the sense the respective address had at the time it was delivered. Later on, I will come back to this and give an example of it. The method of submitting only individual passages or quotations to the Tribunal is here especially inadequate because it is impossible to see from it, that in his speeches Fritzsche always put the events of the day in the foreground. It was only rarely and incidental that he drew any general ideological conclusions. But already from what Fritzsche has stated with regard to those of his discourses, which the Prosecution was able to produce in their entire text, there results a completely different picture as to the cause and motives of his broadcast speeches. From 1932—thus already before the seizure of power by National-Socialism—up to 1939 the latter were nothing but a political press review. And that is what they were called! Accordingly, they were a collection of quotations from domestic and foreign newspapers.

DEFENSE

Fritzsche does not dispute the fact that these collections aimed at promoting the interests of the National-Socialist state. Only during the war—but right till the end still based on quotations even from the foreign press—these speeches became the platform for the polemical controversy which during the war was carried on on both sides. Without any doubt they did greatly contribute toward the formation of political opinion in Germany, but there is also no doubt that many people in Germany listened to Fritzsche's speeches not for their polemics but in order to learn from his quotations something about the opinions expressed abroad. For years these speeches were chiefly private work carried out alongside his official position. Only during the war they came to be considered as semi-official because of their increasing political news value. Thus they assumed—in order to make it clearer—approximately the character of editorials of a newspaper, which—as one used to say—stands close to the government. It would have been easy for the defense to submit to the Tribunal tomes of newspapers dating from the same time, the editorials of which showed the same trend, and even, as it can be asserted here with all force, used quite a bit more violent language.

Fritzsche could most definitely—and in my opinion quite rightfully—repudiate the fact that these addresses constituted an incitement to race hatred, to murder or violence, to hatred among nations or to wars of aggression. If such an effect could really have been produced by these speeches, absolutely the same reproach should fall upon any editor of the Third Reich, who received the “slogans of the day” from the Reich press chief. The accusation seems to be levelled against Fritzsche before this Tribunal only because through a technical means he could be heard at a wide range. But it is due to the war—and only since 1939 did his speeches gain a political news value at all—and in the nature of the thing, that the polemist becomes himself the subject of polemics. Especially the one whose influence, considered from the standpoint of political news value, extended farther technically than the influence of an article in a local paper. Only in this manner his name became better known to outsiders than names of people who were much more powerful than the publicist.

How far the Prosecution went in its accusations against Fritzsche in his capacity of a publicist is shown by the fact that not only is he supposed to have belonged to the plotting group of conspirators, but that he is also accused of crimes against peace. If a propagandist is subjected to such an accusation, there arises immediately the question of whether public radio speeches would not be the least proper means for carrying through criminal aims of a secret conspiracy. Speeches, which can be heard all over the world, could at the best be suited for camouflaging such aims and for misleading the world. But actually, just the opposite reproach is levelled against Fritzsche. He is supposed to have incited other people.

Thus one may consider that the nature and character of these speeches is sufficiently characterized. Their importance had to be brought in proper relationship to the far reaching conclusion of the Prosecution.

Before going into the details of the accusation which states that Fritzsche by radio speeches or by other means contributed toward the various wars of aggression, it is necessary in a case where accusations to that effect, pertaining to criminal and international law, are raised against a publicist to deal with a legal problem.

At no point—as far as I can see—did the Prosecution consider the question of whether and to what extent propaganda, i.e., the attempt to influence minds, especially during war is subjected to the rules of international law. Perhaps this problem did not come up for discussion because this question, once it is asked, would have had to be definitely denied. However, while the indictment speaks of the “gigantic propaganda apparatus” during Hitler’s dictatorship, which was created as a consequence of the supervision and control of any cultural activity, it does not draw from it any conclusions for a judgment according to international law. For, as a matter of fact no generally or specially valid rules concerning this field have ever been established; also no sort of common law could develop here. In this connection it is interesting that in the textbooks of international law, no attention is paid at all—as far as I could find out—to this problem. Nevertheless, a certain number of textbooks, especially those with a tint of natural law, contain regularly in their catalogs of fundamental international law also a section concerning national honor or national dignity. From the equality of nations and their living together in a community governed by international law the requirement is deduced in these chapters that they have to treat each other with respect. Accordingly it is furthermore requested that insults directed by private persons from their own sphere of influence against other countries be prevented, and such excesses be punished when committed. But this idea found its positive legal expression only in a series of national criminal codes which subject to punishment — naturally in peace times only — the insulting of foreign chiefs of state for instance. Another doctrine which is based less upon natural law holds that it is not a question of legal obligation but one of international courtesy only. Be it as it is, and in some form precisely defined international law does not exist, not even for peace times. Especially not as far as private propaganda through press and literature is concerned. And now: As to war, any directive covering this point is lacking, as already mentioned. According to the prevailing international law there is no limit to propaganda against foreign countries in war. Accordingly there is only one limit to this propaganda, namely the great limit which governs all the rules of warfare, that everything is permitted and only that quod ad finem belli necessarium est.

DEFENSE

In view of the tremendous importance of moral influence upon the will of individuals and nations, it is beyond doubt that propaganda can be an important and in certain cases even decisive means of war. Of no lesser importance than for instance economic warfare or even the fight with weapons. Propaganda has here a double task: First, to serve as a means for increasing the power of resistance of the own nation and secondly to undermine the fighting powers of the opponent. This influence—rosy coloring on one side, slandering on the other, concealment of fact, etc.—is in its character nothing else than a stratagem which, within the framework of the rules of land warfare, has been expressly declared as permissible instrument of warfare according to article 24 of the Hague rules of land warfare. In order to continue this line of thought, it may be pointed out that spying—also a form of war stratagem—has equally been declared as permissible instrument of warfare by the Hague rules of land warfare.

What has been said here is in complete accordance with what is practiced by the countries; defamation of the opponent and its statesmen, making him contemptible, falsifying the motives and intentions of the enemy, defamatory presentation, assertion of unproved statements, all this belongs unfortunately to those means of propaganda which are used on all sides and at an increasing rate during a war.

Small attempts but only for the purpose of preventing war are known from the time before the first world war. At that time they pursued an even further reaching aim, namely to contribute in general to the understanding among nations by means of a general moral and spiritual disarmament. (Desarmement moral.)

However this goal was not reached before the first world catastrophe of this country.

After 1918 though, as a reaction after the great armed conflicts, it received a stronger impulse and became known to the world through the tasks imposed upon the League of Nations in this respect. This was indeed the first real attempt to start an intellectual disarmament. At the 5th session of the League of Nations in 1925 in Paris it was decided to found an institute for intellectual cooperation (cooperation intellectuelle). Further investigations which lasted for years resulted in numerous propositions, in the establishment of general committees and sub-committees of experts, with an incalculable wealth of documents. But nevertheless none of these great efforts led the idealistic impulse and the longing of the nations for a "moral disarmament" and for intellectual cooperation to a sober and concrete legislation which would have imposed legal obligations on the individual states as well as on their nationals. No results were achieved in advising a way in which to prevent during war, hatred, incitement, distortion of facts, and provocation of other nations or of the nationals of other countries in all the possible modern forms of expression. Even such well-defined and comprehensive propositions for a moral intellectual disarmament as those presented by the Polish Government to the League of Nations in two memoranda of 17 September 1931 and 13 February 1932 had the same fate. These propositions aimed at using national legislation to prohibit any propaganda, so far as it might become dangerous for peace; and even any propaganda which aimed at a mere disturbance of the good relations between nations. Influence was to be exerted not only upon the big public news media but also upon the vast ramifications in the administration of any modern state including even the revision of schoolbooks. These propositions which advised member states not to recoil even from censorship and measures of prohibition finally failed because of the paradox existing at that time: These propositions were confronted with the deeply-rooted conception that liberty of expression of opinion in moral matters could not be touched by means of such exceptionally far-reaching police measures; this freedom of expression was to be preserved as an "unalienable right" granted by the Creator. And the matter stopped there with this opposition of fundamental principles: We have had here in the courtroom a special demonstration of what censorship and control of the press, radio, and films could lead to.

The few bilateral agreements which were concluded after the failure of the Polish propositions of 1931 and 1932 are not worth mentioning here. They restricted themselves solely to certain sectors of propaganda methods, and only for the duration of good-neighbor relations.

DEFENSE .

Therefore we can only express the hope that on the basis of international solidarity it will be possible in the future to unite these still contrary theses on a higher level.

In this trial a secret order was produced which had been issued by the High Command of the Wehrmacht on 1 October 1938. The latter in its section for international law had a chart drawn up for the case of an armed conflict. On this chart one was to look up the principles for meeting any possible violation of the rules of warfare by friend and foe. Knowing the legal vacuum in the field of propaganda in its broadest sense it is stated there that from the point of view of international law it is absolutely permissible to render the opponent contemptible and to try to undermine his strength "regardless of how many lies and falsehoods are used for this purpose" and that even from the legal standpoint a rule could be established for the future to the effect that in case the enemy should employ such propaganda, defense by means of "counter attacks" is legally possible, whereby "naturally the propagation of atrocity lies" must be used. This may sound cynical and brutal. But unfortunately it fitted in with the customs of war, or rather: This undisguised statement originated in the actual legal lacunae existing in international agreements and in common law. Dr. Kranzbuehler rightfully stated here: In war there is no duty to tell the truth.

Due to the period of time elapsed since the first world war and its propaganda methods on both sides we are permitted to-day to consider the happenings of these days as belonging to history. At that time, too, all belligerents reached the point where they tried to undermine the opponent through the means of propaganda. The legend of children's hands cut off by German soldiers — a war lie, as Arthur Pensenby proved in his book "Falsehood in War-Time" showed up in a French schoolbook even in the midst of peace, namely 10 years after the first world war. Publications of all belligerent countries, drawings and cartoons, dating from the time of the first world war can be found in abundance in all libraries. Many still remember to-day the film which showed terrible atrocities and was named: "The Knights of the Apocalypse." A motion picture which circulated almost throughout the entire world at the time of the first world war. And unfortunately the matter remained legally unsettled until to-day. Is it possible to include retroactively the case of the defendant Fritzsche, in his capacity of publicist in the Nazi state, into a new international law, the creation of which is also one of the goals striven for by Mr. Justice Jackson in this Trial? Can the desire of the Prosecution to see Fritzsche punished as a war criminal be based upon the assertion of a logical development of existing laws when up to now, nothing, but absolutely nothing has been regulated juridically and legally in the field of propaganda and no fertile beginnings of any kind appeared in this direction? The question here is certainly not that of an only apparent legal loophole.

What has been said does, of course, not include those cases in which individual crimes were actually incited by means of propaganda. Therefore, I shall now go into the individual accusations of the Prosecution in order to show that Fritzsche is not guilty of having committed such acts.

As far as the alleged crimes against peace are concerned, the Prosecution starts from the point that any important political and military attack on the part of the German state leadership was preceded by a press campaign. Therefore, the Nazi conspirators for that reason would have had used the press also as an instrument of foreign policy and as a feint to cover subsequent aggressive actions. From that general, perhaps even correct description of such intentions, the far-reaching conclusion is drawn that Fritzsche may also be co-responsible for those matters. Such responsibility would be based only on the time factor that he was in December 1938 to the spring of 1942 the leader of the "German Press division" within the official Ministry of Propaganda. But such inference lacks foundation. It could have been justified only if a proof had been found that Fritzsche really was the creator and inspirer of all those press campaigns. But Fritzsche, if only due to his subordinate position, subordinate not only in regard to the departmental organization but also in relation to the real leaders of propaganda—Hitler, Goebbels, Dietrich, and others—could have known only what his superior presented to him, as to other employees, as historical truth. I am reminded of the fact, that all witnesses, whenever testifying to influence of the foreign policy of the press, always pointed out, that before any political and especially before military actions, the Foreign Office justified the measures taken in the field of high politics before the public by the issue of White Books. Just as in the case of other intentions or goals of the highest leaders of the Third Reich, the press was informed also in these instances only what the public was permitted to learn, while matters not destined for publication were kept secret.

After hearing the evidence, what indeed was the relation between the propaganda furnished by Fritzsche and the various military invasions? What could he have known of their background?

DEFENSE

On the occasion of the occupation of Bohemia and Moravia instructions by the chief of the Reich press were given to him only a short time before the decisive step of 15 March 1939. They consisted as in all other cases in so-called "Daily Directives" given out at press conferences. Such daily directives found their expression in the headlines of German papers. It may be mentioned here, that the best known organ of the party, namely the "Voelkischer Beobachter" due to indirect connection with the chief of the Reich press—and, during the war, with the headquarters of the Fuehrer—has been more independent of such slogans of the day since it had a foreign news service of its own. What was printed in the "Voelkische Beobachter" does, therefore, not represent what had been approved by Fritzsche as leader of the German press. Fritzsche had already—and that attitude is of great importance in regard to all his activities—established the principle for his press information that untrue news should never be given to the press. The apparent reason for that was the fact that his predecessor in the "German Press" division, Berndt, had all kinds of news spread during the Sudeten crisis, losing thereby the confidence of the leading German writers. Fritzsche on the witness stand as well as the witness von Schirmeister gave details about these matters.

It is not apparent in what respect Fritzsche played a greater part than any other officials or officers when the German troops marched into Czechoslovakia. Whatever has been disclosed in this trial about Hitler's hidden intentions of those days was as little known to Fritzsche as the plan "Fall Gruen" could have been known to him. As head of the inland press, he could not have had any influence on the propaganda possibilities which were to be made use of within Czechoslovakia proper.

The same is true of the Polish campaign: Here, too, Fritzsche did in no way express himself for any armed conflict or spread purposely some information which might have supported any bellicose intentions. In his very radio broadcast of 29 August 1939, which was held against him during his cross-examination, he points out explicitly that there could not in fact exist any serious doubt about the German will for peace. Those and many other lines are particularly significant in proving Fritzsche's good faith. He gave expression to his and the German nation's disappointment that Hitler's repeated emphasis on his will for peace had proved to be a lie, even a fraud. If one examines in their full meaning the other broadcasts by Fritzsche shortly before and during the Polish campaign none of his statements could be interpreted as favoring that war of aggression. The official reasons given at that time convinced Fritzsche as well as millions of other Germans that Right was on their side. That Fritzsche had been sharing such conviction in times is proved by his admission, declared on the witness stand, that he also feels to have been deceived by Hitler.

It was no different in the case of Yugoslavia. Here likewise Fritzsche was able to learn only whatever facts were given to him and to other leading journalists by the chief of the Reich Press, which Fritzsche had no opportunity to verify if only for the speed at which those events were developing, if even the thought struck him at all that the press was utilized to provoke warlike measures.

The role of the press in the surprising attack on the Soviet Union was made particularly clear in this trial: Already for strategical reasons the total propaganda apparatus thus including Fritzsche as head of the Inland Press division had to be left in the dark. It was just that campaign, which Goebbels cleverly kept secret by simulating an intended German invasion of England. Goebbels consciously directed even his closest collaborators on that wrong track, as was stated here by the witness von Schirmeister.

Fritzsche's statement that he did not know anything about secret preparations through the formation of a so-called Eastern Ministry was not refuted by the so-called Rosenberg report which was read to him during the cross-examination (Rosenberg's undated draft of a report, Doc. 1039-PS). This is a document which due to the many names it contains, was used also in other connections. At the same time it is the only document, which includes the name of Fritzsche in connection with some secret plans. From that document, which was drafted by Rosenberg and some of his associates according to established facts some time around the 28th or 29th of June 1941—thus after the start of the campaign—no conclusion can be drawn that Rosenberg spoke with the defendant Fritzsche before the decisive date. The draft does not bear any date or signature. Besides, Fritzsche is mentioned in it by the title of "Ministerial Director" which he was given only in the fall of 1942. Fritzsche's statement on the witness stand has in no way been disproved namely that he never had been informed by Rosenberg either about an approaching war with the Soviet Union or about an intended formation of a Ministry for the East. Only after the beginning of that campaign and after the official announcement that a new ministry had been established the requests of Rosenberg were transmitted to him by his associates with regard to the presentation of Eastern problems in the German press.

DEFENSE

Thus Fritzsche's deposition still holds that in the case of the war against the Soviet Union, as well as in other instances, he had been informed only at the moment when he was given the pertinent news for publication. That would not imply, as should be admitted, that he played the role of a somehow scheming or at least informed conspirator. And it cannot be assumed that Fritzsche knew anything about the plans of the High Command of the Wehrmacht in June 1941, or even of the Bormann Protocol of 16 July 1941, both of which were read to him during his cross-examination. Those negotiations show that they could only have taken place in the innermost circle. In this respect the hearing of evidence, which did not concern Fritzsche directly, has shown that even military means of deception had been used to camouflage the plans. This has been stated by the witness Paulus and from the report of the German Military Intelligence Service. The nature of all these things was such that they could well be withheld from a newspaper man. Even the witness Gisevius, who was always engaged in finding out secret ends, had to admit what efforts were required even within the High Command of the Wehrmacht to obtain information as to whether Hitler was planning a war or not.

In conclusion I want to state, therefore, that the emphatic assertion of the Prosecution that Fritzsche was the accomplice of Goebbels in assisting him to hurl the world into a blood bath of wars of aggression is not justified. When I cross-examined Fritzsche he, on the other hand, pointed out: Whatever the facts may have been in the various instances, he and the German public at every moment from the advance into Austria to the invasion of Russia were given only such information as made the necessity of the German actions seem justified.

Now one could also conceive the charge of a crime against peace to be that Fritzsche constantly called on the German people to hold out during the carrying-out of a war of aggression. Naturally, he did not make any defeatist propaganda in the course of his radio speeches.

I must, therefore, discuss the question whether this or any sort of participation in a war of aggression, after the latter broke out, could be considered as participation in the crime against peace and could be punished accordingly.

The French Chief Prosecutor M. de Menthon tried to draw the conclusion—proceeding from a literal interpretation of article 6, paragraph 2a of the Charter, without regard for the real meaning of this article—that the soldiers and other representatives of the aggressor state could not undertake any military operations at all which could be justified by international law. He had to recognize openly, however, that in practice this idea must lead to impossible consequences. Thus, for example, he recognized the Hague Convention for the Rules of Land Warfare as a law which not only obligates aggressor and attacked alike, but also justifies them. He thereby let it be clearly recognized by implication that according to his idea this prescription of the Charter is to be interpreted restrictively.

In Article 6, paragraph 2a of the Charter the following are defined as crimes against peace: The plan, the preparation, the introduction, and, according to the German translation, the "carrying-out" of a war of aggression. "Execution" is the translation of the English word "waging." It could be translated more correctly by "undertaking." Undertaking now means in its natural sense about the same as "intend," whoever undertakes, pursues, intends something, has not executed it yet. The word "execute" could create the opinion that the crime against peace was not concluded with the outbreak of war and therefore could continue for the whole duration. The result of this conception would be that all the persons, who participated in the war operations, as for instance, the Army leaders, all members of the Armed Forces and beyond that all the persons who supported the war in any way—even by deliveries of war material and through broadcasted speeches—were to be punished according to this decision. They had at least contributed support to the waging of war. These persons could even then be criminals against the peace, if before the war they had in no way participated in the planning or preparation of it. Yes, even if they had no idea that an aggression was involved.

To counter this the following must be stated: Only those can be considered as the executors of a war of aggression who had planned it themselves. They just execute their common plan by starting the war, with or without a declaration of war. Thus "execution" ranges on the same level as beginning. The accusation of crime against peace can reach only those who also planned it.

This is supported by the following reasons:

Normally, penal law intends to protect the peace against wars of aggression, i.e., against unlawful wars. In the moment that such unlawful wars start—are "unleashed"—as the Indictment puts it—the rightful domain of peace has been violated, the crime against peace is consummated and accomplished. Therefore, no other meaning but "bring about" "proceed to execute the plan" can be attributed to the term "carry through," or "undertake," waging.

DEFENSE

This interpretation is also consonant with the historic development of the concept of "crime against the peace" international law. For many years, international law has made a distinction between "war crime," in the narrower sense, and "war guilt," in the wider sense. War crimes are offenses against established rules of the law governing warfare, established by agreement or force of custom; against war practices and, going further, also offenses against humanity. War guilt means being guilty of having brought about war, in particular an unlawful war of aggression.

This distinction found expression also during negotiations on the peace treaty after the first World War. A deposition of this is found in Article 227 ff of the Treaty of Versailles. There can be no doubt that the concept of crime against the peace in the meaning of the Charter is to be identical with this war guilt in the previous meaning of international law.

Paragraph 6 part 2a has to deal with the war criminals, that is to say those who bring about an illegal war.

The opinion that the further support of a criminally instigated war was likewise a crime against peace must lead to entirely untenable consequences. Thus hardly any citizen of a country, which had started a war of aggression would be guiltless. The war in its present form is, unlike any previous ones, no longer limited to fighting between the armies. It extended—as has been shown in both these World Wars—over all the belligerent nations and over all their vital interests. It grew into a total war. Total in this sense, that everybody takes part in it. The woman, who is making screws in the factory, is cooperating equally in this total war. And, as Professor Exner so vividly explained in his final pleading, in this war of aggression every arrestation would mean a deprivation of liberty, each requisition a robbery, and each shot a murder. It really would be absurd were all members of a nation to be made responsible as authors of crimes against the peace.

A classification as to the grade and kind of the contribution toward the war would moreover be practically impossible.

Crimes against peace therefore can only be committed by those who were collaborating in breaking the peace, whilst the bulk of the people, who had not participated in it, could not be counted in this category.

The point of view which has been developed here is, in my opinion, also represented in the Indictment. The latter considers the crime of breaking the peace realized by the "unleashing" (Entfesselung). In no place has it even been hinted that the crime itself or its continuation is seen in participation in war or in its support by production or supply of any kind. Also, according to the drawing up of the indictment from the period of time from the beginning of war onward, only crimes of the second and third group come into question, also war crimes in the more closely defined sense of international law, and crimes against humanity.

In my opinion Justice Jackson, in his opening speech of 21 November 1945 also took the point of view which has been advanced here, whereupon it was pointed out to him in the Session of 1 March 1946: Justice Biddle called his attention to the fact, that at that time he had indicated that the beginning of war was the character of the crime and NOT the engagement in war itself, i.e., in other words, that with the beginning of the war of aggression the crime against peace within the meaning of article 6, paragraph 2a of the Charter was completed (breach of peace).

From these statements it is to be concluded that any activity during the war which furthers the war cannot represent a criminal act, neither can the radio broadcasts of Fritzsche, which he made during the war.

The next group of accusations levelled against the defendant is for instance characterized by such terms as: incitement against Jews, incitement against foreign nations, incitement to exploit occupied territories, propaganda for the "master race."

On the witness stand Fritzsche made a declaration which represents a summary of the knowledge he gained after the collapse and above all here in the court. It ran as follows: An ideology in whose name five million people were murdered must not be permitted to survive this event. Now how far did Fritzsche make propaganda for this anti-Semitism? Was he able thereby to foresee this murder, did he approve of it or at least tolerate it? The Prosecution went very far in its assertions: It maintained that Streicher as "the chief Jew-baiter of all times" could hardly have surpassed Fritzsche in his defamation of Jews. Fritzsche defended himself against this accusation. And rightfully in my opinion. We see this quite clearly when we compare the slogans from the arsenal of anti-Semitism, which Sir Griffith-Jones read for hours in excerpts from the "Stuermer" at the session of 10 January 1946, with Fritzsche's statements submitted here by the Prosecution. Fritzsche—supported by the affidavit of Scharping dated 17 May 1946—was able to point out what he undertook against this paper. It must also be noted here that the language and arguments of the "Stuermer" found no echo in any German newspaper or at a single broadcasting station of the National-Socialist regime.

DEFENSE

Before the war Fritzsche carried on no anti-Semitic propaganda of any kind. All the statements submitted by the Prosecution originated during the war. They are, however, not directed against the Jews as a people or as a race, but are related only to the question of the origin of the war. They only mention occasional polemical introduction of the Jewish question in the propaganda battle which was fought in this war alongside the battle of arms. This explains the fact that the radio addresses submitted by the prosecution never contain more than casual remarks and never speak of the Jews by themselves. Each of his radio speeches may be examined to this effect. Nor does there exist a speech by him which would have dealt exclusively with the so-called "Jewish problem." He never talked on such a subject. Fritzsche always spoke simultaneously of "Plutocrats," "Bolshevists," "Democrats," and used other such phrases by means of which the propaganda of the Third Reich felt obliged to conduct its battle. During his cross-examination as witness he dealt in detail with each of the radio addresses submitted in the trial and discussed the reason he had each time for making merely incidental remarks on this subject. An examination of all his statements over the radio would show that of all the fundamental propaganda subjects of Nazi-ideology Fritzsche mentioned and advocated anti-Semitism least of all.

This takes all foundation from the conclusions of the Prosecution. For there cannot be any connection between such rare statements on the part of Fritzsche and the murder order given by Hitler. I therefore expressly protest against the accusation that Fritzsche be more guilty than those credulous men who carried out the shootings. In the course of this trial we have heard many testimonies as to what secret and ultra-secret means and methods were used by the really guilty ones to carry out this horrible murder. So many testimonies cannot be put aside as irrelevant and unreliable. Contrary to former assumptions this trial should have made it clear that there existed only a small group of instigators and initiates. It has not been proved in the least that a man like Fritzsche belonged to this closest circle of Hitler's despotism. The trial has even shown that he made the acquaintance of the majority of his co-defendants here in the dock only.

To draw such far-reaching conclusions against Fritzsche would necessarily lead to the assumption that everybody who took a public stand for anti-Semitism as such, if only with reservations, bore the same criminal guilt. The extent of moral guilt is much greater. It concerns us, however, only so far as the moral guilt is identical with the criminal guilt. And therefore there is no need to discuss here how far a mere error—even a political one—may at the same time become immoral. The accusation, however, of being co-responsible for these murders, was an especially deep blow to Fritzsche.

With regard to this it might be objected that although Fritzsche did not stand very closely to his chief Goebbels and to the other heads of the information control, he was yet one of those persons who had access to the foreign press and radio news. This is perhaps the reason why Fritzsche is accused of having had knowledge of almost everything that happened during Hitler's rule. Fritzsche was able to state in the witness stand and to quote too, a number of details, on the point that even with this opportunity his faith was not shaken in the questions which were decisive—perhaps also morally. This no more enabled him to realize actual happenings than his profession of journalist which gave him the opportunity to follow up rumors which were appearing, for himself. He could not break down by such means the wall which had been erected in front of the misdeeds. With regard to foreign reports on atrocities and other misdeeds Fritzsche as well as von Schirmeister and especially Dr. Scharping have stated that the examination by the office "Schnelldienst" (express news service) which was carried out in all cases, resulted time and again in official replies which eliminated doubts as to the inaccuracy of such statements from abroad. This office, the "Deutscher Schnell-dienst" (German express news service)—which had an entirely different significance from that claimed by the Prosecution—was a control agency created especially by Fritzsche in order to have foreign news tested as to the truth of its contents through inquiry at the competent German official agencies. If the defense had succeeded in submitting the records of this "Schnelldienst" to the Tribunal, documentary evidence could have been offered in every detail for the way in which German authorities answered inquiries of this kind.

For instance the RSHA knew in a masterly way how to make its replies sound credible. The foreign propaganda which had to serve a definite purpose could on the contrary lay no claim to any great power of persuasion. This all the more since enemy propaganda in war time also brought of course positively incorrect reports, of which fact Fritzsche was often able to convince himself.

DEFENSE

Furthermore Fritzsche has been accused of advocating the doctrine of the "Master Race."

The only statement by Fritzsche himself which the Prosecution submitted in regard to this point shows clearly that Fritzsche neither championed nor promoted such an idea, on the contrary, expressly rejected it. An examination of the quotation presented by the Prosecution does not leave any doubt about it. Beyond that the hearing of evidence (the witness von Schirmeister and the affidavit of Dr. Scharping) has shown that Fritzsche prohibited the use of the word "master race (Herrenrasse)" for press and radio altogether. Fritzsche himself under oath termed this assertion nonsensical. Therefore, after thorough examination of all obtainable speeches by Fritzsche I can only state that this charge is untrue. Nothing is changed in regard to this statement by the fact that Foss and Stahel judged differently without giving any concrete facts. I already dealt with the value of these documents as evidence.

Fritzsche allegedly stirred up hatred against foreign peoples. To prove this serious charge the Prosecution emphasized several excerpts from two of Fritzsche's radio addresses which were held on 5th and 10th July 1941. In order to be able to understand correctly the circumstances surrounding the speeches, one must take into consideration the dates on which they were held. They were made shortly after the attack on the Soviet Union. He is not charged with any further statements—made for instance at a later time or similar ones which might have shown some kind of system. When the passages cited by the Prosecution were supplemented by the full text of the speeches and by the examination of Fritzsche on the witness stand it was shown that Fritzsche did not slander the Soviet Union in them. Neither could what had led up to these speeches have given him any reason to stir up hatred against that country. They were held shortly after German sources and in particular war correspondents had reported atrocities in towns in Galicia which had been conquered by German troops. These were things which were reported everywhere in Germany—but also by foreign correspondents—in print, pictures, and motion pictures. In this respect there was an especially great volume of material and in his speeches Fritzsche expressly referred to it. Fritzsche's statements reflect the agitation of the German public over these reports and he pointed to those presumed to be guilty of the atrocities.

The facts as such were also confirmed by the Russians. The latter added, however, that not the Russians but the Germans were guilty of these actions. What happened was only that on the basis of undeniable facts a controversy had flared up as to the responsibility—just as happened later in the famous case of Katyn—in which both sides morally condemned the instigators.

In neither of those speeches, as an examination of their entire contents would reveal, Fritzsche designated entire nations as inferior or sub-human. Phrases about "Sub-humanity" referred only to those culprits whom in real indignation he pilloried as morally contemptible. He could believe the proofs presented by the Germans and therefore there is no reason to assume that at the time he held the speeches he could have predicted what actually happened in the East much later. Therefore there could not have existed any intention on his part to stir up his audience to engage in similar actions. It is impossible to establish any causative connection on the basis of two such words he had spoken once. The same is true of the excerpts from a speech of 29 August 1939, which General Rudenko read to him during his cross-examination. That broadcast also refers to atrocities committed shortly before the outbreak of the war in Bromberg and concerning which on the day of the speech—that being the reason for it—an official White Book had been published. The results of an investigation of those atrocities were summarized in it. Only the guilty ones were designated by Fritzsche as inferior human beings. But it is not justifiable to generalize this opinion to such an extent as though he had designated the entire Polish nation as inferior. Fritzsche considered the representation in the official White Book as correct. He could not have doubted the fact that Poles had killed Germans. However, no word in that speech allows for the conclusion to be drawn that he took the opportunity or even suggested that the Slavic nations be exterminated. The German people no more than Fritzsche could imagine anything like it at that time.

General Rudenko attempted in his cross-examination to prove that my client had made false statements. For that purpose an excerpt from his broadcast of 2 May 1940 was presented to him. In it Fritzsche gives a description of the towns, villages, and hamlets which he had visited shortly before, and which had remained undamaged by war. The Russian prosecutor pointed to the official report of the Norwegian government enumerating the damages caused by the war. Thus the impression was created that Fritzsche was lying to his audience. The full contents of that speech shows, however, that the quoted sentences regarding undamaged houses in Norway stand directly next to other sentences in which Fritzsche himself depicts the destruction caused by the fighting in Norway. The statement does not contain a lie if Fritzsche has reported in it that in other parts of the country he visited not the slightest trace of fighting was found. His description, therefore, is not in contradiction at all to the Norwegian Government report.

DEFENSE

At this place, I should like to insert a few remarks about the case of the "Athenia" and the part that Fritzsche played in this connection. This case shows to what extent Fritzsche was at pains not to retransmit reports until they were proved to be true and reliable. But it shows also how dependent Fritzsche was on the version of the official German offices. This supports his good faith, for the principle that official announcements are to be believed with absolute faith and which was naturally the reason for his conviction could not at that time be shaken.

That particular article in the "Voelkischer Beobachter" dated 23 October 1939 has been rightly described in this trial by all parties as contemptible. Now, Fritzsche also engaged in polemics on this point in sharp if not similar terms. I take the liberty of pointing out that such remarks could be morally condemned only if Fritzsche had known beforehand that it was actually a German submarine which sank the "Athenia." But as he has testified under oath, this fact first became known to Fritzsche here in Nurnberg in December 1945. Before that, he was precisely the person from whom this decisive circumstance was withheld, although he had, through the naval liaison officer, undertaken investigations at the Naval Supreme Headquarters and other official headquarters concerning statements by foreign reports. To support the charge that Fritzsche instigated the ruthless pillage of the occupied territories, the only evidence submitted is a statement made on the 9 October 1941. In this, a passage from a public speech made by Hitler a few days before is reproduced. I have been at great pains to find an instigation to ruthless pillage of occupied territories in this quotation as well as in the remarks made by Fritzsche about it in his radio address. It is inexplicable to me how any sentence can possibly convey anything to this effect. I can only assume that it is a case of a misunderstanding and leave it for the Tribunal to judge.

In no other connection has Fritzsche spoken a word or given a hint to this effect and, least of all, openly called for such a thing. Moreover, it is to be gathered from Dr. Scharping's affidavit dated 17 May 1946 that the use of any kind of coercive means against other nations would have run counter to the purpose of his whole work, including his work within the Propaganda Ministry, namely to gain the voluntary cooperation of the European populations. It has also not been proved that Fritzsche knew really more about the manner in which foreign workers were actually recruited. I would point out that the defendant Sauckel stated he had only one brief and unofficial talk with Fritzsche and that in the beginning of 1945. In his Affidavit Fritzsche gave further the exhaustive details also on the fact that he obtained extensive material from the competent authorities for notification to the German public, in which the free will basis upon which men were being recruited for employment in Germany was continually pointed out. It is inadmissible that information concerning this was given to the Ministry of Propaganda other than that given by Sauckel in his report to Hitler.

Moreover nothing has proved that Fritzsche approved or used for propaganda purposes the violations of international law, already committed or intended, such as the so-called Commissioner's Decree, or the Lynch Law against enemy aviators, who had been brought down. As regards the Commissioner's Decree, the Russian Prosecution charged the defendant that as a soldier, as a member of the 6th Army, he took cognizance of this decree. This has been confirmed by Fritzsche. He could, however, point out that his attitude had not only been passive. He even, as will have to be confirmed, took a successful stand against this by way of proposals to his Commander-in-Chief, witness Paulus. General Rudenko's charge, that in spite of this he remained in Hitler's service, although he should at least have assumed that Hitler was the author of such an order contrary to international law, is not a reason for accusing Fritzsche as a propagandist or even morally as a man. My Lord Justices! If such an accusation with a criminal legal foundation could be made, it would rest upon every German soldier who fought on for his Fatherland in the East after the autumn of 1942.

Fritzsche also protested against the fact that Allied fliers were treated contrary to International Law. When he learned this, he spontaneously refused any propagandist activity for Goebbels in this sphere. These facts have been ascertained through his thorough examination on this subject and through Dr. Scharping's Affidavit.

Furthermore, no charges can be made from what he said about the use of new weapons and the "were-wolf" movement in his radio speeches, with which he has been charged by the Russian prosecution.

I can be spared mentioning particulars in this connection, because Fritzsche could testify in detail. The speech of 7 April 1945, with which he is reproached, does not in the least glorify forms of warfare contrary to the international laws. It rather attempted to find a psychological reason or excuse for the active participation of civilians in the fighting toward the end of the war by referring to the suffering of the German people through the effective air activity of the Allies.

DEFENSE

I must only reply to one point of the evidence:

General Rudenko submitted to Fritzsche a short document at the end of his cross-examination. It is the question of a copy of a short message, signed by Fritzsche, of 19 October 1944 addressed to Major von Passavant a wireless expert of the Propaganda Branch of the OKW. The Russian prosecution wishes to conclude from the contents of this communication, that Fritzsche had committed himself in the preparation and execution of some kind of "biological war." Since a conclusion cannot possibly be drawn from the contents, it is merely a covering message of five lines referring to the transmission of a letter of a radio listener to another department. Fritzsche's department received daily whole bunches of letters from unknown radio listeners. A subordinated official looked through such letters, of which hundreds arrived daily, and directed them wherever they would perhaps receive special consideration. Nothing different happened with the letter of the radio-listener Gustav Otto from Reichenberg, which apparently contained a suggestion to carry out "biological warfare." Although Fritzsche signed the transmitting letter composed by the subordinate official in his capacity of Department Director, he naturally did not know anything about the contents of the listener's letter. With the large number of daily communications from listeners it was completely impossible for him to read them. This listener's letter, in any case did not find any special attention in the Broadcasting Department. The copy of the transmitting letter, as can be seen from pencil notes made thereon, was also immediately put away. How can anything unfavorable be deduced against the defendant Fritzsche from this evidence? Especially since it is completely unknown what the likewise unknown listener meant by a "biological war."

Finally I have yet to point out the following: General Rudenko has read the document on the occasion of the cross-examination, and that from a Russian text. The German text, which appears in this form in the German Transcript on page 12315, and the English text, which appears in this manner on page 12606 in the English Record, differ in content considerably from the German original text.

If notwithstanding the insufficiency of this document—the meaning of which could in any case be clarified only by the "inclosures" which are lacking—the Prosecution believes it deserves consideration, the first requirement would be to have completely exact translations made from the German original text.

In concluding my estimation of evidence I wish to say: None of the documents brought up during the cross-examination of the defendant Fritzsche could modify the impression which he gave us during direct examination: To have spoken before this Tribunal in sincerity and truthfully: and that because of his own endeavor also to make by himself every possible contribution, so that an actual foundation for a proper judgment may be found. And going even further, all the statements made by Fritzsche were supported in all decisive points by the documents which I submitted, and particularly through the testimony of the witness von Schirmeister. The latter, who during the most meaningful period of 1938 to 1943 was the daily companion of Goebbels, was able to report directly and, I dare say, in an observing way, on the actual relations within the Ministry of Propaganda. The result of the evidence—I may repeat here what I expressed in the introduction—was unequivocal for my client. Contrary to the announcement made by Mr. Albrecht at the beginning of my final pleading, nothing during the proceedings could add to the contention that Fritzsche's importance in reality was greater than that diagram of the Propaganda Ministry showed.

The discussion of the bare facts alone ought to have made clear that Fritzsche can in particular bear no responsibility for what is, as far as it can be judged from afar, the actual part that may have been played by the extensive apparatus of the whole Third Reich propaganda in the plans and in the hands of a small initiated circle. If the restricted department in which Fritzsche cooperated was misused, then Fritzsche himself was exploited. The assumption that Fritzsche was Goebbels' closest collaborator, his right hand man so to speak, and even his acting deputy—an assumption from which the bulk of the accusation leveled at him are probably derived—is already refuted by the facts that have been discussed. The odium against Fritzsche on the alleged ground that he bears a responsibility equal or similar to that of Goebbels has already been definitely shown by the evidence to be unfounded. Alone, the actual actions and proceedings of my client ought to make it clear that the assertions of the Prosecution have gone much too far.

In the legal consideration of these acts and measures of Fritzsche by Captain Sprecher, it was quite striking that—as far as I can see also in distinction to the other defendants—at only one point was the quite general conclusion drawn that Fritzsche was during a definite period, the principal conspirator, because he was directly entrusted with the manipulation of the press. I need not mention here again that the factual grounds of assumption for such an opinion did not exist. Now I am only concerned with establishing, in view of the legal qualification by the Prosecution itself, that in his declaration his activity should be considered rather in the sense of forms of participation. The speech of the Prosecution points out in several places that Fritzsche had been called to account by this Court because of his aiding and abetting, he is characterized as an "accomplice" of Goebbels he had assisted in producing propaganda material, he helped in making possible an atmosphere of hate, he had supported and more of the same, thereby stressing that he could not have been among those who did the planning. On the other hand it is said also of this defendant that he instigated and incited thus taking an active part as instigator, stimulator, and inciter.

DEFENSE

The first question now is: Is the accessory helper also a participant within the meaning of paragraph 6 of the Charter? This question, it seems to me, has not yet been discussed by Dr. Stahmer. But the case of defendant Fritzsche offers an opportunity for this, because he has been characterized to a particular extent only as an accomplice. I am, therefore, compelled to give the question closer scrutiny. These four concepts: leader, organizer, instigator, and participant are said to be equivalent on account of their external composition. The four possible perpetrators must also be dealt with in the same manner. These four concepts, so far as they differ linguistically, can therefore only explain in what different forms a plot can be fashioned. The one instigates, the other organizes, the one leads the gang, the other takes part in the plot in some other way. Therefore all four conceptions are closely connected with the common plan. They are united only because of the common plan. Only that makes them true accomplices. To make plans jointly, to want to carry something out jointly that is the main concept of these four subsidiary concepts. Only the functions amongst themselves can of course be different. They can also be shared by the conspirators themselves. If the conspirators have jointly invented the plan, have formulated it or, by agreement, have merely furthered it, then it should be of no consequence which part each one of them plays in its execution. It should therefore be basically also unimportant whether within this plot someone is the leader, the inspirator, or merely another participant in this plan. However, everyone presumably will have to participate in this plan. He must have recognized its purpose at least, for according to the words of the Charter, he must have "participated" in it and that either

- a. in the formulation or
- b. in the execution of a common plan or
- c. in some other conspiracy for the commitment of an individual crime.

Only then is he responsible for others when in the execution of such a plan, someone commits a crime.

The word "accomplice" refers therefore to the plan. He is an accomplice in the plan and is in no respect different from the leader or instigator. A more far-reaching meaning in an accessory sense must therefore be far removed from this concept.

In common law, the accomplice's concept as main concept has also an altogether different meaning for the accessory. By accessory, according to the common legal conception, only one of the forms of accomplice is understood, and that the form by which an outside deed is only supported or furthered. A deed which the accessory does not exactly want for himself. It signifies the dependence, the accessoriess of the bare support of the main deed. Article 6, last paragraph of the Charter cannot have such a meaning. There the participant is to be put on an equal basis with the accomplice, whereas in common law the accessory, as subordinate participant, can never be accomplice in a punishable deed. In common law the assistants are merely accessories. It cannot have been the intention of the creators of the Charter to regard the mere accessorial assistant as participant in the plan. Since whoever participates in a plan is to answer fully for the deeds of others, also than if he has only subordinately participated in the formation of the plan. However, on the contrary it must then follow: Whoever does not participate at all in the formation or discussion of a common plan, can therefore assume no full responsibility for that which others have done. It is thereby a matter of indifference whether the others committed a crime in the execution of a plan or only incidentally upon the occasion of its execution. The responsibility of the one for the deeds of the other can only exist when the plan binds them together. It is for this reason that the concept of conspiracy presupposes of necessity the idea that what is being done takes place under the impulse of a common will and a common knowledge in relation to the plan.

This sense of participation restricted to the plan is, in my opinion, expressed also in other parts of the Charter. Already in paragraph 1—and not only in paragraph 6, section 1—it is mentioned that in execution of the Four-Power Agreement of 8 August 1945, the "principal war criminals," the "principal culprits," the "principal conspirators," or whichever way it is expressed, should to begin with be called to account here before this Court. Assistants, accomplices, simple agents of execution, and all other merely dependent, accessory or perpetrators who do not belong to the central body—that is to say who are not connected with the conspiracy plan or are in closer agreement for the carrying out of a single crime—cannot be considered as belonging to such a group. Within the meaning of conspiracy and of the substitution of the one for the other connected with it, there can be no simple “helpers” at all.

DEFENSE

For the defendant Fritzsche I have demonstrated that he—owing already to his position in the State and the party structure—cannot belong either to the restricted group of conspirators nor to the wider group of the organizations. Moreover Captain Sprecher has himself pointed out that Fritzsche is not represented by the Prosecution as the type of conspirator who would have thought out the all-comprehensive strategy. His particular field even lay outside the conclusion of the plan. But it was not necessary to have himself correctly understood the basic strategy to have perceived the aim, when he became the spokesman of the conspirators. I believe that the latter conclusion, if the concept of participator in the sense of a conspiracy is rightly estimated, embodies an error of thought. He who stood outside the makers of the plan certainly does not belong to the group of conspirators.

After these legal arguments which are even supported by the opinion of the Prosecution, I come now to this conclusion. The defendant Fritzsche, against whom it has not been proved here that he took part in any common planning, can on this account also not have been a participator in the alleged conspiracy. At any rate he cannot be punished according to paragraph 6, last section. According to the intellectual construction of the Charter there should be somewhere a limit fixed concerning the arraignment of a single person in these trials. When is anybody still a participator—accomplice—and when is he no more so, but only perpetrator or helper? Where is this boundary which sets off the responsibility for individual deeds from the responsibility for that which others have done? Because there must be a dividing line for this collective responsibility also. I mean the common plan is this dividing line. He who does not belong to those who did the planning should also be left out of the group of conspirators.

On the other hand the framers of the Charter provided

- a. establishment of a single individual as criminal culprit even though he does not belong to the group of conspirators and

b. declaration of an organization as such as a criminal organization.

If the defendant Fritzsché does not belong to the group of conspirators and as is established—was never a member of even one of the organizations being prosecuted here, he could be convicted only if he as an individual had committed crimes as covered by article 6, paragraph 2a to c of the Charter. In that case, however, just as in any ordinary criminal procedure, the Prosecution must furnish him the proof of a criminal offense. If he does not belong to the conspiracy, if he does not belong to an organization, the Prosecution cannot derive its support from a so-called legal assumption, an assumption merely said to result from membership in an organization. It is not possible to reverse the burden of proof.

The second question then is: Did Fritzsché as an accessoryial accomplice or abettor belong to the class of those criminals of whom it has been proven that they as individuals committed crimes against the peace, a violation of law governing warfare, or a crime against humanity? He as an individual is not charged to have committed one of these crimes with his own hands. The charge is directed against him only by reason of his activity as an accessory.

As far as I can see, the establishment of the concept of the accessoryial accomplice is not something foreign to the English and American criminal law. However, the common law is governed by the principle that the accomplice falls into the same class as the perpetrator, in other words that—irrespective of the measure of his personal culpability—he should be punished, in principle, just like the perpetrator. It is said that at all times the English law was inclined to apply the principle of equal punishment for perpetrator and accessoryial accomplice. The reason for referring here to the English common law merely is to establish a link with the German concept of law. Thus, for the moment mere establishment of the fact that English law and American law know differentiation between the concept of a perpetrator and someone who merely acted as an accomplice may suffice.

On that point however, a decisive difficulty arises, resulting from the fact that there is a difference in the concept of right and of wrong between the Prosecution and the Defendants. The concepts are bound to differ because the Statute Law is not the same.

That is the reason why I cannot as yet conclude my legal argumentation: differences in concept, which may be equally common in both spheres of law, result in different inferences of law as far as Statute Law is concerned.

DEFENSE

The British Chief Prosecutor referred to the individual responsibility of each single defendant according to the letter of paragraph 6, section 2 a to c of the Charter. In that connection he remarked that it is a commonplace in common law that persons who help a criminal and shield him, who give advice and help to a criminal, are criminals themselves. Perhaps he wished thereby to advocate the conception that according to the spirit of the development of English law such persons, by reason complicity in someone else's deed, should be punished in the same manner as the main perpetrator; that the accessoriness of the accomplice, if I understand Sir Hartley Shawcross correctly, is in principle without importance for consideration by common law. In practical effect this might mean that the difference between the concept of accomplices and accessories plays no part here, or at best might determine the degree of the respective responsibility for the measure of the individual guilt. Is it intended, in principle, to judge him who merely supports the deed of someone else exactly in the same way as applies to him who carries out the deed as his own? I may refer to the effects which such concept might have on the measure of punishment, for example. An effect which would be of particular importance only in connection with capital punishment that can be absolutely determined.

At this point it might be in order to say this: The legal maxim propounded by Sir Hartley Shawcross may indeed be commonplace for every member of the English or American legal professions. This does not hold true for a German defendant, however. As I also infer from the argument of the French Prosecutor, Dubost, this does not seem to hold true for French Common Law, because he pointed out that according to the principle of penal law, strictly speaking, all the defendants could in that case not be considered as main perpetrators but merely as "accomplices." And because the confines of common law concepts are too narrow, it is the opinion of the French prosecution that the deeds which are to be adjudicated here are not equal to the common law with its rationalistic statics, that it would be necessary to apply a law which goes beyond this.

The concept of conspiracy therefore, the science of the plot, and the practicability to declare an organization criminal, are to be the vehicle by means of which it will be possible to go beyond the common law. However, how about the case of a defendant who does not belong to the conspiracy nor to an organization? After all, law must be applied! This then leaves nothing but the common law for judging the individual deed. Which law other than general concepts such as, for instance, guilt, dolus, carelessness, and also the accessoriness of the accomplice can be applied? It is possible that through the establishment of new facts of the case, the Charter created new substantive law. But what is the juridical concept with which to approach these new facts of the case? Classification of actual circumstances will probably have to be made by means of the analogy of penal law concepts. As regards the facts of the case listed in paragraph 6 b and c of the Charter, these correspond essentially with the facts of a case in common law. A defendant as an individual who did not take part in laying out the plan, and who did not belong to an organization, can then be judged only according to principles which also must apply for every other delict of common law. If concepts such as the accessory accomplice are involved, argumentation against a defendant can take according to common law only.

The legal consciousness has had to face the most complicated legal problems, particularly in connection with the doctrine of the form of participation; in other words with the question as to how an accessory should be classified according to the various possibilities of participation. From this in particular results the decisive question: is it possible that the Charter went so far as—I repeat: what is involved are common law concepts—it is a question here of banning if possible concepts of common law, of respecting the old established legal concepts of the defendants in judging the accessory assistants. Is it possible that it entirely ignored even the completely different structure of Statute law?

In view of the utterly different nature of Statute law, especially with reference to the question of accessory assistance, I ask permission for a few legal dogmatic remarks on the conception of German law. In all fairness and at least as far as the concept of an accessory accomplice is concerned, a German defendant can be charged only with what is known to the concept of law adopted by his people and which, at the same time, is in keeping, morally, with his sphere of knowledge. That is the decisive point!

By reason of the provisions of Statute law in par. 49 of the Reich Penal Code there is not only a strict separation between the accomplice and the perpetrator as far as the concept is concerned, but necessarily and as a matter of principle he is also to be punished less severely than the perpetrator himself. Jurisprudence and judges, therefore, have made a sharp distinction between the perpetration of an act itself and the mere instigation or support of somebody else's act by accomplices. This distinction is made not only in accordance with external characteristics, and so according to objective factors, but also with regard to what occurs in the mind, and so according to subjective factors. During decades of the German law, particularly in the law of the Reich court, this is expressed in such a way that, in the case of assistance in somebody else's action, the accessory is said to have the animus socii, but the perpetrator himself the animus anctoris. According to German law the assistance is regarded outwardly, which means according to objective factors, only a furthering and support of the action of the principal perpetrator; the accessory must have helped to bring about success by his support. If he has not helped to bring about this success, then he is not an accessory. Then his action is not punishable.

DEFENSE

Concerning the mental side of the deed, the dolus, the will of the accessory (animus socii) must be directed to the end that somebody else's action is supported with his knowledge. And so when judging what is going on within the mind of a perpetrator, German law also makes a sharp difference between the will and the knowledge.

And this discrimination is furthermore decisive as to whether somebody has given assistance at all.

I have stated before what Fritzsche was in any way able to know about plans or the execution of them from the range of his duties. Only if one had proved that he had a definite knowledge and will as an accessory to the fact could he be condemned. It would have to be further proved in the case of defendant Fritzsche whether what he knew and wanted in connection with an alleged furtherance is identical with what any of the main criminals actually did. Only when the knowledge and intent of both agree can one be an accessory at all. In this connection it is to be emphasized than an indefinite knowledge, a very general intent is not sufficient to establish the state of being an accessory. The accomplice must be concretely aware of the elements in a case which another is to carry out in accordance with his intention.

The Prosecution, however, also charges Fritzsche in various points with instigating specific crimes as an accessory. And so the third question is: Has Fritzsche been the instigator of any single crime?

At the beginning of these legal statements, I have already referred to the details of Captain Sprecher's prosecuting speech. To me it is doubtful if here the concept of instigation is meant in the legal-dogmatic sense of the common law. The concept of "incitement" is used essentially to the extent that it corresponds to the German legal concept of mere invitation (Aufforderung). This charge of instigation can only be raised so far as it can be said to concern the individual responsibility of Fritzsche for a specific crime mentioned in article 6 paragraph 2a to c. The assumption that Fritzsche was a possible "instigator" to a common plan within the group of conspirators cannot be substantiated in any case in accordance with what I have already explained at an earlier time.

Instigation as an accessory form of participation in the general legal sense presupposes, however, quite otherwise than in the case of an accomplice, in which a criminal will is only to be supported or maintained, that such a will must first of all be produced in the perpetrator. The psychological influence, unlike that of the accomplice, does not consist of affirming or strengthening the individual who has already decided to carry out the deed, but in first producing the will for the deed. The means for this can be of the utmost variety, but the perpetrator first must have his mind changed, brought around to it.

Assistance and instigation accord again as accessorial forms of participation, as in the case of instigation, a conscious and in the case of the instigator a designed causative connection must exist between his instigation and the decision of the perpetrator. The principle of equivalence is valid equally as in the case of assistance. The perpetration of a deed must correspond with the conception and the will of the instigator. The instigator is therefore responsible so far as his intention reaches. A possible excessus mandati cannot be attributed to him. From this follows the accessoryship not only of assistance but also of instigation!

The evidence has not furnished the slightest proof to the Fritzsche case that he has committed an individual crime as instigator through his transmission of news. Nothing has been demonstrated that he has instigated a single person to murder, cruelties, deportations, killing of hostages, massacre of Jews or others, or crimes mentioned in the Charter, or had as instigator caused a single crime by his transmission of news. Not a single passage from his nearly 1,000 wireless speeches could be produced from which such a conclusion of individual responsibility could be deduced. It could not happen from public speeches. The crimes which were committed were carried out by people completely indifferent to Fritzsche's propaganda. They received their urge or instructions from altogether different sources. These deeds were to be kept quite secret. The official news service should avoid handling this as much as possible. As this trial has shown particularly impressively, the perpetrators made the greatest effort to inform a very small circle, for example, of the annihilation of the Jews. What is self-evident in every other State Constitution, namely, that occurrences in the country should be handled through the press, was not permissible in a dictatorship. The people should not be asked whether they approve such incidents. The crimes established by this trial should not be permitted to be made public. Can one assume that under such circumstances the press and the radio were suitable means to instigate the perpetration of crimes? Is it not more probable that such incidents were kept specially secret from the press and the radio?

DEFENSE

In no single case—even if the speeches of Fritzsche were ever so prejudiced—could it be reckoned that through public speeches he could evoke decisions for the perpetration of punishable deeds by a single individual.

Possibly the juridical indications of the Prosecution do not go so far. The Prosecution will reproach Fritzsche that he has contributed to produce an “atmosphere of hate.”

Only through such propaganda was it at all possible for gruesome crimes as these to be committed in Germany. This reproach, however, is legally irrelevant. This charge would have legal importance only if the defendant Fritzsche had been among the group of so-called conspirators; if he had been the instigator of a common plan. I believe to have proved that such opinion is impossible. If he had actually brought about an “atmosphere of hate,” his instigation of someone else—outside of the group of conspirators—to commit a certain crime would have been impossible legally speaking. Furthermore, according to the provision of the Statute Law of German Penal Code, a summons disseminated by radio would even exclude facts which the letter of the penal code requires in order to establish the charge of conspiracy. According to German jurisdiction as practiced for decades, there could be no conspiracy, because instigation could not have centered on a certain individual. Furthermore, German Law concerns itself merely with instigation to commit a concrete deed but not with instigation to commit punishable actions in general. In principle, therefore, a summons of some kind, directed toward a group of persons individually undefined, does not constitute incitement to complicity; it is rather outside the framework of legal relevancy altogether. It is quite self-evident, however, that Fritzsche’s radio addresses were intended for an entirely unlimited group of persons. Furthermore and since he was seriously striving to find for the German press and radio propaganda a “foundation based on truth,” could he have such an aim to incite to culpable actions? My client admitted in an impressive and unequivocal manner that he followed a tendency which was in keeping with the official German policy, when he passed on the news which he was expected to disseminate. In other words, he did not take advantage of the fact that international law did not place him under any restraint; and nothing in the evidence submitted has refuted his good faith. However, in the light of the law, when it is concerned with incitement to complicity, or with assistance given as an accomplice, good faith is equivalent with lack of will and lack of purposefulness.

This establishes:

1. that the defendant Fritzsche did not belong to the group of conspirators who planned,
2. that he was never at any time a member of a group or an organization which it is here proposed to term criminal;
3. that, factually and for legal reasons, he is not individually guilty of a war crime or a crime against humanity, neither as an accomplice nor according to the letter of law—as an instigator, and not even—also according to the letter of the law—as accomplice.

This will suffice, I believe, for my discussion of the question of evidence and legal conclusions. It is necessary though to mention one other thing: The Fritzsche case has also its human aspect.

Apart from the pros and cons or legal potentialities, another closely related question suggests itself, which must not remain without answer: Taking Fritzsche strictly as a human being, can he be expected to have had knowledge, to have been co-originator of all the monstrosities which were established in this Court? According to the interpretation of the Prosecution, a dolose instrument is the conspirator—of whom Goebbels was perhaps one—: he only who had knowledge of its aims and purposes.

Fritzsche's measures and utterances, however, were not dictated by criminal will. During his examination before this High Tribunal, Fritzsche pointed to the fact that he does not convoke his duty to obey. But he added that as far as his own person is concerned a criminal proposition was never made to him. And he furthermore declared: There was no compulsion for anybody to carry out an order in which he could not help seeing the intended crime. Undoubtedly, Fritzsche sacrificed his own convictions and had to have recourse to many a compromise. This, however, he did not do where he thought he discovered injustice, violence, and inhumanity. As is fitting to a journalist, he examined with care whatever reports reached him from abroad. In disregard to inherent dangers for his own person, he traced the news which concerned Germany itself, dangers which ambushed every person who tried to penetrate that which absolute secrecy intended to hide. He did not permit himself to be put off with paltry, vague explanations. He reported many details. I merely refer to his visits to Gluecks, Heydrich, and his investigations in the Ukraine.

DEFENSE

To the extent that he discovered criminal purposes, such as the "Kommissarbefehl" and the plan to revenge inhumanely the air bombardments on Dresden, he fought against them with determination, in the latter case even with the help of a foreign Ambassador. And he was successful, too, as these two particularly conspicuous examples show. He did this because he followed the voice of his conscience. He did not first engage in lengthy deliberations as to the pros and cons. As regards the "Kommissarbefehl" he merely had heard of it as a soldier—he had never read it, nor did he know that it actually was carried into practice at any time—and he at once raised a protest. When Goebbels ordered him to announce the proposed killing of great numbers of allied fliers, he did not mind incurring the anger and the fury of his Minister. Dr. Scharping described this in detail. When he learned of cruelties in the concentration camp at Oranienburg, he even sounded an alarm. The culprits were punished immediately at that time. Dr. Scharping's affidavits, which I submitted, and others prove his implicit willingness to assist those who were persecuted for political or racial reasons if they applied to him. Most revealing is the tolerance with which he made the continued publication of the "Frankfurter Zeitung" possible. Other proofs along that line which are also submitted with my Document Book II are not negligible, and in the case of Fritzsche certainly cannot simply be passed over with the comment that with his other hand he "cold-bloodedly" abandoned others to death.

He was not willing to sacrifice his dignity as a human being, not even to the seeming demands of what paraded as idealism, or for the sake of an oath he had taken.

While the Prosecution has tried to darken the picture, I can also point to brighter spots, namely those which have bearing on him as the representative of propaganda.

Was he a liar—and even perhaps a notorious liar? That Goebbels was one is made clear by the revelations of this Trial. And as it was wrongly assumed that Fritzsche was his right-hand man, the implication was of course that Fritzsche had the same attributes. The assumption may be clearly refuted. It is my conviction that, had not Goebbels sought evasion of responsibility in death, we should not now see Fritzsche in the prisoners' dock here as representative of the Propaganda Ministry. The further assumption that all collaborators of Goebbels must have been wittingly at the service of his lies is unjustified. It would only be justified if it had been established here that Fritzsche was in a position to grasp everything including the real and most deep-lying connections. But that could only be determined in this Trial. Fritzsche remained entangled in error like millions of other Germans. Glaring abuses were to be seen everywhere. Fritzsche was not unaware of them. Indeed, he has declined to be characterized before this Tribunal as an opponent of Nazism. He has, however, claimed to have opposed abuses so far as he could recognize them. This entitles him to be put on a better moral plane.

Neither was he a zealot or a fanatic, possessed only by the idea or adoration of power and success and inaccessible to criticism. Of course it was a sin, indeed the grievous sin against the spirit, to have served the system.

The decisive point is, however, whether he was in a position to detect more than mere abuses. Falsehood nevertheless was already built into the foundation and anything built upon that was bound to be untruthful. It was not only the "thousand door Ministry," as it was once called, that was poisoned. The real reason why everything in Germany was poisoned by falsehood could best be detected by those who lived in a purer atmosphere.

Fritzsche did not even keep immune from the phraseology, but he used it perhaps with better taste than many others. He had occasion to claim here—and this is no mere empty phrase—that he has always acted fairly and honorably in every respect in his professional work. Dr. Scharping too has emphasized this in his affidavit. Is this not an indication that he really did not detect that the whole foundation upon which his work was built up was hollow and deceptive? Had he been a professional liar, he would not have made a point of doing fine and honest work, that of checking foreign reports and of seeking, in everything that affected him, a truthful basis for the press and radio.

The Prosecution has laid stress upon his rise in the Propaganda Ministry. Did they mean to imply thereby that he was particularly qualified as a liar? Actually, his career—however modest it was really compared to that of Hitler's other auxiliaries—has quite another foundation which has also been clearly stated here. He only made headway because he was qualified as a journalist and technician; not because he was particularly good at lying but because he talked better than many others.

As proved by the affidavits of Dr. Scharping and Frau Krueger Fritzsche lived on a modest scale. During his activity at the Propaganda Ministry he has gathered no riches, possessed no luxurious dwelling, and neither asked nor received any gift.

DEFENSE

Indeed, the Prosecution has made no assertion to the contrary. It therefore does not appear astonishing that those who not only heard his voice on the Radio but also knew him personally should have particularly emphasized his human qualities. Dr. Scharping declares in his affidavit: It was a distinction to be allowed to work with him. Is it in keeping with human experience that an impostor should win such consideration? I believe human esteem can only be won by an honest character. Those who are in daily intercourse with a person can find out whether he is a liar or not. And if his speech does not betray him, then his eyes will.

There may be many possibilities of contradicting that somebody who has cooperated in the propaganda of the Third Reich is nevertheless honest and a lover of truth. The most immediate explanation is probably that which can be taken from Fritzsche's own remark which I repeat here: He said he felt—and this may well be significant for the verdict if not for History—that he was deceived by Hitler too!

Before this Tribunal, Fritzsche has not only defended himself but the German people as well. To what extent he is himself responsible to the German people for his persistent and ultimate exhortation to carry on the war to the very end is not a matter to be decided here.

It may be that Fritzsche did not, like others, realize that he was serving an evil cause, or it may be that he did not turn from the State leadership for the sole reason that he wished to share the cup of bitterness with the German Nation to the last dregs. But guilty in the sense of the accusation brought against him before the Tribunal he is not. I request his acquittal.

2. FINAL PLEA by Hans Fritzsche

May it please the Tribunal: The Chief Prosecutors in their final speeches have repeated several of the accusations against me although in my opinion they have been clearly refuted by the taking of evidence.

The main points in question I have summarized and I do not propose to read them. If it is not in contradiction to the rules of this Tribunal and if it would please the Tribunal, then I should make the request that this summary, which amounts to six pages, should be taken judicial notice of by the Tribunal. They are available for translation.

Yet I should not like to waste this last chance for a last word at this Trial by quoting the details, all of which can be found in the records and documents. I shall have to deal with the entire complex of the crimes since the Prosecution alleged that I had been connected with these crimes through a conspiracy.

With reference to that accusation, I can only say that even if I had made propaganda during my radio speeches which the Prosecution now accuses me of, even if I had represented the teaching of the "Master Race," even if I had preached hatred against other peoples, even if I had incited to aggressive wars, acts of force, murder, and inhuman actions, even if I had done all that, then the German nation would have turned away from me and would have turned down the system for which I spoke.

Even if I had done it in a hidden form, then my listeners would have noticed it and adopted a negative attitude.

But the misfortune is contained in the fact that I did not represent all these trends according to which Hitler, together with a small circle of his accomplices, was acting secretly; this circle which, according to the testimony of the witnesses Hess, Reinecke and Morgen, amongst others, is now slowly emerging from the mist in which it had been hidden until now.

I believed in Hitler's assurances of an honest will for peace and through that I strengthened the trust of the German people in them.

I believed in the official German denials of all foreign reports of German atrocities. And with my beliefs I strengthened the trust of the German people in the cleanliness of the leaders of the German state.

That is my guilt. No more, no less.

The prosecutors have expressed the horror of their peoples caused by the atrocities which occurred. They did not expect that much good would come from Hitler, and they are shattered by the extent of what really happened. But then, you must try to understand the disgust of those who expected much good to come from Hitler and who now have to see how their trust, their good will, and their idealism had been misused. I am in just that position of the man who has been deceived, together with many, many other Germans, of whom the Prosecution say that they could have recognized all that happened from the smoke rising from the chimneys of the concentration camps, or the mere spectacle of the detainees.

I feel that it is a great misfortune that the Prosecution have pictured these matters in such a way as if all of Germany had been a tremendous hideout of crime. It is a misfortune that the Prosecution are generalizing the extent of the crimes, which are in themselves horrible enough. But opposed to this I must say that anyone who once during the years of peaceful reconstruction had believed in Hitler, he only needed faith, courage, and the will to make sacrifices in order to continue believing in him, until through the discovery of carefully hidden facts he could recognize the devil in him. Only thus can the struggle be explained which Germany carried on for 68 months. Such a sacrifice does not grow from crime but from idealism and good faith and from clear and apparently just organization.

DEFENSE

I regret the generalization which the Prosecution have applied to the crimes, because they are bound to enlarge the mountain of hatred in the shadow of which the world lies to-day. Yet the time has come to interrupt the circle of that hate which has dominated the world until now. It is high time that a halt should be called to the harvest and the sowing of a new seed of hatred and that the seed must be changed. After all, the murder of five millions is a terrible warning, and the world has at its disposal the technical means for its self-destruction. For that reason, the Prosecution should not replace hatred by yet more hatred when they present their case.

It is my right to say this before my conscience because I have not preached hatred, as the Prosecution will have it, nor have I closed my ears to pity. To the contrary, again and again, in the middle of the hardest struggle, I have raised the voice of humanity. The vast majority of my speeches prove it, which, after all, can be considered at any time when one considers the allegations of my adversaries. Such speeches, which even now have not been submitted to the Tribunal, cannot simply have disappeared from the surface of this earth.

Admittedly, it is perfectly possible, alas, even understandable, that the hurricane of disgust which swept the world because of the atrocities which were committed might sweep away the borders of individual responsibility. If that happens, if collective responsibility is to be attached even to those who, in their good faith, were misused, then, Your Honors, you must hold me responsible. As my defense counsel has emphasized, I do not wish to hide behind the millions of those men and women acting in good faith who were misused. I will place myself before them, before those for whom my good faith had been an additional guarantee for the cleanliness of the system. And yet, this responsibility of mine is only valid for those who acted in good faith, not for the originators, collaborators, and those who knew of those atrocities beginning with murder and ending with the choice of living human beings for anatomical collections.

Between these criminals and myself there is only one tie; they merely misused me in a different manner than they misused those who became their physical victims.

It may be difficult to separate German crime from German idealism. It is not impossible, if you draw that dividing line, then you will save much suffering for Germany and for the whole world.

XXIV. MARTIN BORMANN

FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Friedrich Bergold, Defense Counsel
Your Lordship, Your Honors:

The case of the defendant Martin Bormann with whose defense I have been commissioned by the Tribunal is an unusual one. At the time when the National Socialist Reich was still shining the defendant lived in the shadow, he kept on being a shadow at this trial and is, in all probability, today, too, among the shadows as the dead were called in ancient times. He is the only one of the defendants who is not present and against whom Article 12 of the Charter is applied. It seems as though history wanted to preserve the continuity of the genii loci and to see in the very town of Nurnberg a discussion of the problem of whether and in how far the greatest probability for a defendant's having lost his life will be an obstacle to a trial in absentia of such a man. For in Nurnberg an adage has come down from the Middle Ages to our times which says the Nurnberg people would not hang anybody lest he be apprehended first.

In other words, it was in Nurnberg in old times already where the question of whether a trial of an absentee can be carried out was discussed in an excellent manner.

[The Tribunal refused to hear the remainder of Dr. Bergold's argument regarding the advisability and the right of the Tribunal to try Bormann.—Ed.]

I cannot and will not criticize the Charter. I wish merely to establish the fact that the Charter has created an unheard of novelty. I am, however, of the modest opinion that, in view of this specific novelty in the legal history of all times and countries, the High Tribunal should carefully consider whether at the present stage of the proceedings it will enforce the right granted by Article 12 of the Charter to prosecute in absentia. Since a revision of the sentence is no longer possible, the proceedings in my opinion should be carried out only if by a corresponding application of the fine and clear principles of Russian law it is first proved that the defendant Martin Bormann is wilfully evading the court and secondly that the circumstances are not in any respect subject to the slightest doubt. As the Charter does not stipulate more clearly when and under what conditions the Tribunal is to enforce its right, the latter must make a law for itself.

DEFENSE

Owing to the incontestable nature of the sentence, the Tribunal's responsibility in this particular case is a heavy one. My opinion that the sentence is final is also shared by the high Tribunal, as in the last phrase of the public charge against the defendant Bormann it is stated explicitly that should the defendant be found guilty, the sentence will be applied without any further procedure as soon as he is apprehended.

But in my opinion it has not been proved at all that the defendant is wilfully keeping away from justice. I think that as revealed by the examination of the witness Kempka it is even highly probable that the defendant Bormann is already dead. Witness Kempka has stated that on the night of 1st to 2d May 1945, together with State Secretary Naumann as first, the defendant Bormann as second, the Standartenfuehrer Dr. Stumpfecker as third, and himself as the fourth in that order, he had tried to flee through the Russian lines by keeping close to the left hand side of an advancing tank. Bormann was walking close to the middle of the tank, so the witness had the impression that Bormann's hand was holding on to the tank. That action seemed to the witness necessary in order to keep pace with the rolling tank. That tank, having passed anti-tank obstacles and having advanced some 30-40 meters beyond, was blown up into the air presumably by a direct hit of an anti-tank grenade (Panzerfaust).

The witness observed without any possible doubt that in the immediate vicinity of the tank just where Bormann walked a darting flame burst forth from the exploding tank, knocking down Bormann and State Secretary Naumann walking immediately ahead of him. Thus Bormann found himself in the center of the explosion which was so violent that the witness is convinced Bormann must have died under such circumstances without a doubt. It cannot be maintained that owing to the fact that the witness had escaped the violence of the explosion Bormann also must have been saved. It should be noted that Kempka was running behind the tank on the left hand side and thus was at a distance of some 4 meters from the explosion proper. Furthermore, he had additional protection in the person of Dr. Stumpfecker, running in front of him, whose body was thrown against him by the explosion, serving as cover. Kempka has testified that Bormann was wearing the uniform and the rank insignia of an SS-Obergruppenfuehrer at that time.

Even if Bormann had not been killed on this occasion he would certainly have been wounded so seriously that it would have been impossible for him to escape. Unquestionably he would have fallen into the hands of the USSR troops who according to the affidavit of the witness Krueger had already been quite close to the Reich Chancellery and had occupied it already on 2 May 1945 owing to the fact that the defenders had fled. With the loyalty the USSR is showing in these proceedings she would have transferred Bormann to the High Tribunal for trial.

There being only two possibilities—at least in my opinion—the first of which, namely that the wounded Bormann fell into the hands of the USSR, has been proved not to be true, then only the second possibility can have happened, namely that Bormann lost his life. I am therefore of the opinion that I have proved with sufficient likelihood that Bormann is dead.

In my opinion one should not be allowed to say that until death is established with absolute certainty a man is to be supposed alive. This is a supposition which I, the defense counsel, would have to refute. A legal assumption of a person being alive has existed in all countries of the world but only in the field of private law and only for the purpose of regulating conditions pertaining to inheritance or matrimonial property laws. However, a legal assumption of a person being alive has only very seldom been stipulated, e.g., in Common Law and in the Prussian Law and even there it is contested.

The Civil Code knows of no assumption of a person being alive but instead only admits the declaration that a person is missing in the eyes of the law. Common Law neither provides a declaration as to the death of a person nor a special one as to a person being alive. Russian law permits already after a short period of time a declaration as to a person being missing in the eyes of the law, and this may be followed by the declaration of the person's death. But even in these stipulations no assumption can be found as to the person being alive.

Whatever is the case in the field of civil law, it is nevertheless a fact that in the field of criminal law there exists no assumption as to a person being alive, in any country. If, however, criminal law does not recognize such an assumption as to a person being alive, it is not my duty either to refute such an assumption as to a person being alive. It must be enough when such circumstances are proved by the defense as lead one through a reasonable evaluation of the usual course of life, as I have already shown, to conclude that a defendant is dead.

I am, therefore, of the opinion first of all that the death of the defendant Bormann was proved with sufficient probability, in fact with such great probability that the proceedings would accordingly have to be suspended entirely and forever since the Charter does not recognize a trial of dead persons. If there were such a thing as the trial of a culprit after his death the prosecution, according to all logic and reason, would have to indict the real heads of National Socialism.

DEFENSE

But apart from all this, it is not at all proved in my opinion that the defendant Bormann is intentionally evading the trial as long as the possibility exists that the defendant is dead. It is correct that the Charter does not recognize such an assumption for the procedure against a defendant who cannot be found. However, the Charter is rather taciturn on this subject and I have already stated that I am convinced the High Tribunal should examine very carefully whether it should exercise its right in this special case of the defendant Bormann. Considering the finality of the verdict it seems to me fair and just in the case of Bormann to consider at least the general legal principle of all civilized countries by which a defendant must be guaranteed a hearing even if only after his arrest. Thus by suspending the proceedings one would avoid creating accomplished facts as long as it is still possible that Bormann's absence can be excused.

May I point out in this respect that paragraph 12 of the Charter, second section, expressly refers the Tribunal to the interests of justice which it should consider in examining the question of whether it intends to try in absentia cases other than where the defendant cannot be found. These interests of justice are not unilateral and are not directed against the defendant exclusively. True justice is always universal. In all laws of the world it demands that as far as possible in the eyes of justice the interests of the defendant shall be protected as well.

In the case of the defendant Krupp's illness, the Tribunal already exercised its right not to try a person in absentia. Even if this case cannot quite be compared with that of the defendant Bormann the decision should be considered in the present instance too.

Just because of the peculiar character of the case and in view of the testimony of the witness Kempka, one can by no means consider the fact as proved that the defendant Bormann deliberately stays away from the Tribunal, because however the matter is viewed, one cannot ignore the possibility that—even if he had been saved and had not fallen into the hands of the Allies—he may have been injured permanently and to such a degree that neither physically nor mentally he is in a position to surrender to the Tribunal. It is for this very reason that after thorough consideration I believe that in the interests of true justice the Tribunal should suspend proceedings against the defendant Bormann.

Such a decision, however, is also justified according to the second principle which was formulated by the Russian law, namely that proceedings shall as a rule be permitted only if the circumstances of the case are no longer subject to any doubts.

The defendant Bormann is absent. He has not even been able to defend himself against the charges made against him. He has not been able to give me any information and I have not been able to find any witnesses who would have sufficient knowledge of the matter and who would be able to disclose to me any exonerating evidence concerning the accusations made.

Now as ever in the course of these long proceedings Bormann's person and activity remained in that obscurity in which owing to his character the defendant already kept himself during his lifetime. The charges which many co-defendants have made against him, perhaps for very special reasons and obviously in order to further their own defense and exonerate themselves, cannot for reasons of fairness be taken as the basis of a judicial decision. The prosecution has already stated quite frequently through its representatives that the defendants would endeavour to throw the main blame upon dead or absent men for the acts which are subject to the Tribunal's jurisdiction. Some of my colleagues have followed these tactics of the defendants in their defense speeches. Perhaps it was right to do all this. I cannot judge the matter. Besides, I have no authority to form such a judgment.

But nobody knows what the defendant Bormann could have answered these men if he had been present. Perhaps he would have been able to show that his entire activity was not the cause for the happenings which the indictment deals with, furthermore, that he did not have the influence which is imputed to him as the secretary of the Fuehrer and the Party.

It is known all over the world, that to secretaries and chiefs of central chancelleries, just like to the princely valets in the times of absolutism, has always been ascribed considerable influence upon their superiors, as it is in the nature of things that through the hands of such secretary must pass everything which can only be handled officially. But what in a modern State can evade the Moloch of bureaucracy?

The Document Book and the Trial Brief presented by the prosecution do in no case contain a definite indication, that in the incriminating events and measures Bormann personally had effective and outstanding influence on the actions and measures of the third Reich, of the NSDAP, and even of Hitler himself, and of how strong that influence had become.

In the comments to the decree of Bormann printed in Volume

DEFENSE

II of the official compilation "Instructions, Directives, and Announcements of the Party Chancellery", p. 228, presented as Bormann Exhibit 11 in my book of documents, it is stated that the party chancellery was an agency of Hitler, which he used to direct the party. Expressly emphasized is the fact that since 12 May 1941 Hitler had again taken over the full and exclusive direction of the party. The head of the party chancellery, at that time Bormann, had been charged to inform Hitler continually about the work situation at that time in the party and to let him know of all circumstances which were important for the taking of decisions in party affairs. This had to be done according to Hitler's fundamental directives and the determination of the latter, especially as regards their political aspect, the supreme chief of the party had reserved for himself.

Thus it is shown that the party chancellery was the central chancellery for matters concerning the home policy of the Reich leadership and through this channel were sent up to Hitler all suggestions and information coming from below, while directives coming from Hitler were passed down by it to the lower levels.

It is right to say that a man in such a position can have a great influence if there is a man who can be easily influenced at the top; but it is also correct to say that a man in such a chancellery can play a purely formal role as the head of a liaison agency if at the top there is a dictatorial autocrat who cannot be influenced and if the chief of the chancellery has no special ambition nor any special abilities.

The proceedings which have been held for many months under this roof have shown which one of the two alternatives is more likely. It is obvious that seen from lower levels the head of the chancellery would appear influential, even in the case of the second alternative, because everything went through his hands, and because any blame for subordinates passed through this agency, and because all mistakes, which arose in the country with the other officials, were reported there. These officials and subordinates, however high a rank they may have held and even though in part they may have feared the chief of the party chancellery—perhaps indeed only for reasons due to their personality or mistakes—these are not the right people to enlighten us as to which of the two alternatives described is the proper one. As long as Bormann does not appear and is not heard personally, the true part he played remains obscure. Nobody, even the High Tribunal, could ever pass a reliable sentence. The whole case remains dubious.

It remains dubious even in the individual points. I would like to demonstrate this by just a few examples.

My esteemed colleague of the defense, Dr. Thoma, has stated that Bormann prevented the defendant Rosenberg from following his policy. For this he referred to the memorandum of Dr. Markulls, submitted as R-36. But this document is nothing other than a comment on an unknown, unproduced Bormann Document.

Markulls declares expressis verbis, that he translated Bormann's formulations into the language of a simple member of the German civil service, and presented them more pointedly. So, only Bormann could enlighten us in this case and tell us whether he wished his writing to be understood in this way, or whether Markulls twisted the meaning and sense of Bormann's writing so that only Bormann could disclose whether this writing, like almost all the Bormann Documents submitted, did not simply transmit the utterance of a Reich leader or of Hitler. So this case, too, seems altogether doubtful. An explanation can hardly be expected. Furthermore, it must be pointed out, that almost all the documents which the prosecution has gathered together in its document book are in general mere reproductions and publications of a Hitler Decree or a Hitler Instruction. Bormann transmitted these instructions to the subordinate agencies with an accompanying letter in order to inform the agencies concerned. This is an activity which like office work has to be done even in the most terrible tyranny and in the most reprehensible despotism—how much more so in a modern state structure like the National Socialist Reich. Some man has to forward all the instructions and orders to the subordinate agencies, that is a purely formal activity. It could be done as well by a plain office boy as by a brilliant Reich leader.

From the transmission of such instructions, according to office routine—I mention for example the Documents 069-PS, 1950-PS, 656-PS, 058-PS, 205-PS, and even the famous document 057-PS can only be considered as a transmission of a Hitler directive and opinion—from such a method of transmission nobody can draw the conclusion that the forwarding party had an influence on the decrees, orders and decisions. It is possible, but it certainly has not been proved.

But before a sentence is passed, this question of influence should be entirely clarified. Because if in the transmission of an order, according to chancellery routine, one could see any offense—whereby one would even come to condemn the women who wrote such orders on the typewriter—the verdict of justice must judge differently the importance and severity of the punishment for such clerical work on orders, from that which should fall upon a man whose collaboration was a decisive factor in causing such orders and decisions, and who, by his influence and advice, led the chief of state to deliver them. All this is not clear in Bormann's case and remains dubious. The empty word of the co-defendants, whose motives can never be entirely unveiled, saying that Bormann exercised great, even diabolic influence is no proof.

DEFENSE

The other documents of the prosecution only prove that Bormann, according to the decree of 29 May 1941, 2099-PS, and to the decree of 24 January 1942, 2100-PS, arranged for an exchange of correspondence between the individual Reichsleiters and forwarded their desires and suggestions. As an example I mention Documents 056-PS, 072-PS, 061-PS, 656-PS. Nobody can derive with certainty from these activities as a go-between, which were necessary from the standpoint of administrative work, the extent and true nature of Bormann's influence.

Further documents show that Bormann very often served as a mere stenographer, and took the necessary notes during Hitler's discussions with some of the defendants. This is proved by Document L-221 concerning the annexation of the "Eastern Territories" (Osteraumannektion) and the Russian Document USSR-172. But in any case such documents do not make clear whether and how he influenced in such sessions the policy and the measures of the Third Reich. According to all rules, a stenographer has no influence at all. He only fulfills an automatic activity.

I would not like to be misunderstood in this. Far be it from me to dispute the fact that Bormann occupied quite an important position in the leadership of the Third Reich. But no clear view has emerged during this trial as to the real weight Bormann could throw into the scales or to what extent his importance was increased and inflated by the bad conscience of third parties, and finally of what his influence actually consisted. Statements of the other defendants, which were made for their own defense, do not constitute relevant evidence. At any rate, the document book of the prosecution contains almost exclusively documents like those I have just examined closely.

Accurately speaking, Bormann only did what was legal in Germany. This is revealed in the documents I submitted, e.g., Bormann-Exhibit 2, 3, 5, 7, in which he repeatedly pointed out to party offices that any illegal action against Jews was not permitted.

It is characteristic for Bormann's case that not even measures against Jews could be proved against him. He never did more than forward such instructions and bring them to notice or publish them, as it was prescribed by the law and as followed from his clerical position as party secretary. Even the great conference of 12 November 1938, which was held under the chairmanship of Mr. Goering and from which emanated a series of laws against the Jews, is only connected with Bormann's personality insofar as Bormann forwarded to Mr. Goering Hitler's instruction ordering that such a conference be held. In any case it has not been made clear at all what influence Bormann himself had on these questions. But how can a just Tribunal determine the extent of an appropriate punishment, if the part played, if the participation of the individual defendant in the offense is not clearly established? Nobody can say that there is no doubt about the circumstances of the case.

With respect to the first idea, it seems to be most certainly proved by the document book of the prosecution that Bormann was one of the most zealous in the fight against Christian churches. Most of the documents quoted in the Trial Brief referred to this point. It is certainly correct to say that Bormann was philosophically and according to his attitude a violent opponent of the Christian doctrine. But, such a spiritual attitude in itself is neither an offense nor even a crime before the whole of mankind, which embraces so many different conceptions of the world and the higher connections and will perhaps give birth to many more.

In modern times there are countless convinced atheists. In other countries of the globe, too, there are officially recognized organizations which oppose the Christian interpretation of the world, and at the turn of our century there were big associations in many countries which had pure materialism as their philosophical system and the negation of spiritual things openly inscribed on their banner. No one can be punished for wishing to teach others the precepts of his ideology or for wanting to convert them to his point of view. The modern world still recalls the horrors of the Inquisition. Therefore, Bormann could only be punished if it were proved that he participated in a real religious persecution and not merely in an ideological struggle.

In my opinion the two most important pieces of documentary evidence which the prosecution has produced against Bormann, namely Documents L-75 and 089-PS, do not show that the defendant Martin Bormann in his official position undertook anything against the churches as religious institutions. The quintessence of Document L-75 is contained in the sentence which says that from the incompatibility between National Socialist and Christian ideology it must be deduced that any strengthening of existing Christian confessions and any furtherance of new ones arising is to be rejected by the party. It is of no importance for what urgent reasons Bormann came to write such a sentence at the end of his letter. One need not discuss the fact that failure to strengthen a religious conception which one opposed on philosophical grounds does not constitute religious persecution. Nobody is obliged to support a religious conception. It is not permissible to direct one's attention only to excited arguments stating that a religion should not be strengthened and to disregard the conclusions from such considerations.

DEFENSE

It is furthermore important in this connection that we received only one copy of this document, a copy which a Protestant minister by the name of Eichholz made out for himself. Whether the reproduction of the contents of Bormann's statement in this document is fully correct has not at all been proved. In any case the document in this form does not represent true evidence.

In Document 089-PS, which may be recognized as being authentic, Bormann takes indeed a very definite stand against the church. It finishes, however, and this is the only fact which should be considered for the verdict, by saying that no National Socialist teacher be reproached for teaching Christian religion and in such a case the original text of the Bible should be used; any new interpretation, comment, or taking apart of the text of the Bible is to be avoided. Therefore, Bormann, despite his previous philosophical attack against the church takes here the legal standpoint that the Christian dogma may be freely propagated. Could a more loyal action ever be expected of such a strong opponent of a doctrine?

The remaining documentary evidence does not reveal any real persecution measures either. The fact that Bormann on Hitler's order prohibited the admission of priests or of members of certain religious associations to the party and that on Hitler's order he forbade priests to be appointed to leading positions in the party in order to prevent dissensions is no religious persecution. The fact that during the war he demanded that the church make the same sacrifices as the other institutions of the State does not represent a criminal measure for religious reasons. That within the closing of many lay institutions which was to take place in order to make a better use of human reserves of the nation he strove for the closing of church institutions too; that within the limitation of the number of copies and number of pages of lay publications he wished that church publications be limited also, does not come under the provisions of Article 6 of the Charter.

It is true that he let himself be guided in this respect among other things also by his anti-clerical attitude. But when otherwise the same measures were taken in Germany against other institutions and other publications, too, measures which as war measures were supposed to be only temporary, one cannot speak of an actual religious persecution. Not even Bormann's participation in originating the persecution of priests has been submitted or proved at all.

It results from all documents that Bormann always adhered to the effective legal stipulations so that he, who was so eagerly intent on complying with Hitler's orders, certainly observed strictly Hitler's decree which directed at the beginning of the war that all measures against the church be discontinued.

Therefore, it may be said in conclusion that this matter, too, cannot be really cleared up despite the numerous documents presented. Documents alone do not suffice to dissipate all doubts on the case. Especially with respect to the importance and weight of Bormann's share in persecution measures against the church it seems necessary to determine Bormann's personal responsibility. Thus, this fact also remains somewhat obscure. A basis for a just determination of the amount of punishment cannot be established.

I shall not take up the time of the High Tribunal by exhibiting further details. I think that the indications I have given are sufficient to show that even the documents presented by the prosecution prove in any case only one thing with certainty, namely, that Bormann in his capacity as chief of the Party Chancellery held "as ordered by the law" an intermediary position in the clerical, secretarial dealings between the head of the Reich and the subordinate agencies and in the dealings among those subordinate agencies.

Anything else is only an assumption which has not been definitely proved, in any case not with that certainty which must seem essential for the sake of justice in order to pass a verdict in absentia and without hearing the defendant, especially with respect to the severity of the punishment. Unfortunately, a legend has been woven around Bormann's personality, his activity, and his survival. But for the sober judgment of jurists, legends are not a valid basis for a sure verdict free from any doubt.

In view of the innovation created by the Charter in the history of law of all times and all nations in passing a final, irreversible sentence upon an absent defendant, I beg the High Tribunal to make use of its right to carry through such a procedure only after having considered the hitherto existing legal conceptions and especially when examining the case to consider the prerequisites set down in a particularly precise manner by the Russian law.

DEFENSE

I, therefore, expressly propose that the Tribunal decide to suspend the proceedings against the defendant Bormann until he is personally heard and can personally state his case, and that the Tribunal make no use of its right according to Article 12.

PART II

PRE-TRIAL INTERROGATIONS*

I. HERMANN WILHELM GOERING **

Testimony of Hermann Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, on 27 August 1945, by Colonel John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Mr. Ralph Albrecht; OUSCC, T/4 Frederick Schnable, Interpreter.

Refusal to Take Oath Before Testifying

Q. Will you raise your right hand?

A. Before that, I want to get some instructions in law regarding which kind of law I am going to be sworn for. I would like to know whether this is only a hearing, or a regular trial or what it is.

Q. You are being interrogated, and you are being asked to be sworn, in order to tell the truth.

A. If I am accused, I can't be sworn in.

Q. You don't have to be sworn if you don't want to. You have not yet been accused of anything.

A. I am ready to tell you the truth to the best of my knowledge.

Q. Have you any objection to being sworn then?

A. I have those objections because I don't know what my position is here now.

Q. In other words, you refuse to be sworn?

A. No, but I am ready to speak the truth to the best of my knowledge. There is another reason: I can't control the interpreter and do not know whether he interprets correctly what I say, and I could only confirm an interrogation if I was given a German record which I would sign if it was correct.

Q. Nobody has asked you to put your signature on any document.

A. Well, if that is not so, I am not forced to take an oath. I have

*Other interrogations previously published in Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression, but not otherwise referred to in this volume are as follows:

Bloemberg, Werner von: I. Supp. A, p. 1298.

Doenitz, Karl: 3150-PS, Vol. V, p. 911, D-866, Supp. A, p. 988.

Funk, Waltehr: 2828-PS, Vol. V, p. 478; 3544-PS, Vol. VI, p. 217; 3952-PS, Supp. A, p. 682; 3953-PS, Supp. A, p. 683.

Schacht, Hjalmar: 3724-PS, Vol. VI, p. 463; 3725-PS, Vol. VI, p. 464; 3726-PS, Vol. VI, p. 465; 3727-PS, Voy. VI, p. 478; 3728-PS, Vol. VI, p. 485; 3729-PS, Vol. VI, p. 501.

Speer, Albert: 3720-PS, Vol. VI, p. 488.

Schwerin von Krosigk, Lutz Graf: 3731-PS, Vol. VI, p. 535.

See also documents 3593-PS, Vol. VI, p. 298; 3730-PS, Vol. VI, p. 530; TC-90, Vol. VIII, p. 534.

INTERROGATIONS

been interrogated before, and I made statements and when I read them afterwards they were exactly the opposite of what I said.

Q. Do I then understand that you refuse to be sworn?

A. Only after I saw what I said I want to give the oath on my statement.

Q. In other words, if you were given a chance to read what you say, you will then swear to it, if it is what you said?

A. Yes.

Hossbach's Records of Hitler's War Conferences

Q. Are you acquainted with Hossbach?

A. Yes.

Q. What was his full name?

A. I want to mention at this time that I have been asked by American officers very often for the first names. In Germany it is not usual to use the first names, and I don't even know the first names of my closest collaborators.

Q. What was Hossbach's job?

A. When I first met him, he was chief aide de camps to the Fuehrer. Later he reverted to the General Staff from where he had come. I met him again during the war for a few minutes when he commanded a division. I don't know what happened to him afterwards.

Q. Did he enjoy the confidence of the Fuehrer?

A. He had the confidence of the Fuehrer during the part of his career in the army but lost it later in connection with the Fritsch case. However, it was always our opinion that Hossbach was never a warm supporter of the Fuehrer.

Q. What were his duties in the year 1937?

A. At that time he was Chief Adjutant of the Fuehrer.

Q. What were his duties in that position?

A. He was Chief Adjutant and as such was responsible for the military office of the Fuehrer and all the other duties that an Adjutant normally performs. As far as I remember, he was also a member of the General Staff at that time being a Personnel Officer for General Staff Clerical Personnel.

Q. Did he act as the recorder of what transpired at various meetings attended by the Fuehrer?

A. Not officially. Not unless the Fuehrer gave him a special order to do so.

Q. Did the Fuehrer from time to time give him official orders to record what transpired at meetings?

A. Not in my presence, but I wasn't there all the time. But I am of the opinion that he might have made notes without having received any special orders to do so because he was in close contact with the Chief of Staff of the Army to report to him about it afterwards.

Q. But you have attended numerous meetings, have you not, at which Hossbach was present and made notes and recordings of such meetings?

A. I never paid any attention if in the many meetings which I attended and at which Hossbach was also present, he made any notes or not. I never paid any attention if he did make any notes.

Q. But if minutes of various meetings are in existence, signed by Hossbach, they are doubtless authentic, are they not?

A. They don't have to be authentic. It is possible that they reflect only an opinion of Hossbach of what the Fuehrer said. I know for myself that I sometimes, when I saw the protocols which my Adjutants had taken, told them that some of the things were incorrect or some of the notes had another meaning, and I know that from my own experience.

Q. I am not talking about your Adjutant. I am talking about Hossbach.

A. Therefore, I think that the same thing could also apply to Hossbach.

Q. Do you know of any case where Hossbach ever incorrectly recorded the minutes of a meeting?

A. I have never seen any of Hossbach's reports and therefore I can't say anything about them.

Q. Do you recall a particularly important meeting which was held in Berlin on 10 November 1937?*

A. In Berlin?

Q. Yes. A meeting at which the Fuehrer stated that he had decided not to discuss the matter in the cabinet because of its outstanding importance?

A. I can't recall the date.

Q. Will it help you to remember if I tell you who were present?

A. Maybe.

Q. The Fuehrer, Blomberg, von Fritsch, Raeder, Goering, Neurath, and Hossbach as the recorder.

A. Such conferences took place two or three times.

Q. But I am asking if you can recall a particularly important one which took place in November of 1937?

A. No. I don't recall this certain conference.

Q. Will it help you to remember if I suggest that it was a

* See document 386-PS, Vol. III, p. 295.

INTERROGATIONS

conference at which the Fuehrer expressed his future plans of action?

A. He did that, too, more than once. It is very difficult to say. The Fuehrer was afraid that the army, in particular, did not carry out his rearmament program as forcefully and radically as he wanted it. He regarded Fritsch, the Chief of Staff, and General Beck as obstacles in that respect, and, therefore, he represented his ideas as being necessary in the interest and defense of Germany.

Q. But do you recall a meeting in November at which he particularly discussed the expansion of his foreign policy, and requested that his statements be looked upon in the case of his death as his last will and testament?

A. He did not say that this should be his will in case of his death. I don't believe it, because he also told me in the Reichstag when he nominated Hess as the third in succession, that I would be free to take steps should I succeed him, as he was free to make his own decisions.

Q. But that is not what I am talking about at this time. I am asking whether you can't recall a meeting in November of 1937 at which the Fuehrer stated that what he said about the expansion of his foreign policy was what he wished to be considered as his last will and testament in case he died.

A. I only mentioned that because I don't believe that he said that, because as far as I remember, he never spoke about his last will in case of his death. About his own future plans he has spoken more often, but never about his last will.

Q. It is so written in the official documents.

A. What?

Q. It is recorded that such a meeting took place, and I am only trying to recall that meeting to your recollection.

A. I only understood in the question that if there has been something written down about the foreign policy, the future foreign policy.

Q. That is correct.

A. A written last will of the foreign policy was never laid down.

Q. The document is in our possession.

A. The Fuehrer never showed it to me.

Q. That is all for today. I want you to try to think, between now and tomorrow, whether you can't recall this meeting in November of 1937 at which the expansion of Germany's foreign policy was discussed among those whose names I have already given you.

A. As I stated before, there have been several conferences where foreign policy was mentioned. What the Fuehrer said as an overall picture, I know, but what he said on this particular date, I cannot recall. Austria, the Anschluss, Sudeten Germany, Danzig, the question of the Corridor, expansion to the East—he spoke about that frequently.

Q. This was a full and complete statement of the overall policy which was to be adopted from that time on.

A. But that is not so. It was the way of the Fuehrer to try to influence people to gather their strength and use it in a certain direction that he got enthusiastic and gave a bigger picture, an overall picture of a whole situation to impress, but it wasn't meant as a principle. The principle existed only in the question of Austria, Sudeten Germany, and the Corridor.

Q. Czechoslovakia?

A. No. That came as a surprise to all of us.

Q. That is not in accordance with the official documents either.

A. But I can say so, because at first only the question of the Sudeten Germans was a principle of foreign policy for him. The question of the remaining part of Czechoslovakia was deferred depending on solution of the Sudeten problem. When I say that it was a surprise to me and to most of us I mean that after the Munich Pact the occupation of Czechoslovakia was a surprise.

Testimony of Hermann Goering taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 28 August 1945, by Col. John H. Amen. Also present: Pfc. Herbert T. Baru, Interpreter; Nancy M. Shields, Reporter.

Hitler's 1937 Planning for Aggression

Q. Do you recall at one or the other of these meetings, the Fuehrer stating that Germany would have to decide upon three different cases or alternatives?*

A. I cannot recall exactly whether the question of three alternatives was brought up but it was, of course, the Fuehrer's duty in this close circle of his collaborators, military and political, to discuss all alternatives present for Germany.

Q. Do you recall that one of these cases was that from 1937 any change would be for the worse so far as Germany's existing situation was concerned? For example, that the rearming of the Army, Navy, and Air Force was practically concluded.

A. No. It was not finished by a long stretch, but he did say that at a certain time the other powers would catch up with the initial advantage Germany had in armament. In 1937 the German rearmament was not completed.

* See document 386-PS, Vol. III, p. 295.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. But that relatively with the other countries, the German position would not improve as time went on?

A. No. He thought the situation would become more unfavorable to Germany as time went by. It was for the purpose of that that the Generals would speed their rearmament.

Q. And that the equipment of the armies was modern and might deteriorate as time went on?

A. Yes, that also.

Q. That the secrecy of special weapons might get out?

A. No new weapons in that sense worth mentioning existed in 1937. They were merely modern constructions of existing weapons and there were no new weapons in the sense of the secret weapons of later years.

Q. And that the enlistment of reserves would be limited to current recruiting age groups and an additional number from older, untrained groups would be no longer available as time went on?

A. Yes, this also was discussed.

Q. And all of these matters were stated by the Fuehrer at that meeting or at one or the other of these meetings?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you also recall his saying at or about 1937 that should Germany not act until 1943 to 1945, then being dependent on the absence of reserves, any year might bring about a food crisis for the countering of which Germany did not possess the necessary foreign currency?

A. Yes, the Fuehrer once spoke about it in very general terms. I don't remember if it was on this exact date. Also, it is not quite sure whether the years 1943 and 1945 were mentioned but I do remember that the Fuehrer said if the problem was not solved in the near future a crisis in food might develop.

Q. Do you also recall him saying this must be considered a weakness in the regime and he did consider it such?

A. Yes. The Fuehrer himself would have considered it a weakness in the regime.

Q. And that the world would anticipate action from Germany and would increase counter measures yearly?

A. I don't remember precisely but this is well within the trend of Hitler's thought.

Q. And that while other nations isolated themselves, Germany would be forced on the offensive?

A. It is not quite clear what is meant by "other nations isolating themselves."

Q. Withdrawing themselves from Germany?

A. Hitler never imagined a complete state of isolation. He always thought in terms of groups of nations.

Q. And do you recall his stating that in view of all these various factors that Germany could wait no longer to prepare for offensive war?

A. No. Hitler certainly did not say so because in 1937 the German Army was not sufficiently progressed. It was still on the ascendance and no immediate war was intended.

Q. I am talking about the speech that Hitler made, possibly not what he had in mind, but the speech.

A. He may have said "within the next years" but not as of 1937.

Q. But do you not recall that he stated in 1937 that on the one side were large armed German forces with the necessity for securing their upkeep, the aging of the Nazi movement and its leaders and on the other side the prospect of the lowering of the standard of living and a drop in the birth rate which left Germany no choice other than to act?

A. Certainly Hitler did not speak of any possible fall in the birth rate because at that time there was a steady increase in the birth rate.

Q. How about the rest of it?

A. He certainly did not refer to the aging of the movement, but possibly to his own personal age.

Q. Specifically, do you not recall the Fuehrer stating that if he was still living, it was his irrevocable decision to solve the German problem of space not later than 1943 to 1945?

A. No. Hitler did not mention any definite date but he did say it was his decision to solve the problem during the time of his own life. He may have referred to those years as a turning point from which time the equilibrium of power would be in disfavor of Germany.

Q. Does it not help you to remember if I suggest that he said the necessity for action before 1943 to 1945 must come under consideration in Cases 2 and 3 which I haven't yet questioned you about but will right away?

A. I don't remember that Hitler said anything with such precision but I would like to hear the cases so that I can remember.

Q. I have now given you Case 1. Here is Case 2. Should the social tensions in France lead to an internal political crisis of such dimensions that it absorbs the French Army and thus renders it incapable of employment in war against Germany, then the time for action against Czechoslovakia has come.

INTERROGATIONS

A. I do remember that Hitler spoke about internal crisis in France and said he was well aware such a crisis would naturally materially help his plans, but made no specific reference to Czechoslovakia but I remember that he spoke about a crisis in France.

Q. The documents and other witnesses are quite to the contrary.

A. But he certainly spoke about a crisis in France. I remember it very clearly.

Q. But if a crisis developed, then the time for action against Czechoslovakia had come?

A. Hitler said approximately that, if the interior crisis in France developed more, it would then be a moment for Germany to begin discussions on the questions which needed solution.

Q. But then action would be taken against Czechoslovakia?

A. It is possible that he said that also. It was one of the points in the program that the Sudetenland would have to be liberated.

Q. If the documents show that, you would not dispute it?

A. What, in particular?

Q. Action against Czechoslovakia, that is?

A. It is quite possible.

Q. Now Case 3. It would be equally possible to act against Czechoslovakia if France should be too tied up by war against another state that it cannot proceed against Germany.

A. Yes. That is one of the same suppositions.

Q. Do you not recall that the Fuehrer so stated?

A. Yes, it may well have been within the trends of his thought.

Q. And for the improvement of Germany's military and political position it must be their first aim in every case of entanglement by war to conquer Czechoslovakia and Austria simultaneously in order to remove any threat from the flanks in case of a possible advance from the west?

A. Yes, he said so.

Q. And that in the case of a conflict with France it would hardly be necessary to assume that Czechoslovakia would declare war on the same day as France?

A. I don't remember, but it is possible.

Q. And that Czechoslovakia's desire to participate in the war would increase proportionately to the degree to which Germany was being weakened and its actual participation could make itself felt by an attack on Silesia either towards the north or the west?

A. Yes, sir, as far as weakened is concerned, Hitler said it. Hitler always called Czechoslovakia "the aircraft carrier of the enemy" and considered that one of the most pertinent threats against Germany. He was of the opinion that whether there would be a war against the west or the east, Czechoslovakia would have to be eliminated first in the same moment.

Q. Did you not also hear him say that once Czechoslovakia was conquered and a mutual Germany-Hungary frontier was obtained, then a neutral attitude by Poland in a German-French conflict could more easily be relied upon?

A. Yes. I remember that Hitler said that.

Q. And also that Germany's agreements with Poland remain valid only as long as Germany's strength remains unshakeable and that should Germany have any set-backs then an attack by Poland against East Prussia, perhaps also Pomerania and Silesia, must be taken into account?

A. Yes.

Q. And that, assuming a development of the situation which would lead to a planned attack on Germany's part in 1943 or 1945, the behavior of France, England, Poland, and Russia would probably have to be judged as follows:

A. I will have to listen to what follows. I don't remember that Hitler referred to such precise dates.

Q. Do you not recall the Fuehrer stating that he personally believed that in all probability England and perhaps also France had already silently written off Czechoslovakia and that they had got used to the idea that this question would one day be cleaned up by Germany?

A. Yes. I don't recall precisely whether Hitler said that on November 10 but it was certainly the trend of thought.

Q. When I get through, I think you will probably remember that all these things were said at that one meeting.

A. These things have been stated repeatedly.

Q. And that the difficulties in the British Empire and the prospect of being entangled in another long-drawn-out European war were decisive factors in the non-participation of England in a war against Germany?

A. Yes, such thoughts were expressed.

Q. And that the British attitude would certainly not remain without influence on France's attitude then?

A. Yes. Hitler always considered France entirely dependent on the British attitude.

Q. And that an attack without British support was hardly probable, assuming that its offensive would stagnate along our western fortifications?

A. Yes.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Without England's support it would also not be necessary to take into consideration a march by France through Belgium into Holland and this would also not have to be reckoned with by us in case of a conflict with France as in every case it would have as a consequence the enmity of Britain.

A. No, I don't remember that Hitler ever spoke of an isolated war against France. It was always his conception that a war with France would also be with Great Britain but it is possible that he made a general reference to such a possibility which, however, he didn't believe himself.

Q. Did you not hear him state this: Naturally, we should in every case have to bar the frontier during the operation of our attacks against Czechoslovakia and Austria?

A. Yes, but he didn't fear any attacks from Austria. The Czech frontier was more in his mind.

Q. It must be taken into consideration here that Czech defensive measures will increase in strength from year to year and the consolidation of the inside values of the Austrian Army will also be affected in the course of years.

A. I remember well that Hitler spoke of Czechoslovakia but not of Austria. That would be impossible, furthermore, because of the disintegration of the Austrian Army which was on the increase at that time and if Hitler said anything of the kind it was merely done to impress upon the gentlemen of the army the necessity for arming and he may have advanced arguments he didn't himself believe.

Q. Do you also recall him stating that although the population of Czechoslovakia is not a thin one, the embodiment of Czechoslovakia and Austria would nevertheless constitute the conquest of food for five to six million people on the basis that a compulsory emigration of two million people from Czechoslovakia and one million from Austria could be carried out?

A. That I believe is utter nonsense, because everybody knew that Austria needs imports of foods and that nothing grew on the Austrian mountains. It must be an error.

Q. The question is, whether or not the Fuehrer said it.

A. The only thing said about evacuation that I remember is that three or four hundred thousand Czechs residing in Vienna and Linz could be sent to Czechoslovakia. That was the only evacuation referred to. But again, about the gain of food, that is utter nonsense because Czechoslovakia may be self-sufficient and able to export a little but Austria has always been a country needing imports of food.

Q. Do you recall the Fuehrer saying that the annexation of these states to Germany, militarily and politically, would constitute a considerable relief owing to shorter and better frontiers, the freeing of fighting personnel for other purposes and the prospect of reconstituting new armies up to a strength of about 12 Divisions, representing a new division per one million population?

A. Yes, on the whole. Hitler said the frontier and the situation in Germany would be materially improved and he figured a number of new divisions from Austria and Sudetenland. It may be he arrived at a number of twelve. I think that is probably correct.

Q. Do you recall the Fuehrer saying no opposition to the removal of Czechoslovakia was expected on the part of Italy; however, it cannot be judged today what would be her attitude to the Czech question since that would depend on whether the Duce were alive or not?

A. Yes, those were his thoughts.

Q. And that is what he said?

A. Yes, very well. He said that repeatedly. I cannot pin down exactly that he said it at that meeting.

Q. Do you also recall his stating that the measure, the speed of our action would decide Poland's attitude? Poland would have little inclination to enter the war against a victorious Germany with Russia in its rear?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you also recall his stating that military participation by Russia must be countered by the speed of our operations? It is a question whether this need be taken into consideration at all in view of Japan's attitude?

A. It is possible.

Q. Do you not recall his having said that at any time?

A. Yes. Such things were said repeatedly.

Q. And that, should Case 2 occur, which you remember was to paralyze France by civil war, then the situation should be utilized at any time for operations against Czechoslovakia as Germany's most dangerous enemy would be eliminated?

A. Yes; he has said so before.

Q. And also that the Fuehrer sees Case 3 looming near? It could develop from the existing tension in the Mediterranean. Should it occur, he has decided to make use of it at any time, perhaps even as early as 1938?

A. I want to know again what Case 3 is.

Q. Case 3 is that it would be equally possible to act against Czechoslovakia if France should be so tied up in a war against another state that it could not proceed against Germany.

INTERROGATIONS

A. Yes. He said that for whatever reason France would be incapable of acting, it would then be the moment for settling the Austrian and Czechoslovakian question.

Q. And following the recent experience of the course of events in the war in Spain, the Fuehrer did not see an early end to the hostilities there?

A. That is correct.

Q. And taking into consideration the time required for past offensives by Franco, a further three years' duration of the war is within the bounds of possibility?

A. I cannot recall precisely Hitler speaking of three years, but I remember he said it would go on for much longer.

Q. And on the other hand, from Germany's point of view, a 100 percent victory for Franco is not desirable? We are more interested in the continuation of the war and the preservation of the tensions in the Mediterranean?

A. First of all, I do not recall that Hitler said anything of that kind at that particular time. Such opinions are in contradiction to Hitler's opinions. Germany was engaged in the war in Spain and had no interest to be engaged too long in such a war, and also it had to be feared that incidents might develop out of that engagement in the Spanish war which might lead to conflicts which at that time were not intended and not helpful to the freedom of action.

Q. Is that something that Hitler might have said for the benefit of the military?

A. It is possible that he said some such thing because he often used arguments which were supporting the argument of the moment and not in the general trend of his thought. I do not recall the extremes, but I remember very well the general trend of thought.

Q. Do you also remember the Fuehrer stating that should Franco be in sole possession of the Spanish peninsula, it would mean the end of the Italian intervention and the presence of Italy on the Balearic Isles?

A. Yes, I remember that such things were said.

Q. Do you also remember his stating: However, a solidification of Italian possession of the Balearic Isles cannot be tolerated either by France or England and could lead to a war by France and England against Italy in which Spain, if in Franco's hands, could participate on the side of Italy's enemies?

A. Yes, it was true that Hitler said the Italians should not use their intervention in the Spanish war to establish themselves on the Balearic Isles because that would lead to conflict with England and with Franco, who could not tolerate their presence there.

Q. And that a subjugation of Italy in such a war appeared very unlikely?

A. That is not clear. A subjugation of Italy in what war?

Q. The war by France and England against Italy?

A. Whatever over-estimation of Italy may have been the case, I don't believe that! Hitler was sure that France by herself or England by herself could quite certainly defeat Italy and even Franco by himself might defeat Italy.

Q. Did you hear Hitler say that Italy's military strategy would be to remain on the defensive, and carry out operations against France from Libya against North African colonial possessions?

A. I don't recall precisely, and again, I must say that I don't recall certain observations of Hitler to support a momentary theory. It may well have been that Hitler said something in theory that he would do, if he were the military commander of Italy he would have such-and-such a plan.

Q. If the documents show that Hitler said that, you would not dispute it?

A. No. I think it is quite possible but not in the sense of speaking of Italian policy but rather that, if Hitler were in charge of the Italian affairs, he would behave in such a manner.

Q. That is the manner in which the Fuehrer often spoke, is it not?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you also recall the Fuehrer speaking about Italy and stating: As a landing of French and British troops on the Italian coast can be discounted and as a French offensive via the Alps to Upper Italy would be extremely difficult and would probably stagnate before the strong Italian fortifications, French lines of communication by the Italian fleet will to a great extent paralyze the transport of fighting personnel from Africa to France, so that at its frontiers with Italy and Germany France will have at its disposal solely the metropolitan fighting forces?

A. This was the opinion in 1937 but in 1939 when I visited the fortifications on the Italian-French frontier, my opinion changed.

Q. But you do recall his making statements of that kind on frequent occasions?

A. No, those things weren't said frequently. He may have said it once and again, Hitler transposed himself into being the military commander of Italy and pointed out what he would do in such a position.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Doesn't all this help you to remember that all these things were said by the Fuehrer on this occasion?

A. I cannot pin it down but I have no doubt it is possible. Such things were said so often and in so many circles and when the Fuehrer was taking walks with me alone but it is possible he said it. I cannot pin it down. I will not dispute it because it is entirely possible that Hitler said that, only certain points may have been misinterpreted when they were copied down at the time.

Q. Do you recall the Fuehrer saying that if Germany profits from the war by disposing of the Czechoslovakian and Austrian questions, the probability must be presumed that England, being at war with Italy, would decide not to commence operations against Germany and that without British support a warlike action by France against Germany is not to be anticipated?

A. Very surely, sir.

Q. Do you also recall him stating: The date of our attack on Czechoslovakia and Austria must be made dependent on the course of the Italian-English-French war and would not be simultaneous with the commencement of military agreements with Italy but of full independence and, by exploiting this unique favorable opportunity, he wishes to begin to carry out operations against Czechoslovakia? The attack on Czechoslovakia would have to take place with the speed of lightning?

A. In this case Hitler may have spoken of the entirely unlikely case that Italy would be in an independent war against other powers but all that amounts to the fact that Hitler said the Czechoslovakian and Austrian problem must be solved at the time when other powers were involved in other wars. It revolves around that point.

Q. Do you also recall the Fuehrer saying that Blomberg and Fritsch repeatedly pointed out that England and France must not appear as enemies and they stated the war with Italy would to such an extent bind the enemy that it would not be in a position to commence operations on our own frontier with superior forces?

A. Certainly the gentlemen of the army were so afraid of France that they certainly said it.

Q. Also, that Fritsch estimated the French forces which would be presumably employed by the French and Italian frontier, to be in the region of 20 divisions, so that a strong superiority would still remain on our western frontier?

A. I don't recall precisely the 20 divisions but Fritsch said repeatedly very much was to be feared from France.

Q. Do you recall the Fuehrer saying that the French would, according to German reasoning, attempt to advance into the Rhineland?

A. Yes, if it was according to the Generals, the French would have advanced into Berlin.

Q. That we should consider the lead the French had in mobilization and quite apart from the very small value of our own fortifications the four motorized divisions laid down for the west would be more or less incapable of movement?

A. That is absolutely right. That was the purpose of the whole meeting because the general staff had no confidence in their armies and no confidence in their fortifications but were in fear of France.

Q. But you do now recall that all this was said at that one meeting?

A. Such meetings occurred three or four times; once, before they left the League of Nations; before they published the re-armament laws, and in all such issues such meetings were called, and that on every such occasion the gentlemen of the army were so afraid that it is quite possible that Hitler said again all the things said at that meeting.

Q. Do you also recall the Fuehrer saying that in regard to our offensive in south-easterly direction von Blomberg drew special attention to the Czech fortifications, the building of which had assumed the character of the Maginot Line and which would present extreme difficulties to our attack?

A. I remember that well, and the army did nothing else but draw attention to the German weakness and the strength of her enemies. Again, another such meeting was called when they entered the Rhine.

Q. I will question you about that later. Do you also recall the Fuehrer stating that Von Fritsch said it was the purpose of the study he had laid on for this winter to investigate the possibility and carrying out offensives against Czechoslovakia with special consideration of the conquest of the Czech fortifications? That the general also stated that owing to prevailing conditions he would have to relinquish his leave abroad which was to begin on 10 November?

A. Yes, it was the duty of von Fritsch to prepare such studies.

Q. Do you also recall Fritsch stating that this intention was countermanded by the Fuehrer who gave as his reason that the possibility of the conflict was not to be regarded as being so imminent?

A. Only in the sense that the general should not put this study above the level of normal studies of the General Staff.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Do you also recall the Fuehrer stating in reply to a remark by the Minister of Foreign Affairs that the Italian-French-English conflict was not so near as the Fuehrer appeared to assume, the Fuehrer stated that the date which appeared to him to be a possibility was the summer of 1938?

A. No, I don't remember that and although the Fuehrer may have spoken in general terms about a possible Italian-English-French conflict, he didn't really believe such a thing would occur.

Q. But if the documents show the Fuehrer said that in a speech you would not dispute it?

A. Then I would merely have to add that the Fuehrer said something that in his inner soul he did not believe.

Q. In reply to statements by von Blomberg and Fritsch regarding the English and French attitude, the Fuehrer repeated his previous statements and said he was convinced of England's non-participation and consequently he did not believe there would be military action by France against Germany?

A. About the non-participation of England—in what case did the Fuehrer speak of non-participation?

Q. That he believed that Britain would not participate under the circumstances as the Fuehrer foresaw them?

A. Yes, it is correct it has always been his opinion that France would not act independently of England.

Q. Assuming that neither England nor France would take military action at that time?

A. Yes. Why should they?

Q. Do you recall the Fuehrer stating: Should the Mediterranean conflict already mentioned lead to a general mobilization in Europe then we should have to commence operations against Czechoslovakia immediately? If, however, the powers not participating the war declared themselves disinterested, then Germany would, for the time being, have to side with this attitude?

A. Yes, that is contained in the general trend of thought.

Q. By and large, you can state that everything that I have repeated to you as being stated by the Fuehrer was so stated by him at one or more of these meetings in 1937?

A. On the whole this may well have been said. However, it is eight years ago and I do not remember whether it was on 10 November. Some slight errors may have been made in copying down things which were said.

Goering's Part in the Obersalzberg Speech

Q. Do you recall a speech at which you were present which was made by the Fuehrer at Obersalzberg on 22 August 1939?*

* See document 798-PS, Vol. III, p. 581; 1014-PS, Vol. III, p. 665; L-3, Vol. VII, p. 752.

A. To whom was the address directed?

Q. To the Commanding Generals and Supreme Commanders,
A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember that was the speech where you jumped up on a table after the speech and led a demonstration?

A. I dispute the fact that I stood on a table but as the ranking officer at the end of all such events I assured the Fuehrer of our loyalty to the cause.

Q. I said that to remind you of the speech?

A. Yes, I remember it but I did not stand on the table.

Q. What did you do?

A. It was the custom in such meetings where Hitler addressed the commanding generals and high officers (which wasn't too frequent) that at the end of such a meeting I would thank the Fuehrer for his speech and secondly to say the speech had found a warm echo in our hearts and to assure him of our support.

Testimony of Hermann Goering taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 29 August 1945, 1430-1640, by Col. John H. Amen.

*Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter;
S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Reporter.*

Planning the Invasion of Poland

Q. Well, doesn't what I have read to you help you, then, to remember what he actually did say in the speech on that day [22
August 1939]*

A. As far as I can remember he gave expression on this date to his determination to solve the question of the Polish Corridor, and it is quite possible that armed conflict might result from this;
and in this connection he discussed with the generals the possibility and eventualities of an armed conflict, be it with Poland alone or also with the western powers, and that he tried—I don't know exactly how to express it but I think the word "Vergleich" expresses it; that is literally translated an equitable solution—for an equitable solution, and that it was his belief that the attitude of Russia would prevent the western powers from entering into armed conflict with him. He elaborated on the two cases, be it war against Poland alone or be it war against Poland and the western powers, at that meeting. He mentioned to the generals his own views of what might happen in such a conflict, and he insisted that it was necessary to complete the campaign in Poland as quickly and as effectively as possible in case of intervention by the western powers. Whether he said this actually in his speech or mentioned it afterwards in the inner circle of

* See footnote p. 1102.

INTERROGATIONS

his intimates I do not know, but he said that he hoped that with a quick completion of the Polish campaign the Western Powers at any rate would be ready to talk peace with him.

He further reasoned that he would make no air attacks against the west, but would use the whole force of the German Luftwaffe against Poland. It was furthermore his opinion that German Naval forces should not engage in active warfare with either French or British Naval forces. He was of the opinion that a quick completion of the Polish campaign, even in the case that the western powers should stick by their pledge to come to the aid of Poland, would convince them that it was better to make peace, especially after seeing that Germany and Russia had come to an accord over the matter of Poland. He also elaborated in a general way about such things as we mentioned here yesterday.

Q. Is it not fair to say, then, that this was the occasion upon which the Fuehrer announced to the generals his decision for an immediate attack upon Poland?

A. It was his habit to address his officers personally before each campaign. Most of the officers present there must have known of the fact that the Polish campaign was coming through orders that they had received or handled, but no doubt a few of them learned of the coming campaign in this way.

Q. Also is it not fair to say that it was in the nature of a pep talk for the impending attack upon Poland?

A. Yes, it was a pep talk in case the campaign was coming.

Q. And the campaign did come almost immediately thereafter, did it not?

A. Yes, but I wish to remind you of the fact that in September or just before September there were still all kinds of diplomatic activities going on which had as their object the peaceful solution of the problem of the Polish Corridor and other questions related to that. I admit the Fuehrer was sceptical from the first because he did not assume that the Poles would enter into any compromises regarding the question of the Polish Corridor or Danzig. We knew that Foreign Minister Beck of Poland was willing to enter into compromises, but we also knew that the military people of Poland were not willing to do so because they regarded Germany as very much weaker than she was in actuality.

I want to make another addition. I wish to add that yesterday we talked about my jumping on a table after the speech to which you have referred so many times. I want you to know that the speech was made in the great hall of Hitler's private house and I did not have the habit of jumping on tables in private homes.

Also this would have been an attitude completely inconsistent with that of a German officer.

Q. Well, the fact is, however, that as you explained in conformity with custom you led the applause after the speech?

A. Yes, but not on the table.

Q. And it was an address which was enthusiastically received by you and the other persons present?

A. Enthusiastic? Well, yes, it was perhaps enthusiastic in the sense that the officers who were present there applauded his speech and then declared emphatically that they would do their duty.

Q. When the negotiations of the Polish foreign minister in London brought about the Anglo-Polish treaty at the end of March or beginning of April 1939, was it not fairly obvious that a peaceful solution was impossible?

A. Yes, it seemed impossible after my convictions, but not according to the convictions of the Fuehrer. When it was mentioned to the Fuehrer that England had given her guarantee to Poland, he said that England was also guaranteeing Rumania, but then when the Russians took Bessarabia nothing happened, and this made a big impression on him. I made a mistake here. At this time Poland only had the promise of a guarantee. The guarantee itself was only given shortly before the beginning of the war. On the day when England gave her official guarantee to Poland the Fuehrer called me on the telephone and told me that he had stopped the planned invasion of Poland. I asked him whether this was just temporary or for good. He said, "No, I will have to see whether we can eliminate British intervention." So then I asked him, "Do you think that it will be any different within four or five days?"

At this same time—I don't know whether you know about that, Colonel—I was in communication with Lord Halifax through a special courier outside the regular diplomatic channels to do everything to stop war with England. After the guarantee I held an English declaration of war inevitable. I already told him in the Spring of 1939 after occupying Czechoslovakia, I told him that from now on if he tried to solve the Polish question he would have to count on the enmity of England. 1939, that is after the Protectorate.

Q. Is it not a fact that preparations for the campaign against Poland were originally supposed to have been completed by the end of August 1939?

A. Yes.

Q. And that the final issuance of the order for the campaign against Poland came sometime between the 15th and 20th of August 1939 after the signing of the treaty with Soviet Russia?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Yes, that is true.

Q. Is it not also a fact that the start of the campaign was ordered for 25 August, but on 24 August in the afternoon it was postponed until 1 September in order to await the results of the new diplomatic maneuvers with the English ambassador?

A. Yes.

Plans for Occupation of Denmark and Norway

Q. Is it not a fact that the decision to occupy Denmark resulted from consideration of the occupation of Norway and was done to shorten the lines of communication overseas and to build a secure communication bridgehead to Norway?

A. Yes. First of all that, and then as the second reason to prevent England making a foothold in Jutland between Norway and Germany.

Q. In Norway did you try to negotiate with the government immediately after the entrance of German troops?

A. Yes.

Q. At the end of December or early in January 1940, you expected English landings on the Norwegian coast?

A. From then on we worried all the time about the possibility of English landings in Norway.

Q. Was the reason for the postponement until 9 April because of the fact that the Baltic Sea was frozen?

A. Yes, the situation as far as the weather was concerned. The thing would have been put off still further but we had definite proof that England was getting ready to make landings in Norway.

Q. But he had planned it for the earliest possible date?

A. Yes, to the date best suited to the weather. This particular date was very bad for the air force because Norway had only few airports and those north of Oslo were still under snow at that time.

Q. Was there any over-all plan other than to occupy the most important harbors and airports by surprise from both air and sea?

A. Yes. The original plan called only for the occupation of the most important harbors and airports and there weren't even enough forces to occupy one point, on which I in particular had insisted, Andalsnes, and that exactly proved to be the point where later on the English landed.

Q. Was it planned that heavy weapons should precede the landing?

A. Yes. That is only at Narvik. There were several coal and ore boats which we were going to use for Narvik. They were loaded with cannon, but they were stopped at Haugesund.

Invasion Plans for Russia and the Balkans

Q. We will take the Balkans for a moment. Is it not a fact that the decision to take part in the Balkans occurred only when the Italians became impotent in Greece?

A. Not right at that time because the attack of Italy against Greece was done without our knowledge and the Fuehrer tried to stop that by flying to see the Duce but he was unfortunately four hours late.

Q. The Fuehrer wanted to occupy Crete rather than the Greek mainland, did he not?

A. That was very much later. Only when the putsch in Belgrade forced us to act did we become interested in that.

Q. Why was the Fuehrer unable to stop the Italian operations toward Greece?

A. I can say that exactly. The Fuehrer coming back from a conference with Franco on the Franco-Spanish border heard about the Duce having such a plan and ordered his train to proceed to Florence at once to meet the Duce there. As far as we know, and I can only say as far as we know, the proposed invasion of Greece by the Italians was not meant to be done on this date, but the Italians realized that the Fuehrer would very strongly object to such an invasion. They ordered the invasion to start at six o'clock the next morning in spite of bad weather. The Fuehrer got there at ten o'clock and he wanted to make remonstrations with the Duce. The Duce told him, "It has already happened, but there is nothing to worry about because we will be done in a few days."

Q. That was presumably done for political reasons on the part of the Italians?

A. With the Italians one never knows whether they are reasons of policy or prestige. The Fuehrer did not want this because of Turkey.

Q. And I presume that the Germans wanted to free their troops as fast as possible for the Russian campaign?

A. The invasion of Russia only took shape in the spring of 1941 at the first, and when he decided, in order to prevent a Russian attack on him, he moved troops in the direction of Rumania, the putsch occurred in Belgrade and these troops were turned about at once to settle the matter in Jugoslavia; since the English had landed in Greece and only when the fateful situation that had developed for the Italian army by encirclement by the Greeks and also the matter of the Yugoslavs had come to a head, the Fuehrer decided for intervention in Greece. There also may have been the reason that he wanted to please Bulgaria, who was then a friend, by occupying Greek territory. The Fuehrer was very unsympathetic towards war with Greece because there was nothing we could gain.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. We will take Crete for a moment. When did the Fuehrer come back to his original idea of occupying Crete? Was it toward the close of the Greek campaign?

A. The Greek campaign was also already finished when Hitler ordered me to occupy Crete at very short notice. This was done quite independently of the Greek campaign, as he wanted to use Crete as a base against the Suez Canal and it also would have been a possible base of the English facing our positions in the Balkans; another reason was that Crete should prevent a possible connection between the fleets of the Black Sea and those of the Mediterranean; that is the Russian and the British fleets.

Q. Was it a part of the purpose to seal off the Aegean Sea and get a bridgehead on the way to North Africa?

A. Yes; as far as blocking off the Aegean Sea goes, that is true. At that time everything was being prepared for the invasion of Russia and nobody thought of going into Africa, but Crete was to be very useful in disturbing traffic for Suez.

Q. Were the preparations for the Crete campaign entirely the responsibility of the Luftwaffe?

A. In the main, but the fleet also had some responsibility and the army, but in the main the Luftwaffe was responsible, that is, with the parachutist division.

Q. What general of the Luftwaffe was in charge?

A. In order to be absolutely sure that the thing would work, I sent my chief of staff, General Jeschonneck down there. The man responsible for Air was General Richthofen.

Q. We will take Russia for a moment. Was it the Fuehrer's original intention to start the Russian Campaign in the fall of 1940?

A. No. Nobody talked about Russia then. No; there was no talk about it at this time but in November 1940 an order was given to prepare for the security of the eastern frontiers. That was in case Russia should assault them.

Q. Is it not a fact that in July 1940 Jodl told his staff officers at Reichenhofen that the Fuehrer had decided to eliminate the threat of Bolshevism?

A. I don't know anything about that. The thing was that in September and October 1940 the Gibraltar campaign was very much on our minds. The first time that I thought about the coming danger of war with Russia was in November 1940 when I was given the preparatory order to secure the borders more than they had been secured before because large attack formations had been observed in Russia. The second thought I had about this was in February 1941 [sic] at the time of the visit of Molotov in Berlin. I watched the attitude of the Fuehrer and that made me think along those lines. That is, the attitude of the Fuehrer towards the demands of Molotov. In the beginning of March Hitler told me that he was determined to prevent a Russian attack in an unfortunate moment for Germany and to act.

Q. At any event, the Fuehrer stated at some point that he proposed to start operations in the spring of 1941 as soon as the weather permitted, did he not?

A. No. I have never heard of that. I think it is impossible because the time was too short. He would not have been able to concentrate his forces in such a short time. Perhaps you are a little mixed up on this because it is true that the attack against Russia would have happened earlier if the Jugoslavia affair hadn't come.

Q. Well, the first written orders, Barbarossa, so-called, were released in the late fall of '41; is that not correct?

A. For Russia. We were already at war in the autumn of 1941.

Q. '40.

A. Those were not orders of attack; they were orders in case the Russians attacked us. We only had very weak forces in the east at that time, as far as I remember only eight divisions. It is possible that Hitler may have spoken about that with his more intimate military advisors, such as Jodl or Keitel, towards the end of 1940, but I don't know that. The first time I ever heard of that was after the visit of Molotov in Berlin when the Fuehrer ordered me to come to him at Berchtesgaden and in a discussion of two hours showed me his reasons for waging a preventative war against Russia.

Q. But doubtless the Barbarossa orders were preceded by discussions between the Fuehrer and his military commanders?

A. Surely.

Q. Is it a fact that the necessity to intervene in the Balkans caused the delay of the opening of the Russian campaign from May '41 to the latter part of June?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Yes, I said that.

Q. And is it a fact that the only final cause for the launching of the Russian campaign was found in matters of exchange of goods as provided in the German-Russian Treaty?

A. No, but through the great preparation for an attack Russia made in her newly won Polish area. I can tell the Colonel all those reasons exactly in this connection.

The reasons for the preventative measures that the Fuehrer took against Russia were the following: The very strong concentration of Russian forces at the German frontier; second, the conspicuous massing of air forces in the newly won area of Poland; third, the factories where the Russian tanks and planes were made, were for the first time shown to Germans and one could see the enormous production and possibilities for production that they had; fourth, a fear that the Russians would increase their economic pressure against Germany by failing to deliver one thing after the other; but the main reason—and I am coming to that now—was the demands that Molotov made in Berlin. Russia wanted to start the war against Finland again in order to occupy all of Finland. Russia also demanded a free hand in Rumania and in the Balkans with respect also to the Dardanelles. In a talk between Molotov and Ribbentrop even bases at the exit of the Baltic Sea were mentioned, and the Fuehrer was afraid that the Russians would not go south from Rumania in the direction of the Dardanelles but that they would move their weight into the southern German flank. He was also afraid that the campaign for the reopening of the campaign against Finland was only an excuse to outflank Germany from the north.

Those were the reasons that made the Fuehrer certain that Russia was going to attack Germany, especially when German forces were going to be committed again in the West through an invasion or something of that nature, because at this time he had the free use of the Army and he was anxious to eliminate this danger as quickly as possible. To this must be added that we had reports from three Russian generals about a talk that Stalin had held in front of his generals in which he said that the treaty with Germany was only a curtain behind which things could be manipulated. Those were the reasons.

Q. Did you personally agree with those reasons?

A. I asked the Fuehrer for permission to return again in the evening in order to state my opinion and then in a long elaboration I voiced my objections to which he listened quietly. I thought that my reasons were carrying a lot of weight. The way I looked at it should Russia again go to war with Finland and expand to the south, it would get into conflict with England, because it was headed for the Dardenelles. I also called the fact to his attention that we already were at war with one of the great world powers, namely, the British Empire, and that without a doubt America, another great world power, would enter the conflict and that it would not be wise to start a conflict with Russia, the third major world power, because that would go beyond our powers. I had no doubts that we would destroy the Russian Army relatively fast. I even held the conviction that this could be done more quickly than the Fuehrer himself believed, but I asked him how he ever expected to get peace with this huge space on his hands. I also told him that the security of this huge space and the security of the extended lines of communication against attacks which were sure to develop from the inside of Asia would take an enormous power to hold, which also was beyond our means. To this was added the fact that my Luftwaffe which at this time was engaged in successful attack upon England would have been stopped in the middle of that attack in order to be committed for the new venture. The Fuehrer thanked me for giving him my reasons and for acting as the agent of the Devil as he put it, but he held the danger was so singular that he decided to go ahead as planned, and he got me to help him as always.

Testimony of Hermann Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 30 August, 1945, 1030-1145, by Colonel John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Reporter.

Responsibility for Armament Program

Q. By whom was the annual program of armament requirements prepared?

A. The Fuehrer, together with the Supreme Commanders of the army and the Minister of War, fixed that; that is, army, navy and air force, and the Minister of War.

Q. How about OKW?

A. The OKW was only founded after 1938 when Minister of War von Blomberg resigned. Then from 1938 on the OKW took its place there instead of the Minister of War.

Q. Represented by Jodl?

A. No. Keitel represented—that is, as far as the questions of armament are concerned.

Q. And were those questions considered in discussions between these individuals?

INTERROGATIONS

A. No, there were rather few discussions. The Fuehrer gave the outlines and only when there were differences about the requirements of raw materials were there discussions. And Keitel usually reported these differences to the Fuehrer.

Q. Before Keitel participated in those discussions, I presume that Blomberg did?

A. Yes.

Q. During what years did Blomberg do that?

A. From the year 1933 until February 1938.

Q. And then Keitel?

A. Yes. Keitel was not directly responsible. Blomberg had been over the three Commanders of the branches of the service and Keitel was not. Now Hitler took the responsibility and made the decisions.

Q. Then in 1942 or shortly thereafter Speer took over?

A. Yes, in the big outlines. It was done in such a manner that Speer was responsible for the requirements in the big outlines. But as far as tactical and technical matters were concerned, the three Commanders of the three branches of service were responsible.

Q. Well, was there closer coordination under the Speer set-up than under the previous arrangement?

A. Coordination was closer with Speer than it had been before.

Q. And what was the set-up under Speer?

A. At first, Speer only took over the office for weapons of the army; then of the navy; and very late also of the air force, in 1944, and he was responsible for all production of war materials, and the three branches of the armed forces were only responsible for the development of tactical and technical details. But the Fuehrer himself very strongly influenced armament in collaboration with Speer.

Q. Then did the Fuehrer approve the final planning?

A. Yes. The Fuehrer even decided upon the plan. Very often he decided upon the number and type of guns, rifles and machine guns to be produced. He, moreover, checked all plans very conscientiously. Three days would hardly have passed without him seeing either Speer or Saur, who then took Speer's place to talk about these things.

Q. And when the plan had been approved by the Fuehrer, was it then announced by Jodl as the Fuehrer's order?

A. That may have happened upon certain occasions. Usually, though, he held Speer directly responsible for that. It is quite possible, however, that in the time between the resignation of von Blomberg and the coming of Speer the Fuehrer may have handled these matters through Jodl.

Q. About when did Speer take over?

A. Todt was already in charge of it before Speer. Todt was only responsible for the armament of the army. That must have been in 1941, referring to Todt.

Q. Well, now, before Speer took over, whose responsibility was it to see that the Fuehrer's orders with respect to armament were executed?

A. For the air force it was my responsibility. For the navy, it was Raeder's and later, Doenitz's responsibility. For the army, Keitel was responsible.

Q. Where did the word "Blitzkrieg" come from?

A. The word "Blitzkrieg" came from England for the first time. The impression that our swift advances made on the English may have caused them to coin the word. And they also used to call our air attacks on England "Blitz."

Q. Referring to armament again, to what parts of the armament did the Fuehrer pay particular interest?

A. His main interest was always in the navy [sic]. He had great knowledge in these matters. The main thing was the army. He only mixed in affairs of the Luftwaffe in 1944.

Q. Apparently in the beginning he had little or no interest in tanks?

A. Yes, tanks especially. He had the habit of doing those things himself. He was especially interested in ships, tanks, and guns. It is his merit that we got the heavy tanks. He asked for this in opposition to all interests in the army.

Q. But prior to the Polish campaign little importance appears to have been attached to tanks. Is that correct?

A. Yes, the Fuehrer recognized the importance of tanks from the first, and he built up his whole plan of campaign in Poland and France on the theory of using tanks.

Q. At approximately what date did the Luftwaffe start to prepare for an attack upon England?

A. Do you mean during the war?

Q. Yes.

A. After the Polish campaign. On the day of the English declaration of war, I personally wanted to attack Scapa Flow, but the Fuehrer did not permit this.

Q. How much of an increase was made in the Luftwaffe following the Polish campaign?

A. The air force was not especially increased after the Polish campaign, but it was increased as production became available.

INTERROGATIONS

I wish to correct myself here; I made a slip. The actual air attack against England was only started on the 6th of September, or possibly 7th of September, 1940. All the previous attacks were only on a small scale.

Q. Well, then, didn't the major development of the Luftwaffe take place in 1939?

A. No. That already took place before that with all available means. Of course, everything increased from year to year, that is, production of planes, and so on.

Q. Well, in your opinion, when was the maximum strength of the Luftwaffe reached?

A. Maximum strength in 1942. And as far as fighter planes are concerned, 1944 or 1945; that is, the end of 1944 and the beginning of 1945.

Hitler Discounts Possibility of America Entering War

Q. I am now going to take up certain excerpts from some of the supplemental memoranda relating to the Green papers.*

A. Yes.

Q. [Reading] "It is not expected that other states will intervene against Germany."

A. Yes, that is right.

Q. And was that your opinion also?

A. No. I have always told the Fuehrer, and even in front of a witness, that it was my belief that if England would be drawn into a war with Germany, sooner or later America would come to her assistance—unless things were going very well for England right from the beginning.

Q. But the Fuehrer did not agree?

A. No. Strangely enough, the Fuehrer held the opinion that America would not enter the war under any condition. He said that America had had such a bad experience in 1918 that America would not participate in a second European conflict unless America itself was touched. He also overestimated considerably the influence of the so-called American isolationists.

Q. Was that opinion based upon advice and information which he received or merely an offhand opinion, so to speak?

A. The first part—I mean the part about the bad experience—was based upon a conversation he once had with Lloyd George. This talk on the whole produced in him a completely false opinion of the English and American attitudes. As far as the American isolationists are concerned, I do not know exactly, but I assume that he received his information in the normal manner.

* Fall Gruen—The plan to invade Czechoslovakia. See document 388-PS, Vol. III, p. 305.

Testimony of Hermann Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 13 September 1945, 1111-1205, by Col. John H. Amen. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Court Reporter.

Hitler's Role as Strategist in the West

Q. I ask to have this photostatic copy of "Memorandum and Directive for Conduct of War in the West" marked for identification as Exhibit A, 13 September 1945 (Goering).*

Do you recall whether the original of this document, or the copies which were distributed, contained the Fuehrer's signature?

A. Yes. All of them.

Q. Now, what were the other principal departures from the plan, as outlined in the memorandum?

A. The principal alteration and departure from this plan, such as is outlined in this memorandum, was simply that we used only infantry divisions in the north. We concentrated the armored divisions in the south, as far as I know, the armored divisions were reinforced until they finally were ten in May.

Q. Were there any departures and changes, so far as the plans outlined for the Luftwaffe were concerned?

A. Yes. There were alterations. As I outlined the other day, in the original plan the main effort of the air force was to be made in the occupation of the Belgian National Redoubt at Ghent by paratroops. That was altered by an occupation of Fort Eben-Emael, and the bridges of the Albert Canal, and the Dutch bridges. Also, by the alterations in the general plan of operations, the center of gravity of operations for the Air Forces was shifted from the north to the south, that is, the breakthrough at Sedan.

Q. Were there any other principal departures from the plans, as outlined in the memorandum?

A. No. The principal plan, which argued for not stopping in front of fortified places, or stopping for towns, but argued for encircling the largest possible element of the enemy, was kept.

Q. How many other similar directives for conduct of the war in the West were issued by the Fuehrer?

A. Does the Colonel mean before the war started in the West?

Q. Yes.

*Document L-52, Vol. VII, p. 800.

INTERROGATIONS

A. Well, there is this thing, and you have to be sure and recognize the fact that this is a memorandum and not a directive. After that, I believe there were one or two directives from the Fuehrer, which were a little more definite in distributing tasks and missions, and then later when the whole plan had to be altered, there again were one or two, but I don't know exactly how many there were.

Q. So that this memorandum or "outline," as you call it, was implemented by subsequent more specific directives, is that so?

A. Yes. That is right. This memorandum here did not give any details whatever. It just stated the principle of the thing, and it formed the spine for any further directives and orders to be given.

Q. And the subsequent directives altered this outline in the various respects, which you have already explained, and went into further detail as to each procedure?

A. Yes.

Q. Was there more than one such specific directive? In other words, were all of the matters referred to in this outline covered in one directive or in several?

A. No. There was more than one. As far as I remember, there were a few of them. Just to give you an example how this was handled: Say for instance that the first directive explained and ordered all these strategic measures to be taken. Then possibly, the second directive would lay down all principles to be used in replacements of losses in the delivering of ammunition and so on; and then there was one covering each one of these subjects. Then after the three Supreme Commanders, who are mentioned on the first page of the document, received the original memorandum, they had to prepare their plans and submit their plans to the Fuehrer for approval. Then he would coordinate those plans, and maybe there would be another directive which in effect would state what coordination and what departures had taken place. Then after the general plan of operations was fixed by such directives, the Fuehrer would issue directives to the commanders of the actual armies in the field, and also to the commanders of the different air forces in the field, and that, in the presence of the supreme commanders, he might even explain to them their special tasks in their sectors.

Q. Did he personally correlate these plans?

A. Yes. These are purely his personal plans, I mean, the attack against the West.

Q. With or without consultations with the persons on this distribution list?

A. With consultation, of course; but I want to say the principal thoughts and the strategy in the document are his. They were his. It was his idea to make as massive a push in the south and then, so to speak, with one battle do the whole thing. He was very gifted strategically.

Q. Well, when the persons listed on this distribution list put in their proposals with respect to this plan, did they follow this plan, or did they make changes as seemed advisable to them?

A. Personally they did not suggest any departure or alterations. I do remember, however, that the army had a smaller plan. They argued for a major battle in front of the Maas, and then standing on the other side of the Maas and pausing there, because they did not believe that plan could be executed. On this occasion they wrote a memorandum to him, which however, was not accepted by him.

Q. And did these consultations with the Fuehrer, and with the persons mentioned on the distribution list, take place before or after they had submitted their proposals, based upon this memorandum and outline?

A. All this happened before he gave us this memorandum. When he gave us this memorandum, that was really the first time he had expressed the intention to attack the West at once. It happened many times that additional measures to be taken were suggested, or that minor alterations were suggested, but the basis for all this was his directive which stood.

Q. Were you in personal agreement with the Fuehrer's plan?

A. Yes.

Testimony of Hermann Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 24 September 1945, 1550-1655, by Colonel John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Andre Kaminker, Interpreter and S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Court Reporter.

Schmundt's Minutes of Hitler's War Conferences

Q. Are you acquainted with Lieutenant Colonel Schmundt?

A. You mean the Adjutant to the Fuehrer, who later became a General?

Q. Right.

A. Yes.

Q. And when was he Adjutant?

A. As far back as I can remember, he became Adjutant to the Fuehrer in 1938, and remained Adjutant until the day of the attempt in July 1944, when he was very seriously wounded, and later on died.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. And what were his duties as Adjutant?

A. He was Chief Adjutant to the Fuehrer and later on was Chief of the Personnel of the Army.

Q. Do you know his handwriting?

A. Yes, I suppose I can remember it.

Q. Did he write up minutes of meetings at which you and the Fuehrer were present, from time to time?

A. When I was alone with the Fuehrer, no, but if some other persons were present, it might quite well be that he took some notes.

Q. Now, I show you a photostatic copy of a document in German characters, and ask you whether you can identify this as Schmundt's handwriting? I think you will find his signature on the last page (handing to witness).*

A. I can recognize his signature, but I am not so sure about the handwriting itself.

Q. Well, you can definitely identify the signature as that of Schmundt, can you not?

A. As far as I can remember, that was the signature of Schmundt.

Q. You have no reason to question the authenticity of that signature?

A. No, I do think it is his signature.

Q. Now, do you remember a meeting in the Fuehrer's study on 23 May 1939, at which were present the persons named on the first page of the document?

A. At first sight, I do not remember exactly whether this meeting had been held on that date, because those conversations were rather frequent, but if I read the document itself, I might remember it.

Q. Well, first I just want to see if you can't identify the handwriting of the script, as being the same as Schmundt's signature.

A. Generally, I have only seen Schmundt's signature and not his handwriting, but this is the signature of Schmundt. I can say with a great amount of certainty that this is the signature of Schmundt.

Q. So that whether the body of the document contains his handwriting, at least you can definitely testify that he signed the document on the last page.

A. Yes.

Q. All right. Now, will you read the document carefully and tell me whether you have seen it before, and are familiar with its contents.

*Document L-79, Vol. VII, p. 847.

A. (After reading part of document.) There is one sentence which says that there is a possibility of attack of Italy breaking through the Maginot Line, and that that possibility must be studied. That seems to be a mistake, because it doesn't make any sense.

Q. Which page is that, on your copy?

A. Page 15.

Q. We will have it retranslated.

A. Yes. (After reading document.) First of all, I want to say, I want to point out that I have never seen this document before. This is a memorandum which has been written by the Adjutant, as such, and has not been distributed. Therefore, I have not seen that document before.

Q. But you know that it has been certified as a correct record by the Adjutant, Schmundt, don't you?

A. On the whole document I can only certify that this is Schmundt's signature, but not on the handwriting on the document itself.

Q. I understand that, but I say, you will note that when Schmundt signed his name to it, he signed below the words "Certified A Correct Record."

A. I have a slight recollection of the whole conversation as it is brought out here in this document. Much of it corresponds to general lines as outlined by the Fuehrer, but on the other hand, there are many things in it which contradict the Fuehrer's point of view; but this is nothing extraordinary. It very often happened that when the Fuehrer had a certain purpose in mind, he only reasoned according to that purpose, and a few weeks later, he would give some very different point of view, when that particular subject was not in mind.

Q. But you have no reason to question the authenticity of this document, have you?

A. I have got no reason to doubt the authenticity of this document itself, but I must add that it is not absolutely certain that Lieutenant Colonel Schmundt has given exactly the real meaning of the Fuehrer. For instance, as far as the war against England is concerned, some indications in the document are very much against the Fuehrer's general trend of mind, for instance, the attack against the English Fleet. I remember that I proposed to the Fuehrer immediately after the day of England's declaration of war, to send the whole of the Luftwaffe against Scapa Flow, and that this had been absolutely forbidden; strict orders were given that this should not be done.

Q. But again you have no reason to question that this is the official document reflecting the minutes of the meeting, as certified by Schmundt?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Yes, I believe that is correct.

Q. Where would the originals of these documents ordinarily be kept?

A. I don't know exactly where those documents were kept in the Fuehrer's office. I have got all reasons to believe that all those documents, written by adjutants, would be placed in the safe of the office of those adjutants. After 1942, all the conversations with the Fuehrer, which were not strictly private, had been taken down in shorthand during his speech. As far as I know, they were kept. I don't know for certain, but I have been told two documents were kept, one in Obersalzberg in Berchtesgaden, and the other document with Bormann in the central office of the Party.

Q. Now, with reference to the sentence on page 15, which you thought was a mistake. The mistake, if any, must have been made in writing the German script, is that right?

A. Yes, of course, but it is very clear that it is entirely out of the surrounding text.

Testimony of Hermann Goering; taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 1 October 1945, 1550-1700, by Colonel John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Court Reporter.

Use of POW'S for Forced Labor in War Industries

Q. Whose idea was it to supply prisoners from concentration camps to work in connection with the aircraft industry?

A. It was the principle that workers were provided by concentration camps to work in industry. This was not a matter that was only done for the air forces.

Q. I say whose idea was it originally?

A. As far as I remember, Himmler suggested it to the Fuehrer.

Q. Were you present at the time?

A. No, that is what I heard.

Q. Where did you hear it?

A. That was generally spoken about. This not only applied to prisoners in concentration camps, but to prisoners generally. There was even talk about captured generals being used for work.

Q. And, as a matter of fact, they were, weren't they?

A. Yes, the prisoners should work.

Q. And Czechoslovakians were used also, were they not?

A. That I don't know. The Czech POW's were treated the same as the prisoners of the other nations with which they had been captured. As far as I know, they were not committed in the armament industry, that is, the prisoners of war.

Q. Did this program have a special name?

A. I believe there was a special name only for the extension of the subterranean armament program, but I don't remember the name.

Q. Now, when did you first start using prisoners of war from the concentration camps, in connection with the aircraft industry?

A. As far as I know, there were never any prisoners of war in concentration camps.

Q. Oh, but there were.

A. I don't remember the exact time when prisoners were committed for the armament industry. However, they were committed.

Q. And was it early or late in the war?

A. I believe that it only really started in 1942, when strong demands were made on the armament industry, when the workers were drafted into the Army.

Q. When did you start making airplane parts underground?

A. I believe that started only toward the end of 1943, if I remember correctly.

Q. Do you know when it was that Himmler first made the suggestion to the Fuehrer?

A. I can't say that. I don't even know whether Himmler directly suggested this to the Fuehrer, or whether he just provided the workers for the industry.

Q. Well, at any rate, Himmler was the medium through whom these workers were obtained by whomsoever wanted them; is that correct?

A. Yes, it was partly Himmler, that is, for the people that came from concentration camps. For the people that came from other prisons, the Minister of Justice was responsible.

Q. How about Speer?

A. Speer only requested workers. It didn't matter to him how he obtained them; he only requested them.

Q. Well, did he participate in the working out of the plan?

A. No, I don't think so. I believe that he only requested the workers, and then when he obtained them from whatever sources he could get them, he would distribute them.

Q. Now, when you wanted workers, for example, to make airplane parts in the underground factories, what procedure did you follow to obtain them?

A. If I remember correctly, there was an SS Group Leader,

INTERROGATIONS

Kummller, who was responsible for these subterranean factories, that is, for the extension of these factories, not for the running of them; and he submitted plans; and I would pass on them if the proposed locality was right. He would submit proposals to the Fuehrer; and he was responsible to him. He was appointed to take care of these things. Then, there was also a subterranean factory at Kahla, in Thuringia, which was directly under Gau-leiter Sauckel, of Thuringia. He was solely responsible for it.

Q. Now, these prisoners from the concentration camps, of course, had to work whether they wanted to or not; is that right?

A. That I don't know, but I assume it.

Q. Well, why don't you know?

A. Because I only had little to do with these things.

Q. Oh, you had quite a lot to do with them, personally.

A. How do you mean? I did not take any interest in those things.

Q. Well, do you recall that on 14 February 1944, you sent a teletype to Himmler, requesting a further supply of prisoners for construction and production work in the aircraft industry?

A. That is possible.

Q. Well, I show you a photostatic copy of such a document, dated 14 February 1944, and I ask you to read it and tell me whether you have ever seen the document before and are familiar with its contents (handing to witness)?*

A. I did not see this document before. Many such documents were issued by my department without my having seen them or dictated them, if the fundamental issue was decided before. But this was done under my responsibility.

Q. And have you any question as to the authenticity of the document?

A. No.

Q. So that you can identify that as an official communication, emanating from your office to Himmler, right?

A. Yes.

Q. And you noted the covering letter?

A. Yes, that is the Group Leader, Kummller, whom I mentioned before. I don't know the second document, but I have no doubt that it is in order just like the first one.

Q. Am I correct in assuming that you had made similar requests prior to this date?

A. It is quite possible that requests in this direction had been made before.

Q. I hand you photostatic copies of two teletypes, dated 18

*Document 1584-I-PS, Vol IV, p. 117.

February 1944, signed by Himmler, and addressed to you and to General Pohl, with respect to the same matter, and I ask you to read them, and tell me whether you have seen them before, are familiar with their contents, and can identify the same as being official communications which you received (handing to witness)?*

A. I do not remember them, and I have never seen the first; at least, that I am certain of, that I have never seen the first. If such things came in, that is, answers, they usually would not be submitted to me but my adjutant would inform me about them. However, I have no doubt about them at all, and they are official documents without a doubt.

Q. You have no reason to question the authenticity of either documents?

A. No reason at all.

Q. And you do recall the subject matter of both communications?

A. Yes, this is quite clear; the commitment of prisoner of war labor in the armament industry was discussed—not prisoners of war, but just plain prisoners in the armament industry—was discussed quite frequently. I don't remember this particular detail, but I have no doubt about it.

Q. Well, you know very well, don't you, that prisoners of war were used for these purposes?

A. Yes, Russian prisoners of war.

Q. Oh, but also other prisoners of war.

A. I was always told that in first line, Russian prisoners and French were used. I only saw Russian prisoners used.

Q. But you do know that French prisoners were also being used?

A. Yes.

Q. But the larger number were Russian prisoners of war.

A. Especially for excavations, when this thing was started, that is when I saw them. However, at the machines themselves, that is, for higher technical jobs, there were the French prisoners of war. And partly, the French prisoners of war had been released when they obligated themselves to work as civilian workers.

Q. How about British prisoners of war?

A. As far as I know, they refused to be committed in such a manner, as a matter of principle; and I heard once that they couldn't be used anyway, because they were much too lazy.

Q. Well, it is not your thought that the Russian and French prisoners of war wanted to be used for this labor, is it?

A. I did not concern myself with these details, with these peo-

* Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

ple, but usually the French were regarded as the most willing workers, and they were willingly taken as well in agriculture, but I really don't know the details.

Q. Well, you do know that regardless of whether they wanted to or not, they were obliged to work under this program, don't you?

A. Anyway, I know that they received certain prerogatives when they declared their willingness to work. I know that there were certain advantages for them. They were more free, and they also would be almost entirely free after a certain time. They walked to the factory freely, and on Sundays, if they were in Berlin for instance, they could walk around without any surveillance, and I know it for a fact, that they preferred this arrangement to the stiff regimentation in the camps.

Q. I don't doubt that.

Now, I show you a photostatic copy of another document dated 22 February 1944, addressed to Himmler, and signed by Pohl, being a reply to the inquiry cited previously, giving a complete detailed report of SS participation through the use of concentration camps prisoners in the aircraft and allied production program to date. I ask you if you have seen this document before, and are familiar with its contents, and can identify it as an official communication (handing to witness) ?*

A. I don't know this whole thing, because many of these* details were worked out directly between the subordinate departments. I don't even know many of the things that are mentioned there, because they belonged to the armament staff. However, I have no doubt that this is an official document.

Q. Have you any reason to question the authenticity of the document?

A. No.

Q. And you can identify it as being an official communication on the subject matter with which you were generally familiar at the time?

A. Yes.

Q. I show you a photostatic copy of another document, * dated March 8th 1944, being a memorandum to Pohl, signed by Himmler, with reference to the transmittal of a draft of the document previously referred to, to Goering, expressing the opinion that supervision of such concentration camps prisoners engaged in aircraft production was not sufficient, and suggesting the taking over of the management of such places of production. I ask you to tell me whether you have seen those documents before, and are familiar with their contents, and can identify them as official communications (handing to witness) ?

* Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

A. Of course, I have not seen this document, but I do remember that there was some discussion as to whether the management should be responsible for the security and surveillance in the factory, or whether somebody else was to be responsible for this. As far as I know, I was only interested in the results, whereas the regulations and the formulations with which the work should take place was up to the manager. However, I do not have any doubt that this is perfectly genuine.

Q. You have no reason to question the authenticity of those documents ?

A. No.

Q. And you can therefore identify them as being copies of official communications ?

A. Yes.

Q. I show you a photostatic copy of another document,* dated 9 March 1944, addressed to you, and delivered by Himmler personally, and ask you whether you have seen the document before, and are you familiar with its contents, and can identify it as an official communication from Himmler to yourself (handing to witness) ?

A. Of course, I don't know this document, because there were many reports on the results of the work of many departments, but there is no doubt about this document.

Q. Well, that document was delivered to you by Himmler personally, was it not?

A. That is absolutely possible, but I don't remember it any more.

Q. Have you any reason to question the authenticity of this document ?

A. No, not the least. That is the letter which is in reply to the document which has just been shown to me from Pohl, and this is a summary of the whole thing.

Q. And you can identify that as being a copy of an official communication, delivered by Himmler to yourself.

A. Yes.

Q. I show you two additional documents, being two inter-departmental memos, bringing the report previously referred to, to the attention of SS Major General Pohl, and SS Brigadier Fegelein, suggesting that Obersturmbannfuehrer Brandt was entirely familiar with the matter, and ask you whether you have seen any of these documents before, and are familiar with the contents, and can identify them as being copies of official communications (handing to witness)?*

*Document 1584-III-PS, Vol. IV, p. 118.

INTERROGATIONS

A. Of course, I didn't see these two documents, because they were never addressed to me, but there is no doubt about them. They are official.

Q. You have no reason to question the authenticity of either document?

A. No.

Q. And can identify them as copies of official communications?

A. Yes.

Q. What "Brandt" is that?

A. He is unknown to me. In any case, it is not Professor Brandt, the well-known physician.

Q. It is not Karl Brandt?

A. No, it is quite possible, of course, that the man knows me, but I don't know him, at least, I don't know him consciously.

Q. Now, I show you another document, and being a teletype, dated 7 April 1944, addressed to Himmler, and signed by Hans Frank, requesting the supply of 500 prisoners for excavation work and tunneling operations, and ask you whether you have seen this document before, and are familiar with its contents, and can identify it as a copy of an official communication (handing to witness)?*

A. No, I don't know this communication, and I have never heard about the factory which was proposed in this document. However, I have no doubt that this is an official communication.

Q. You have no reason to question its authenticity?

A. No.

Q. Were you familiar with the fact that Hans Frank was requesting prisoners for this type of work?

A. For this type of work, no. This is the first time that I read of this intended work. This is the first time. I don't even know whether it was for the air forces.

Q. Well, did you know that Frank was requesting prisoners for any such purposes?

A. No, I don't know that. I only saw Frank two or three times in my whole life.

Q. Now, I show you another document, being a reply from Himmler to Frank, dated 8 April 1944, and ask you the same questions with regard to this document as I asked you with respect to the previous exhibits (handing to witness)?*

A. I don't know it, but the same applies here. I have no doubt that it is an official communication.

* Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

Q. I show you a copy of another document, dated 8 April 1944, from Brandt to Pohl, transmitting a copy of the reply to Frank, and requesting Pohl to inform Kummler, and ask you the same questions which I asked you with respect to the previous exhibits (handing to witness).*

A. The same applies here.

Q. Now, I show you another document, being a letter dated 17 April 1944, signed by Speer, Minister for Armament Productions, and addressed to a number of authorities engaged in the supervision of armament production, and ask you the same questions as I did with respect to the preceding exhibit (handing to witness) ?*

A. I don't know the document itself; I have never seen it. The fact of the Fuehrer's demand for two such great works is well known to me. As a matter of fact, those works were not constructed in France or the Protectorate, but on German soil, in Bavaria. I believe that one was near Kufringen, in Bavaria, but I don't remember the other; but I do remember that, however, finally both of them were constructed in Bavaria.

Q. But you have no reason to question the authenticity of the document, and you can identify it as a copy of an official communication?

A. Yes, this is exact. Also the persons mentioned in there, everything is exact.

Q. Now, just what did Speer have to do with this forced labor program, anyway?

A. In March 1944, the program for the production of fighters was pushed very much, and Speer at that time was in charge of the armament industry. Then, either in the end of April or the beginning of May, he took over the total production for the air forces, and also was responsible for the war production. At that time, of course, he needed many workers, and whenever he could not get them, he would make a request to the Fuehrer and would get him to intervene. However, as matters were not like that, that Speer could say that such and such authority must give him workers, all he could do was demand them. He could intervene, for instance, in such a manner that he could close down certain parts of the industry. For instance, he could close down the textile industry and order the workers to be used on war production. That was the extent of his powers. However, he had no power to commit prisoners of war, prisoners, or prisoners from concentration camps, without the consent of the authorities who were responsible for it. He had to request them.

* Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Well, in other words, he would request the prisoners from the concentration camps from Himmler?

A. Yes.

Q. But maybe he would speak to the Fuehrer about it first?

A. Well, that certainly was the case for larger requests. For instance, the Fuehrer was always very much interested in production and also the details, and he would have very extensive reports made to him by Speer, and then Speer might say that he could carry out such and such a scheme only if the manpower was available, and would get the Fuehrer to give a direct order in that direction. Speer received especially great demands from the Fuehrer in 1944 and 1945, and he must have answered him that he could carry out these schemes only if his request for materials, manpower, and so on, were met; and then the Fuehrer personally intervened many times.

Q. Have you any idea of the total number of concentration camp prisoners requested by Speer?

A. I can't say how extensive this was. As far as I know, Speer could only inform Himmler as to how many workers he would need, and then Himmler would provide them, but I don't know to what extent this was carried out.

Q. Now, I show you another document, bringing the previous exhibit to the attention of Pohl, and ask you the same questions which I have asked you with respect to the previous exhibits (handing to witness)?

A. I would like to make an additional statement to the things which we have just talked about.

Q. Yes.

A. I know that there were very many strong differences about the requests that Speer put in for manpower, because they were never fulfilled in total. I know that there were differences before the Fuehrer, and they were very vivid between Sauckel and Speer. Sauckel would state that he had so many prisoners available, and Speer would claim that he had only received a fraction. I should have said that Sauckel had so much manpower available, and then I myself, was called in 1944 to investigate the controversial opinions that were held between Sauckel and Speer. At that time I found out that Speer generally could only request a number of workers that he needed, and that he would only receive a fraction of them. For instance, there were figures that so many workers were from France, or so many from a conversion that had taken place in an industry, or from Italy, or from prison camps, but in effect, he only received a fraction of them. That is all I wanted to add to that.

(Referring to document) As far as this document is concerned, I have the same answer as to the other questions.

Q. I show you another document, being a letter dated 7 May 1944, to the Personnel Bureau SSEF, Attention of Colonel Brandt, and signed by SS General Kummler, with respect to the production of tank engines; and I ask you the same questions which I have asked you with respect to the preceding exhibits (handing to witness)?*

A. The same applied here, the same answer.

Q. Now, on the whole, did you find that this forced labor program worked successfully?

A. Yes, according to the reports which I received, it worked out successfully.

Q. Have you any idea how many Czechoslovakians were incorporated into this program?

A. No, that I really don't know.

Q. Poles?

A. That I don't know either, but there were certainly Czechs and Poles there, but I don't know the number.

Q. Do you know what kind of work they did?

A. Of all the factories that are mentioned here, I personally only saw the factory at Kahla, and there were Germans and Russians working there. The Germans were not prisoners; they were just real workers, and the Russians were prisoners of war.

Q. Is that the one where they made airplane parts?

A. This was not so much for airplane parts. At this factory, there were to be a thousand propellerless planes to be constructed every month. I am referring to the type 262, and that did not only include the fuselage, but also the machines and everything. It was a very extensive factory. I didn't ever see the others. The great factory at Wittenberg was first constructed for the production of V-2 weapons. Later, when the production of V-weapons was curtailed heavily, it was used in part for plane production.

*Excerpts of Testimony of Hermann Wilhelm Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 3 October 1945, 1500-1630,
by Col. John H. Amen. Also present: Pfc. Richard W.
Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Reporter.*

*Goering's Part in the Anschluss

Q. Now do you remember an agreement was reached in the summer, about 1937, between the German Government and the

* Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

 See document 2949-PS, Vol. V, p. 628.

INTERROGATIONS

Austrian Government to the effect that the two nations would exchange visits of economic representatives?

A. Yes.

Q. And do you recall that when the Austrian representatives came to Berlin you invited them to dinner?

A. Yes. Yes, I know all about it. I remember. I can say I remember that one. They got very frightened.

Q. And do you remember the speech that you made?

A. Yes, just about.

Q. What was the substance of it?

A. I believe that I made it clear to them that the Anschluss was to be effected soon, one way or the other.

Q. Well, did you make it clear to them that they were traitors to the German cause, and should be ashamed of themselves for not making Austria part of Germany?

A. I didn't tell it to them quite as hard in the conversation, but in substance I did tell them that.

Q. And do you also remember that Schuschnigg later on demanded a retraction and an apology for the speech?

A. No. This conversation did not take place at the dinner; but the gentlemen arrived in the afternoon, and I talked to them something to the effect that you just mentioned to me. They, of course, were very frightened. They at once called Vienna, and talked to Schuschnigg; and I know what they said, because the telephone conversation was monitored. Then it was debated whether they should go to the dinner; and I believe that Schuschnigg demanded that I should speak a few deprecating words to them before the dinner. Then the Austrian envoy in Berlin intervened, and said they had better not ask me that; and the dinner was to take place anyway. Well, I went to the dinner, and the Austrian envoy was there. He told me that maybe it would be appropriate to say a few nice words to the delegates in order to lessen the fright that they had received in the afternoon; but he never demanded a retraction and an apology.

Q. Didn't you eventually make a retraction or an apology, through diplomatic channels, to the Chancellor of Austria?

A. I did not do it. If the Foreign Office did that behind my back, it is not known to me; at least, I didn't do it in any case.

Q. Well, it was done in writing, was it not?

A. Yes. But anyway not by me.

Q. By whom?

A. I don't know. It is possible that—well, I don't know. The diplomats, they're different, and perhaps Mr. von Papen wrote a few words in Vienna, or he asked the Foreign Minister to write a few words that would have a calming effect. I don't know.

Q. But you don't deny that such a retraction or an apology might have been made through diplomatic channels, right?

A. That is possible. As I said before, I just made the thing seem a little less strong in a humorous manner in the evening, if I remember correctly, but I don't know what the diplomats did. I do remember that I said, in the evening, that apparently I had been understood slightly in the wrong direction, in the afternoon.

Q. You meant what you had originally said, though, didn't you?

A. That is self-understood.

Q. Now, do you remember in March 1938, March 11th, to be specific, you had some telephone conversations with Seyss-Inquart and Glaise-Horstenau?

A. Yes, certainly.

Q. And those conversations were monitored?

A. Certainly. I knew that they were. I knew that they were being monitored, and that is why I held them the way that I did.

Q. And what was the substance of those conversations?

A. If I remember correctly—you mean the conversations that took place the day before the Anschluss?

Q. Yes.

A. I made a number of telephone calls to Vienna on that day. On that day, the whole thing started to slide, and if I remember correctly Schuschnigg went so far as to say that there would not be any elections. I said that it would be too late; and I talked to Seyss-Inquart, and told him that this was not sufficient. Things really started to slide then, and I felt that this was the decisive hour. In other words, it was to be decided now whether we would achieve the Anschluss without any difficulties, and without paying too high a price. Then, when Schuschnigg went a little farther, I demanded the next thing; and so it went on. I don't want to deny that I possibly was the most active man in Berlin on that day. I might have been even more active than the Fuehrer himself. I just felt that it was the only decision.

Q. Well, what was the substance of what you said in these telephone conversations? With particular reference to invading Austria, the first call was about ten o'clock in the morning.

A. As far as I remember the telephone conversation, the whole conversation took place in the morning, and was about the mission that Glaise-Horstenau received from us in Berlin. It was his mission to talk to Schuschnigg on the one side, and to Seyss-Inquart on the other; to tell them that things were critical now; and it was his mission to go with Seyss-Inquart to stop the elections and to force further compromises from Schuschnigg. I remember when Glaise-Horstenau took off in a plane from Berlin, he did not look very courageous, and he was worried about what would happen. Also I knew that Seyss-Inquart—I am sorry, I made a mistake here—that Glaise-Horstenau was a very jovial gentleman, but he was not very energetic, and I just was worried about what had happened to his mission. I wanted to make sure that things were working all right.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Well, the election had been proposed for the 9th of March?

A. The election was not to take place.

Q. Well, that is the substance of what you were saying, that the election should be called off, or else Germany would invade Austria, right?

A. Yes.

Q. And is this the substance of the conversation : "Goering asks me (Seyss-Inquart) to tell the Chancellor immediately that he has one hour to revoke the Plebiscite, and to answer publicly that the Plebiscite should be revoked; and that in three to four weeks Austria would make the Plebiscite, concerning the Anschluss with Germany, conform to the rules of the former Saar Plebiscite, held by Germany in that area"?

A. This was the immediate opinion of the Fuehrer. It was his opinion that it should be handled in such a manner. As I said before, in the course of the day, events started to slide so fast, that towards the evening there was a completely different development, from which then followed the occurrences which subsequently took place.

Q. Well, when Seyss-Inquart had been informed by Schuschnigg that the latter was willing to delay the election but would not agree to the application of the rules of the Saar area election, Seyss-Inquart then found you and informed you of the Chancellor's decision?

A. Yes. We were in continual conversation by telephone.

Q. And then at one o'clock in the afternoon, there was a second phone call from you to Seyss-Inquart and Glaise-Horstenau which went as follows: "Reichsmarshal Goering says that the situation in Austria can only be saved when Chancellor Schuschnigg resigns within two hours from now."

A. I wasn't a Reichsmarshal at the time. I was only a Field Marshal.

Q. "And the situation in Austria can only be saved if Chancellor Schuschnigg is nominated as his successor, as next Chancellor of Austria. When you (Seyss-Inquart) don't give me any reply by phone within those two hours, I know that you are hindered by force—”

A. Yes, as far as I remember, this was at four o'clock.

Q. “Know that you are hindered by force from doing so, and we will begin to march against Austria.”

The Chancellor resigned at 3:30.

A. Well, the hours really don't matter, but in substance this is just about what happened, and I believe I said it before, that by the time Schuschnigg would agree to some compromise, it was so late already that some other developments had taken place; and the events just kept on sliding; and they were temporarily accelerated then. We were informed that the people of Vienna were already on the streets, and the people of Graz and Styria had declared their willingness to go with Germany. As I said before, I considered this the most favorable hour for a rapid and cheap way to gain the Anschluss; and I will not deny that at all times I have been for the Anschluss of Austria, which has a purely German population with the Reich.

Q. Late in the afternoon of that day, do you recall making another telephone call to Seyss-Inquart, demanding that he immediately send a telegram to you which would ask for the assistance of German troops in Austria, because the internal conditions in Austria were such at that time that the Austrian government could no longer cope with them?

A. Yes, this was desired by the Fuehrer, and I wished for the same thing.

Q. And isn't it a fact that this telegram, in effect, was a pretext to get German troops inside of Austria under the guise that you needed them to control the internal situation?

A. Yes, that is so. The true reason behind that was that we were not so much afraid of finding any resistance in Austria, as we wanted to have troops in Austria as quickly as possible, for fear that some outside influence, say, the Little Entente, would make an occupation of their own, say, of the Burgenland, or some other part, say, southern Styria. This was in effect to guarantee that none of the other neighbors would come in and take their little parts, so to speak. The Fuehrer had misgivings about this, and that is why he wanted troops in there. The telegram was made the internal reason for it.

Q. But isn't it also a fact that prior to 4:00 p.m. on March 11, 1938, you had sent Keppler to Vienna; and that after arriving there, Keppler gained admittance to the Chancellory, set up a German office inside, called Schuschnigg and told him, in effect, the following—

INTERROGATIONS

A. I want to say something here about the dispatch of Keppler. He was dispatched by the Fuehrer. I would have sent somebody else. Of course, that doesn't matter here. At any rate, he was dispatched by the Fuehrer, and he received his information from the Fuehrer; and I was there when he received it; and I added my own remarks to his.

Q. What was Keppler? How did Keppler happen to come there?

A. We used Keppler for missions of high diplomatic nature, so to speak. As far as my own opinion of him goes, he was competent for certain economic matters. However, personally, I would have never trusted him in such a task. He did not carry out the power of his convictions, and he was not hard-hitting enough to carry out something like that. At least, that was my opinion of him. He was a little slow, and I thought at the time that somebody else might have been better used for that.

Q. Now was he instructed or did he, in effect, tell Schuschnigg: "You see, now, that what I told you two weeks ago is correct. You should have followed my advice. Are there any wishes which you have?"

A. This is correct; but of course, this is from the Fuehrer. I never talked with Schuschnigg before. The Fuehrer is referring to the conversation which he had with Schuschnigg, two weeks prior.

Q. Where were you when these various telephone calls were made?

A. I was in the Reichschancellory, together with the Fuehrer, in one room.

Q. And how did you know that the conversations were being monitored?

A. That is self-understood. Which state does not monitor official conversations? I wanted Schuschnigg to hear all that.

Q. What instructions did you or the Fuehrer give to Keppler?

A. The Fuehrer gave him this instruction, and he furthermore gave him instructions to support Seyss-Inquart; and at that time, that is in the afternoon, the exact manner of the Anschluss had not been fixed, and that was only fixed later when Hitler talked at Linz. My instructions were the following—to be frank, at that time I knew Seyss-Inquart very little, and also his new entourage. However, the idea that I had of them, or let's say, the suspicion that I had of them, was that they were very willing to kick out Schuschnigg; and that they wished for a close relation with Germany. However, they did expect to get something out of this for their own personalities, and it was their wish to remain as independent as possible. I didn't want this whole thing to have the effect that the government of Schuschnigg would be kicked out, and that merely a camouflage Nazi government of Austria would be instituted under them. But I told Keppler to keep a sharp lookout that they would not take things into their own hands, and that the Anschluss was to be effected in such a manner as the Austrian people had wanted it in 1918. And just that was the reason, that I had misgivings in sending such a soft man as Keppler.

Here is something that I want to say by way of explanation; I can only emphasize again that I spent a great deal of my youth in Austria, and therefore was very familiar with everything that went on in Austria. Moreover, my father, at the time of the Kaiser, in Austria, already had the ideological concept of the Anschluss. This is only by way of explanation of how I came to have this opinion. So to speak, I spent half of my youth in Germany, and half my youth in Austria.

Q. Was the Fuehrer present during all of these telephone conversations, to which you have testified?

A. He was present at 80 percent of them at least—no, I remember now, there was only one conversation which I did not make from that phone; that was later in the evening.

Q. And everything which you did on that day was done with the knowledge, approval, and at the direction of the Fuehrer?

A. Yes. He partly directed the conversations, or he heard them and he consented to what I said. I only can say again, that on this afternoon perhaps, I was more driving than he was. However, he consented to all these things. Of course, I couldn't do any of those things without the Fuehrer's approval.

Goering's Opinion of Hitler's and Bormann's Fate

Q. Do you think the Fuehrer is dead?

A. Absolutely. No doubt about it.

Q. What makes you think so?

A. This is quite out of the question. We always knew that the Fuehrer would kill himself if things were coming to an end. We always knew that. There is not the least doubt about it.

Q. Was there any understanding or agreement to that effect?

A. Yes. He said this only too clearly and too explicitly to different people, and we knew about all this exactly.

Q. What about Bormann?

A. (Throwing hands into the air) If I had my say in it, I hope he is frying in Hell, but I don't know about it.

INTERROGATIONS

Goering's Tip to Guido Schmidt on the Anschluss

Q. Why did you put Guido Schmidt into the Hermann Goering Works?

A. The Hermann Goering Works had very strong economic interests in the Balkans, and as he had been the Foreign Minister of Austria, he knew all the economic treaties that had been reached between Austria and the Balkans. I always liked to trade very much with the Balkans, and I will frankly admit that I had personal sympathy for Guido Schmidt. For instance, on the day of the march into Austria, I had him brought to Berlin at ten o'clock in the morning, to be sure that nothing would happen to him.

Q. I presume then that he had been cooperating with you prior to the Anschluss?

A. Well, "cooperate" is really saying a little bit too much. He paid one visit to Berlin before the Anschluss, and he attached himself more to me than either to the Fuehrer or the Foreign Minister. He was really my guest most of the time, and there is only one story here that I would like to tell you about, if you are interested in it.

Q. All right.

A. I had a map of Germany, which was done in the old style, so to speak. Instead of having the name of the town, it would have some monument that was in the town to indicate it; for instance, for Berlin there was Brandenburg Arch, and for Munich there was the Frauenkirche; and Austria was also included in this map; and I remember I led him before the map; and when he looked at it, and saw the map, and also that Austria was included, and he made the remark to me: "You are really preceding historic events a little, aren't you?" So I said to him: "If I knew something exactly, I might just as well include it into the map. There is no sense in changing maps every few minutes." And by this way I told him just about how things were going to happen.

*Testimony of Hermann Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 7 October 1945, 1520-1530, by Col. John H. Amen.
Also present: Lord Wright, chairman of the United Nations War Crimes Committee; Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; WOJG Jack Rund, Reporter.*

Goering's Plan for Disposing of His Art Collection

Q. What was your program about acquiring art objects, other than the French ones which we discussed the other day?

A. It was my intention to start an art gallery according to new principles, and I had always been very much interested in such things, and thus I had tried to acquire articles of art value from many countries for this.

Q. Do you mean a personal art gallery, or an art gallery for some branch of the government?

A. It was my intention to build up an art gallery which I meant to hand over to the German people, and I wanted to build it up myself, and I had some new principles there that I had thought of myself.

Q. Did you ever sign any written articles which would indicate that it was to be given over to the German people?

BY LORD WRIGHT:

Q. Where was the art gallery going to be established?

A. It was to be built at Karinhall, which was a public building anyway. That is, it belonged to the State. I wrote an official communication to the Finance Minister, Schwerin-Krosigk, about this and informed him about this matter.

Q. But you also acquired many objects of art on your own account, did you not?

A. Yes, I did, but they were to be assigned over into this gallery as a personal gift of mine.

Q. Yes, but they never were, were they?

A. Well, yes, the gallery was not actually being built, but the preparations were just being made and I had informed the Finance Minister I would give those articles, which I had personally acquired, into this gallery.

Q. But the objects never got into the gallery, did they?

A. At this time the gallery hadn't been handed over yet. It was just being built. You have to differentiate here between two entirely different sets of objects. First of all there were those objects which I had acquired from my own means, and which were my personal property, and which I had intended for this gallery. Then there were those art objects that were acquired from the art budget, and I had informed the Minister that the whole thing was supposed to be handed over to the people.

Q. But you had agents that were going around representing you, personally, in various localities, did you not?

A. Yes, but I want to emphasize again that I also wanted to hand art objects over into this gallery, which were my own property. Then, on the other hand, there were many things, such as portraits and other art objects, which were of no real value for the gallery. It was my intention to only put the really good pieces and objects of art into this gallery.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What were the names of the agents who represented you or the Government in the purchase of these objects of art?

A. You have to make a difference here. You cannot speak of the Government as such that it was interested in art objects. I had my representatives, and when they acquired an object of art for me, they never knew whether they acquired it for me privately or for me in my official capacity.

Q. Who paid their salaries?

A. They were art dealers and they got a profit from these transactions.

Q. A commission?

A. Yes. A commission.

Q. But they were employed by you personally were they not?

A. Well, I used art dealers for that, and there really was only one agent who was responsible for the coordination of the whole matter. For all the other transactions I merely used art dealers.

Q. Who was that?

A. That was Hofer. He was also responsible for the administrative aspect of my art objects.

Q. Did you ever actually turn any of these objects of art over to the Government?

A. How could I hand them over to the Government? The Fuehrer and the Minister of Finance both knew that I was starting a gallery of art objects and they knew that it was my intention to open this gallery after the war, when I had completed my collection. At this time most of the objects of art were in safe places, in subterranean places and such. You must remember that this whole thing was still in a stage of transition. In other words, objects of art were acquired and then later they might be exchanged for another art object that would serve the prospect better. In other words, the thing was not complete. It was merely a plan that had been thought out and had been drafted, but nothing as yet had materialized, and everything was in a stage of transition as yet.

Q. Did you, or did you not, ever turn over any of the art objects, which you acquired, to the Government? Yes or no.

A. No. How could I do that? Who was there to receive them?

Excerpts from Testimony of Hermann Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 8 October 1945, 1100-1230, by Col. John H. Amen. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; WOJG Jack Rund, Reporter.

How Goering Obtained His Art Collection

Q. What were the names of your principal agents for the purchase of art objects?

A. If I may, I would like to explain to you how this whole matter was handled. Since it had been known for a long time that I was very interested in art objects, I used to get offers from several countries. For instance, partly these offers came from art dealers, say in Switzerland, Italy, or other countries near there, and they would inform me that an auction would be held, and they would actually send me the auction list. Also it happened very many times that private people would contact me if they had art objects that they wished to place on sale. Moreover, there were several men that were interested in the subject generally, and I told them just what my wishes and interests were. In the main, it was Hofer who was in charge of the administration of my art collection. He was an art dealer by profession, and in addition to administering my collection, he remained in that profession. Being a well-known art dealer he knew all the art dealers, I might say in all the countries, and kept in contact with them. Especially in France there was a Dr. Bunjes, who would inform me any time that he heard of some art objects that were for sale or on auction. He would inform me of the fact. However, this was not his main occupation, and he just did it, so to speak, as a sideline. Also, there was another art historian, Dr. Lohse, who worked in about the same capacity as Bunjes. Then there was also Dr. Muehlmann.

Q. And Angerer?

A. Yes, he too, but only in a few cases.

Q. And Bornheim?

A. Bornheim was an art dealer like so many others.

Q. Miedl?

A. Miedl, again, is an art dealer.

Q. Reber?

A. No, I don't know him, but it is quite possible that he was in some connection with Hofer. The name is not known to me.

Q. Bunjes?

A. Yes. I mentioned him before.

Q. Von Behr?

A. You have to look at von Behr in another connection. He was not directly an agent of mine, so to speak, but he was responsible for Rosenberg's collection of art and art research.

Q. What were your financial arrangements with Hofer and Lohse and the rest of them?

A. There was no financial arrangement made with Lohse and Bunjes. They worked in such a way that people who were interested in art sales or art auctions would contact them and they, in turn, would inform me. With Hofer too, there was no direct arrangement as such. Being an art dealer he would make a certain commission any time that he sold me portraits, or enabled me to buy them at an auction sale. In addition to that, his wife was in charge of the restoration of all portraits, and thus she got some monetary advantages out of that. Otherwise, he had the advantage he lived without paying any rent, and as I said before, he could earn a commission any time that he enabled me to buy a portrait. It was my intention to give him a position of director of my collection after the war, when things came to such a stage, but at the time he worked for me this had never materialized.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. How much of a commission did he get?

A. I really don't know how much he got. For part of the portraits, he didn't get any. That is, those which he didn't discover himself. For the others, he made the arrangements directly with the dealers.

Q. Frequently, you and Rosenberg and the Government were all trying to get the same objects for yourselves, were you not?

A. Yes. It is very unfortunate that this happened. Many times we did not know about it, and thus the prices went very high with the art dealers. Colonel, if I may make the remark, I want to tell you for instance that if I went to Holland or Paris, or Rome, I would always find a huge stack of letters awaiting me. There would be letters from private people, princes and princesses, and anything that you want, and there were very many genuine offers, and many fake offers, and the prices were anywhere from good to improbable, and everybody offered me this stuff to buy.

Q. Some of the objects which you got were confiscated objects of art, were they not?

A. We must differentiate here between two separate cases. Firstly, those objects that were bought in free trade, so to speak. The second case are those that were collected by the organization of Rosenberg. Those were articles that had been confiscated from people who had left the country. I would like to make a short remark here about this Rosenberg commission. They collected and registered all their art objects, and they were destined either to go to the Fuehrer's gallery in Linz, that was to be built, or to the Hohe Schule that Rosenberg was going to build at the Chiemsee. It was my intention that not all of these art objects should go to southern Germany, and I had the intention to buy some of them for my gallery. I bought those things and they were estimated, not by German art experts, but by French experts, and then it happened very often that after I made all the arrangements, the Fuehrer would see a photo of the objects and I would have to return things to him because he wanted them.

Q. What was the Kunsthof?

A. The Kunsthof was an art fund which I had instituted for the purchase of art objects.

Q. Where did the money come from that went into that fund?

A. It was partly made up by private contributions which I received to build up my gallery. At one time I also received a large amount from the Fuehrer, and then I myself would give to this fund. The fund did not contain any money that came from State sources.

Q. Who was authorized to deposit and withdraw from that account?

A. To deposit or withdraw money in there?

Q. Yes.

A. That was I.

Q. Exclusively?

A. Yes. Only I.

Q. Were all of your purchases and sales cleared through that account?

A. No. This fund was instituted only very much later by me. Here is something else I want to call to your attention. I inherited a certain amount of art treasures.

Q. Did you employ various people to work on this art collecting business?

A. Does the Colonel mean in the acquisition of these art treasures, or after the acquisition, to work on them.

Q. Both.

A. In the case of who I employed before the acquisition of the objects, I think I explained how they were offered to me from all sides, in all countries. After the acquisition, there were two things that were mainly done with them. The first thing was to classify them, and second to conserve them; that is, to prevent them from blistering, or the paint from peeling, or what have you. All those things that are required to keep them in good condition. This was handled at first by my secretariat, and later on by Hofer and his staff.

Q. Most of these objects were kept in Berlin, were they not?

A. Yes. Almost all of them. Only when the Russians were approaching were they moved.

Q. When and how were they moved?

A. They were moved from the end of January 1945, through February and March 1945, by rail.

Q. Where are they now?

A. They were moved to Berchtesgaden.

Q. All of them?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Since I, myself, was arrested by Hitler, I don't know whether all of them ever did get there, but I am sure that the greater amount of them did get there. I would say at least 90 percent—over 90 percent. I have to say something else here; that I had a number of art objects which were not destined to go into the gallery. They were art objects, but in themselves they were not so precious or good enough to be in a gallery. They were merely something I would like to call glorified furniture, and it is quite possible they were left in Berlin and that they were not treated as carefully, and moved as carefully, as the others.

Q. What would you estimate the entire collection to be worth?

A. That is almost impossible to determine. That depends very much on the market, and that is why it was never estimated. The only thing that was ever estimated was the value of some certain pieces. Just to give you an idea about that: once a picture was offered to me in Holland for 3,000 guilders. In the course of the years it was offered to me a total of seven times, and the last time it was offered to me the price was 45,000 guilders. That is because other people would offer prices for the same picture. It is impossible to even estimate the value of some of the pieces I had. For instance, the Storzing Altar could never have been estimated. It depended very much on who was interested in it, and at what time. Just to give you an example, if I wanted to sell something by Lucas Cranach the first man might offer 50,000 marks; the next man might have Lucas Cranach as his particular hobby, and he might offer 100,000 marks. Then somebody else would be interested in the object as such, but not to a greater extent than 10,000 marks, and that is why it is impossible for me to estimate the value of the total collection. I really don't even know the extent of my collection anymore. I only remember the most important objects.

Q. I think you testified on Saturday that none of these objects were ever in fact turned over to the Government. Is that correct?

A. Yes. That is correct. I couldn't hand it over to the Government because who was there to act as a representative of the Government? According to our Constitution it was quite sufficient if I informed the Fuehrer of the fact that I had certain objects and gave the Minister of Finance notice to the same effect. As it was, the gallery, as such, was never intended to be handed over to the Government after it was built. It was my intention to hand it over to the people, and the way this would have been effected is that at a certain date it would have been said in a communique, "Goering, on such and such a date has decided to hand over this gallery as a gift to the German people." If you look at it this way, I was the Government myself. Just to show you how this works, for instance, there was an exhibition of the work of living artists, each year in Munich, and the Fuehrer had expressed the wish that all the Ministries should purchase some of those pictures in order to support the artists, and that happened. Then these pictures were taken and put into the ministries, or into the houses that are the official residences of the ministers. Well, now, as such they were Government property. However, they actually were located in the ministries, or houses of the ministers.

Q. But in point of fact, none of these objects were ever given to the German people?

A. How could this be done? The gallery had never been built yet, and all this was to happen after the war.

Q. But, I say, it never happened.

A. That is quite clear. That is quite impossible.

Goering's Estimate of His Income

Q. Up to the end of the war, what would you estimate your total personal income to have been?

A. You mean my monthly income?

Q. Yes. Monthly or yearly.

A. My income was made up first by my salary; second it stemmed from the special fund that I received as Reich Marshal.

Q. How much did you receive for each of these?

A. The two of them together amounted to about 28,000 marks a month. In addition to this came free residence, and all representative functions and matters were being paid for; and this, of course, was variable. Then I derived income from books and articles that I had written. Of course, this was variable, but I would estimate the total sum that I had derived in such a manner throughout the war, as about one million, and maybe one and one half million marks.

Q. What other sources of income did you have? Income from securities?

A. I had other income derived from interest on my capital and securities.

Q. How much would you estimate that to have been?

A. I am sorry that I really can't tell you, because I can't check it. Unfortunately I did not take very much interest in the administration of my own finances. They were left to the secretary, and I don't think that she had enough perspective to do the thing right, and I found out very much later that I had lost a great amount.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. How about income from industries in which you were financially interested?

A. I had no financial interest in industry except shares that I had bought as a private person, and I only had those in state factories.

Q. Such as?

A. For instance, there were the Hydrier Works. Any factories that belonged to the State, that is what I am talking about. We were allowed to have shares that represented a financial interest in it.

Q. Then let me ask you again, at what fee you would estimate your total monthly income?

A. That is very difficult for me to say because so many of these things were distributed over so many years. As I mentioned before, I received 28,000 marks in currency per month, and then I would say possibly five to seven thousand marks would be added to that from interest and annuities, and so on, and I would say that I received a total of 35,000 marks in currency each month. The sum I mentioned before that I had received as an author, of course, was distributed over many years. This income which I mentioned as a million, and a million and a half marks, has been distributed over this period of time.

Decree Re "Criminal Attacks on Party and State"

Q. Then there was the decree for the execution of the law on the Secret State Police of 10 February 1936?*

A. Yes. This was the same for all decrees. There were laws for their execution.

Q. That decree referred to "criminal attacks on Party and State."

A. Yes.

Q. What did that mean?

A. Several attacks had taken place upon the leaders of the Party, and the Fuehrer wished that not only attacks upon leaders of the State came within their jurisdiction, but that leaders of the Party would enjoy the same protection.

Q. What kind of criminal attacks?

A. I don't remember the particulars about this. Anyway, one thing is clear—that it was the decision of the Fuehrer to make the leaders of the Party, that is, the prominent people in the *Document 2107-PS, Vol. IV, p. 732.

Party, in every way the equals of the leaders or prominent people in the State. He had this idea for everything. For instance, a Reichsleiter of the Party had the assimilated rank of a Reich Minister.

Excerpts from Testimony of Hermann Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 9 October 1945, 1530-1700, by Col. John H. Amen. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Goering's Opinion of Hess's Mental State

Q. Did you think that Hess was telling the truth?*

A. Yes, absolutely. He is completely changed, and I would have recognized him maybe from his looks, but he gives me the impression that he is completely crazy.

Q. You say he seemed to be crazy before he went off on this flight?

A. I wouldn't say outright crazy, but he was not quite normal then, and he was very exalted, so to speak, very exuberant.

Q. Was he any worse at the time when he flew over to England than he had been before?

A. I want to say this, and what I am going to say has got to do with the probable cause of it. In spite of the high position, he had relatively little to do after the outbreak of the war, and his ambition to do things, and being frustrated, may have caused his attitude. It was his wish all the time to do something, and to do something decisive, and this made him very, very nervous. Then he probably also felt that his next subordinate, Bormann, was talking to the Fuehrer and not telling him about it, and that may have added to it. Then he got the idea that he had to do something decisive, that he had to fly to England and bring about peace; in other words, to do something to compensate for this relative inactivity, which was forced upon him.

Early Nazi Operations in Austria

Q. Did you know Theo Habicht?

A. Yes.

Q. Was it the Fuehrer's belief, when he appointed Habicht, that he could win Austria through normal political means?

A. It was the Fuehrer's belief that Habicht was a competent Party man for Austria, but then after the Dollfuss affair, he let him drop very sharply, and he intended to take very strong measures against him, but he just let it be at that.

* This interrogation was conducted immediately following an interrogation in which Hess had been confronted and questioned by Goering and other of his former associates, in order to test the genuineness of Hess's claimed amnesia. See pp. 1160-1170 of this volume.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Why did Habicht, when he failed to win over the Austrians by normal diplomatic means, resort to terror in order to try to break Austria?

A. He made a report to the Fuehrer and I remember it rather well. I was present. He made some completely false and untrue statements there when he described the situation. He declared to the Fuehrer that within the Austrian Federal Army there was a large component, which had the intention of making a putsch against the government, and thus to prevent the Anschluss. He was always talking about a Standarte Bundesheer, which was supposed to be a society within the Federal Army of Austria, and which was supposed to work with us. It was a fact that this Standarte Bundesheer consisted only of those that had already been dismissed; thus he created a completely false conception in the Fuehrer's mind. The Fuehrer believed it, although he was very skeptical. He made this report in a very deceptive way. We were both very surprised that there was so much momentum in the Federal Army, and it was our opinion that if the Federal Army decided for a putsch, to upset the government, then the Party would find an opportune moment for their intentions. Then, when this whole thing did not succeed, and everything was cleared up, I remember Habicht came again to report to the Fuehrer. It was at the occasion of the Wagner Festivals at Bayreuth, and the Fuehrer had asked for him. He remonstrated with him and accused him of cheating and falsifying reports, and he told him this in no uncertain manner, and then I remember it was either the next day or a few days later that Habicht came to me and asked me whether now he should shoot himself and then I answered him—well, if he had to ask me about it, he didn't have to do it. I remember this moment very well.

It was the Fuehrer's intention, at first, to punish him very strictly, but then he also let this go because he did not want all this to get to the outside and expose the whole thing. Then, very much later later we took charge of the Austrian Government, I remember that I was once asked whether he could get a civil service job in Prussia, and I believe that he got the post of a mayor in some town.

The Dollfuss Murder

Q. The death of Dollfuss was planned in advance, was it not?

A. No, quite the contrary. That was a thing that was most unpleasant to the Fuehrer. This made the whole situation terribly dangerous to the Reich. At that time, Mussolini was against us and he was very well allied with Dollfuss. If I may, I would like to make a remark about the last interrogation that we had about Austria; that is, in this connection.

Q. All right.

A. I was then asked about the march into Austria, why we marched into Austria, and whether the telegram that had been fixed up was to give the external occasion, so to speak. At that time I counseled the Fuehrer very much against the sending of this telegram. On the one side, we could rightly say that the bulk of the Austrian people, and their movement, was on our side and thus it could not be said that their attitude would result in the necessity of sending this telegram, asking us to come there in order to maintain quiet and peace, because we published the fact that the entire Austrian people wanted the Anschluss. On the other hand, I thought it was absolutely necessary that the troops were to march in and I gave you the reason the other day. I was afraid that other states neighboring on to Austria would occupy certain parts of the country. Now, here comes the decisive thing, which I forgot the other day, but talking about all these things in that connection now I can remember it. At the occasion of the Dollfuss assassination, Mussolini mobilized five Italian divisions at the Brenner Pass.

Q. Only two, wasn't it?

A. Possibly he only mobilized two, but he told us five. Those five divisions always stayed in my recollection, and I thought about that very much, so I thought if the question of the Anschluss came up again, it would be better if there were German divisions at the Italian border. In spite of all the friendship that we had with Mussolini, you could never know what kind of an effect the Austrian question would have on him. Then there was also the letter that the Fuehrer wrote to the Duce at the occasion of the Anschluss in 1938. Now, this letter was delivered during the night, before the date of the march into Austria, and I believe it was half past eleven when I was called from Rome and I was told that the Duce had accepted the situation. On the day before, I had given a great dance for all the diplomats, and I thought it would be very practicable, because at that moment I could tell them of the proposed plan for the Anschluss. At that time, the members of the Italian Embassy acted very strangely and very icy, so to speak, and I was glad that the decision to march in had already been taken, and when they then finally got the news from the Duce during the night, that he accepted the situation, the whole thing became very much less tense.

Q. You were acquainted with your ambassador, Dr. Rieth, were you not?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Yes, only very slightly.

Q. The evidence shows that Rieth carried on the negotiations for the death of Dollfuss with the ultimate conclusion.

A. Well, if that is so, I must say it is very unfortunate that we didn't have the evidence at the time, for had we had the evidence, we would have acted against Rieth. I can only say—and this is absolutely positive—that the death of Dollfuss was the most unpleasant event that could happen for the Fuehrer.

Q. What is your explanation of the death of Dollfuss?

A. I believe it resulted from the entire revolutionary situation. As far as I remember, his death was effected by some subordinate organs. As I heard at first, it was the intention of the revolutionaries to use Dollfuss as a hostage in order to assure their own get-away. However, two people, who were both very subordinate, and I believe the name of one of them was Planetta, or something like that, finally shot Dollfuss.

Q. He was the person upon whose grave in 1938 you put wreaths for the great celebration where Hess was present; isn't that so?

A. I don't know whether or not I put any wreath down there, but it is a fact that many wreaths were put down there, and that those people who finally had been killed for the assassination were regarded as martyrs and celebrated as such by the Party. It is quite possible that when I did get to Vienna, somebody sent wreaths there for me. However, I don't remember that I did it personally; I don't think that it is possible that I put any wreaths down there in the presence of Hess.

Q. Hess put the wreath on.

A. That is possible. I came to Austria for the first time only fourteen days after the Anschluss. The Fuehrer went there immediately and I stayed in the Reich as his deputy. I was Charge d'Affaires for the entire Reich.

Q. The Fuehrer made a great speech eulogizing the murderers, didn't he?

A. That I don't remember.

Q. That is what the evidence shows.

A. It is possible.

Q. There was a big celebration?

A. As I say it is quite possible. I am not denying that they were made martyrs by the Party.

Q. If you thought his death was so regrettable, why did you come along later and eulogize the people that were responsible for it?

A. The two things really have nothing to do with each other.

There is no doubt about this, that Dollfuss' death made the greatest political difficulties for Hitler, and Dollfuss' death, as such, hadn't been necessary and it actually did great damage for many years. However, here was a case where two men had been executed by the Austrian government and the Austrian Nazi Party had pictured them as martyrs. What sense would there be to upset this after they had already been martyrs? That did not mean that the act of killing or the act of assassination of Dollfuss had been approved. That was the thing that the Fuehrer had against Habicht, among other things. The Fuehrer knew exactly just what relationship there was between Dollfuss and the Duce. Then the death of Dollfuss brought the relationship between Germany and Italy and Austria in this whole connection into the greatest conflicts. You will remember the speech that the Duce held. At that time, the wife of Dollfuss was paying a personal visit to the wife of the Duce, and thus it was a very unpleasant situation.

Q. You don't know what negotiations may have been carried on by Dr. Rieth with respect to the murder of Dollfuss, is that correct?

A. No, I don't know, and I don't really believe that Rieth, who did not belong to the Party, entered into any negotiations for the assassination of Dollfuss.

Q. It may have been so without your knowing it; right?

A. It is possible, but Rieth was a diplomat and I think it is out of the question.

Q. Do you think that diplomats don't conduct such negotiations?

A. Not in general.

Von Papen's Mission In Austria

Q. Are you familiar with the instructions which Hitler gave to von Papen?

A. Yes, in substance. I wasn't there when he gave them to him, but I know just about the thoughts.

Q. Papen did go to Vienna and secure, first, an agreement between Schuschnigg and Hitler?

A. The immediate reason for Papen's dispatch to Vienna was that he was to pacify the turmoil that had been created by Dollfuss' death. You must remember that Papen was a very prominent politician, and that he also was a Catholic. He moreover was an ambassador who did not belong to the Party. There was one point in his favor for this assignment. The second one was that he was a prominent Catholic and he came to a Catholic country. Moreover, as a third point, he had been Vice-Chancellor until then and thus he had held a very high position, and that was showing a certain courtesy to these people. Moreover, Papen was not put under the authority of the Foreign Minister, but directly under the Fuehrer.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What were the initial instructions from the Fuehrer to Papen?

A. Papen was to effect a general appeasement there. He maintained very good relations with Cardinal Innitzer and the Church in general, and that was one thing. When was the Dollfuss affair? 1934?

Q. July 25th, 1934.

A. The basic instructions that he received were to effect a general appeasement of Austria. Then, in the course of the further events, he received instructions to see that Austria would approach Germany more and more in economic aspects and also in aspects of internal politics.

Q. He did secure an agreement between the Fuehrer and Schuschnigg; right?

A. Yes, but that was in the year 1938. That was very much later—1937.

Q. No, '36, July 11, 1936.

A. Oh, I thought of the Berchtesgaden agreement. There were two agreements.

Q. We are talking about the initial agreement.

A. Yes.

Q. What was the substance of that agreement?

A. I don't know exactly just what the substance of it was. That was the same for the first agreement and for the second agreement; although I was very much interested in the Austrian affair, strangely enough, I was not consulted that time.

Q. You know that Hitler did live up to the terms of that initial agreement, don't you?

A. Well, you have to call back the conditions of the agreement to my memory a little more, and maybe I will remember a little more about it. I know just a little more about the second one though.

Q. The second one was later on.

A. Personally, I can remember the second agreement better than I can the first agreement, only if you will just give me an idea about it.

Q. As a matter of fact, it was the failure on the part of the Fuehrer to live up to that agreement that led to the meeting at Berchtesgaden, wasn't it?

A. As far as I remember, both parts did not live up to the terms. The situation was such.

Q. Anyway, the Fuehrer didn't live up to the terms.

A. Yes, and the other one didn't either.

Q. In fact, he never intended to live up to the terms at the time, did he?

A. That I don't know, because I did not participate in that agreement. I would have probably counseled against any agreement. It was always my policy to demand the Anschluss without any reservations. When the English Foreign Minister visited me in October 1937 or the beginning of November 1937, I told Lord Halifax explicitly, and in the presence of the English Ambassador, that the Anschluss of Austria was an integral part of German policy and I told him that nothing short of a total Anschluss would suffice.

COL. AMEN TO THE INTERPRETER: Will you read this to him?

THE INTERPRETER: "The Reich government recognizes the constitutional sovereignty of the federal state of Austria in the sense of the Fuehrer's and Reichskanzler's statements of May 21, 1935. (These statements run: Germany has neither the intention nor the desire to interfere in internal Austrian affairs, or to carry through an annexation or Anschluss of Austria. But I believe that no regime, which is not anchored in, supported, and desired by the people, can last.)"

A. I believe that he said this in a speech in the Reichstag and it was the difference between me and the Fuehrer that he would do things like this, because the Anschluss of Austria was absolutely an integral point, I may even say the first point of our entire foreign policy. I remember this speech very well, because I got very frightened by it.

Q. In any event, that part of the agreement was not lived up to by the Fuehrer, right?

A. No. It wasn't lived up to, and it couldn't be lived up to.

Excerpts from Testimony of Hermann Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 October 1945, 1500-1655, by Col. John H. Amen. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Court Reporter.

Reasons Why Schacht Left Economics Ministry and Reichsbank

Q. What were the real reasons for Schacht's departure from the Ministry of Economics in 1937, and from the Reichsbank in 1939?

A. As far as the Ministry of Economics was concerned, there were strong differences between Schacht and the Ministry for Agriculture.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. On what grounds?

A. I don't remember any particulars about it, but I do remember that the Minister of Agriculture and Food, Darre, came to me repeatedly and told me that he could no longer work together with Schacht in financial and economic matters. Also, the relationship between the Fuehrer and Schacht had become considerably worse.

Q. From what causes?

A. I really never understood those reasons, but I believe that the Fuehrer thought that Schacht did not believe wholeheartedly in his plans. Also the Party constantly attacked Schacht very strongly.

Q. Do you mean in the Fuehrer's plans for aggressive warfare?

A. No, just his plans generally. The Fuehrer charged Schacht with carrying out a great many financial plans, and Schacht did not feel capable of carrying out these plans. He was very pessimistic and sceptical at the time, and this was together with the attacks that were being made upon him by prominent functionaries of the Party; that is, they came to the Fuehrer and complained about it. As I have explained before, his leaving the Reichsbank must be brought into connection with the differences he had with the Reichminister for Finance. I believe that at the time he refused to advance the money for the last of the month, which was the usual practice and carried out everywhere. I believe that he picked this as a reason because he wanted to get out.

Q. Would there be any truth in the suggestion that he got out because he was opposed to vigorous war measures?

A. I don't know just why he wanted to get out.

Q. Well, did you see any indications that he was opposed to vigorous war measures?

A. Yes, Schacht was a very careful man.

Q. But you wouldn't say that that was the reason why he got out.

A. He made the suggestion that I was to become the Commissioner for Raw Materials and Foreign Currency. He had the idea that in that position I could give the Minister for Economics and the President of the Reichsbank valuable support. Moreover, in that capacity I should furnish him protection against the attacks that were continually made on him by members of the Party. Moreover, he was very outspoken in the suggestion that he and Blomberg made, that I was to be put in charge of the Four-Year Plan. However, the idea that Schacht had there is that I myself did not know very much about economy, and that he could very well hide in the protection of my broad back and thus ward off those attacks.

I believe that these really are the deep reasons for his leaving, but, of course, they are only my personal opinions. He found out that after a certain time, when I was responsible for these things, I insisted on expressing my opinion on them and taking action. He did not like this, and consequently he became an opponent of the Four-Year Plan. Then there were a number of rows between his people and my people. Then after he lost the Ministry for Economics, he also found that he was no longer the complete boss of the Reichsbank, because in the last resort I had some say in what should happen to foreign currency and the gold reserve, and he did not like that at all. I imagine that he had the idea that that lowered his standing, and he felt very well that he no longer completely dominated the Reichsbank affairs. As I said, these are my personal reasons. As I mentioned before, the actual occasion on which I made him leave the Reichsbank was something that he really artificially created.

Q. Did you disagree with Schacht on the question of the desirability of the production and expansion of the export-import trade as a means of rearmament?

A. I don't think that he could have had a different opinion, really, because my main task in connection with the Four-Year Plan was fixed by a memorandum which I received from the Fuehrer on that subject. My main task was to create an autarchy for Germany, so that she would be agriculturally and economically independent. We might have differed in certain methods. However, all you could do was to buy extensive quantities of raw materials under the most favorable conditions by import, and then export other things in exchange for them. In other words, that was all either one of us could have done about it.

Q. Now, after Schacht lost these two positions, did he continue to have any say in matters of government policy?

A. No. He still was a member of the Reich Cabinet, but as far as I remember, the last time that it was called for a session by the Fuehrer was in 1937.

Q. He remained a Minister without Portfolio?

A. Yes. We had quite a large number of those.

Q. Did he meet with Hitler from time to time after he lost those positions?

A. I believe just a few times. He appeared for the different sessions of the Reichstag, and he would sit on the government bench. That was his main activity as a member of the government.

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpts from Testimony of Hermann Goering, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 11 October 1945, 1045-1130, by Col. John H. Amen. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Goering's Relations with Schacht

Q. How were your personal relations with Schacht?

A. At first it was very good, then later when I was charged with the Four-Year Plan, I had all kinds of conferences with him, but on the whole it was good.

Q. It got worse, rather than better, as time went on?

A. Yes.

Q. Did actual friction develop around the time when he got out of office?

A. There was some friction concerning the methods he applied, but I don't remember that there was any especial friction, just when he left the Reichsbank. It may have been so when he left the Ministry of Economics, that there was some difference about the methods employed by the Four-Year Plan.

Q. How was the relationship at that time between the Fuehrer and Schacht?

A. The relationship between Hitler and Schacht was especially good for many years. However, from 1937 on, it cooled off progressively and finally deteriorated very badly.

Q. I think you said yesterday that after 1939 Schacht had very little to do with matters of policy?

A. Yes.

II. RUDOLF HESS*

Excerpts from testimony of Rudolf Hess, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 9 October 1945, 1045-1215, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Hess Claims Loss of Memory

Q. Do you prefer to testify in English or in German?

A. In German.

Q. What is your full name?

A. Rudolf Hess.

*See Vol. I, pp. 97-113, for medical reports, motion by defense counsel, and statement by Hess concerning his memory.

Q. What was your last official position?

A. Unfortunately, this already comes into a period which I cannot remember any more. I am suffering from loss of memory, and the doctor has told me that this is a frequent occurrence, especially in time of war, but that there is some chance that my memory will return. There are many cases where I cannot even remember what happened 10 or 14 days ago.

Q. What period is it that you cannot remember?

A. Anything longer than, say, 10 or 14 days ago. It has frequently happened that I met gentlemen I could not even remember their faces when I saw them again. It is terrible. Yesterday I was told by a doctor, or maybe it was a clerk over there, that it happens sometimes that people don't even know their own names any more, and he said that possibly by a shock it would suddenly all return again. This is terrible for me, and everything depends on it for me because I will have to defend myself in the trial which is going to come soon. There is nobody to defend me if I cannot do it myself.

Q. You mean that you cannot even remember what your last official position was in Germany?

A. No. I have no idea. It is just like a fog.

Q. Do you remember that you used to be in Germany?

A. Well, I think that that is self-understood, because I have been told so repeatedly, but I don't remember just where I was and not even in what house I was. It has all disappeared. It is gone.

Q. How do you know that any kind of proceeding is coming up, as you say?

A. This trial has been talked about all the time. I have seen it in the newspapers, and it has been mentioned to me, and even yesterday I was told about it. Then when I was brought down here I was told that I was brought down here for the trial in Nurnberg. Such a big event, naturally, has made an impression on me and I can remember it. I am thinking of it all the time at night.

Q. But you don't know what the proceeding is for?

A. I have no idea. I don't even know whether I was told what I am accused of. I know that it is a political trial. That has been said all the time, and also war criminals have been mentioned. Perhaps I had even been told just what I am accused of, but I don't remember.

Q. Do you remember how long you have been in England?

A. No, that I don't remember.

Q. Did people question you while you were in England?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Certainly not during the last 8 or 10 days. I don't remember anything that is further back than that, but during the last 8 or 10 days I was completely alone. When we left there, I was told that I had been at that place for a long time.

Q. When did your memory go away?

A. The doctor told me yesterday that it has been this way ever since July.

Q. But you don't know yourself?

A. No.

Knowledge Without Memory

Q. Have you ever seen this book before? (Passing book to witness.)* Suppose you read these first few pages, and see if that means anything to you.

A. That is I, myself (pointing to the printed signature of Rudolf Hess).

Q. Will you read this portion? (Indicating).

A. This is good, and there is no question about it. However, I cannot remember that I ever wrote this.

Q. Suppose you look through the book and see if that doesn't mean anything to you.

A. My name appears below all these things. There is no question about that.

Q. Don't you know what they are?

A. No. I would have to look at it first.

Q. Look at it.

A. Well, if you will tell me—

Q. Do you know what laws are?

A. Yes; that is self-understood.

Q. Don't you remember having anything to do with the enactment of various laws in Germany?

A. Do you mean I, myself?

Q. Yes.

A. Enacted laws?

Q. Yes.

A. No trace of it. According to this, I must have—well, how shall I say—I must have had a very prominent position.

Q. That is right. Doesn't that help you to remember what that position was?

A. No. Well, what I read, I read, but it doesn't mean anything more than just what it says there.

Q. Do you know who Jews are?

A. Yes. They are people—a race.

* See documents 3179-PS, 3182-PS, 3183-PS, Vol. V, pp. 916-920.

Q. You didn't like them very well, did you?

A. The Jews, no.

Q. So you had some laws passed about the Jews, didn't you?

A. If you tell me, I have to believe it, but I don't know it. It is terrible.

Q. You don't remember having anything to do with any laws about Jews?

A. No.

Q. Will you look at this portion of the index? Will you just read that part and see if that helps you to remember it at all?

A. (Examining document). That is self-understood. It says here, and I understand what it says.

Q. Didn't you have something to do with those Jews that are referred to there?

A. Well, that is very apparent, yes, but I can't remember it.

Q. You don't remember anything about it?

A. No, nothing at all. It is completely blank.

Q. Isn't this whole book full of laws, for which you were responsible, and isn't that why your name appears on the front?

A. Yes, that is apparent, of course.

Q. Still, you don't remember anything about them?

A. No, not at all.

Q. It is just as if it were a book written by somebody else?

A. If I did not know my own name, and if my name did not appear below this introduction, I would believe, without reservation, that somebody else was the author.

Q. How do you happen to remember your name? Did somebody tell you, or did you remember that?

A. I had to put my signature below documents all the time, and then that has been stamped on my brain, so to speak, from my youth, but the doctor ought to know about that. I don't know how to explain it, but it is a fact that I know I am Rudolf Hess.

Q. Do you remember the Fuehrer?

A. Yes. During all that time I had a picture of him hanging in my room in front of me.

Q. Do you remember being a member of the Fuehrer's secret cabinet council?

A. I have no idea.

Q. Don't you remember a lot of meetings that you used to attend with the Fuehrer?

A. No; not at all.

Q. What do you remember about the Fuehrer?

A. That he was the Chief of the German State.

Q. What else do you remember about him?

INTERROGATIONS

A. The Fuehrer was the leader, and he was a personality that excelled everybody in every German's mind.

Q. What else do you remember about him?

A. I know that he is dead.

Q. How did you learn that?

A. Anyway, I know that. I don't know where I learned it.

Q. You don't remember ever talking to him?

A. No.

Q. Do you think you have ever done so?

A. According to this, I must have talked with him. If somebody constantly issues laws or decrees in his capacity, as the Deputy to the Fuehrer, then he must have talked to him.

Q. Do you remember that you were a Deputy to the Fuehrer?

A. No. I see that from this again. (Pointing to book)

Q. But you have no recollection of it?

A. No.

Q. Why don't you like the Jews?

A. If I had to explain that to you in detail, I am again facing nothing. I only know that this is deeply within me.

Q. How do you remember that you don't like them?

A. When the name "Jew" is mentioned, something stirs in me, which is dislike, or that they are not sympathetic to me, or rather that I have no sympathies for them. I cannot explain it in detail.

Q. You cannot recall any reasons why you shouldn't like them?

A. No.

"Thought Association" But Not Recollection

Q. Do you remember that there was a war?

A. Of course, I know that there was a war.

Q. Between whom?

A. Anyway, I know that the Americans were one enemy and the English were another one.

Q. Do you remember any others?

A. Japan was in the war, but she was on our side; not our enemy.

Q. Anybody else?

A. I wouldn't know, not at this moment.

Q. How about the French?

A. The French? That is quite possible. I don't know of any details, but I know that there were the French, that the French were in the war and also the Belgians. Yesterday we traveled through Brussels, and there we saw the air forces and the armed forces, and also the damage that had been done to buildings.

Q. Was France an ally of yours, or was France fighting against you?

A. No; I don't believe that France was allied to us. Of course, they were our enemies.

Q. How about Russia?

A. Of course, Russia, yes, they also were our enemies.

Q. When did the war start?

A. That I don't know.

Q. Did Germany start the war, or one of these other countries?

A. That I don't know.

Q. You don't remember how the war got started?

A. No.

Q. Do you know whether it is ended or not?

A. Yes. The war is finished.

Q. How do you know that?

A. I have read the newspapers during the last day, and it is quite evident from that.

Q. Do the newspapers make sense to you when you read them?

A. Partly yes and partly no.

Q. How long were you in England?

A. I have no idea.

Q. Was it for a long time or short time?

A. I was told that it was a long time, that was in the last few days, just before we left there.

Q. How did you get there in the first place?

A. To England? I don't know.

Q. Why did you go to England?

A. I don't know.

Q. What happened to your family?

A. I don't know.

Q. Did you have a family?

A. Yes. I had a wife and a child.

Q. How do you happen to remember that?

A. I have the photos of my wife and my little boy hanging in front of my eyes alongside that of the Fuehrer all the time.

Q. Do you know what their names were?

A. My wife's name is—well, I don't even know that.

Q. How about your child's name?

A. I don't know that either.

Q. A boy or a girl?

A. Boy.

Q. What is a war criminal?

A. I would like much more to ask you this question.

Q. You mean, you never heard the expression before?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Yes, of course, I have heard it before, but in spite of that I am not absolutely certain about just what this means.

Q. Do you think it is a crime for a country to commit aggressive war against other countries, without provocation?

A. That will depend on the conditions such as they existed. I cannot either say yes or no. That depends on the case.

Q. I just said in general.

A. I would say that if a country starts a war, without a real cause for war; that is, one which is not internationally recognized as a reason for war, and thus bring war to another country, it is criminal. There is no question about that.

Q. That is what a war crime is, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you believe that Germany was justified in conducting this recent war?

A. I cannot give you an answer to that, because the circumstances are—not any of the circumstances are in my memory.

Q. So perhaps they were wrong, and perhaps they were right; is that it?

A. Yes. That depends entirely upon the situation, which I don't know.

Q. When did you first learn that the Fuehrer was dead?

A. That I don't know.

Q. Do you know whether he is dead or not?

A. Well, that is a term to me, so to speak. I don't know why it is a term, but if I looked at the picture of the Fuehrer, which was hanging in front of me, I knew that he was dead.

Q. You knew he was dead from looking at his picture?

A. That was a thought association, just that the Fuehrer is dead. That is all.

Q. Where did you get that thought?

A. That I don't know.

Interrogation of Rudolf Hess, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 9 October 1945, 1430-1510, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Hermann Goering, Dr. Karl Haushofer, Franz von Papen, Ernst Bohle (for the purpose of identification); Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

*First Reunion with Old Friends and Associates

Col. Amen: Your name is Rudolf Hess?

Rudolf Hess: Yes.

* This confrontation was made in order to test the genuineness of Hess' claimed amnesia.

Col. Amen: Will you look over here to the right to this gentleman here.

Rudolf Hess: At him? (Pointing to Hermann Goering)

Col. Amen: Yes.

Hermann Goering: Don't you know me?

Rudolf Hess: Who are you?

Hermann Goering: You ought to know me. We have been together for years.

Rudolf Hess: That must have been the same time as the book that was submitted to me this morning. I have lost my memory for some time, especially now before the trial. It is terrible, and the doctor tells me that it is going to come back.

Hermann Goering: Don't you know me? You don't recognize me?

Rudolf Hess: Not personally, but I remember your name.

Hermann Goering: But we talked a lot together.

Rudolf Hess: We were together; that must have been the case. That must have been so. As the Deputy of the Fuehrer all the time in that position, I must have met the other high personalities like you, but I cannot remember anyone, to the best of my will.

Hermann Goering: Listen, Hess, I was the Supreme Commander of the Luftwaffe, and you flew to England in one of my planes. Don't you remember that I was the Supreme Commander of the Luftwaffe. First I was a Field Marshal, and later a Reichsmarshal; don't you remember?

Rudolf Hess: No.

Hermann Goering: Don't you remember I was made a Reichsmarshal at a meeting of the Reichstag while you were present; don't you remember that?

Rudolf Hess: No.

Hermann Goering: Do you remember that the Fuehrer, at a meeting of the Reichstag, announced in the Reichstag that if something happened to him, that I would be his successor, and if something happened to me, you were to be my successor? Don't you remember that?

Rudolf Hess: No.

Hermann Goering: You don't remember that? We two discussed that very long afterwards.

Rudolf Hess: This is terrible. If the doctors wouldn't assure me time and time again that my memory would return some day, I would be driven to desperation.

Hermann Goering: Don't you remember that I visited your family and your wife? I saw you and your wife together repeatedly. You also visited my family with your wife.

INTERROGATIONS

Rudolf Hess: This is all a fog, behind which everything has disappeared; everything that happened in that time.

Hermann Goering: Do you remember that I lived just outside Berlin, in a great house in the forest, at Karinhall; don't you remember that you came there many times? Do you remember that we were together at Obersalzberg with the Fuehrer, where you have been for years, near Berchtesgaden?

Rudolf Hess: I have been there for years?

Hermann Goering: Yes, for years, even before the acquisition of power.

Rudolf Hess: That means nothing to me.

Hermann Goering: Hess, remember all the way back to 1923. at that time when I was the leader of the SA, that you led one of my SA troops in Munich already for me before 1923? Do you remember that we together made the putsch in Munich?

Rudolf Hess: The putsch in Munich was already mentioned this morning.

Hermann Goering: Do you remember that you arrested the Minister?

Rudolf Hess: I arrested the Minister?

Hermann Goering: Yes.

Rudolf Hess: I seem to have a pretty involved past, according to that.

Hermann Goering: I am just calling the most glaring things to your attention. Do you remember the beginning of the year 1933. and that we took over the government then, and that you got the central political office from the Fuehrer, and that we discussed it for a long time?

Rudolf Hess: No.

Hermann Goering: You also told me that you wanted to become a member of the government, and I told you that I would try to help you. Do you remember that you moved to the Wilhelmstrasse, into the palace which really belonged to me, as the Prime Minister of Prussia, but I enabled you to live there?

Rudolf Hess: I don't know.

Hermann Goering: I visited you many times, and I handed it to you so you would have a house in Berlin. I turned the house over to you for your benefit.

Rudolf Hess: I have been told that everything will come back at one time by a shock.

Hermann Goering: Just a moment. Do you remember Mr. Messerschmitt? You were well acquainted with him. He constructed all our fighter planes, and he also gave you the plane that I refused to give you, the plane with which you flew to England. Mr. Messerschmitt gave that to you behind my back.

Rudolf Hess: No; that is all black. That is all black. That is all blacked out. It is all beyond 14 days, and everything then I have a slight memory, and nothing exact. They told me that people who suffered heavily in the war would get attacks like that.

Hermann Goering: Do you remember that the war started—

Rudolf Hess: I know that there was a war, but I don't know how it came about.

Hermann Goering: Do you remember that you flew in a plane, you yourself, in this war, flew to England?

Rudolf Hess: No.

Hermann Goering: You used a Messerschmitt plane. Do you remember that you wrote a long letter to the Fuehrer?

Rudolf Hess: About what?

Hermann Goering: What you were going to do in England, that you were going to bring about peace.

Rudolf Hess: I have no idea of it.

Hermann Goering: I have come to the end. I cannot ask him any more.

Col. Amen (to Hermann Goering): All right. You move over here. (At this point Dr. Karl Haushofer enters the room.)

Rudolf Hess (to Dr. Karl Haushofer): Pardon me, but I really don't know who you are.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Rudolf, don't you know me any more?

Rudolf Hess: I don't know you.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: I am Haushofer.

Rudolf Hess: Are we calling each other by our own first names?

Dr. Karl Haushofer: We have called each other by our first names for 20 years. I saw your family and your child, and they are well.

Rudolf Hess: I was asked about your name today, and I don't know you.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: I saw your family, and your boy is nice. (At this point Dr. Karl Haushofer and Rudolf Hess shake hands).

Dr. Karl Haushofer: May I shake your hand? Your boy is wonderfully grown. He is 7 years old now. I have seen him.

Hermann Goering: (to Dr. Karl Haushofer): Tell him again that you have known him for 20 years.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: We have known each other for 20 years.

Rudolf Hess: In order to calm down an old friend, I can only assure you that the doctors tell me that my memory will all come back to me. I can't remember you. I just don't know you, but it will all come back to me, and then I will recognize an old friend again. I am terribly sorry.

INTERROGATIONS

Dr. Karl Haushofer: I am sure that it will come back again. Anyway, I can tell you that your son is very well. I saw him. He is a nice boy. And I said goodbye to him under the oak, that has your name, which you yourself chose, that is on Harzhimmelhof, where you were so many times. Don't you remember that there was the view on the Zugspitze and the branches of the trees that hung low down?

Rudolf Hess: All that doesn't mean a thing, it doesn't mean a thing.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Don't you remember Heimbach, where you were so long, where you lived so long?

Rudolf Hess: This is very peculiar. I don't know you. I want you to know how this could happen. All I can say is that it has all gone away. I don't know that it will come back.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: I am sure it will come back. I have known such cases with old soldiers. I have seen many such cases. Your whole memory will come back to you almost with one shock. You have got to have hope that the same thing will happen to you. I can see how those 4 years have worried you. Rest assured that it will come back. We have been friends for 22 years. You were in our University to become a doctor. That is as true as that your memory will come back. You will see that it will come back. I also see the light in your eyes like in the old days. Best of all, I know that your wife and your son are well on the farm, and that your boy has grown, has developed into a fine young man.

Hermann Goering (to Dr. Karl Haushofer) : Please mention the name of the farm itself to Hess.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: The Harzhimmelhof. And then from the Harzhimmelhof we traveled by car into the country.

Hermann Goering: Do you know that you lived in Munich, Hess?

Rudolf Hess: No.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Don't you know where Munich is?

Rudolf Hess: Of course, I know it is a town.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Don't you remember the flower beds with the waterflowers? It is all still there.

Rudolf Hess: I don't know anything about waterflowers. It may be right, but I don't remember it.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: It is like that. Just imagine, your little boy, he has grown so high (indicating). He is 7 years old, and he looks half like you and half like his mother.

Hermann Goering: (To Rudolf Hess): Do you remember your boy?

Rudolf Hess: Of course, I do remember them, because I looked at a picture of my wife and my boy all the time. It stays in my memory.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Your boy is this tall (indicating).

Rudolf Hess: He is not a small boy?

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Like yourself, he is a big boy, and he is 7 years old now. He is going to school and he is a wonderful little man. He is well-developed, and he is well taken care of, just as well as it is possible. I saw them two weeks ago. And I said goodbye to him under the oak, which you yourself chose.

Rudolf Hess: Of course, that is long ago. My memory for that period of time is gone.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: It will all come back. How far back can you remember?

Rudolf Hess: Possibly 10 days or 14 days, but I don't know anything further back than that.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: You wrote me a letter one time, by devious routes, which got to me finally, and you wrote to me about the long walks that you were taking, and you told me about the hay and the smell of the flowers, and that you were allowed to take walks of 2 hours' duration; that you had an honor guard. That made me and your wife very happy. That convinced us that you were treated well. In the last letter that you wrote, it already contained the sad line that says "I am beginning to lose my memory. Recollections leave me."

Rudolf Hess: How long ago was that?

Dr. Karl Haushofer: That must be about three-quarters of a year ago now.

Rudolf Hess: Three-quarters of a year?

Dr. Karl Haushofer: You said, "My recollections are starting to leave me. I cannot even imagine my son any more, and perhaps that is the greatest luck for me." That made us very sad, but we saw, though, and we understood that after 3 or 4 years of solitude and separation, you could not bear up under the impact. Maybe you have that much memory, and maybe you can feel yourself back into your recollection. Don't you remember that we read the story by the Swedish author Selma Lagerlof, together, and there are gifted students mentioned in there who lost their memory, just like you have now, and then with the help of music and poetry, found their memory again. I imagine you could do the same thing.

INTERROGATIONS

Rudolf Hess: I don't even doubt it after the doctor told me that. If I didn't believe that, I would have to become desperate.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: You must not become desperate. I remember especially these wonderful letters, which took a long time, but whatever you wrote to your wife, she also sent to me. Thus we remained in contact with your spiritual life and with your feelings, and thus we are completely convinced that your remembrance and your memory can be restored, if we refer to things that we have lived together during a period of 22 years. I know you never were patient in life. Now, you know, I am 76, and you are getting older. You will have to learn to be patient. If you are patient enough, your memory will come back. It will come back more and more to you, and then you will remember your old friends and also your youth, how we circled around the mountains in the Fichtengebirge with an airplane when we flew from Berlin to Munich. Don't you remember how you made the plane circle in the Fichtengebirge because the landscape was so beautiful? Don't you remember that?

Rudolf Hess: No.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: That is where your mother lived, and she is quite well. Don't you remember your old hunting lodge, that is the one that your father built?

Rudolf Hess: Do you have any news from her?

Dr. Karl Haushofer: In her little fine handwriting she has written letters to me, and she always has. Don't you remember the time when I was forbidden to write to your wife and to your mother, and I told the Gestapo they could arrest me, because I would not give up my old friendship for women and ladies, and then it was permitted for me? Thus, your mother and your wife and I corresponded all the time, but probably people put their noses in it.

Rudolf Hess: Why was this supposed to be stopped?

Dr. Karl Haushofer: For some years, that is, after you escaped, I was no more in favor in the official places. When you flew to England, it was believed that your romantic friend was guilty.

Rudolf Hess: I can't look through all this now, especially, if some of my friends had to suffer from it.

Hermann Goering (To Rudolf Hess): Do you remember an institution which we had, and which was called the Gestapo, the Secret State Police; don't you remember that?

Rudolf Hess: No.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: One sticks to his old friends always, even if one gets treated a little badly sometimes. Of course, you know that I spent 6 weeks in Dachau. I didn't write to you, and Elsie didn't either, but those things are borne for the sake of old friendship. I would like to look in your eyes, because for 22 years I read in your eyes, and I am glad to see that a little bit of recognition is coming back into them. I know that you are going to make yourself a little happier now, after long and heavy and hard times. Don't you remember Albrecht, who served you very faithfully? This is my eldest son. He is dead now.

Rudolf Hess: It doesn't mean anything to me.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: It will all come back. I see that a lot of it is coming back to you. Your voice is changing, and your eyes are changing. Recognition is coming back to you.

Rudolf Hess: I am terribly sorry, but at the moment, all this doesn't mean anything to me.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: But sometimes the old gleam is coming back into your eyes, and I think you are recognizing. In those 22 years I had great worry and pain for you.

Rudolf Hess: You are now talking about this flight to England?

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Before flying to England, you told me, by the fireplace, that you wouldn't fly any more.

Rudolf Hess: I told you that?

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Yes; you told me that. (At this point Franz von Papen enters the room.)

Col. Amen (To Rudolf Hess): Do you know that gentleman?

Rudolf Hess: I don't know him. Who is that?

Col. Amen: Did you ever see him before?

Rudolf Hess: No; I never saw him.

Col. Amen (To Franz von Papen): Do you know this gentleman?

Franz von Papen: Yes, I know him.

Rudolf Hess: I am sorry; I don't recognize him.

Franz von Papen: He has changed very much.

Col. Amen (To Franz von Papen): Would you state something to him? That might help him to remember who you are.

Rudolf Hess: Yes, I have changed. I didn't have any chance to shave.

Col. Amen (To Franz von Papen): Speak German to him.

Franz von Papen: I am Mr. von Papen.

Rudolf Hess: That doesn't mean anything to me.

Franz von Papen: I was Vice Chancellor under Hitler's government.

Rudolf Hess: I am very sorry; I don't know you.

INTERROGATIONS

Col. Amen (To Franz von Papen) : Could you recall any incidents to his mind?

Franz von Papen : We didn't see each other very much in that time, but you must remember that when we made Hitler's government on the 30th of January, that I was the Vice Chancellor in his government.

Rudolf Hess : I don't know that any more. I can't remember anything. I just explained it to these gentlemen. (At this point Ernst Bohle came into the room).

Col. Amen (To Bohle) : Do you know this gentleman?

Ernst Bohle : Yes, I do.

Rudolf Hess : There's another gentleman whom I don't know.

Col. Amen : Could you say anything to him that might make him remember you?

Ernst Bohle : Mr. Hess, you know me, of course. My name is Bohle.

Rudolf Hess : That doesn't mean anything to me. There are many gentlemen here who have been introduced and I am supposed to know.

Ernst Bohle : Don't you remember, your brother Alfred, he was with me?

Rudolf Hess : No.

Ernst Bohle (in English) : That is most remarkable.

Rudolf Hess : It is not so remarkable, because the doctors say that all will come back again some time to me.

Ernst Bohle : He has known me for years.

Col. Amen : Are there any special things you can think of?

Ernst Bohle : I have just told him that I know his brother very well, and we were together for quite a long time. I just reminded him of his brother. (To Rudolf Hess) : Don't you remember, you know your brother Alfred?

Rudolf Hess : Yes.

Ernst Bohle : He was working with me.

Hermann Goering (To Bohle) : Remind him that it was you who translated his letter.

Ernst Bohle : Don't you remember that I translated your letter for you to the Duke of Hamilton?

Rudolf Hess : No.

Ernst Bohle : Don't you remember that you took this letter to the Duke of Hamilton, that it was I who translated it?

Rudolf Hess : I don't remember that. I don't have the least recollection of that.

Ernst Bohle (in English) : That is flabbergasting.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Perhaps he wasn't called Hamilton then. Don't you remember Clydesdale, the young flier who flew over the Himalayan mountains? Don't you remember that he was your guest in Berlin at the Olympic Games, and his name was Clydesdale? His name was Hamilton later. That was the English way of giving out titles; don't you remember that? Don't you remember him?

Rudolf Hess: If I don't recognize a person whom I have known for 22 years, how do you expect me to know Clydesdale?

Dr. Karl Haushofer: If I brought his picture to you, you would probably recognize him again, because we found him very sympathetic at the time. Don't you remember you liked his flying feat when he went over Mount Everest, when he dropped for 2,000 meters, and he barely got away? Don't you remember that that made a very strong impression on you, because it was a terrific aviation feat, especially, that the plane did not break? Don't you remember how he got out before, between the mountains? Don't you remember that was something like where you used to ski, in the Hoellental, but that was 2,000 meters that he dropped. Don't you remember that that left a very deep impression on you? That was a wonderful feat in aviation, going over the highest mountain.

Hermann Goering: Don't you remember that any more?

Rudolf Hess: If I don't remember other things that made a much stronger impression on me, how do you expect me to remember that?

Hermann Goering: Hess, try to remember the following: remember the other war, the earlier war, when you were a young lieutenant in the air forces, as I was, and you were a fighter pilot?

Rudolf Hess: I have no idea.

Hermann Goering: Don't you remember when you flew in France as a fighter pilot? Don't you remember the plane you had, the Fokker plane? Don't you remember the aerial combat that you were in? Don't you remember all that?

Rudolf Hess: No.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: Don't you remember when you got wounded so bad, when you were shot in your lungs?

Hermann Goering: Don't you remember Max and I, who flew together with you? Don't you remember Max?

Rudolf Hess: Nothing, no. I don't remember anything at all. I am consoling myself with the fact that the doctors will probably be right.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: I can show you many common memories that we have. At least, in your eyes, I have the impression that your memory is coming back.

INTERROGATIONS

Rudolf Hess: Unfortunately, I don't feel anything of it.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: That may be, but your facial expression very often is stronger than what you really show, and it shows. It shows that your memory is coming back to you when you try to picture those things. It must work like that, because I know of many cases where men have found their memory again in this manner. You have to take single pictures in your memory, possibly impressions of music, impressions that you got from pictures. Use all of that to feel your way back. It is terribly hard to do, but you will find out.

Rudolf Hess: The doctors tell me that it could happen very suddenly if I got very strong impressions.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: That is why we mentioned all those memories to you, because we wonder if possibly one of them might not be strong enough to throw them all back to you. For instance, the moment, don't you remember when we played hide-and-seek between the oaks in the Hartz Mountains? We looked at the rainbow. Don't you remember that any more?

Rudolf Hess: I am sorry that I am facing here an old friend, and that I cannot share those old memories with him.

Dr. Karl Haushofer: They will all come back. They are sleeping somewhere deep down in your subconscious mind. They are all there. These men are all here trying to help you find again your recollection and memory. I cannot show you anything stronger. I can't show you anything stronger than to tell you that I shook the wonderful hand of your little boy, with my own, and the hand of your wife.

Rudolf Hess: I am very glad to hear that.

Col. Amen: We'll continue some other time.

Excerpts from testimony of Rudolf Hess, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 October 1945, 1700-1707, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Wm. A. Weigel, Court Reporter.

Advantage or Disadvantage of Loss of Memory Before Trial

Q. When did you get this idea of losing your memory?

A. I don't know. It is a fact that I don't have it now.

Q. I say, when did you get the idea that it would be the smart thing to lose it?

A. I don't quite understand that. You mean to say by that that I thought it might be a good idea to lose my memory and then deceive you like that?

Q. Yes. That is just what I mean.

A. Well, I can only say that that is not true.

Q. Well, it might be very helpful in connection with the coming proceedings, might it not?

A. Well, how could it be helpful?

Q. Well, if you don't remember anything that you were implicated in, it would be more difficult to, perhaps, prove it.

A. Well, take the book, for instance, that you showed me yesterday. I don't see what benefit I could derive from losing my memory there.

Q. Oh, no, but, for instance, when you directed the murder of various people, which you did.

A. I did that?

Q. Yes. So the witnesses say.

A. You mean that because I can't remember it, the witnesses are less creditable?

Q. Oh, somewhat.

A. Or, do you mean because I am lying?

Q. To make people feel sorry for you also.

A. On the contrary, I don't understand that. If I give the appearance that I lost my memory, then people will not like me, and it might influence the trial in such a way that I will get a worse judgment.

Q. Well, all I was interested in was finding out when it was that you got the idea of doing that.

A. Well, if I tell you that I never had any such idea, I can't tell you when I got it.

Q. So you think, for purposes of the trial, you would be better off to have your memory than to have lost it; is that right?

A. There is one thing that I can do in the coming trial, and that is to fight with everything I have for my own skin, and the only instrument I have to fight with is my brain and my memory.

Q. Well, your brain is just as good now as it ever was, isn't it?

A. Well, how does it help me, though, if my brain is working all right and if I don't have any memory; if I can't confront a witness with facts?

Q. Well, it doesn't, of course, if you really haven't got any memory left.

A. Then I must ask the gentleman again why he thinks, or for what reason he thinks, I am doing this. Does he think I am so childish, or so naive, that I think I could improve my position with that?

INTERROGATIONS

Q. I'm not quite sure why you are.

A. Yes. Well, that is just it, and that is why I am asking you, because I am much less sure why I should have any advantage from it.

Q. Well, Goering thinks that maybe he can help you get it back again in the near future.

A. I don't know what I can give him. Whether I can give him a decoration or a medal later, I don't know; but whatever I can give to him, I willingly will give to him.

Q. Well, we will let him try.

A. Well, I am only grateful for that.

Q. That is all for now.

*Statement by Rudolf Hess, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 19 October 1945, 1646-1648, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Nancy M. Shields, BCV, Reporter;
Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter.*

Insignificance of Indictment

Q. You have now been served with a copy of the indictment in this case, in which you are accused, as the defendant, of the commission of various crimes.

A. Yes.

Q. It is expected that you will continue to be interrogated from time to time unless you expressly object thereto?

A. I believe that, practically, there would be no purpose to that.

Q. Please state whether you have any objection to being further interrogated or whether you consider that your interests will be better protected by refusing to be interrogated further.

A. In my opinion, there is no difference either way because nothing will ever come of it. I read the indictment and to me it is completely insignificant. It does not mean a thing to me. However, if the gentlemen desire to put questions to me, I will be glad to listen to them.

Q. In other words, you have no objection to being further interrogated from time to time?

A. No.

Col. Amen: That is all.

Excerpt from testimony of Rudolf Hess, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 30 October, 1945, 10:30-12:00, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present Major Teich, F.C.; Major Kelley, D.M.; Pfc. Ruppert Waare; Pfc. Harold Predland; Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Frances Karr, Court Reporter.

Continual Loss of Memory

Q. What is your full name?

A. Rudolf Hess.

Q. And when you came up to Nurnberg, you brought with you various papers and documents?

A. I do not know that.

Q. You don't know whether you brought any papers and documents with you?

A. No, I don't know that.

Q. You told me the other day that you had?

A. To this gentleman here (pointing to Colonel Amen)?

Q. Yes.

A. I don't even know that I ever saw the gentleman before.

Q. You mean you do not remember that you ever saw me before?

A. No, as a matter of fact.

Q. Do you remember being questioned at all since you have been up here?

A. Well, I must have been interrogated before because among my papers I found the statement, which in substance was something like this: According to yesterday's interview I stated that I didn't want a defense counsel, so I must presume I had been asked, that is, that I could not name one.

Q. Don't you still remember leaving England to come up here?

A. Yes, I know that I came here from England.

Q. And you don't recall what has happened since you have been here, after you left England?

A. Well, I know that I am in a cell over there.

Q. Don't you remember that I have questioned you many times since you have been up here?

A. (To the Interpreter) You mean the gentleman that is confronting me now, putting questions to me.

Q. Yes, right in this room.

A. I don't know that.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Your memory is getting worse instead of better, is that right?

A. I can't say whether it is better or worse, I do not know that.

Q. But you do not remember ever having seen me before?

A. No, to the best of my knowledge I do not remember that.

III. JOACHIM VON RIBBENTROP

Excerpts from testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 15 August 1945, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD. Also present: Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD; Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD; Major Arne Brogger, FA, OCC Representative in Norway; Mr. Thomas Dodd, OUSCC; Jens Hauge, Legal Secretary to Norwegian Prime Minister; Mr. Helge Silvertsen, and Mr. Ivar Follestad, Representatives of the Norwegian Government; T/4 Kurt M. Gutman, Interpreter.

Quisling's Slush Fund

Q. I show you a document dated 15 June 1940.* The part I am interested in is the provision that for the first 3 months after March 15, 1940, 10,000 pounds were to be paid to Quisling to support his efforts. Is that what you read?

A. I recall one thing. Some means were put up for disposition for intelligence purposes in the Scandinavian countries. I can state one thing regarding the Norwegian expedition. The first time I was notified about the Norwegian operation was 36 hours before the landing operations. Neither I nor anybody else in the Foreign Office had any idea that an operation against Norway was to take place.

Q. By whom were you first so notified?

A. The Fuehrer himself. It happened on the afternoon, two days before the invasion.

Q. But you subsequently found out, did you not, that there was an arrangement to pay the 10,000 pounds per month to Quisling?

A. I don't know the amount of money and the receiver of the money. I know, however, that money was put up for intelligence purposes in Scandinavia. I may add here too, that Quisling's name is only known to me slightly.

* See document 004-PS—The Political Preparation of the Norway Action.

Excerpts from testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 24 August 1945, by Lt. Col. M. I. Gurfein, OUSCC. Also present: 1st Lt. R. Stutz, Interpreter.

Armaments and The League of Nations

Q. [In English] How did you get your job as disarmament commissioner? What was the sequence of events that led to it?

A. [In English] We had left the League of Nations and I remember that the reason why we left the League of Nations was speeches which were then made by the various Foreign Ministers of England, France, and so on. I think it was Sir John Simon for England and for France it was Barthou, I am not quite sure. They made speeches in which they said, I remember, that Germany would have to wait four years and see how politics in Germany went.

Q. Wait four years for what?

A. About disarmament. They were talking about disarmament now. You see the Fuehrer had decided that it was one of the main issues. The Fuehrer wanted absolutely to have equality, you see, equality of rights in every field with the other nations and also, of course, equality in armaments; but he was willing to come to arrangements with the nations about it. I remember well that Hitler was very much concerned about speeches which were made, I think it was by the English representative and the French especially, saying that before Germany could get equality in rights, she would have to wait four years to see how things worked out and then another period of four years would have to pass before anything definite could be done. So this meant for the Fuehrer that before he could come to any equality of rights so far as armaments were concerned, approximately eight years would have to pass. This really made the Fuehrer decide to leave the League of Nations.

I had a long conversation with Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Baldwin. This conversation went very well. I explained to them the situation of Hitler, of Germany, why we left the League, I think. At any rate, we talked about the equality of armaments; and I remember that afterwards we didn't come to any arrangement because I was a private individual then. I told them that Hitler wanted to come to a definite arrangement with Great Britain, that he had advocated that in Mein Kampf since 1918 and this was a profession of faith. Then I remember when I was in Paris that Mr. Baldwin made the speech in the House of Commons, which was a very good speech and which we liked very much, in which he said that somehow the English and the members of the League of Nations had promised equality of rights to Germany and that this equality was to be obtained either by rearming of Germany to the standard of the others, which, of course, was impossible and nobody wanted, or the disarmament of the others to the standard of Germany, which others wouldn't do and therefore would have to come to some arrangements. This was a speech I read then in Paris, which seemed to show to me that the English people were then moving in a direction which would bring, or which would give us the possibility to come to some solution, because Hitler was quite willing, quite prepared to make concessions, a big concession on his part.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. About what?

A. About armaments, I mean.

Armaments and the Versailles Treaty

Q. Now I ask you, did the Fuehrer ask you your opinion as to what could be the effect on world opinion, particularly the opinion of England and France, if he marched into the Rhineland?

A. Yes, he did. That is right.

Q. Do you recall how long before the occupation of the Rhineland Hitler had these conversations with you in which he asked you your opinion?

A. It was a question of days, there is no doubt about that. My opinion, at any rate, was that and I also told Hitler that it was absolutely necessary that Germany would have to defend her own country again and that very probably the English and French people would accept that. That was my opinion.

Q. Defend the country? Germany against whom, did you tell Hitler?

A. Well, defend, have fortifications. I mean to defend one's own country, the sovereignty of the country.

Q. The contiguous territory, the country adjacent to the Rhineland is France?

A. Yes.

Q. And at the same time you were circulating around the capitals, Paris and London, to establish some sort of friendship with the French?

A. Yes, but on the basis of equality. I have said that always very openly.

Q. That is what you said before?

A. Yes. I have stated that very openly. I mean on an absolute clear basis of equality and my view always has been, you see, that in order to have equality, we would have to be able to defend our own country, have our own fortifications, and that sort of thing, you see. That always has been my opinion.

Q. In other words, the problem must have been raised, obviously, that this was a violation of the Treaty of Versailles, which had been signed by the plenipotentiaries of the German Government; that must have been discussed by you and Hitler.

A. If you like it that way, it was violation. Yes.

*Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop,
taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 29 August 1945, 1030-1200,
by Col. H. A. Brundage, OUSCC.*

Ribbentrop's Role in Hitler's Accession to Power

Q. [In English] I am interested primarily and for the moment in the early days of the Party and the German Government.

A. [In English] Papen, was, in August 1932, Chancellor to Hindenburg, and some other people tried in August 1932 to make Hitler Chancellor. I didn't participate in the negotiations but I watched them because I got the view during 1932 that the only possibility for Germany to avoid chaos and civil war would be to follow the patriotic front consisting of National Socialists, Nationalists, down right to the central party—that was my view then. People tried in August to bring that about, but Hitler came to Berlin. I then went to see Papen at the instigation of Helldorf and I asked Papen what really had happened. He told me that Hitler had asked to become Chancellor; that Hindenburg wouldn't do that. I told him, of course, that is a different situation, but what about if I went to try and see Hitler and talked with him whether things could be arranged in some way—perhaps in some other way—that he may not become Chancellor; and Papen was quite agreed, quite willing, and so Helldorf had asked me whether I would make intermediate talk and try to bring Papen and Hitler together again; and they prepared an interview for me which was the first time I saw Hitler to meet him personally, in August 1932, at the Berghof. I had a lengthy discussion with him, and I saw that Hitler was very disappointed and had a great distrust of von Papen. I tried to eliminate that, but the essence of my whole situation really was that I found that it was practically useless conversation, because I could not eliminate this distrust of Hitler's; and I went away, telling the Fuehrer that I would try as far as I could to get to Papen again to see him or come into communication again. Meantime, I think Hitler had met Papen in the house of Baron von Schroeder and they had a talk there,* and I don't know what happened there because I was not a party to it. About a week or ten days later, it must have been, I was approached whether I would not try again to bring Hitler and Papen together, and so I did. And that meeting at my house—I think it was two or three times during January, and I believe that these conversations at my house have contributed to the fact that later on the Hitler Government was formed. I personally did not take part in the material side of the discussions, but my activities as intermediary were only the fact to put my house at their disposal, to bring them together, and let them discuss.

INTERROGATIONS

Ribbentrop's Loyalty to the Fuehrer

Q. Do you feel that you have an obligation to the German people to historically set forth, not only the good things, but the bad things, for their education in the future?

A. That is a terribly difficult question to answer.

Q. Does that counterbalance the loyalty you feel toward the Fuehrer?

A. I do not want to stand before the German people as being disloyal to the Fuehrer.

*Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop,
taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 29 August 1945, 1400-
1630, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, IGD. Also present:
T/5 Adolf I. Mayer, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Reporter.*

Hitler's Views on Anglo-German Friendship

[Interrogation continued in English language from morning session.]

A. I may point out that still, about a week before his death, the Fuehrer had again pointed out to me the necessity of Anglo-German friendship, and has to this moment given me a sort of—well, we still thought then there might be possibilities of some negotiations, or some meetings of the statesmen, or something, some sort of a message which I should give to them when I saw them. This was on the 22d or 23d of April, when the Fuehrer spoke to me for the first time that the war was lost. He never spoke of it before. It was the 22d or 23d of April.

Q. You mean of this year?

A. Yes, of this year. I mean, it only shows you how he really stuck to his fundamental ideas. He came back to that again, about the tremendous necessity of these two countries coming to some sort of an arrangement.

* See statement of Kurt von Schroeder, Vol. II, pp. 922-924.

I may say that also—this may be just interesting for historical purposes—that also during the war, after Dunkirk, I was sitting together with Hitler in his headquarters in France, and I asked him what he thought should now be done with Great Britain, what we could do; and I proposed whether we could not make a quick peace, and the Fuehrer was enthused about the idea himself. And I asked him whether I should sketch out some sort of plan or something. He said: "No, I shall do that myself. It will be only a few points, a very few points, and the first point is that nothing must be done between England and Germany which would in any way violate the prestige of Great Britain. Secondly, Great Britain must give us back one or two of our old colonies. That is the only thing we want." My next conversation—"And thirdly, we must come to a stable and everlasting line with Great Britain." That is all the Fuehrer asked for. He told me that on the eve of Dunkirk, three or four days later. It also shows you that during the whole war or—later, you know, the Fuehrer made this peace offer then in the Reichstag. It was perhaps not happily formed, I dare say. I don't think he believed very much that Great Britain would take it up, but I don't know. I don't know, really; but he never, even later during the war, never lost the idea that one day one might still come to an arrangement with Great Britain. And I remember personally what the memorandum was which I proposed to the Fuehrer during the war, which always had stated at the time, "Well, then, we must come to an arrangement with Great Britain."

Now, the question is: Why have all these trials of Germany been in vain? Well, here I must say this: I am convinced that apart from the question of world perception, which of course also molested or hindered a great deal this policy with Great Britain, it is to my mind no doubt that the idea of the balance of power which was upheld by Great Britain was the main reason why this friendship did not come about. I may perhaps point out that the point of view of the Fuehrer was this: He thought that the old English theory of the balance of power was old-fashioned, and he thought, with reference to the East, and to the possibilities of power displayed in the East, England should for her own protection, be glad to have a solid Germany; that is to say, a very much stronger Germany as a new balance of power in Europe. He quite often expressed that. That was the Fuehrer's notion. And especially a Germany, whose vital problems were solved, and which was prepared to give England all security guarantees, territorial and also as far as armaments were concerned. That is to say, first British supremacy at sea, the 100 to 35, which had been done—I am explaining to you the way the Fuehrer thought at that time, you see.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Yes.

A. And secondly—and these were things which were offered to Great Britain all along by myself, officially, to British statesmen—secondly, the integrity of Holland, Belgium, and France, with the renunciation of Alsace Lorraine. Thirdly, a close alliance with Great Britain, through which, and as a condition of this alliance, the Fuehrer offered to Great Britain, to put at the disposal of Great Britain this 35 percent of the German fleet, plus 12 divisions, if ever England would have the necessity in her empire to defend herself. This was an idea of the Fuehrer then. Then also on the colonial field, the Fuehrer was absolutely willing to renounce colonial policy, but only he wanted for raw material purposes to have back one or two of the old German colonies. That was his view. And after the closing of the Anglo-Germany treaty, the Fuehrer was prepared, besides the fleet arrangement which had already been closed as 100 to 35, to come to an arrangement with Great Britain in the question of land and air armaments. That was also the part of the proposal.

Now, against this, the British point of view was—I wouldn't say of all people, but of quite a number of people—was that the National Socialistic Germany with Austria and Sudetenland, and so on, was getting too strong, and was endangering the old English theory of the balance of power, and that England would have to oppose this.

Q. Do you think there was any element of distrust of Hitler?

A. I don't know. At that time, I don't know. I think—you see, if Hitler was willing to come to such terms, as I have sketched them out now, this would have been the real proof of trust, really; so I don't think this question came in at that moment. Perhaps later on, but perhaps not at this moment.

The Fuehrer thought that England must understand his point of view, and should act accordingly. I have, on the other hand, always pointed out to the Fuehrer that England would not tolerate such a stronger Germany as the Fuehrer imagined, but that it would, that the very important circles in Great Britain would, at the moment when they thought this thesis of balance of power in danger, go against Germany, and at the opportune moment even go as far as war. That was my absolute conviction. I heard about this, and had repeated, even sometimes violent, debates with the Fuehrer. I am pointing out this, especially because it has been often said in propaganda, very clever British propaganda, that I had been advising the Fuehrer that England would not fight. You probably have heard this also. This is absolute nonsense. I must say that quite openly and frankly here, because it is known to everybody who knows anything around the Fuehrer that this has been one of the most striking differences of opinion which I have had with the Fuehrer. Quite fundamental. As Ambassador from London, I reported to the Fuehrer always in this direction. And I have, furthermore, I remember that during the war—this was said, always repeated again and again on the radio by British propaganda, that I had advised the Fuehrer wrongly. It said that the British people were degenerate and wouldn't march, and so on; so that I went to the Fuehrer, I think it was in 1942 or '43—I think it was in '43—and I told him that I thought this propaganda was harmful, and I asked him particularly whether he would allow that in an open speech I would say exactly how I told him. He agreed. I made an open speech sometime in 1943, where I made it quite clear what my position was. That is always what I told the Fuehrer. He never accepted my view, and I never came to a real harmony with him on this point.

Therefore, I merely want to point out that even already in 1936, to my mind, there were these very strong forces in Great Britain, who were absolutely of the feeling that this National Socialistic Germany with its program was getting too strong, and that one must oppose it and not make a pact with it.

Now, after the solution of the Austrian question and the Sudeten question, this tendency was getting very much stronger, and there were rather aggressive speeches made by British politicians against Germany, so that the Fuehrer got the impression that England did not want to come to arrangements with Germany, and that the anti-German circles were getting the upper hand. The Fuehrer then, to my surprise, made a speech at Saarbrucken, in answer to these aggressive British speeches. I may perhaps point out this—I don't know whether you know that. I thought it was unfortunate, but that since I have been Foreign Minister, I don't think—maybe once, but I don't remember it exactly—the Fuehrer has never shown me his speeches or discussed them with me. All his Reichstag appeals, all his foreign policy speeches, were always made without me. I complained about it once, but the Fuehrer didn't like it very much, and had the habit of deciding these matters, speeches and all decisions, deciding them very much out of himself, without consulting me.

[Another excerpt from this interrogation has been published as document TC-91 (Vol. VIII, p. 535).]

INTERROGATIONS

*Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop,
taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 30 August 1945, 1430-1640,
by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JADG. Also present: S/Sgt. Wm. A. Weigel, Court Reporter.*

"My Foreign Office—The House of Difficulties"

A. [In English] I would just like you to understand. In the first place, you see, I have been a loyal supporter of the Fuehrer to the end. I did not agree with the policy in many respects. In 1941 I had a great difficulty and I gave a promise, a word of honor, that there would be no more difficulty with the Fuehrer. Since then I have followed up and stood behind the Fuehrer all these years of the war. You can imagine that already before the war and also after the war I have told you that I stood very often quite alone. This is true because as far as my own office is concerned, my Foreign Office was called the "House of Difficulties." The Fuehrer didn't like it, and he didn't like all the old men; the old routine men he didn't like very much—some exceptions, of course. I had to take very drastic measures, very often because this and that had been said by such and such a diplomat outside or inside the office and so on, and it was a continuous run, I should like to say, from many places against my office in Germany, that we weren't taking a firm enough position, that we were seeing matters only through the eyes of foreign countries and that sort of thing. So I had to see to it personally—the Fuehrer demanded from me always to take a very strict and very severe view toward all these difficulties whatever they might have been. This I did.

Therefore, of course, there are quite a number of these, my own people. I told you this morning I had to dismiss three Chiefs of Missions only a few months before the end. But this is not the only thing. I think I dismissed 150 higher officials at the order of the Fuehrer also in the winter of '44 and '45, you see, because he wanted the Foreign Office to become quite small. Many of these functions were taken by other places, for instance, the Propaganda Ministry and some other places, and he wanted the office to be quite small and me at the head of it only as a sort of a body which was there to advise him or to be ready for diplomatic missions. That was the whole conception of the Fuehrer of my Foreign Office.

"Military Necessity" for Invasion of Belgium and Holland

Q. Did you have anything to do with the Belgian situation?

A. Well, later on, yes. The Fuehrer told me one day that different preparations, I think, were being made for the Belgians—yes, that the French and English troops, I think it was, were being concentrated on the Belgian frontier, and a number of other military methods, which I don't quite remember now. I remember also that he was giving me a number of documents which were there which showed that there had been connections between the English General Staff, French General Staff, and the Belgian and the Dutch General Staffs. I remember that I got all the various documents and the Fuehrer told me to prepare a note to Holland and to Belgium that it was necessary to occupy their territory and make part of the advance toward France through these countries in order to—well, I will say in other words, that he thought that at the first opportune moment that the attack on the other side might go and that he was compelled to do it, and I was to prepare notes to the Belgian and Dutch governments that it was a military necessity to do so.

Q. Was there any attempt made to ascertain the validity of the documents that you had?

A. Well, there were various documents, especially on the military field, I think, and some were also on the political field from the central news service or what you call Intelligence, the Intelligence of the Fuehrer.

Q. But you had no diplomatic negotiations with either of those countries?

A. No. No diplomatic connections.

Norwegian, Balkan Invasions "Forced" Upon Hitler

Q. What about the decision to take part in the Balkans?

A. The decision came through the Simovic putsch in Belgrade.* You remember we had closed a treaty with the government. We had made a treaty and a week later out of the Simovic putsch, which meant hostilities, the Fuehrer decided to go against Serbia and at the same time, and very unwillingly, also to help the Italians in Greece. The Fuehrer was most unhappy that the Italians took up this Greek war. As I remember, we were in France, I think, meeting with Franco. I was with the Fuehrer and we were going to go back to Berlin or to Munich, and the Fuehrer heard something that the Italians were about to do something in Greece

* Coup d'etat, led by General Simovic, March 26, 1941, overthrowing Yugoslavian Government which had joined the Three Power Pact on the 25th.

INTERROGATIONS

or in Albania or from Albania, and the Fuehrer wired to Mussolini and turned the train to Florence in order to try to end this war with Greece; but it was too late. When we arrived there, Mussolini said that they were marching. I remember that very well. We never had anything against the Greeks and we were rather sorry about the whole development.

Q. Didn't Hitler have an idea that he wanted to occupy Crete?

A. Well, I know I can tell you this, that he absolutely had no intention to bring any war down to Greek territory. He didn't have any intention of that. I remember that he was saying after the Greek war occasionally that the Italians did this very foolishly, this whole war, that from a military point, they should have occupied Crete instead of invading Greece from the North. I remember the Fuehrer saying that.

Q. That was his idea?

A. So as to provide a springboard. I think so, yes.

Q. A bridgehead in North Africa?

A. I remember him saying that. I think he said it. I don't remember now to whom, but I remember it was his idea, that it was very badly done, this campaign of the Italians.

Q. On the other hand you had a long range plan whereby war could be fought outside of the borders of Germany.

A. But there was no long range plan.

Q. Certainly every development indicated that Germany was attacking other countries, not sitting back waiting for countries to attack her.

A. Yes, but there was no plan. The Fuehrer wanted to settle the Polish problem.

Q. But those successions of attacks against other countries, they must have—

A. I assure you, Colonel, it would be quite wrong to say it was planned. It never has been planned. The Fuehrer once, I remember told me that here he was in Europe being forced from one step to the other from the military necessities. The moment Poland started, the war with Poland started, and England and France had declared war on Germany because of the Polish question (the Polish war being settled), well, it was of course quite natural that the Fuehrer would try to keep war away from the German front as far as possible—which was quite natural already on account of the air and so on. I am convinced that the Fuehrer would never have consented, for instance, to go to Norway or to go to Greece and so on. But I am sure that the Fuehrer, and I remember that the note to Norway, and I remember that this was the essence of the note, that the English were going to occupy Norway. I don't know where he got the confirmation, but after the Norwegian occupation the Fuehrer had repeatedly said that he had just arrived within 34 or 48 hours before the English arrived there, and so when the English and French declaration of war had come, then to my mind this was the time that the whole matter was in the hands of the timetable of the General Staffs. The moment the English wanted to come, for instance, in Norway, the Fuehrer went there as quickly as possible as he could. Then the English landed in France and here the Fuehrer went and occupied Belgium, Holland, and France in order to keep the English and French as far back from the German frontier.

Then came the Balkans. We had made, you remember, we had no harm or difficulty with the Greek people. On the contrary, we had rather a friendship with them. We liked them. Already for the purpose of old culture, German culture is built up on Greek culture really. And I remember the Fuehrer saying repeatedly that it was one of the worst things that he had to go and fight against the Greek people who even fought very bravely. But we made a treaty, for instance, with the Serbs. I had made this treaty with Prince Paul at the close of Vienna and we hoped through this treaty that the whole Balkans would keep out of the war. We were trying to prevent the enlargement of the war which couldn't help us any. But of course, when Simovic came—the English people made this putsch themselves and even had already troops going to Belgrade to Serbia—so again the Fuehrer was forced down in order to not become a new Balkan front like the Silesia front in the World War. He didn't like to do it at all. This went on and on, the timetable, until the Russian war. There was a question of really—I would like to say once the war is started the political people, the diplomats, kept matters out of their hands and the general staffs dictate really the necessities of war then.

I think one ought to see it that way. I mean, I can tell you that the Fuehrer repeatedly expressed the opinion that here he was being forced by military necessities to go and send German soldiers anywhere and to all sorts of parts of Europe, but I can assure you this was absolutely no plan, no laid down plan, or anything to dominate Europe. That is not true.

Q. What I am trying to find out—in your opinion in this succession of events that took place you must have started down the wrong road someplace. Where in your opinion was the first false step that was made?

A. Well, I don't know.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Let me put it a different way. Some place along this succession of events there must have been a stopping point. Do you have an opinion where Germany could have stopped and avoided this disaster to her?

A. I don't really know. How should I answer you that? I think personally I am of the opinion that the outside world would never have tolerated a strong Germany, perhaps already as strong a Germany as the Fuehrer imagined himself which he wanted, which after all showed at the moment after Bohemia and Moravia and after the Polish question came up. But to tell you exactly where Germany might have stopped or what she should have done to prevent this disaster, well, the only thing I can imagine is that she should have renounced, for instance, should have renounced the solution, for instance of the Corridor or the Danzig problem, something like that. Then, perhaps, I don't know, it might have been possible that in such a case some arrangement with the outside world might have been possible. The Fuehrer, I believe, didn't think it so because otherwise he probably wouldn't have done it, because he probably thought at that moment that sooner or later some sort of combination which perhaps might not give Germany a chance at all would squash us. That was probably his view. I don't know if I make myself clear, but it is very difficult to answer the question.

Negotiations with Stalin and Molotov, and Invasion of U.S.S.R.

Q. What was your reaction to the decision of Hitler to attack Russia?

A. To understand the whole situation I think it is better to tell you the whole story. But it was in 1939 when I proposed to the Fuehrer to come to an arrangement with the Soviets. The Fuehrer first was not very pleased with this proposal on account of his fundamental views of Bolshevism, but after awhile he agreed that we should try. My view, in doing this was, firstly, I personally have always held the view that it should be possible also to find some sort of bridge between what our doctrine of National Socialism and Bolshevism is. Secondly, I held the view that on account of this difficulty with Poland—you know Poland was always lying between ourselves and Russia—I considered, and this was also the view of the Fuehrer, that an understanding with Russia might on the diplomatic field help to bring about an easier understanding between ourselves and Poland. And, furthermore, it was, of course, important also to know, in case of a hostile development between ourselves and Poland, to know where the Russians and where we stood towards each other. Those were more or less the reasons which made us do that.

The Fuehrer sent me to Russia. We negotiated with them through the diplomatic channels for a number of weeks, I think it was in August 1939. For us of course, this was also important because then already the attitude of the western world was rather unfriendly towards us. With France we made a treaty, a sort of treaty—I don't know whether you know that I had been in Paris in 1938 and we closed a sort of nonaggression treaty with them. This was all right, but all the same they were rather against—the feeling was rather against us—and the same thing was in America and in England. Then the Fuehrer allowed me to—he sent me to Moscow and I had a long discussion with Stalin and Molotov. During these discussions we talked about the various points of interest between our two nations, especially we also discussed the question that the idea of Bolshevism and National Socialism should not prevent the two countries to come to a good understanding. Furthermore, we discussed that we were in a tense position, of course, with Poland and that there might be difficulties, and at any rate it was the understanding between ourselves and the Russians that whatever would be the development we would keep a friendly attitude towards each other. There were a number of other points being discussed, of course, of a more detailed kind.

Then after the finish of the Polish campaign, I was sent again to Moscow and completed a pact of friendship with them and at the same time then the Russians occupied the eastern parts of Poland. This was agreed between the Russians and ourselves. Later on we also went into the Baltic and into Bessarabia and parts of Ruthenia later on. I tried in the meantime to enlarge this basis of understanding between the Russians and ourselves on the casual sector, and here I found great difficulties in Germany between the parties, or with the parties. I tried, for instance, to introduce a number of Russian films in Germany and this always met with great opposition of the Party. And, as I may say, that this pact, here I stood again comparatively alone. This pact was not considered with great favor between the people.

We tried to enlarge the economic situation with Russia. We closed a treaty for one billion marks which was a big treaty then, but we found the Russians rather hard in their demands. They were very hard bargainers.

Now, why came the breakdown of the German-Russian friendship? I must say this, that during the last part of the French campaign, I got a telegram one day from our Herr Schulenburg at Moscow announcing that, I think, within 24 hours, or it was the same evening or the next morning the Russians would occupy Bessarabia, so to speak, overnight. They didn't discuss it with us as the Fuehrer had expected them to, if they had any intention of that sort, but they simply did it.

INTERROGATIONS

Also the occupation of the Baltic and the way it was done was rather a surprise to the Fuehrer, and the Fuehrer at that date already spoke of signs of expansion measures of Russia towards the west.

Then after the war with France I had two discussions with the Fuehrer. In the first discussion the Fuehrer talked about the military deployment of Russian forces everywhere on our eastern front already during the Franco-German war, especially in Lithuania towards East Prussia. He talked again about the Bukovina tendency because Bukovina had been occupied. Certain parties passed there where Germans were living and it was quite unexpected by the Fuehrer that the Russians went in there. I asked the Fuehrer whether he had the intention of doing anything about it, but the Fuehrer, in the first conversation I remember, told me that he didn't want to do anything, that he told me to observe this policy with greatest concern, the future Russian policy.

In the second conversation which we had, the Fuehrer was very nervous and rather aroused or agitated because he had again heard reports of further concentration of Russian troops. I remember at that time there was the talk of 22 divisions in Eastern Lithuania towards the Russian front. And I remember he had reports of some of the German police stations that Communistic propaganda was being made in German factories again. I remember this was a point which agitated the Fuehrer perhaps even more so than the military side.

I think it was also the question—I don't remember that very well though that it was the Russian commercial delegation in Berlin. They had quite a few hundred people in this commercial delegation who were leading this propaganda.

The Fuehrer, as I said, was rather nervous. He told me this pact of '39 had been made by the Kremlin in case of a long war in the west to put the pressure on Germany economically and later to dictate political dispositions. He said he would not let himself be overrun by Russia and that he would take military measures against them.

I had at that time made a very earnest representation to the Fuehrer I pointed out to him the danger of any preventative action. I remember still I pointed out to him the word of Bismarck who said once that one couldn't look God into his path, and therefore one should never make a preventative war. I then pointed out the good relation that we had with Stalin and Molotov but the Fuehrer pointed out the great danger which these Russian preparations might mean and that he would on no account let himself be overrun or surprised by Russia.

The Fuehrer then was in a rather difficult—he must have had—I don't know exactly—but he had certain difficulties about these Russian questions. Whether it was military or not I don't know. At any rate, he told me that he demanded of his collaborators and also of me a very clear line about this Russian policy, and I told him for myself that in case whatever policy he would decide towards Russia, of course, as a follower of his I would stand behind him. I told him that, but I have again urged very much then that all his news, for there was much news coming from Russia, should be looked into and confirmation of it should be found in every way and all information coming from there.

Then for a long time there was really no talk any more about the Russian attitude. I remember—I don't know exactly the date—but sometime during the latter part of the year I proposed to the Fuehrer whether we could not clarify this Russian position in trying to get a better understanding and to clear the situation, because I had heard no more then from any military preparations of the Russians at that time.

Q. When was that?

A. This must have been sometime during the autumn now when I proposed to the Fuehrer—I remember that I have written to Stalin at that moment—and I proposed to him—

Q. That was in 1940?

A. 1940. After the French war. I proposed to him to try and sort of clarify the situation on the diplomatic field with Russia to see whether anything aggressive was behind this tendency of Russia or these measures which had been reported to him or not. The Fuehrer agreed and by this way we—yes, tried first very hard to bring about a meeting of the Fuehrer and Stalin, but this didn't come off because the Fuehrer was of the opinion that Stalin would not leave his country, and, as the Fuehrer did not want to leave Germany, this meeting didn't come off.

Q. He wasn't invited?

A. He was not invited. But I wrote a letter to Stalin explaining the whole situation and I asked at the end of the letter whether

INTERROGATIONS

Molotov would—as I had been advised in Moscow—whether Molotov would not pay a visit to Berlin.

Q. Did you get a reply to that?

A. Yes. Stalin wrote to me that Molotov was quite willing to accept my invitation. I may perhaps point out at this moment—as a matter of fact this was the idea of the Fuehrer, but I quite consented to it and quite agreed to it. We had the idea of bringing Russia nearer to our Three Powers Pact in the hope that—you see, the Three Powers Pact was really closed, as I pointed out, just before by us with the clear intention not to come to war with the United States of America, but to keep the United States of America out of the war. That was the very clear object of this treaty.

Q. You mean by that that Japan would be a threat against the United States from the west?

A. I will point out to you exactly what I felt. You see, we felt the attitude of the United States was very unfriendly towards Germany. As we had good relations with Japan, we hoped that the fact of Germany, Italy and Japan coming to this treaty would strengthen those forces in the United States of America who were for isolation and who would then do nothing because the Fuehrer was always afraid on account already of the Jewish question of world perception and so on that the United States would one day declare war on Germany. He was always afraid this would come at any rate.

You see, we had the idea that a combination like that would help to bring what we called the reasonable forces in the U. S. more into power, who would know, if they went to war with Germany—for which we thought in Germany there was no reason whatsoever because we certainly didn't want this war—that they would still hesitate if they knew in case of an attack from Germany on the United States they would have to fight in Europe and in Asia. That was more or less the reason for the Three Powers Pact.

Q. Did you ever hear it discussed among any of the leaders of Germany that the real purpose of that was to permit Germany to continue with its world expansion program?

A. Never, no, never. Never has been discussed with me. It never has been discussed and I do not think if it had been, if anybody said something like that, they must have been what you would call loose-talking people, or something.

Q. You had a very rigid internal control?

A. I am of the opinion, I think the way the internal control was exercised was wrong. I don't think it was right and I think it was wrong. As a matter of fact, I considered the whole development of the police system and so on, I did not consider that in the interest of German unity. As a matter of fact, it may seem queer to you, that with these internal questions I worked 14, 16, and 18 hours a day with my foreign political questions, so I had nothing to do with the internal questions. I knew perhaps less about the internal questions than the boy on the street or the porter in the hotel. But I was amazed during the later months of the war when I suddenly got a glimpse of these police methods and things that were going on. I don't think it was right, the way it was done, but this, of course, was due to people who handled it badly. It was not formed well to my mind. It was not formed well,

Q. That shocked the conscience of the world.

A. Well, I can tell you this, Colonel. I know it is very difficult for you to understand and you have heard it perhaps from many people but it is the absolute truth that I tell you that I myself, and many others I am sure, had not the slightest idea of what was going on in the concentration camps, not the slightest idea. It was absolutely controlled and closed up, I mean to an extent that was hardly believable to you.

Q. Well, frankly, that isn't believable to me.

A. It is extraordinary, but it is the absolute truth.

Shall I go on with this Russian history and finish that? Molotov came to Berlin. In a talk Molotov had with the Fuehrer, this talk did not go very well because Molotov insisted very much on a number of matters, also of the territorial kind, that the Fuehrer—really, this conversation with the Fuehrer did not end in a harmonious atmosphere. There was no specific program for this visit, you see. We had thought it was only a visit of good will, among ourselves, and that I would try perhaps to clarify with this visit whether these Russian expansive tendencies, especially of a military kind, was something earnest and so on. Molotov raised certain specific points which gave to the Fuehrer, again I should like to say, the impression that we had more at stake with the Russian problem than the opposite. The Fuehrer then said that he could not, without talking with Mussolini, go further into these matters. But I asked the Fuehrer specifically whether he was not willing that I should try and clarify the situation further with the Russians and I tried to see if I could not bring, after all, about a friendly atmosphere. The atmosphere was friendly, but a closer atmosphere—I could see on what conditions Russia would, if possible, come nearer to our Three Powers Pact. The Fuehrer consented and I negotiated with the Russians. I talked with Molotov in the evening at my house. Molotov said he would talk with Stalin about it. You see, the Russians—well, you know that probably Stalin decided everything there, and Molotov didn't commit himself very much and he said he would present it to Stalin and he could give no answer, but he would promote it and help if he could. Then he worked through the Ambassador in Moscow, I think. For two or three months the negotiations went on but they did not really come very far because there were certain claims and certain desires of the Russians which it was impossible for us, for the Fuehrer, to accept. The question of the Balkans came up then and there were other points, and, of course, the Russians are very hard bargainers if they want something. You probably know that yourself. So these negotiations did not really get very much further.

INTERROGATIONS

Also, it was a question, the Mediterranean question played a certain role then and the Fuehrer thought that the Duce—that it would be difficult for the Duce, on these questions, so these questions, so these negotiations didn't get very much further.

And then came in the spring the putsch of Simovic in Belgrade and I don't know whether you remember that, shortly after the putsch a few days later, well, the revolution, Stalin closed the treaty of friendship with Simovic. This, of course, struck the Fuehrer very much as a sign of these fears which he had with Russia were really confirmed. I then proposed to the Fuehrer again to try to come to a diplomatic clearing up of the situation, but the Fuehrer said that he had such complete views or reports and information about complete preparations of the Russian advance and of the attack on Germany, so that the Fuehrer refused that and said he would not change anything more in the whole situation.

Now, about this military question, I can't tell you very much, but I remember the Fuehrer then one day decided, it was in June, that he would not wait until the Russians had finished their preparations of attack.

I know that the military people probably can tell you more about what these preparations are and were. I don't know very much about it, but I know that it was especially the military preparations, also the political tendencies of the Russians which they had shown in those months, and also the propaganda which was being made in Germany. And, as another point, I may say these reports which the Fuehrer got about the tremendous and huge Russian war potentialities of industry and so on which they already had, but were still building—we had trading negotiations with them at that time, and our engineers and so forth were there, and there were reports coming back. I have never seen them myself, these reports, but they made a tremendous impression on the Fuehrer; I remember that. That is the way the war broke out. So the Fuehrer went into Russia, I think it was on the 21st of June 1941. Well, I may say from the foreign political point, it was a very harsh blow because my political concept was really, well, I may say, ruined on that, because unless this war went well we were to come into a very difficult situation and I could tell you mainly that I have been anxious about the outcome of this war since the beginning of the Russian war. Of course, then came these tremendous victories and so on which carried one along. It caused us to have an optimistic view, but since the winter of '41-'42, since the German army got stuck before Moscow, I really must say that I have all along been anxious about the whole situation, very anxious. During the war I have, well, perhaps I proposed to the Fuehrer not once, but quite a number of times, to come to an agreement with Russia as quickly as possible, but the Fuehrer didn't want it. He only wanted to do it after victory which didn't come off, but I was very anxious.

The military people say that if the Fuehrer hadn't done it, that Russia would have struck and I believe they have proof, and also during the war there have been proofs found to that extent, that the Russians would have struck at us. And there again comes the time-table. As for me, as a political man, I would not dare to give an opinion on the matter of how these things would have developed or would not have developed. It is very difficult to say. I don't really know. I don't know, but that is more or less the history of this very sad end of our German-Russian friendship which I regret very much. But the military people still told me when I saw them in Mondorf* here that in case the Russians would have struck in a moment of a severe invasion, being absolutely near the German front, the situation with Germany would have been disastrous. The power which the Russians really have displayed now, of course, I think nobody had any notion, perhaps the Fuehrer a little bit. Several times he said he never knew what powers lay behind the Russians. I remember him telling me that.

I may perhaps add I don't know what really made the Fuehrer turn in his Russian policy or what influence there was, who discussed it with him, and so on I don't know. The Fuehrer had discussed this question with me only very seldom. I remember these two conversations, perhaps one or two others, very few, about this question of world perception having had anything to do with

* Shortly after their capture, before transfer to the Nurnberg Prison, the principal Nazi officials were interned at Mondorf-les-Bains in Luxembourg.

INTERROGATIONS

it. I couldn't really tell you, but at any rate I have the absolute conviction, and I had for myself when I went to Russia in 1939 and also when I wrote to Stalin in 1940, I had the absolute intention that I would like to see a long established friendship, for, let's say, at least an adjustment between these two countries. An adjustment of interest should be found.

And I was also of the opinion that the Fuehrer was of the sincere belief then that it could be done. That I can say. But I did know that—I don't remember who told me—that the Fuehrer had already given orders early in 1940 to make preparations for a Russian war, and so on. That is possible. If it has been done, I don't know. He never talked with me about that. He only said, that is right. He did say that he would take military precautionary measures. He said that, but I never knew that he had given orders to any—any definite military orders. That is all. I never knew, and if he had done so, Colonel, I don't think this was meant as a definite order of the Fuehrer. It was probably a precautionary measure, because before Molotov came, I think the Fuehrer still hoped very much that some solution could be found. I think so.

*Excerpts from testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop,
taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 31 August 1945, 1150-1200,
by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present: Pfc.
Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M.
Levy, Reporter.*

The Nazi View of German-American Relations

A. [In English] The attitude of the USA had really, since quite a number of years already, been rather hostile towards Germany; and especially, the Fuehrer felt that this was on account of the question of her handling—the way the Jewish and the Church question was treated by Germany. That was the conviction of the Fuehrer, and he had very much in his mind. I may add to that that President Roosevelt and also circles very much around him were also very hostile to my country. As I said, especially since the radical parts of the Weltanschauung Program was more and more coming into the foreground in Germany. There was the policy, for instance of the American representatives in Europe, which showed—and I don't know whether you remember that during the Polish war, there were documents which were found in Warsaw which came from Count Potocki, who was the Polish representative in Washington, and they had been published in the White Paper by the German Foreign Office. They were really extraordinary documents and showed the activities of some of the diplomatic representatives of the United States in Europe, for instance, of Mr. Bullitt, I think it was in France. I remember that. I remember just a few names. Then I think also from Mr. Drexel Biddle in Warsaw, and also especially the Poles of the United States and Great Britain. Now I haven't these documents at hand, but you will be able to get them very easily. I am sure you have them, and you will be able to weed out what this Polish representative, who after all was a representative of a friendly nation to the United States, what views he gave on the attitude of important circles in America, in the United States of America, towards Germany. It gave us, to a certain extent the impression that very important circles, such as—and I think he said that, I don't remember it exactly now—in some of these reports, they were driving directly towards war with my country. And I think he even said once in these reports that very important circles in Washington considered a coming war with Germany utterly inevitable. Now, this is only, so to speak, the political background. Furthermore, he said, in one of those reports, that very strong influence was used in the United States, as it was called, "to stop Hitler," and to influence Great Britain, not to lend her hand any more—or a helping hand to any future further settlement with Hitler or which Hitler might try, something like that. This was about the contents. I have this just roughly in my mind, about these documents, and of course, the Fuehrer may perhaps have—I may perhaps say this: He was a man who never gave much value to diplomatic reports, which was unfortunate really to a certain extent, because he had not very much confidence in his diplomats. He paid not a lot of attention, sometimes even too little attention to the press, and some sort of reports. And I may perhaps say this, that on that occasion, the intelligence, as far as foreign countries are concerned, was directed in a rather unhappy way, to my mind. I personally had really nothing much at my disposal except diplomatic channels, and among these channels we had perhaps an embassy there and a man of confidence in the embassy there, one or some. So we had perhaps a very small and limited—I can't even call it a net of agents—a very limited intelligence of our own in the Foreign Office. It was very small, really. The real intelligence, the way it was worked, was concentrated by the military Wehrmacht. That was the Abwehr (counter intelligence). The whole name of the military intelligence was Abwehr, so they got all the military news and also the political news that came from the Army. Then there was the other intelligence which came from the SD. They had their agents all over and they also had—this was reported directly to SD and from SD to the Fuehrer. I was supposed to get it, but that was always perhaps one of the worst, one of the most unpleasant aspects that I as Foreign Minister, and my men in the Foreign Office, really never had at their disposal all the extensive news which was coming from abroad. We should have had diplomatic reports, and the intelligence to compare and see what was really going on, but unfortunately we didn't have that, and I had to continue this fight for many years to get these reports from military and from the SD side, but unfortunately I didn't succeed very much in that. So that very often, decisions of the Fuehrer were taken on every account by reports which I hadn't even seen. This very often happened.

INTERROGATIONS

*Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop,
taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 31 August 1945, 1420-
1535, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present:
Rudolf Pressburger, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Reporter.*

The Nazi View of German-American Relations

[Continued from morning session.]

A. [In English] Of course, there were these deliverances of war material on a large scale to Great Britain. Then was the—I remember there was great talk in Germany about the news that volunteers, American volunteers, were serving in the British Army and especially in the British Air Force early in the war. Then, I think, that American pilots were being trained in Canada. Then came the question of these deliverances of the destroyers, 50 destroyers to Great Britain. I remember that struck the Fuehrer very much. Then came the question of the active assistance of the United States in Northern Africa, the building of a road to Alexandria. I just have a vague remembrance of that, and the occupation of the—replacement of the British occupation of Iceland. Then came the—I don't remember whether you remember that—something that you recalled your Ambassador from Berlin. I think it was after the Jewish questions broke out, and later all the German consuls except the personnel of the Embassy in Washington, all the capitals, in San Francisco and other places were sent out from the United States on the ground given that they had made, I think it was, propaganda and intelligence. Then, of course, if you remember, the declaration—when our submarine warfare came on—the declaration of zones, which I think was a formal declaration of the United States, though I don't remember it exactly, in which American ships would shoot at German ships without warning, if they were shown in the neighborhood of convoys. It was a formal declaration of a special zone to the chief of, I think it was, to the Chief of the British Harbors, where this war material was going on the "cash and carry" clause, where it was sent to England. And then, afterwards, of course, came the actions, and I can't give any details today about it, but I know that there have been encounters, meetings between German ships, whether they were submarines, I don't remember, really, but I know that German ships, after that declaration of operation zones, have, how often I don't know, but have been sunk actually by ships of the United States Navy. Now I may perhaps point out to you the feeling of the Fuehrer. I have always particularly asked the Fuehrer to do everything which we possibly could to avoid war with the United States of America, and I may say that the Fuehrer always was absolutely agreed with that, in order to avoid any conflict possibilities. If you look up the German attitude since 1938, '39, '40, '41, to the outbreak of war, till Pearl Harbor I think you will find that, for instance, as far as speeches, press and also military measures are concerned, that the German attitude has been absolutely restrained. I remember the Fuehrer giving a particular order himself that no matter what the United States newspapers wrote on Germany, not to answer and not do anything that would make the situation worse, because I was afraid that if we would answer, you see, these things would go to and from and lead to a situation which might be disastrous.

Q. Before we go on, what in your opinion, what was the underlying cause of that attitude of the Fuehrer?

A. The Fuehrer, I can assure you that the Fuehrer personally was of the opinion that there was absolutely no necessity of war between Germany and the United States of America. That was his view. But he was of the opinion that there was especially, I think, on the ground of the Jewish question, very strong forces in the United States who worked against Germany. He was absolutely convinced of it and also very important circles of the Government, he thought; but he personally also would have liked before everything to avoid this war with the United States. There can be no doubt about that.

The idea—I mean, I may perhaps ask this question: the propaganda which had been made that Germany had any intention of doing anything whatever on American soil, the United States of America, Central America, or South America, that was only American propaganda, wasn't it? Or was it really believed that we had any intention of ever doing anything like that?

INTERROGATIONS

Q. I really don't know.

A. I can assure you that it always struck us as so ridiculous that we never even thought of it.

Q. What do you think was the ultimate purpose of the agitation in South America?

A. Well, I tell you, that was absolutely—the whole business was absolutely tommyrot, nonsense, complete nonsense. I can assure you most definitely that never anybody in Germany, not one soul I think, ever had the slightest thought of really making any sort of a policy anywhere in America, either South or Central America or anywhere, ever. What brought this thing about, and I was very sorry about it, we had this Ausland Organization, which was an organization which was really the child of Hess. You know Hess who went to London. But the real idea of what they should do was a good one really. They should keep the German citizens in foreign countries, sort of make them social, get the rich people to look after the poor, you know, that sort of thing, and help each other and so on, and make a good collaboration of the German colonies abroad. That was quite a good idea I think as far as that is concerned, but now what happened is this: Of course, as you always know, there are people getting ambitious out there and therefore a certain number of people, like in South America for instance, the Argentines, where there are many people of German origin. They had relations here and there and so on, and they wanted to show themselves, to show they could do something and give themselves a good position and so on; and so they did in those countries, a certain number of things which were to my mind rather ridiculous, you know, but which showed up as if there was here tremendous German propaganda going on and which created certain diplomatic difficulties sometimes between ourselves, the Argentines, Chile, Brazil, and so on, in which we had now and then to calm down by diplomatic channels. But "au fond" there was nothing to it. It was simply very cleverly taken up by American propaganda and brought up to some huge affair. But if you could look into the space of what really did happen in those years in those countries, you can see for yourself now, it is absolutely—it was almost nothing. You see, perhaps you would have a party meeting somewhere and they would do the silly thing and invite quite a number of Argentine citizens, and they would make "Heil Hitler" and something like that. The real significance of the whole business shows you—when I was in London as Ambassador, I looked into one of these organizations, of the Ausland Organizations, and do you know how many members this whole organization had, in the whole of Great Britain—no, it was in the English Isles, not in Great Britain—500. That is all. I mean, 500 members of the National Socialist Party were in the whole British Isles.

Q. But you are sure that there were no discussions or any decision reached, either one way or the other, with respect to even the possibility of war between Japan and the United States?

A. No, this was never, to my mind, discussed at all. Of course, this tense feeling was there, which might possibly be said that once it might have been discussed or said, "What will this lead to?" or something. I don't know. I don't remember that very well, but surely the possibility of the war of Pearl Harbor was never discussed in a way as if it was going to happen. On the contrary, if I remember well, we had rather the opposite feeling that things were coming to adjustment.

Q. And you were also sure that there was no encouragement of Japan, looking towards the creation of an incident that might bring about such a war?

A. No, absolutely not. I can say most definitely, no. You know, I tell you, even if something had been—which definitely had been in the Japanese mind—the Japanese are very close-mouthed. They don't say what they think. My experience with the Japanese taught me that they are very close-mouthed. We never knew exactly where we stood, never. They never said really what was going on.

I remember I told the Fuehrer, that according to the stipulation of the Three Powers Pact since Japan had attacked, we would not have to declare war on the United States of America, formally. So then the Fuehrer decided—he thought this matter over quite awhile, and then he gave me a very clear decision in that respect. This is more or less what he said: "If we don't stand on the side of Japan, the Pact is politically dead. But that is not the main reason. The chief reason is the United States is already shooting against our ships. They have been a forceful factor in this war, and they have, through their actions, already created a situation, which is practically, let's say, a situation of war." I may perhaps point out—I don't remember now exactly how it was, but I think it was Washington who, a month before created this expression: "All measures short of war." Do you remember that?

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Yes.

A. I think it was created in a speech by Mr. Roosevelt, or somebody, "All measures short of war," which, of course, meant "so near war" that the Fuehrer was of the opinion at that moment that it was quite evident that the United States would now make war against Germany. Therefore, he ordered me—he gave me the precise order to hand over the passports to the American representatives.

*Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop,
taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 September 1945, 1130-
1215, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present:
Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.*

Effect of U. S.-Japanese Relations on Germany

A. [In English] You see, the Fuehrer at that time had worries. He saw the attitude of the United States "short of war" and he was worried about an agreement, because there were certain groups in Japan who wanted to come to an arrangement with America. He was afraid that if an arrangement would be made between the United States and Japan, that this would mean, so to speak, the back free for America and the expected attack or entry into the war by the United States would come quicker. I remember there were preparations of that kind.

Q. You mean by that, that he was afraid that if arrangements were made with Japan, that then the Pacific coast would be clear of trouble, and then all the attention of the United States could be directed toward the Atlantic?

A. Yes. You see the situation—we had the situation short of war against us. We had this pact with Japan, but there were certain difficulties. For instance, in the press it said, that if the United States and Japan would come to certain arrangements, that would mean that they would not have to work automatically if the United States went into war against Germany. Do I make myself clear?

Q. Yes. Was that the press comment or was that Hitler's reasoning?

A. I think there were comments like that in the press going on, which went in that direction. I remember the Fuehrer talking of the thing out of the Three Power Pact.

Q. Was that also Hitler's reasoning at the time?

A. Yes. And I remember that we discussed it once and that is quite possible. I don't remember the details any more, but at that time there were discussions to keep them in line.

Q. Then, summarizing, Hitler was opposed to Japan making any arrangements with the United States?

A. Yes. One can say that.

Q. That was before Pearl Harbor?

A. To my mind, I think a long time before Pearl Harbor. I don't recall it exactly, but one can see that in the press.

Q. Would you say that it was in the Spring of '41?

A. I don't really know about dates. It is very difficult for me. I only know my recollection by this: that Pearl Harbor was a complete surprise to us all. We didn't expect anything like that and so these negotiations, of that kind, to my mind, must have been very much earlier. That is the way I recollect it, but I couldn't really tell you exactly when, but I do remember that we had not given to Japan the counsel ever to attack the United States. I don't remember that at all. With the position of the United States short of war, and the shaky attitude of certain Japanese circles, it might perhaps have been understandable, but I don't remember that we ever gave a counsel like that; but perhaps I may explain, chronologically, the way it went. First, our first dealings with Japan were against Russia. It was anti-Comintern. It was more on the line of world perception. Then came the Three Power Pact which was closed, as I think I said before here, in order to keep the United States neutral. Then during the war, since the declaration of Great Britain with war on Germany, the Japanese had discussed at various occasions the idea of attacking England through the south on Singapore. I remember myself discussing with the Japanese in Berlin, I think also in Tokyo, the interest we took in such an attack, on the neutrality of the United States. I remember pointing that out at various occasions.

Q. Well, logically, it was much to your advantage that the United States did not enter the war against Germany.

A. It has always been in my mind, and I remember quite well that I have talked with the Japanese in Berlin, in the sense that it would be in the interests of us all, to keep the United States neutral, which was the main object of the Pact when closed. I don't know whether on the military sector there had been anything. I don't know; I was not informed, but I don't suppose so.

INTERROGATIONS

The Enemy "Forced" Hitler to Go Everywhere in Europe

A. So far as aggression is concerned, I can tell you about something, which the Fuehrer once told me quite frankly, that he was quite worried. I think it was during the time of the Serbian-Greek business, he said, "Here I am. I wanted to settle my new Germany, with the minorities and so on. Here the enemy forces me to go everywhere in Europe, there and there, where I don't want to go at all."

Q. But, in retrospect, don't you agree now, of course, he was disturbed by the fact that he started out to do something and he found out that he was getting in deeper every time he wanted to gain more territory for himself because somebody objected; when he went to get territory, he found a proprietor there who resisted?

A. I am sure, Colonel, that is not right. The Fuehrer, the way I see it now, wanted to settle the Polish program, and through England then taking the point of view, being behind Poland and declaring war on Germany and France also; of course, this meant a big war, at least a European war, if not a World war. The Fuehrer, to my mind, had absolutely no sketched out definite program of any sort of forming what later on was called the Gross Germanic Reich or the Gross Germanic State. I want to say a word to you about that. He never had that idea. It all came during the war. He never had that before.

Q. You admit he knew when he attacked Poland, that that meant war, a big war? I mean there was no doubt in anybody's mind about that?

A. I can't answer you that question, what the Fuehrer really thought then.

Q. Didn't you discuss that with him?

A. Oh yes, the Polish question, I can tell you exactly. I can tell you most definitely that the English guarantee, which the English had given to Poland, would mean war with Great Britain, and that is because the Fuehrer—

Q. That is what I say, there was no doubt that that meant war when he decided to attack Poland.

A. I was of that opinion, and the Fuehrer was also, from the first, and, you know, on my proposal he stopped the advance. You know, the military operation had already started in August. He stopped that, which showed me that he was absolutely of the same opinion. He did not want war with Great Britain.

*Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop,
taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 September 1945, 1415-
1705, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present:
Siegfried Ramler, Interpreter; Nancy M. Shields, BCV, Reporter.*

Hitler's Refusal to Initiate Peace Discussions

A. [In English] The Fuehrer, of course, I must say, held everything very firmly in his hands. Perhaps in the last year or half year, things ran more out of his hands and into others. That is possible, but there were a number of people who had great ambitions to become the successors of the Fuehrer and most of them had their Foreign Minister ready all the time. Himmler had his own, Goering had his own, and Bormann had his own.

As it was brought about, we lost the war, and there is no doubt if the Fuehrer was alive today and sitting here, he would say "I have the entire responsibility."

Q. He would pretty near have to say that!

A. He would say that. There is no doubt about it. You see, I never quite understood one thing, that during the last four years, since 1941, as I told you this morning, personally I have tried to come to a quiet foreign political talk with the Fuehrer. It was never possible. I have tried to come down to a quiet talk of two or three hours to discuss the whole situation because I felt the two ends would meet somehow. I have felt that since Stalingrad three or four years ago, but it was not possible to get the Fuehrer to a quiet discussion. I have tried it 20 or 30 times. He always said at once, "We must have a military success." I would say, "What are you going to do? The world opinion is there for the people and not the people for the world opinion. How are these ends going to meet?" and so on, but he evaded the definite talk about the whole real world situation. I was sometimes rather desperate about that. I came home very often telling my people this. I remember, for instance, once that it was after your landing in Africa. You see, the Fuehrer had a firm conviction that we would have a big victory and after that he would go in for negotiations and it was his fixed idea not to go into negotiations except after a big victory; but that didn't come any more after the last 3 and a half years. I remember after your landing in Africa in 1941 [sic], I met the Fuehrer in his train when he came from the Eastern Front to meet the Italians. I went in to his train at Bamburg, and I was very anxious about the situation for I saw the whole calculation of the submarine warfare had been wrong because it was calculated that such a landing was impossible but I saw that you had been landing with four or five million tons or something like that—a huge landing. I went into the railroad train and to the Fuehrer and I told him, "I think this situation is very serious—very serious." I told him I had a proposition to make and said, "Allow me today, give me full power, to treat with Stalin to make peace with Russia at any sacrifice; then afterwards, if we manage to do that, then we will come and get the Americans and the English out of Africa again because we knew it would be disastrous for the Mediterranean and if we succeed with that, I will propose a new peace offer to England and America." The Fuehrer turned me down very flat and in such a way that I was not even able to mention the problem. I tried it after the Italian breakdown, when Mussolini was liberated. I went to the Fuehrer and he was quite willing, and sketched out a line with the Russians and next day he said "No." I wanted a definite authorization to discuss with Stalin, but next day he didn't want it any more. I made three or four memoirs at the time, saying he must have this lightening of the burden and so on, but he didn't want it. I don't want to criticize. I don't know whether it was possible. I want to explain the situation. The Fuehrer was convinced he must break the thing through militarily and only after victory to come to negotiations. Whether I am right or he was right, whether it would have been possible, I don't know. Perhaps he was right.

INTERROGATIONS

Hitler's Hope for Victory Till the End

Q. Is there any doubt in your mind as to whether Hitler is alive?

A. He is dead. Surely dead.

Q. You are sure of that?

A. Yes. He told me. He told me that he would die. He told me that on the 23d of April. That is absolutely certain. He said, "I am going to stay here, and either Berlin will be liberated" (which he hoped for still). But the amazing thing is this, which I never quite understood; that six weeks before the end I came to see him in the Reichschancellery and this must have had something to do with the 20th of July because I came to him in the Reichschancellery and he said, "Ribbentrop, we are going to win this war by the length of a nose." That was six weeks before. I said, "Good God, how?" and he was then convinced that the new types of airplanes would help to bring the turn of the war. I think he was counting on some new airplanes. I am not well up on technical matters. Wasn't it the ray planes? Airplanes sending out rays? He had a report of some kind but I am only saying this to show you how some fanatical belief was in the Fuehrer that for this whole life, the way he went, he could not lose this war. He was in earnest when he meant that. I saw it. I was amazed.

Excuse for Attacking Poland

Q. Do you remember any reason that was advanced by Germany about its excuse for attacking Poland?

A. The excuse was, of course, the Corridor and the Danzig problem not being settled. That was the reason as far as I personally remember. There must have been tremendous outrages somewhere. I don't remember exactly.

Q. Danzig and the Corridor would not have been the excuse because that was merely the case where you asked the Poles to do something and they said "No." That was not a legitimate excuse. There must have been others.

A. The Fuehrer wanted to settle the problem of Danzig and the Corridor, but how the situation was aggravated in the last few days, I can't tell. I know there have been continuous reports pouring in to the Fuehrer of outrages there and there and there, and what that was exactly I must say I don't remember well but that surely is all laid down in this White Book.

General Karl Wolff—Intercession with Himmler

Q. Do you know a General Karl Wolff?

A. Wolff, I knew quite well. I always personally considered Wolff, and I still have that opinion today, as I have never had any reason to call it otherwise, as rather a good genius on whom Himmler had a very bad influence. But I always considered Wolff a good influence because when we had certain matters to settle with Himmler and I don't know whether you know that during the last two or three years there were quite often rather severe grievances between myself and Himmler, Wolff always tried to be the intermediary and he did it rather well and smoothed things down. For instance, I remember in former times I had rather a relationship to Himmler because I saw in the original idea of the SS an idealistic note—that is to say, to create a new German leadership. My first great grievance with Himmler was about the Rumanian question. That was, I think, in 1941. It was something like that. When this question of the Rumanian region came up this was one of the first times when the SS started to mix very much in foreign policies, and I had to take a very stern view because the Fuehrer had decided on Antonescu and Himmler supported the other side in Rumania and we had a very severe divergence then which really broke our relationship more or less. Then from that time on, my relationship with Himmler was outwardly all right. Himmler was a very powerful man and our relations were outwardly fairly good. But internally, it became worse and worse from year to year and from month to month. I still occasionally saw Himmler because he was a very powerful man and we had to work together on certain instances, but the idea of the SS dominating everything became also more and more felt in the whole attitude of the world opinion foreign policy and so on. In later years, I think it was since 1942 and 1943, two years or something like that, Wolff was in Italy and, of course, in the mixing up of the SS and various forms of political sections and intelligence and in the embassies and so on, this got so severe that these divergences were bigger and bigger and my personal relationship with Himmler was very bad. Sometimes we saw each other and we had one or two very bad encounters, also before the Fuehrer, so that it was—Himmler was a very powerful man and I sometimes told one or two of my people that they would have to be careful.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. How about Wolff? Was he obedient to Himmler and everything Himmler wanted to do?

A. What I know of Wolff, he was, of course, Himmler's man and he was together with him for a number of years but I don't know much of their relationship but I personally would think, from what I know of Wolff, they must have had a lot of divergences and I considered his influence to the good side. Himmler had to my mind two souls. An extraordinary man—some of his ideas were on the idealistic side and some were terrible.

Why Hitler Occupied Hungary

A. Of course, he (Hitler) did this whole thing in Hungary—the whole occupation of Hungary was done because these reports came that Hungary was concluding a separate peace and the Fuehrer moved in because he thought that if the enemies came in, the enemies would break up the Balkan Front and the Fuehrer was always of the opinion that the Jewish element was one of the main elements to influence the Hungarian government.

The Responsibility for Concentration Camp Deaths

Q. Assuming that it is true that there were millions of Jews and other people killed in these concentration camps, don't you admit that such an order would come directly from Hitler, in view of your statements that Hitler was entirely responsible for everything that went on in Germany?

A. I was asked that question in Mondorf.* I don't know.

Q. You know you cannot be backing and filling on these things. Either Hitler was not responsible for everything that went on or he was.

A. Responsible, of course, but whether he knew that or not, I don't know.

Q. Not only that he knew it but ordered it?

A. I don't know. I can't imagine it.

Q. I am not talking about your imagination. I am saying, using that assumption, assuming that to be true, assuming there were two million Jews killed in concentration camps in Germany, whether sick or well, could that have been done without Hitler's orders?

A. It is very difficult to answer that. I really don't know.

Q. What is so difficult about it?

A. He must have known it but whether he ordered it—

Q. Could anybody else have ordered it without getting authority from Hitler for such a program?

A. It is hard to believe.

Q. Isn't it a fact that Hitler must have ordered it?

A. I don't know.

Q. If you don't know, it certainly destroys your theory that it was a one-man government.

A. It certainly was a one-man government. That is certainly true.

Q. If you stand by that, then there is no other answer you can give to that question except that he did order it?

A. It is very difficult for me to believe that. That he ordered that? Things were done in a queer way sometimes.

* See footnote p. 1193 of this volume.

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 13 September 1945, 1537-1642, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present: 2d Lt. Edward H. Littman, Interpreter; S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Court Reporter.

Events Leading Up to German Occupation of Hungary

A. [In English] In Hungary, the Fuehrer was always very suspicious with the Hungarian position, and I may say also—perhaps, unfortunately; I don't know—to the personality of Horthy; and especially, perhaps less to him personally, I would like to say, but to his entourage. And I personally think rightly so, from the German point of view, because a lot of the people who were around him were decidedly not friends of Germany. Now, we have, of course, to the outsider been friends, and to a number of friends, who were friendly with Germany and so on, but during the war the Fuehrer got—when things went well, everything was all right. As far as I remember they were the first to ask to join the Three Powers Pact. The Hungarians asked first to join it. They were enthusiastic about it, and they joined it first. Then I think also after the Russian war started they asked to participate in the Russian campaign, so they were quite willing to help and be on the German side and to go for quite a while, because we didn't even ask them to do that. It came from them. I remember that well. So everything went well for a time.

Then, of course, came the bad developments in the East after Stalingrad, and here the first great difficulty arose that the Hungarian troops didn't do very well, which led to a sort of certain emergency and so on. Then the further development was that news came from Intelligence to the Fuehrer over and over again that the Hungarians had sent emissaries, I think it was to Turkey and also to Sweden, that there were always rumors of the Hungarians trying to find feelers with the enemy and trying to make a separate peace. These rumors accumulated, and I think the Fuehrer—had he seen him two or three times, I don't remember now—at any rate he has seen him on various occasions, once I remember in East Prussia in his headquarters, and I think twice I remember in Salzburg, and I think generally these discussions and talks with Horthy and the Fuehrer were alone. I didn't much participate, but during one I did.

* See also Statement XIV, "Hungarian Relations with Germany before and during the War" by Nicholas Horthy, Jr. (Vol. VIII, p. 756.)

During these discussions the Fuehrer, I think, talked quite openly with Horthy about the reports that he got about the inferences, which were about their going against Germany and so on. It was several times, well, I may perhaps say this: The Fuehrer didn't like the Hungarians from that moment. He never liked them very much, but he disliked them very much since then, of course. I think the Fuehrer justly thought so, that the Hungarians had a lot of advantages from Germany. They had had at that time three revisions of their Treaty of Trianon: the revision with Slovakia, where they got part of their territory back; the revision with Siebenbuergen, which he made with the Austrians in Vienna, where they got part of Siebenbuergen back; and then they got another part, which was the part that had been taken from them in the Treaty of Trianon and given to Czechoslovakia. So the Fuehrer thought they ought to be very thankful; but they were very ungrateful.

All of this sort of accumulated, and when the Fuehrer thought that things did not run very well, then they tried to make these rumors of separate peace and so on, that were not only rumors but were also reports which came to the Fuehrer from the military intelligence, from the SS intelligence, and we also got various reports—and when he furthermore heard that, I think it was that, important people had been sent by the Hungarian government out to have feelers with the enemy, then, of course, he was very upset about it. He told Horthy on these various occasions that if things didn't get any better and Horthy never did anything about it, and the Hungarian people didn't do anything about it, the same people remained, and so on—and then what brought about the crisis? I must think it over for a moment.

Yes, then I think there came very definite reports of Horthy trying to treat or treating with the Hungarian Government and that was the time when, let's see, now—I think that was the time when the military situation in the Balkans became very grave when there was the talk of parachute divisions, English parachute divisions, landing in Hungary. There was on the other side the Russian advance, of course, coming nearer and nearer to Hungarian territory. That was more or less the situation. And in this situation the Fuehrer was very much afraid that Hungary would now turn over and make a separate peace and that this would bring this whole realignment in disorder and bring the Southern Balkans and Eastern Balkans, that is, Rumania, and, of course, Croatia, Greece and so on, bring them in, an absolutely impossible position. That was more or less the background when he invited Horthy to come and see him, to have a last discussion to settle the matters and to see whether he could not keep him in line.

INTERROGATIONS

Now, the discussion which the Fuehrer had with Horthy, I was not present, but I believe it went very badly, because I think—I don't know—Horthy I think left the room. Something like that happened. It was a very tense and very awkward situation. The Fuehrer had decided that he would absolutely occupy the country in order to put it in order, and it was now a question of whether out of it would develop a German-Hungarian war or not. This was the question when Horthy was at Treson. That is in Salzburg, as a matter of fact. And in this situation I remember he was very glad then that a man was there who was really sort of an intermediary. It was Herr Sztojaj. I don't know if you remember the name. He was the intermediary. I asked him to come and see me. The Fuehrer was in a very angry mood, and he said, "I don't mind. I am not going to let myself be betrayed. I am going to take my own measures."

So I was scared or anxious about the situation, and I may perhaps say this: I have perhaps been contrary a little bit to the Fuehrer, but I have always held up the Hungarian flag. The Hungarians never thanked me for it. On the contrary, they did the very opposite. But all these revisions which they got in, they have after all been treated. Then the Fuehrer ordered it and I have treated them with Count Tranau and with the Rumanians, and Slovaks, and so on. They ought to have been very grateful about it, but they were not. I sometimes myself complained to the Hungarian Government about it, but I was always known at home in my country of having what one would call a Hungarian heart, because I rather liked the Hungarians.

In this situation I talked with Sztojaj and told him, "For heaven's sake, you talk again with Horthy"—I think Horthy had already asked for his train then—"If Horthy goes away now it will be a disaster, because in the first place the material which we have here in the hands of the Austrians is, of course, disastrous for you, for Horthy, and for everybody, and for the whole Hungarian Government. If Horthy goes away, what would happen? The Fuehrer will order me to publish it and the German troops will march in tomorrow morning in order to get their fighting troops in order. That will be the result. So for heaven's sake help me and save the situation."

So he went off to Horthy, and talked to them. He was a good man. He went off and talked with him and so Horthy went to see the Fuehrer again, and so they arranged the whole situation among themselves. And Horthy was then at the end, I think, quite satisfied, as a matter of fact, that things had run so. I think we find afterwards things went quite smoothly. But there was a moment of great tension then, you see.

Q. Do you know when publication of the consent of Horthy was made?

A. To go in?

Q. Yes.

A. That is right. It was agreed afterwards. There was a tense moment, you see, in the whole negotiations. I think Horthy disagreed absolutely with the Fuehrer.

Q. But it is a fact that the newspaper publicity was brought up prior to the time Horthy gave his consent?

A. No. No. Surely not. The German troops then went in with the consent of Horthy. It was agreed then. Most certainly not, because Horthy was there, you see, and the Fuehrer told him quite openly, "I am going to do that." You see? "No matter what, I can't leave the rear of my troops in a situation like that. It is quite impossible."

Q. But you are sure, are you, that the newspapers didn't come out before Horthy gave his consent?

A. No, most definitely not. I am quite certain of it. I can tell you that quite definitely. That I would remember.

Q. Was Horthy placed under arrest at that time?

A. No. In Germany?

Q. Yes.

A. No. Not at all. Nothing like that. No. I think it was only what you would call a hard conversation which the Fuehrer had with him which went—and they separated, the first conversation being in disaccord, in disagreement, you see?

Q. Was Horthy ever threatened with arrest at that time?

A. No. Never. Not once. Absolutely not. Most definitely not. Never. The Fuehrer would never have done that. Absolutely not. There was no threat.

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 20 September 1945, 1430-1618, by Mr. DeWitt C. Poole, Special Representative of the U.S. Secretary of State and Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present: Siegfried Ramley, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Hitler's Distrust of the Foreign Office

MR. POOLE TO THE WITNESS:

Q. We know, not from one person but from numerous persons of the Foreign Office, that this important step in foreign relations [the anti-Comintern Pact] was taken without their knowledge.

A. It is quite possible that only one or two knew, but I am sure Neurath must have known.

Q. You think Neurath knew?

A. I should imagine so because the Fuehrer discussed everything with him.

Q. Again, Herr von Ribbentrop, you imagine so. Is it possible, in a well-ordered state, that the Minister of Foreign Affairs should not know that negotiations of that kind were going on?

A. I am sure he knew. I am sure of it. I don't remember now exactly when, or how, or if he informed him. I don't really recollect at the moment, but it is quite possible that the Fuehrer then, I don't remember that exactly, did not want too many people to know about it. That is quite possible, because in such things he always liked to have not too many people to know about them. It was the same thing, you know, when I made the naval arrangement, I might perhaps tell you, with the English. That was something which I negotiated for the Fuehrer, so to speak, being in the Foreign office and being under von Neurath, but the Fuehrer also gave me instructions, I remember, so far as the naval arrangement is concerned. He gave me that all direct, and I remember that the Fuehrer himself informed von Neurath that he sent me and so on, and, of course, I also went to see Neurath about it. But the arrangement and everything was more or less in London, also directed by myself on particular order by the Fuehrer. This you can only understand because the Fuehrer had a tremendous antagonism or dislike, or he always stood under the impression, which I may perhaps say I never got over that myself until the end, even when I had the Foreign Ministry since 1938, I never could do away with the distrust of the Fuehrer with everything which had to do with the Foreign office. There were many, many things which the Fuehrer discussed with me, many, many things, which he, particularly, every time told me that I was not to tell a soul in the Foreign office. This was a particular dislike of the Fuehrer, the belief of the Fuehrer that the people in the Foreign office would not keep secrets and could not keep secrets, that these things would come to the ears of foreign diplomats and that sort of thing. It was almost a mania of the Fuehrer, which went through all along. With Neurath it was the same thing and with me it was the same thing.

So when I closed the naval arrangement, I got all the instructions, not from von Neurath, but I got them from the Fuehrer, and I got all the detailed instructions from the Admiralty, from Raeder, and so, direct. I remember that very well and the Fuehrer wanted me to treat it that way and not to discuss it with all the other officials of the Foreign office. Of course, Neurath was informed, but I don't think even the Under-Secretary knew. When the naval arrangement was closed, it was a great surprise to most people of the Foreign office. I remember that.

Q. I am sure that what you say is correct. It, of course, is other information, but I come back to my point. I assure you, with the utmost kindness, that I do not think that you discussed with me frankly the question of the Japanese pact in its bearing on relations with Russia and China.

A. Yes, but may I ask in what sense do you mean? Do you mean that this pact means a change of policy?

Q. Yes; I have already said that.

A. There is no doubt that that is what it means. It meant, to a certain extent, a change in policy; there is no doubt.

Q. To a certain extent? It was practically a right-angle change of policy with regard to two countries, was it not, with regard to Russia and with regard to China?

A. With no doubt in regard to Russia. With regard to China, that was something that came up very much later, wasn't it? I mean because the Chinese war had in no way broken out and I think our relations with China, so far as I do remember it, were kept on a good basis.

Q. They were on a good basis with the Foreign office, one branch of the German government, while another branch of the German government was carrying on negotiations and consummating an alliance with Japan. It is quite true that the good relations were kept going with China.

A. I don't hesitate one moment to say that there is no doubt that it was a change of policy, for instance, toward Russia and so on, but, you see, the policy was changed again later, with

INTERROGATIONS

Russia in '39. We changed it again the other way, you see, didn't we?

Ribbentrop's Unsuccessful Ambassadorship in London

Of course, you know in '35 we tried to get Baldwin and the Fuehrer to meet and it didn't go through. The Fuehrer was to some extent already inclined to think that the alliance with Great Britain would not go. So I told the Fuehrer I thought it would be well worthwhile, my going over to London and trying to find out definitely whether it wasn't possible, perhaps, after all, to get this alliance. In the meantime we had quite a number of friends over there. There was King Edward there, who was considered quite friendly toward Germany, and so on. And the Fuehrer quite agreed. So far as I remember, I think I thought it over a day or so. Then I went to the Fuehrer and said, "I have thought it over and I would ask if you agree not to make me Under-Secretary, but send me over to London." And then he said "All right." That is the way it was done.

Q. This is serious business, Herr von Ribbentrop, so you will excuse me if I now make a point which is perhaps a little indelicate, but you recognize, do you not, that your Ambassadorship in London was not successful?

A. Well, when I was made Ambassador, the British press and everybody, knowing that I had made the naval arrangement with the British Admiralty or the British Foreign Office in '35, welcomed my arrival in '36. Now, why my Ambassadorship was not successful, I think this is easily explained. The one reason, of course, was that we had at the time this very unfortunate non-intervention committee of Spain, I don't know whether you remember that, which was a very unfortunate thing because I was at the same time Ambassador with the British, or with the Court of St. James, and at the same time I had to follow up instructions of my government in the nonintervention committee, which was a sort of a League of Nations, having more or less replaced the League of Nations in London, because all sorts of international things were discussed, like Spain. The English at that time very often taking a stand with France, with Russia, and with the Red part of Spain, and against Franco; the Fuehrer, the Italians, taking a stand with Franco. I had, of course, very often to take a position against the British, which was most unfortunate and which, during my whole stay in London, interrupted very much my real work, which I was after, trying to establish good relations with Great Britain. That was very unfortunate.

Q. Was it your idea, or were you instructed from Berlin, to make the Nazi salute when you were presented?

A. No; I was not instructed.

Q. You were not instructed. That was your own idea?

A. Well, I can say that perhaps I may have been at fault in doing it. At any rate, it was considered only to be an honor to the British sovereign, nothing else, of course. I may say that perhaps it was not, in the diplomatic field, the right thing to do. I quite agree. Perhaps I might have omitted it, but at the same time it was considered only to be an honor. I may say this: In spite of what some people have said, the Marshal of the Diplomatic Corps came to me a few days later and said, of course, that the King considered it as nothing but an honor to him. He was very nice about it and he only wondered if some change was made, he would like to know about it.

Q. I do not want to press small things, or to be too personal; but the large point which I am trying to make is the incongruity between your repeated assertions that an understanding with Great Britain lay very close to your heart, and to your mind, and the conduct of your embassy in London, which was not successful.

A. I think I can answer you that very easily, you see. After all, this desire of coming to a close contact and alliance with Great Britain was very earnest. I spent ten years of my life in this and I think, in spite of the war and everything, there will be dozens of Englishmen who will confirm that. I have spent day and night of ten years to do that. Why it did not come off, goes to factors which were stronger than myself, I can assure you. I don't want to be too long, but, in short, I think one can say this: That when I was made Ambassador in London, I remember in '36, it was during the Olympic Games, and a very influential Englishman came to the Olympic Games, I don't remember, but I think it was even on my invitation. It was Lord Vansittart. I had a long discussion with him in the evening at my house and the next day we had lunch together alone. I had a very long discussion with him for many hours. I quite remember that. I was trying to induce him, win him over to come to this Anglo-German arrangement. He didn't move. It was like speaking against the wall. He didn't move at all. The Fuehrer had a talk with him, I think, already in 1936. There was a very strong tendency of very important Englishmen who already then took in their internal policy, if not outwardly, a very firm stand against Germany, thinking that one day this National Socialistic Germany would get too strong. I think that is the answer why I didn't have success in London.

INTERROGATIONS

Negotiations with England Regarding German Colonies

Q. You were speaking a moment ago of your efforts in the last week, and I think I remember reading in your previous testimony that you had in mind that England needed to return—Hitler had in mind, and you too—only one or two colonies for raw material purposes.

A. We would like to have had that.

Q. What did Chamberlain offer in 1938 in the adjustment of the colonial question? Chamberlain offered an adjustment of the colonial question in 1938.

A. Well, the only thing I do remember was what was once discussed, that the English did not want to give any colonies back. It was the idea of some combine of raw materials or something like that. Somewhere in Africa, in some way a combine of excess raw materials, more or less on the economic field, but there were no colonies offered, so far as I remember.

Q. You don't remember then, that when Dirksen came from Japan, on his way to London to take your post, that he was received by you and Hitler and reference was made to this offer of Chamberlain's and Hitler said that he would not answer it and that Dirksen said that this was startling to him, since it seemed very rude not even to answer such a request.

A. That is not right. In the first place, Hitler would never say that. He just wouldn't answer a thing. He would never say that. Secondly, it can't be right because I am pretty clear in my recollection, there was never a colony offered, never, never.

Q. Never?

A. No, never. Then it would have to be without my knowledge when I was not Foreign Minister yet, but when I was Foreign Minister, surely not. When Henderson came, or during the visit of the British statesmen, they offered in the old German colonies some collateral access to the raw materials or something of that sort, but nothing political or nothing territorial, of that I am sure. That cannot be right. I would remember that because it would be so important.

Q. Mr. von Ribbentrop, I do not have the feeling that you are being frank in your relation of these events.

[Another excerpt from this interrogation has been published as Document D-490, Vol. VII, p. 66.]

Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 24 September 1945, 1415-1535, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present: S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Court Reporter.

Responsibility for Arrest of Prominent Frenchmen

Q. [In English] Of course, you know Abetz who was in Paris?

A. [In English] Yes, of course I do. Yes.

Q. If you had sent him an order to arrest 2,000 people, you would know about that wouldn't you?

A. Let me think about that. Abetz? French people you mean?

Q. Yes, possibly French.

A. Now, let me think. I know that, well, two thousand, that is of course nonsense, but I know that there had been—I must think about that. There was a written order given by the Fuehrer that certain important political people everywhere should be put under guard—arrested and put under guard and a number of them also to be brought to Germany. That is right. Also French people. I know that, and it is quite possible that Abetz got such orders that he should look after and see what people there were who were liable to create political differences in France for Germany. If that is what you mean with having put people under arrest, that is quite possible that I played a role in that. That is quite possible. I remember that a general order was given to Holland, Belgium, and France, when there had been—I don't quite exactly know now the reason why it was done, but I know that quite a number of people—let's see, what was the reason? There was some special reason. Do you know that date when it was done? Wasn't it not very long before the invasion or something like that? It had political reasons of some kind, I remember.

Q. I think it was about '43.

A. Wasn't it later? I don't remember.

Q. Actually they were all put into concentration camps, weren't they?

A. I don't think so. I mean, for instance, I remember people like Daladier; he was not in a concentration camp. I know that quite a number of arrests have been done in France; that is possible, but that they have been put in concentration camps, I know nothing of that. I know a number of people have been taken to Germany, a number of people like Daladier. Who else? They were well known names, but they were put by special order, and Abetz had known that and can confirm that, that these people were to be treated well and put in good houses and so on, in villas, to be treated as well-known people, people who had been ministers or having official big positions.

INTERROGATIONS

Collaboration with Petain and Laval

Q. Did you have much difficulty with Abetz?

A. Difficulty? Yes. Sometimes we had.

Q. What was the nature of those difficulties?

A. Well, that is a terribly long story. You see, Abetz and I—at the beginning he was my man.

Q. Yes, I know he was.

A. We wanted to come to some arrangement with France, but the Fuehrer was not very much taken by that idea. I once got him so far as to go to Montoire. I don't know if you remember Montoire. There was a meeting with the Fuehrer at Montoire in the South of France when the Fuehrer went to see Franco. Petain went to Montoire and matters seemed to go rather smoothly although in Montoire I must say that a real collaboration with France and perhaps a very large measure of peace was in my mind very much. Petain in that first meeting and conversation with the Fuehrer was very reserved, so the Fuehrer rather cut short the conversation. It didn't last very long. The Fuehrer made certain advances to Petain, but he was very much reserved and the Fuehrer, just having defeated France perhaps didn't think that quite the right way. Though things went very smoothly, the conversation was cut rather short, so things did not run in the direction which we wanted them to. Petain was never a partisan of a real understanding to my mind—the Fuehrer also thought so—between France and ourselves. Then, of course, a number of things happened. Abetz was there. He was then installed. Then a number of things happened. The Fuehrer gave back the coffin of the Duke of Reichstadt.* He made his gesture to Napoleon. Petain was to go to the funeral at Paris and he didn't go and he told everybody he thought the Fuehrer would arrest him in Paris. Absurd, of course. That upset the Fuehrer very much when he made this gesture to France and Petain. So things didn't go very well in that direction at all.

Then, of course, Abetz always wanted to come to some arrangement with France, so did I. The Fuehrer got less and less friendly with that business. Then Abetz got into rather difficulties with the military people, I believe, always in France. He didn't match very well. So I don't know how it really came about, but after a short time you could hardly mention the name of Abetz with the Fuehrer any more, an experience which unfortunately, I have made with a number of my collaborators, because the people either on the military side of the SS—somebody I don't know who would—the reports would come in that Abetz always wanted to adjust things and try and find a way with the French, and the other wanted to go the stern way. Perhaps they were right. Perhaps in their executive way they saw things didn't match. I don't know. I wouldn't like to say that Abetz was right. Abetz got into an awful difficulty with the Fuehrer. The Fuehrer would say, "Well, Abetz said this." He wanted to try on various occasions to help. He always did his best to help. It was very difficult for me to find the balance between what Abetz did in Paris and to keep him in his post and to find the leaning with the Fuehrer again, because I wanted him to stay there, for he was no doubt an expert. But, of course, sometimes he did things which were, I should like to say, chiefly from the point of the Fuehrer, not very convenient.

* The son of Napoleon I and Maria Louisa of Austria. At Hitler's order, the Duke's body was taken from the Hapsburg family vault in the crypt of the Chapel of the Capuchins in Vienna, and on 15 December 1940 reinterred in the Invalides near the tomb of his father exactly 100 years to the day after the body of Napoleon I was finally laid to rest in that sanctuary.

Q. How about from your viewpoint? Were you personally satisfied with his operations?

A. I had a conversation and we had what you might call rough minutes together. He did things which were really more small things which were used against Abetz in Berlin or in the headquarters. Let me think of something. For instance, there was one great tremendous difficulty which we had and that was at that time the propaganda ministry wanted to put their foot into Paris. I don't know if you know about that. There was always a great antagonism. If something didn't match well they would say, "Well this is Abetz who does it." If something didn't run as we wanted in France or Laval didn't do as we wanted or Petain, it was always Abetz. Petain and Laval, I must say frankly that the French don't like them altogether today, but they always remained Frenchmen in their hearts. I must think of that—they always remained Frenchmen.

Q. You mean Laval too?

A. Laval also to a certain extent, yes. Petain absolutely, I should say, because Petain never played with us. I mean I think he knows that. He never played what you call a real game of rapprochement between the two countries. Laval tried for awhile but he also had his large reserves.

You can imagine the difficult position Abetz was in. He wanted to play the game with France, but the Frenchmen really didn't want to play the game with us. Also Daladier at the time didn't want to play the game with us, really, to come to terms with us. They always made their reserves. And Abetz wanted to get that. He tried to present it to the Fuehrer, but it never worked out.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Was that because of the size and scope of your demands upon them where they just couldn't do it?

A. This was never scoped out, even by the Fuehrer. But you see, Colonel, how difficult this French situation was for us. I can tell you in one example. Most people never quite realized this. There was the mistake of Abetz. Abetz looked to the French people, so to speak, as if they were 100 percent pro-German. That was his way of looking at things. But he sometimes in wanting so much to come to this understanding, which I also wanted, went sometimes too far and saw things at a wrong angle. To show you the way people really thought in France, in 1943 the collaborationists gave a memorandum to Abetz. I think it was to Abetz. It was an official sort of memorandum which was passed on to me in which was more or less—of course, they took it for granted that even the collaborationists would keep Alsace-Lorraine for France. That was the real bad situation. It was the great difficulty of the whole situation. Everybody went against Abetz because he was a man of the Foreign Office, and they said that of me. I had very few friends. There wasn't one of the big men, so to speak, not one—I don't want to mention names—but of the ten or twelve well known names in Germany, there was not one who was with Abetz, while military or propaganda or from what angle it came, everybody went against Abetz. They always said something against him. The trouble was he had a French wife. I don't know if you know that. I always kept him, but I had to push him to make him stand like that. Little things happened which made the Fuehrer wild. He sent out invitations in the German-French language, that sort of thing; or his wife at a reception would say things. And these things he did which made the whole people pounce on him like that. I had to put him there because I wanted him to stand there. That was because he wanted a French-German understanding. I think that was the whole situation.

Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 4 October 1945, 1415-1650, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD. Also Present: S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Court Reporter.

Excuse for Occasional Memory Lapses

Q. [In English] Is there anything the matter with your recollection, other than what happens to any normal person?

A. [In English] I think I have asked Major Kelley * to tell you about it. I mean, I have been taking sleeping remedies for four years and especially these bromides. This had a very bad effect, not only now, but for the last two or three years already.

* Nurnberg Prison psychiatrist.

Q. I know, but I don't think that bromides would eliminate from your mind any of the things that are of major importance, that you were dealing with at the time. For instance—

A. It should not.

Q. For instance, the Major explained to me—

A. It should not be so, Colonel, but of course, it is possible because I have not recollectcd quite a number of things, absolutely not recollectcd. I just mentioned, I think, one fact this morning. I was asked here a few weeks ago about the Austrian question, and I did not remember at all, for instance, that there had been a luncheon with Schuschnigg. It absolutely escaped my memory, and furthermore, I did not know at all that there had been written agreements. I don't know today that there had been written agreements. I have been told so.

Q. And you think that is because you have taken bromides, is that it?

A. I don't know. I am afraid I have had that experience very often, not only now, but during the last two years. This can be testified very easily.

Q. What kind of bromides do you take?

A. I have taken every evening what you call "bromo-amitol", or something, but will you talk to Major Kelley about it?

Q. I have talked to him about it and he said there is nothing to that. He said that if occasionally you took too much of it, your condition might be that of a person who has had too much to drink, but it wouldn't have the slightest effect on your memory, as far as the daily events are concerned.

A. Well, he told me quite differently and the German doctors, I can tell you—and I discussed that with Major Kelley, I think twice already—and I know that the German doctors told me that absolutely bromide had this effect on the brain; and I think this can be easily testified by many people.

Q. It might be that you took too many bromides, but I still don't think that it removed from your mind the recollection of certain specific matters, which were constantly brought to your attention.

A. I am sorry to say, the most extraordinary thing is that even very important events absolutely escaped my memory entirely, but I have said that repeatedly, that when I came back into the prison, that then I thought about a certain matter and suddenly this fact came back.

INTERROGATIONS

Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop taken at Nurnberg, Germany, on 5 October 1945, by Mr. Justice Robert H. Jackson, OUSCC.

Also present: Colonel John H. Amen, IGD; OUSCC Colonel Howard A. Brundage, JAGD; OUSCC Pfc Richard Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; WOJG Jack Rund, Court Reporter.

"The Fuehrer Is Dead"

Q. [In English] I am Justice Jackson, and I have a letter which you addressed to me under date of 2 October 1945, in which you make certain proposals. I want to ask you some questions about various statements in the letter, and I will tell you frankly why. We are to meet within the coming week to determine what we will do as to the indictment of yourself and others as war criminals, and I want your proposal in as definite form at the time I go to the meeting as I can have it. There are some things I want to ask you because I don't understand just what your proposition involves. Some of them I will ask you because I want to know what you know about them. One of that class of questions is that several times you say here, "The Fuehrer is dead." I want to know what information you have about that.

A. [In English] For my information, I may perhaps say this: I know definitely he is dead, because when I left him—I think it was on the 23rd of April in Berlin—he told me that he would not leave the Reichschancellery. The definite information I know, or I have about it, is this: That when I was at Ploen with Admiral Doenitz, he received a telegram—or he had received a telegram by Herr Bormann, stating that the—I think it said, "The testament of the Fuehrer was in force and that he would"—I think the quickest possible way—"join Herr Doenitz"; or something like that. And from the words of the testament—I mean, that is, the succession of Doenitz is in question on that, of course—was the definite news that he was dead. And I think it was the 30th of April. I think it must have been the 30th of April. I am not quite sure.

Q. Your knowledge is based on those facts?

A. On those facts, but I am absolutely certain, I think he is dead.

Q. Was there any understanding or discussion of a suicide pact if things went wrong with the war?

A. That he would commit suicide?

Q. Yes. Have you ever had any understanding to that effect?

A. We all were certain all along, during the last weeks, when things went wrong, that the Fuehrer would not survive. We were convinced of that absolutely, and I can tell you that I think it must have been the 20th or 21st of April, one or two or three days before I left Berlin, he evidently only then saw that the war was definitely lost and he left, I think, the Military Operation Room saying he wanted to shoot himself. That was two or three days before I left.

Q. But he didn't do it at that time?

A. He did not do it at that time. No.

Q. Was there any understanding or agreement that he, or any others, would commit suicide if worst came to worst?

A. I don't think so. No. No agreement.

Ribbentrop's Ignorance of German Foreign Policy

Q. In your letter to me you say that you are ready to supply information, and to present objectively the course of foreign policy followed by the Fuehrer, insofar as this policy was evident to you, as his foreign minister. Do you imply by that, that you are not familiar with his foreign policy, or that any part of it was concealed from you?

A. I was familiar only with a certain part of his foreign policy. I never knew or heard at all of him, or of his final conception which he really had as to the formation and how the Reich, the definite Reich, was to be formed, and so on. I think, personally, that in 1938 when I became foreign minister he told me that he wanted to get a certain number of foreign policy aims by way of negotiation and by diplomacy. This was Memel, Austria, the solution of the Sudetenland, and the corridor of Danzig; and this was more or less his program which he sketched out for me in 1938. I think he had decided in August 1939 to settle the Polish problem, that is to say, the problem of Danzig and the Corridor. I think, probably—and I must say that quite clearly—against my views—he thought this probably would go without involving a big war. I think it was on the 25th of August—I am not quite certain about that at all—when the Polish guarantee came from Great Britain, the news came military operations had already started against Poland. I went to the Fuehrer with the news and proposed to him and said this to my mind meant definitely war with Great Britain. The Fuehrer, thinking it over only a few minutes, quite agreed with me and took back the military operations with Poland. I think this was on the 25th of August 1939. He then entered into negotiations—I think it was so—he was decided to settle the problem also on the military basis, but he still hoped that in some way things might be settled in some other way, and he hoped perhaps—what always has been his aim all along, and I might say has really remained his aim during the years of the war—he occasionally talked about it—he still hoped he might be able to get perhaps the alliance with Great Britain, which had always been his great aim. Then, I think, he stopped that, hoping perhaps Great Britain would consent in some way to his solving the Polish problem either diplomatically, or probably militarily. So, negotiations went on with Mr. Henderson—and I am sorry I have not all the detailed recollection because the Fuehrer handled it from the date after he took back his advance [Word "advance" supplied by interpreter] on Poland. After he took that back, he took entire charge of the affairs himself, and evidently he did not feel very well about it. Perhaps it was the military, but he took matters entirely in his hands and I think Henderson, as far as I remember, went to London with the proposal of the Fuehrer and came back with an answer which was rather negative and which, at any rate was called by the Fuehrer, negative.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. As I understand you, at all times you knew that his program meant war?

A. I may say this—

Q. Is that not true? Try to answer my questions if you will. It will save us a great deal of time.

A. I was of the conception that the Fuehrer himself wanted to get all these vital problems of Germany in order by diplomatic means. Of that I was convinced, that he wanted very much to get it diplomatically.

Q. Will you give me an answer to this question, which you can answer yes or no. When you became foreign minister, and his aims were outlined to you, as I understand it, you did not believe that it would be accomplished diplomatically, and you knew that meant war.

A. No. I must say no to that.

Q. I misunderstood you.

A. I am sorry. I did not mean that. I hoped to get these things diplomatically.

Q. Do you mean to imply in your letter that you did not fully understand the foreign policy, and that the foreign policy was not fully imparted to you?

A. I must tell you quite frankly that apart from that which I just told you now, all the further aims of the Fuehrer which he might have had and which I only heard during these interrogations here, and all the documents which were supposed to be in there, the Fuehrer never disclosed to me any of his definite big policy, or the future formation of the Reich. There was the question occasionally—not often, but once or twice he mentioned it, the idea of creating the German Reich, the greater Germanic Reich was the idea, but he never revealed to me what this conception really meant, or what he understood under this conception. And I may say I have had the feeling all along that he was during the war—he said that once or twice—the military timetable of the General Staff came up, and he was driven to one decision after another. His conception later on was a very much larger one.

Q. Do you really want me to go to my associates at this meeting and tell them that it is your position that as foreign minister of the Reich you didn't know what the foreign policy was?

A. I am sorry. I must say so. I am very sorry. The Fuehrer never revealed his definite aims to anybody.

Q. You say to me, on page 5 of your letter, that "My goal as a diplomat was to attain diplomatically the goals of Germany." Yet, you say now you didn't know what the goals were.

A. I mean, the goals that the Fuehrer disclosed to me.

Q. You mean the first steps?

A. Yes. These goals.

Q. Further than that you had no knowledge of the foreign policy of the Reich?

A. I personally don't think the Fuehrer had a real conception of it. Of course, in the course of the war, the conception became a different one. For instance, after the Polish war, the conception came so that the Fuehrer wanted to have a frontier then with Russia and create—he wanted a Polish State created, but the Fuehrer made a General Gouvernement out of it; and after the French victory, over France, I know there have been all sorts of conceptions, but nothing really about Belgium, Holland, or France, became definite, and it always remained open—and the conceptions which he occasionally—but I can say most definitely, I never discussed with the Fuehrer, or he never discussed anything with me of the definite shape of what he called the Definite Reich, or Gross-Deutsche Reich, was to be; but the vague notion I had that he had in his mind a Latin combine; some sort of Germanic combine, in which countries like Norway, Denmark, and Holland, and so on, would have in some way a link, or a closer connection with Germany of some sort. And then, he always talked of the future and still getting in line with Great Britain. That was the conception he had. Then to the East, I must say, after the Russian War he had the idea that he wanted absolutely to have the Ukraine. That was his goal, for food purposes.

INTERROGATIONS

*Ribbentrop's Differences with Hitler on "Weltanschauung"

Q. You say in your statement that "I had some very serious divergences of opinion, and differences with the Fuehrer in matters of basic doctrine, as well as the foreign policy." Do not bother to argue them, but just enumerate for me what those differences of opinion on basic doctrine were.

A. My differences of opinion in basic doctrine were, especially —how should I explain it?—That only I was not one of the old party followers of his in 1923. I came to the party in 1932 and, therefore, I never personally—and the Fuehrer knew that very well—have had the conception of Weltanschauung, as I was supposed probably to have. The Fuehrer knew that and tolerated it, and most people also knew it. Where I didn't agree with him fundamentally was in the church question, in the Jewish question, in the whole development of this. We knew we had a Jewish problem in Germany. I knew that, and some solution had to be found. I was also of that opinion, but the whole development the Jewish question took; I was entirely against it, and I told the Fuehrer that repeatedly. Also, in written documents which I have.

Q. Have you any copies of the documents which you submitted?

A. No, but my collaborators can testify to it. I have none at all.

Q. Who can testify to it?

A. I could name you Ambassador Gaus who could, and I could name you probably one or two of my secretaries.

Q. Let us name the people who can testify that you took any affirmative steps whatever in those matters.

A. Ambassador Gaus.

Q. Where is he now?

A. I have never heard of him again. I don't know where he is, but I suppose he is easily to be found. Then, my secretaries.

Q. Named?

A. Frau Blank. Then, may I perhaps think it over, and I can perhaps name you a few more later on.

Q. You have named one secretary. The other one was—

A. That was Frau Krueger, and I may say this. Perhaps that until about 1934–5, the Fuehrer was comparatively easy to talk with on these matters and I had at that time, for instance, quite a number of Jews who were in my house, and the Fuehrer tolerated that, and he even saw a number of Jews himself, through my intermediation in 1933–4, and probably as far as 1935. When I came back from London, things were changed, and it was very difficult, but I have through the war repeatedly brought forth this question, and as I said, also have in writing asked the Fuehrer to come to an evolution—instead of this revolution, to an evolution in the question of churches and of Jews, because this was an intolerable burden to foreign policy.

*World-view or philosophy.

Q. And your advices were that that policy was making Germany enemies abroad?

A. As I said to the Fuehrer once or twice—I remember something I said—that the enmity of the Jews alone, and the churches, would mean the enmity of a big power, and so forth. I said that once or twice to him.

Q. And you are surviving to face that enmity, and he isn't?

A. Yes. That is right.

• Why Ribbentrop Did Not Resign

Q. What did you ever do about it, when your advice was disregarded?

A. It was—I can tell you promptly—it was impossible to do anything at all.

Q. Did you ever resign?

A.. No.

Q. Did you tender your resignation from office?

A. Well, I resigned once, in 1941, in which I had a terrible difficulty with the Fuehrer, and I may say—

Q. What was that difficulty about?

A. The difficulty in 1941 was this: The occasion was a trifle, but it had accumulated for quite a long time and it was this: That apart from the question of Weltanschauung, I saw that in the whole world these Jewish people—and I have always said to my collaborators, and they can testify to it, that we have taken the whole world on our arms. I have said that a hundred times, that this question of Weltauaffassung*—and, furthermore, perhaps I can explain it that way—that the elimination [word “elimination” furnished by interpreter] myself of so many important questions of foreign policy after the outbreak of the war was creating and giving to me the gravest anxieties. I may perhaps explain to you. Already before the war, to a certain extent it may perhaps surprise you, but I, as foreign minister, have never seen one speech of the Fuehrer. Not once. I have once seen it and he once complained about that. You see, the way he had matters in his hands, he told me he did not need a Gouvernante. I mean, he was absolutely 100 percent—he dominated [word “dominated” furnished by the interpreter] the situation, and it can perhaps only be compared to what I have seen, for instance, of Stalin, and Moscow, and something like that. It was absolutely dominating, and I wasn't in. You see, his Saarbruecken speech — I don't know whether you heard of it.

*See Ribbentrop Interrogation, 17 Oct. '45, p. 1255 of this volume.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. But even a dominator has to have people understand what he is trying to accomplish if he is going to have it done.

A. Yes.

Q. How did you carry out his policy if you didn't know what it was; and, how could you disagree with it if you didn't know what it was?

A. May I say this; Before the war it was so, that, for instance, at the Saarbruecken speech was the turning point in the British policy, for instance, but—

Q. Didn't you know about that speech? .

A. I never heard about it. I was amazed when I saw it in the paper.

Q. You mean that as foreign minister you first read of his speech in the newspapers?

A. Everybody can confirm that from my collaborators; everybody. I have never seen one speech of the Fuehrer during the time I was foreign minister, beforehand. Not one phrase which he made in his foreign policy.

Q. And you didn't resign?

A. I will come to this now.

Q. Tell me now about your resignation.

A. Before the war it was very difficult to follow it, because the cancellation of the naval arrangement, which I made, I heard sitting before the Fuehrer in the Reichstag. I heard it for the first time in the Reichstag and I never heard it before. That is the way the Fuehrer dominated the foreign policy. This was before the war. During the war the question had been this: The Fuehrer had during the war taken over matters. For instance, when Poland was taken, he made the Grande Finale. Then, when the Norway incident came, I only heard that very late. I think it was a day or two before, and he went in there—and with the moment we occupied Norway, from that moment on the same thing that was in Belgium and Holland; the Foreign Office was discarded and we had no more to say in these countries. In France I managed to get an ambassador in, but he had it very difficult. Then, when the war with Russia came, the East Ministry was created, and the whole Foreign Office was discarded from the whole sector of the East; and in all these things it, of course, created tremendous difficulties. For instance, in Sweden, Finland, Turkey, and so on we had great difficulties all through there.

And all these difficulties had accumulated, and on this occasion I personally lost my temper a little bit. I had a great deal of difficulty with the Fuehrer and I asked to resign, and the Fuehrer had accepted my resignation, but then after he had—he was not well, and so I asked him personally to take back the resignation. I personally asked him, myself, that it—

Q. What do you mean, "he was not well"?

A. He asked me then—he was not very well with his head. He had something—he asked me whether I wanted to—I was his most difficult subordinate [word "subordinate" furnished by interpreter], and that I hurt his health, and so on; and so I was very much moved, and I asked him personally to take back the resignation, and so I stayed in my office.

Q. Then, whatever difficulties you may have had, they were not sufficient to cause you to actually leave the Ministry?

A. I did not leave the Ministry. I may say perhaps one more thing; that since 1941 my influence was very small, if any at all. But I must say this, that on several occasions—he did not ask my resignation, but my people know that also, that I asked him, the Fuehrer, if I couldn't go for a half a year to the front—four or five times—but I asked this in such a way that it was not meant as a resignation.

Q. Let me ask you, did you dare to resign?

A. I did, in 1941.

Q. What would have happened to you if you would have resigned?

A. I don't think anything would really have happened, but of course how things would have gone, I don't know. It is very difficult to say that; to answer that.

Q. Did you stay in the cabinet through fear?

A. No, I wouldn't like to say that.

Q. Did that enter into it, and is that a part of it?

A. No, I wouldn't like to say that.

Q. Then there was no reason why you couldn't resign if your disagreement had been a basic and serious disagreement?

A. Well, I would like—

Q. Just answer my question, and it will save a great deal of time. There was no reason why you couldn't have resigned if you had had a disagreement sufficiently grave to have caused you to part company with the Fuehrer, was there?

A. I could have resigned, but I felt it my duty as a patriot to remain as foreign minister. I must say that.

INTERROGATIONS

Ribbentrop's Ignorance of What Went on in Concentration Camps

Q. You say in your memorandum to me that "mistakes have certainly been made on the German side." I wondered what you had in mind, since you didn't specify?

A. You mean mistakes altogether? Well, of course, I meant especially the concentration camp, and these things; but of course, there were also other mistakes.

Q. Would you specify for me now the things which you conceive of as mistakes on the German side?

A. I would like to say first, of course, I was always against these, or any, too harsh measures on the question of Weltauffassung. I have continuously used that picture with my collaborators, that one day things might—I am sorry, and it is dreadful to think to a certain extent it has become true—that the Weltauffassung—and that some people may remember back and hold up the flag of Weltauffassung, and the German people may be gone; and I have repeatedly said that to my people; and, therefore, I was against measures which were going in that direction. Whether I was right or not, I don't know, but it seems I have been right. But I was, of course, very much against the measures which were taken, of concentrating all people in the camps, and when I heard for the first time—this was after the taking, I think, of the concentration camp of Maidanek—through reports that came from our diplomats abroad, where this made a tremendous uproar; of course, I was very much upset about these things which were said in these reports.

Q. Candidly, were you upset by the uproar, or were you upset by the facts?

A. By both. Very much by both.

Q. Do you want us to understand that you didn't know what was going on in those concentration camps, at least in a general way?

A. I can assure you that I had not the slightest idea these things were going on. We knew there were things going on in the concentration camps—I mean, people put to hard labor and so on—that we knew, but we had not the slightest idea these things were going on.

Q. Didn't you have American newspapers, for example, clipped and sent to you by American representatives?

A. No.

Q. Didn't you keep track, and wasn't it part of your duty in the foreign office to keep track, of foreign public sentiment?

A. Yes, it was my duty.

Q. Did you not know that, repeatedly in the American press, reports were given that these things were going on in these concentration camps?

A. I must say I did not get one of those clippings. I must say that.

Q. How can you expect us to believe that what was generally known in the United States following 1933, or as soon as these camps began to be opened, wasn't known to you as a responsible head of the German Government? How can you ask me to believe that, Ribbentrop?

A. It is very queer, but it is quite possible, because it has been the case. This was so much tied up, these things, and especially from all people. I mean, for instance, if I would have wanted to visit something like a concentration camp, it would have been quite impossible.

Q. When did you begin to suspect there was something wrong about the concentration camp program?

A. You mean that these—

Q. When did you first begin to oppose it? You said you opposed it. When did you first begin to oppose it?

A. I don't know. I can't tell you exactly. I know that the biggest shock which I got was from this—was the first I really got—also in the reports from my diplomats abroad—was when the Maidanek—this was in Poland—when the Russians occupied that. That was the first picture I really got.

Q. That was toward the end of 1944, was it not?

A. That was very late in 1944.

Q. You say up to that time you had no idea that there were tortures, and exterminations, and that sort of thing going on at these camps?

A. One heard occasionally the talk that there were things going on which were not in order, and so on, but this was so much closed up that one really never heard anything definite about it. It was entirely closed up, and I think very many other people can confirm that to you. I heard vague rumors, and things like that, but we never heard anything definite of what was really going on. The source of his information was, especially—as all the source of his information—always 95 percent newspapers I should say. The Fuehrer got most of his information from newspapers. He got clippings from the Special Department. He didn't get that from ourselves; he had a special office, a special department—Reichs Presse Agent it is called, who made all these clippings for him, and I say, most of his decisions, and everything of his political conceptions — foreign policy — were taken from this office and the newspaper reports which he got from this office.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Who ran that department?

A. Dietrich, the Reichs Pressechef.

Q. Don't you recall that President Roosevelt protested against these concentration camps, and the treatment of the Jews and minorities?

A. Yes, I remember, and I recollect that. Yes.

Q. Did you not take any pains at that time to look into these matters and see what was going on?

A. Every possibility—I always looked after one thing; that every report of such kind which arrived was brought forward to the Fuehrer, but I can tell you it was extremely difficult in 1938 even to mention the subject of Jews, because it was almost impossible to mention the subject with the Fuehrer. He was—I don't know whether you can realize what an overwhelming personality he had. It was quite possible. If he didn't want to talk about a matter, to even get it to him was quite impossible. It was quite impossible. I was perhaps one of the few who tried it.

Q. When a matter became so important and so well-known that the head of a Foreign State protests, wouldn't it be your function to look into the matter and ascertain whether the Foreign State head has misrepresented the matter?

A. I don't know now. I may perhaps think it over. It is possible I did that once or twice. I don't remember now.

Ribbentrop's "Opposition" to Policy toward Churches

Q. You say in this letter to me that you were "absolutely opposed to the development in the policy toward the churches." What was the policy toward the churches, to which you were opposed?

A. The policy towards the churches was—I only overlooked it in a large way, and in a way because I was not very much informed about internal matters, but I saw it when it came through the nuncio, or we heard it occasionally through the connections we had with Protestant churches to foreign countries, and so on. The general policy was in that direction in order that the tendency—the Fuehrer was of the conviction, I would like to put it that way, that the churches—and this was also his conviction about the Jews—in his big struggle which he always considered his main struggle, that was always his conception he had in his mind. There were disintegrating elements in the fight of the national states against the dissolution through communism. That was the big conception which the Fuehrer had, and everything probably was based on this one big conception always, and at the end of the war he focused always entirely on this point and he was of the opinion that the churches also were a part—who were in the struggle against dissolution of the German national people which was coming from the East—would play a part of weakening the German peoples in this mental and probably also physical fight. That is the way I would like to put it.

Q. You mean that he thought the Catholic church and the Communists were working together?

A. He sometimes—yes, sometimes I even heard that said, to a certain extent. That he thought—I remember the Fuehrer once said something, but I must say I never quite understood that, the idea that the Catholic Church in Germany was going back he said to the war Christendom—to ancient Christendom—[words "ancient Christendom" furnished by interpreter] that there was a certain similarity between ancient Christendom and the Communist doctrine. I remember him saying it, and I never quite understood that, as a matter of fact, but he mentioned that occasionally, and one thing I do know—and I must say it was in 1932 a very difficult problem in Germany — the Protestant churches were empty. I have never been a partisan of the church for a long time, but I perhaps may say this, that my wife and myself during the last five years of the war, when we saw how the tendency of the whole church—an antichurch policy—went, we repeatedly said to each other: "We are now, where everybody is going out of the church, we are going to enter again now." So, because we saw it would have a disastrous effect the way things were going—the Fuehrer was, of course, of a definite opinion on that.

Q. What was the policy that he was going to follow toward the church that you objected to?

A. It was really the general attitude, I mean.

Q. What was the attitude to be? Whether he prayed or didn't pray, I am not interested in it. Whether he believed in the church or didn't believe in it, I am not interested in it. But what was he going to do to it? That is what I am interested in. I am taking it that you were interested in the policy, and not reforming the Fuehrer.

A. How should I explain that. There was going on this—that there was certainly a persecution of certain clergymen and which, of course, this persecution brought in again that certain clergymen would make speeches against National Socialism, and by this way quite a number of them were in concentration camps, as you probably know—were put in concentration camps, and this would make the other priests again preach against National Socialism, and so on, and this would show in the sort of dissolution tendencies in the spirit of the people, and also of the Army. I heard that from various places.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You thought it was bad policy to put the priests in concentration camps?

A. Yes. Very bad policy. I tried, as a matter of fact, for quite a long time to get a number of priests out, but I only managed in the last month to get a few hundred out.

Q. Then you knew over a considerable period of time that the church was being persecuted and that the concentration camp played a part in the persecution of the church?

A. That I heard; yes.

Q. You were satisfied that was true?

A. I heard of it occasionally.

Q. But you were satisfied it was true, and you protested?

A. What I did in it was this: You see, I tried to help to get some of the people out; but in all these questions, I am sorry to say—

Q. You were well aware that the concentration camp was a savage place for them to be, were you not?

A. (No answer.)

Q. You knew that the concentration camp was a torture place.

A. No. I didn't know that. No, that I didn't know.

Q. Why did you want to get them out then?

A. I was always personally—

Q. What did you think the concentration camp was for? Tell us what you thought a concentration camp did?

A. Well, a concentration camp to me was—my conception of what I always figured out—people put in there in order—I mean, working like, let us say, like a prison—but some sort of a prison.

Q. That is all you thought of it as; just a prison?

A. Yes.

Q. You knew there was a great fear of the concentration camp all through Germany, did you not?

A. Well, it is very queer that the first time I really heard of this fear was during the last month, when a sister-in-law of mine was interned. A sister-in-law of my wife was interned, and I heard then really for the first time, of this great fear, but we were, I must tell you quite frankly—

Q. You mean, you felt it for the first time then, do you not? That was the first time it really came home to you?

A. That is right. That is quite right.

Q. But you knew it was happening to a great many other people, did you not?

A. Well, we were so—I can tell you this—we were so closed up. I was working between 14 and 16 and 18 hours, sometimes, at my foreign policy, that I hardly—I must say that quite frankly—all during the war I was generally out in my quarters. I was not in Berlin, or at the Fuehrer's headquarters, but in my business headquarters near there, and I very seldom knew anything that was going on in Germany. Very seldom. You knew or heard very little about it.

Q. All these things that were going on in Germany with reference to the Jews and the Catholics and the Protestants became known abroad, apparently, before they did to you; but, you heard of them through foreign affairs, did you not? They came back to you from abroad, did they not?

A. Well, it is quite possible that we got certain reports occasionally. That is quite possible, but generally spoken, we felt all the time that every persecution of Jewish and church question was a tremendous handicap in foreign policies. If I may tell you a few examples: I remember when we made the Spanish policy, I know the Catholic problem played one of the most important parts that things did not go as we wanted it. I know in the Swedish problem, the Jewish part played a great role, and in many other problems we felt and I saw almost every second or third step we took in foreign policy, I saw one of these problems facing us.

Q. Did you receive from the Vatican a communication dated 2 March 1943, calling your attention to a long list of persecutions of bishops and priests, such as, imprisonments and shootings and other interferences with the exercise of religious freedom?*

A. I don't recollect it at the moment, but I know that we had protests from the Vatican for—I mean, we had a whole desk full of protests from the Vatican.

Q. Did you investigate them to ascertain whether they were true?

A. Well, I will tell you quite frankly it was impossible for me to confront the Fuehrer with the Vatican question. It went so far that I may say this: When the East Ministry was created in 1941, I think it was in 1941, that the Fuehrer made a rule that in everything that we had to treat—yes, he wanted to make a rule that all the Vatican treatments with the whole East, for instance, was not to be made by us any more; so that to approach the Fuehrer with one of these protests was futile. They continuously went to the Fuehrer and they also went to the party councils—I know to the party—but to approach him in any of these matters to do away with it, it was quite impossible, and he said to me once or twice, "This is merely an interior matter which is not a concern of yours." Repeatedly.

*Document 3264-PS, Vol. V, p. 1018.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Did you reply to the Papal protests?

A. I think there were very many we did not reply. Quite a number.

Q. Did you reply to any?

A. I don't know now exactly, but there were very many we didn't reply to.

Q. And, so far as you know, the protests were based on facts?

A. (No answer.)

Q. You had no reason to doubt that the communications from the Vatican reciting atrocities against priests were true, did you?

A. It may perhaps seem strange, but I don't remember, personally. I don't think—I have perhaps seen one or two, but I have hardly seen these protests at all.

Q. I thought you said there was a whole desk full?

A. Yes, but I know—

Q. You know, Ribbentrop, that your relations with the Vatican were an important part of your foreign policy. Weren't they?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You couldn't hope to have good relations in some quarters of the world, if your relations with the Vatican were bad, and that was particularly true of South America, was it not?

A. Yes, I know.

Q. And, you were particularly anxious to cultivate South America. Now, do you mean to say you didn't even read a protest from the Vatican that came to your desk?

A. It is really true. It is so that the Fuehrer took such a stand in these Vatican matters that from then on they didn't come to me any more.

Q. I am not interested in the Fuehrer any more. Let us get down to this part. If those protests were based on misinformation, it was your duty as foreign minister to convince the Vatican that it was being misinformed, was it not?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you take any steps to ascertain whether those protests were based on truth?

A. I didn't because the Fuehrer didn't want it. I must say that quite frankly.

Q. You took no steps to ascertain whether they were true?

A. Excuse me. Many timely steps have been taken, but I am sure in many, many cases—you see, the nuns; for instance, where the nuns would come and my people would discuss it with them, but it was impossible for me to approach the Fuehrer with one of these things.

Q. Do you mean to say that you couldn't even discuss with the Fuehrer your relations with the Vatican, as important as the Vatican relations were to foreign affairs and to the rest of the world?

A. I must say, absolutely, 100 percent, yes.

Q. And you thought that man was the man to whom you owed unquestionable obedience? A man who took that position?

A. You see, his view was—

Q. Now, in all candor, did you think that he, taking that position, was a sane man to be running the affairs of a great country?

A. I have had hundreds of sleepless nights about it, I can tell you.

Q. Not enough though to leave his government?

A. No. Therefore, we—

Q. Didn't you recognize that this was a reckless course that was going to bring most of the world on to Germany's back?

A. (No answer.)

Q. Did you not think you had an important duty to the German people, if this man was running that kind of a course with foreign affairs?

A. It was very difficult for me, you see. I might perhaps say again the conception which the Fuehrer always brought forward, again. He said, "The only thing which must not happen to Germany is that it becomes communistic, and in order to be strong enough to stand against this doctrine"—that was his—absolutely his creed—"we must simply, without thinking, discard any problem which has the possibility of weakening Germany in the struggle." This was always his conception.

Q. You don't for one moment think that the Catholic Church and the Communist Party were cooperating in any way, do you?

A. No, I don't think so.

Q. You recognize the Catholic Church as one of the bulwarks in the country and in the world against Communism, do you not?

A. Yes. That is also my view.

Q. You cooperated and carried out a policy based on a basic misunderstanding of the nature of the Vatican's attitude. Is that correct?

A. We all believed in the Fuehrer.

Q. Tell me whether or not you read that document* when it came to the foreign office. The document was furnished to me by the Vatican, and that of course is a translation.

*Document 3262-PS, Vol. V, p. 1015.

INTERROGATIONS

A. [Witness reads document] I may say, I don't at the moment recall this specific document; but I recall this, that it must have been in 1943 that the Nuncio, this Orsenigo with whom I had occasionally these discussions, he came to see one of my people about the Warthegau, which made such great difficulties with the Vatican, and I know I tried very hard at that time with the Fuehrer to get control in the Vatican matters about all the countries which were not the old Reich [words "the old Reich" furnished by interpreter], which were the occupied territories; like Poland, and like the East, and other territories in France, and so on; but I remember that the Fuehrer was very displeased at that moment, and he made a rule—just particularly whether it was this one I can't say, but it must have been about that time—I can't say it was this time, of course, but it was either 1942 or 1943—he made a rule from that moment, that I was to send a note—I think it was a note—to the Vatican, that if the Vatican did not recognize any of these German political changes, the Reich would in the future refuse to negotiate with the Vatican on any matters except the old Reich. I fell very flat with the proposition of trying to get those things more in hand, and I may perhaps add that this has also once been a topic when in 1938 or 1939 I went to Rome. I made then an effort to get a nearer approach with the Catholic Church. I paid, with the consent of the Fuehrer, a visit to the Pope, and to the Vatican, hoping afterwards, perhaps to find some way of coming to a new agreement, a new concordat [word "concordat" furnished by the interpreter], but things didn't come off.

Q. But you did reach a concordat with the Vatican, did you not?

A. Yes. That was before. That was made, I think it must have been in 1933, 4, or 5, or something like that. There was a concordat, but it didn't work very well.

Q. It was not kept by the German Government, was it?

A. That is possible, yes.

Q. You have no particulars in which the Church failed to keep its agreement, do you?

A. That I don't know; I can't tell you; but I know the Party always said they have not kept it, but I must say I don't know any details about it.

Q. Were these protests, by the Vatican, answered?

A. These here, you mean (indicating document).* I should say that probably one of these protests—I don't remember exactly—probably I sent once—I think I sent the whole bunch of protests to the Fuehrer, and also to the Partei-Kanzei, so that they should see what was going on, and that brought forward this definite note of the Fuehrer which I think he dictated, and at any rate he gave me exactly what I was to do so we could not from that moment discuss with the Nuncio any more any questions about the out-Reich. That was the effect which this had when I presented it to the Fuehrer.

*See document 3263-PS, Vol. V, p. 1017.

Q. So the official answer of the German Government was that it wouldn't answer these protests?

A. I think all the protests were concerned with—everything except the outside of the Alt-Reich, for that moment would not be answered. It wasn't about that.

Q. So far as you know, the statements of facts made by these protests were true, because you never investigated them to ascertain whether they were true or false?

A. These facts here, you mean? (Indicating document)

Q. Yes. About the shooting of priests and mistreatment of bishops?

A. I don't know exactly what has been—certainly there have been efforts made to ascertain this.

Q. But nobody ever proposed that the Fuehrer be advised that there was any untruth in the stories of atrocities which the Vatican had brought to your attention?

A. That certainly is so, because we didn't after this moment answer any notes any more.

Ribbentrop's Position on Extermination of Jews

Q. You knew that the policy advocated by the Nazi Party was to exterminate the Jews, didn't you?

A. I did not.

Q. Was that a secret from you?

A. Yes. Absolutely.

Q. Did you hear the speeches of Goering and Streicher?

A. Yes, but I may say this. I was personally convinced—I may say that—I knew it was considered a long time before entering the party. I know I discussed it with my father who didn't enter until 1933 because of the Jewish question. He was convinced, and I was also convinced, there would be an evolution in the direction of adjustment after some very evident factors of the Jewish problem in Germany would be done away with—which as a matter of fact certain important Jews told me, and I remember one telling me himself, that he did not like this development in Germany. I remember that.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. How could you have expected a change for the better on the Jewish question when you yourself say that Hitler was so violent on the subject that you couldn't even discuss it with him, and that he was the man everybody had to bow down to without question? What source did you expect improvement to come from?

A. You see, in 1933 and '34 I think there were probably quite a number of people living still, and even in 1935 I think, continuously some old Jewish friends in my house. I knew that quite well.

Q. I know, but you are not answering the question I am asking you, and perhaps my difficulty is that you are a man of experience in the world, and it is no good for me to assume that you knew so little as you tried to make out you knew. How could you have expected any improvement in the lot of Jews in Germany, with Adolf Hitler as head of the government in Germany, when you say that you as foreign minister could not even discuss the problem with him because he was so violent on the subject?

A. That was in 1938. In 1933 and 1935—

Q. But it was in 1938 that you became foreign minister and were a part of this outfit?

A. I can say this, in 1935—I remember one incident when suddenly it turned out that my chief adjutant was quarter Jew or half—he had Jewish blood, quarter Jew I think. I went to the Fuehrer, and the Fuehrer made him even in 1935 a member of the National Socialist Party. So the Fuehrer was not at all uncompromising in those years, and I thought he would go in that direction. He saw himself—and I can name you quite a number of Jews and half-Jews the Fuehrer saw with me occasionally in those years on foreign policy matters, for instance. Later on, of course, things became very uncompromising.

Q. You stayed with him after that became more uncompromising also.

A. Yes.

Effect of Trial Verdict on German People

Q. You have asked me to do something about preventing these trials because you say you think the German people would think that any verdict or decision as to war criminals would be directed at them. I am interested to know how the German people could think it was directed at them, as a whole, when you yourself say you disagreed with the policy but couldn't do anything about it?

A. I think this: I think that this war has been so terrible, and

I want so much my people to come to reconciliation—the German people with the other nations—especially also with the American nation.

When the War Became “Terrible” for Germany

Q. When did the war become terrible, Ribbentrop? When did this war impress you as terrible?

A. It became to me terrible—I can tell you the exact moment. From the moment of the African landing, I mean, of the English-American forces.

Q. That is just about when I thought it began to affect you that way, and up to that time, when the destruction was going on in other people's countries, this war never impressed you as being terrible, or having any terrible aspects. There is nothing that happened to Germany that Germany didn't inflict on Warsaw, and tried to inflict on London, is there?

A. I may say this, that in Warsaw, I think the Fuehrer tried five or six times to make them see he doesn't want to get the civilian population out, and everything else; and as far as London is concerned, I may tell you I was personally very much against the bombing of London because I knew the English people and knew it would affect them exactly the way it did; but, of course, I had nothing to say in it.

Q. But Ribbentrop, when you knew all of these things, you knew the bombing of London wouldn't do any good and it would do Germany harm, and you knew the attitude of the Vatican, and you knew the attitude of the United States, and in other words, on your own statements, you knew Germany was running a course that was going to bring the whole world against her, as it did, and you let the German people in for this out of what you say is loyalty to the Fuehrer. Now you say to me that the German people, if they know these facts, will think it is against them. It seems to me if the German people know these facts, they are the people who would want to deal with you, and with the other men who led them into this, and I would like to know what you think about that.

A. That may be so. That may be so for the moment, yes. But I wonder—don't you think that in the long run that Germans condemned before a court of not-Germans, would in the long run stand between the countries, no matter what it was? That is the question I am asking myself.

Q. I am not being interrogated. I don't happen to think that. It seems to me that the one thing that the German people need is to know how you fellows went on this reckless course and you never warned the German people what they were getting into. It seems to me, if I may say so, and I don't want to be unpleasant about it, but it seems to me you would have more difficulty squaring your accounts with the German people, than you would with the American people, because after all, we take care of ourselves. You are in the position of a man who, on the basis of your statements, knew that this was running amuck.

INTERROGATIONS

A. May I say this. I think I have said it also in that letter, and I think I must say that quite frankly I was not satisfied with quite a number of things, as I said. Now, the Fuehrer, of course, was of a different opinion, and he is dead, and it would be to me, disloyalty, and also I don't know—perhaps I have not the right and it would be presumptuous of me to judge such a big thing in history. The Fuehrer from his beginning in 1932 I know was convinced that unless he went a strong course intellectually, military, and in every way—that is to say, mentally and physically, that the German people would be the German National State, and not only the German National State, but also Europe—and he thought much further than that, and he always said would be dissolved by the Communist idea. This was his outstanding feature and he never lost it until the last. I remember during the last month he repeatedly, when I urged so much—I don't know whether you know that I have tried, during the war, four or five times very hard to come to a compromise with him to get the Fuehrer to compromise the first time after the landing in Africa, where I tried everything, and he refused, and I tried it later again and he always said "it is all Schicksal [interpreter explains that Schicksal means 'fate'], and I can't do anything." That was his creed. It is very hard for me really to judge such events, I should like to say.

Explanation of Difference Between Communism and Nazism

Q. In this fear of Communism there was nothing which prevented him from joining hands with Russia.

A. He tried that; yes.

Q. Tell us how you reconciled it with your fear of Communism?

A. That is a very strange thing. I must say I had the idea to reconcile—I had the idea always that it is possible to get National Socialism and Communism to overbridge the gulf between these two Weltanschauungen.

Q. They are not so different, are they?

A. It is something very queer. I couldn't give you a definite view about that. I was in Moscow, and I treated with Marshal Stalin twice, for many hours; and I had then the impression that something very strong was there, and that the doctrine, the Communist doctrine, as it had also shown in Germany, was a very, very strong doctrine, because I saw how this one man had these 200,000,000 Russian people in his hands like that. From the first moment when I arrived in that room and Molotov and Stalin were there, until the very end of these two visits, which I had, I don't think anybody ever spoke a word but Stalin and he had this whole country in his hand. I came back from Moscow and reported to the Fuehrer, and I told him to my mind—I can tell you, from my side—I had also the impression it was from the Fuehrer's side, that it was the Fuehrer's thought also it would be possible to overbridge this difficulty. Later on I was rather doubtful.

Q. You mean, you thought that Communism and National Socialism could go along together?

A. I thought there was no necessity that the two countries should come to any divergencies or difficulty on account of the "Weltauffassung" [interpreter explains that this word means "conception of life"]. The Fuehrer, I thought, was of the same opinion, and I thought that for quite a long time, but then, of course, this pact was very unpopular with the Party, and I noticed how there were very, very strong influences I think going on in the Fuehrer himself; how he slowly sort of took an attitude towards Russia but, of course, with that as far as I am informed also, and what the Fuehrer told me himself on those occasions, the military question had a great, great part, and still more important part in it. I just want to sum up. The Fuehrer had the opinion that in the general line that this Communist doctrine was such a strong doctrine and had produced such an enormous power in the East, that he wanted to get Germany as strong as possible, as he possibly could mentally and physically, and repeatedly during the last year or two of the war he has repeatedly said again, "This is all Schicksal," and even went so far as to say one day that the German people must now prove whether they can stand these tremendous impacts [word "impacts" furnished by the interpreter] of the new Genghis Khan, he called Stalin, and he spoke in great admiration of Stalin always, and called him a Genghis Khan. He said, "Now the German people must prove it. If they can't stand the going it is all Schicksal." He absolutely focused on this one idea, and more and more on this one, so that nobody else had anything to say.

Q. Was his admiration for Stalin after he attacked Russia or before?

A. After.

INTERROGATIONS

Extent of Ribbentrop's Assumption of "Responsibility"

Q. Now, let us get back to the letter. You say on page 5, "if the necessity for finding responsibility can be satisfied by the voluntary assumption of such a responsibility by myself, and perhaps other co-workers of the Fuehrer, and in this manner the proposed trial of the Germans can be prevented, I stand ready to take such a step, as the former Foreign Minister of the Fuehrer, who is taking over the political responsibility of the men and women of our regime who were imprisoned here." Whom do you have in mind as perhaps to take responsibility with yourself?

A. It is a very difficult question, which I have already been asked. I have already thought about it, but I have not come really to a definite conclusion yet about it. But I should think that a number should be found.

Q. What do you have in mind taking responsibility for? What is your proposal?

A. I can't take any responsibility for criminal matters, but I thought of a political responsibility.

Q. Do you take responsibility for the war of aggression?

A. I couldn't do that for the war of aggression.

Q. Are you willing to take responsibility for waging war in violation of your treaties?

A. That is very important. May I think these questions over? They are very important questions. I have not thought about these details. What was my conception was that one could simply say, "Here. These people have declared themselves responsible for the consequences," or something like that.

Q. Are you willing to take any responsibility for the killing of American airmen?

A. No. I couldn't.

Q. Are you willing to take any responsibility for the deportations of slave labor? Of course you knew of that policy?

A. Yes. I knew. I knew. What I knew of that policy, I mean, what we did in that part was, for instance, bringing people—I mean, it was on agreements with the governments made in those countries. That was our part we took in it.

Q. You mean, with Laval?

A. With Laval, and with the Balkan countries, and with the various countries, we made agreements.

Q. Then you think there is no responsibility for that?

A. I beg your pardon?

Q. Then you think there is no responsibility for that?

A. Well, as far as we were informed, the Strength Through Joy and the German Labor Front [words "Strength Through Joy" and the "German Labor Front" furnished by the interpreter], were taking care of that, and we even put people in there to get them synchronized, and propaganda, and that they have through their own people, the French and so on; and we considered that—I don't know of any other details about this.

Q. You don't take any responsibility for the policy of deportation of slave labor?

A. Slave labor? No.

Q. And you don't take any responsibility, I suppose, for the killing, or branding, or other mistreatment of Russian prisoners of war?

A. No. I couldn't.

Q. Do you take any responsibility for the killing of hostages?

A. No. I couldn't.

Q. Do you take any responsibility for the plunder of property, such as this Rosenberg looting of cultural shrines?

A. No. That I can't.

Q. You had nothing to do with that?

A. No.

Q. And you wouldn't take any responsibility for the destruction of the Warsaw ghetto?

A. No. I can't do that.

Q. Nor for the bombing of Rotterdam?

A. No.

Q. The destruction of Lidice. You wouldn't take any responsibility for that?

A. No.

Q. And I suppose you take no responsibility for the concentration camps?

A. No. I can't.

Q. Nor for the extermination policy against Jews?

A. You mean for these criminal things? I can't.

Q. And you take no responsibility for the persecution of the churches?

A. No.

Q. How many Jews were exterminated, in your estimation?

A. I have not the slightest idea. I don't know at all. I only heard them, as I told you, the first time at Maidanek, and then after the breakdown, through the radio, before I was taken prisoner.

Q. Have you any idea whether it is a large number or a small number?

INTERROGATIONS

A. I don't know at all. I couldn't tell you. I have not the slightest idea.

Q. Would it surprise you to know that more than 4 and one-half million Jews were exterminated?

A. That is not possible.

Q. Why is it not possible?

A. That is not possible.

Q. What makes you say it is not possible?

A. That must have been propaganda. It is quite out of the question.

Q. If you are able to show me any reason why that is not true, I would like to know it. How many Jews were there in Germany at the time the program of extermination started?

A. I think we had in Germany altogether 400,000 Jews.

Q. How many are there left?

A. I don't know.

Q. You don't know of many, do you?

A. I can't tell you. I don't really know, I must say.

Q. Do you take any responsibility for the Gestapo, secret police, and their handling of prisoners?

A. No. I couldn't do that.

Q. What about the SS? Do you take any responsibility for what they did?

A. I don't know what you are hinting at? What you mean by that, I don't know.

Q. Their whole course of treatment of civilians in other countries, and their treatment of American prisoners?

A. Well, I—

Q. In other words, you take no responsibility for any war crimes, or crimes of any kind?

A. Crimes, I can't take. But may I say this. I mean, I assure you that the Geneva Convention—we had held that Geneva Convention up as much as we possibly could.

Q. Ribbentrop, I am sorry to disagree with you because I would rather be pleasant than disagreeable, but unless all of the proof in this case, coming from your own people, is not to be believed, the Geneva Convention was flagrantly violated. But the point is, you take no responsibility for anything that is criminal. Aside from that you are willing to take responsibility. Is that the point?

A. (No answer.)

Q. Your offer to me does not include taking any responsibility for anything that is classed as a war crime, or a crime of any character. Is that right?

A. That was my idea. No crime.

Q. So that, if we are in a position to prove crimes, your offer doesn't reach that situation at all, does it?

A. That, of course, is right. Yes. But I thought one could, perhaps find some other way to prevent these proceedings, if a number of people declared themselves responsible, and say a statement being made about it, and not holding the proceedings then.

Q. And then the world would forget all that I have called your attention to, such as these concentration camps and deportations and killing of American prisoners?

A. May I say one thing about the prisoners? You see, I may say this; that during the last weeks there were these terrible bombardments of Berlin and various other cities.

Q. Why do you refer to them as terrible bombardments?

A. Well, there were, I think, 40 to 50 thousand women and children killed.

Q. How many were killed in Warsaw?

A. I don't know exactly.

Q. If I may say so, I find it very difficult to be sympathetic with your viewpoint, because you seem to think that the bombing of Germany was a terrible thing, and I agree with you it was, but you seem to think that was when the terror of the thing began. The reprehensibility of this thing began to dawn on the American people when it started, and when President Roosevelt began protesting about this thing, but you people were utterly heedless about the sentiment of the world then.

A. But it isn't—these bombardments were disastrous. It is something unimaginable.

Q. Have you seen the pictures that your own people put out of the destruction of Warsaw?

A. No, sir.

Q. It was put out as propaganda.

A. No.

Q. I am rather afraid you are going to be surprised, if you knew so little about your own government; you are going to be surprised at some of the things that they did.

A. I can only tell you about the Geneva Convention.

Q. I think you have testified about that yesterday?

A. I mean, after these bombardments the idea came from under this terrible apprehension to do away with the Geneva Convention, of course, and I can only say this was a last—a very, very hard 10 minutes, and if everybody tried to do away with it, I could—in a very hard conversation—I could make the Fuehrer not to sign this. This was a very, very important matter, I think, which happened during the last month of the war, because it would have meant probably—you see, it was such a terrible excitement then about these women and children, that they said, "We must take some reprisals, and what can we do?" And it might have meant the shooting of many thousands of prisoners.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You mean there was consideration given to shooting the remainder of the prisoners in your hands, as retaliation for the bombing?

A. There was a possibility of shooting prisoners then. Reprisal against—

Q. If you took responsibility as you propose, what was your idea of the penalty that should be imposed?

A. I have not thought about that. I don't know.

Q. What are you prepared to suggest as appropriate?

A. I would leave this entirely to the other side.

Q. I think that is all.

Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 8 October 1945, 1430-1705, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, AGD. Also present: S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Court Reporter.

German Peace Overtures

A. [In English] Then I find later on in '35—I don't know whether I ever told you—I tried to bring about a meeting between the Fuehrer and Lord Baldwin. I tried very hard. It was arranged that the Fuehrer was going to fly to Chequers. Mr. T. J. Jones can tell you about it. He was a sort of a right hand of Mr. Baldwin. I knew Mr. Baldwin and met him three or four times, and we wanted to try to get a British alliance then. May I just say this, perhaps, what it really comes to is this, the English, historically, did not want to commit themselves. They were always against the biggest power in Europe, the strongest power. I don't know whether you know that I made offers repeatedly to the British about the naval arrangement 100 to 35, then the guarantee of the Low Countries, including France. I advocated to the Fuehrer to renounce that in order to come to the British. That was in '33 or '35. Then I told him about the integrity of these territories, and the Fuehrer went further and said that he would put a number of up to twelve divisions at their disposal in case they needed to defend their empire anywhere. Most English people know it, you see.

Then I tried to bring the Fuehrer and Mr. Baldwin together at the time, but then there were these forces in England who said no. We felt very well that this meeting didn't come off. Mr. Baldwin said at the last moment, "No", he couldn't very well. Things weren't ripe yet, and so on. From that moment on, I think, one can say that England thought that Germany, this National Socialistic Germany, the National Socialistic doctrine, would be getting too strong in Europe. I don't know why the English didn't help to arrange the question of Poland. They could have had the chance to do it. Why they didn't do it was because they evidently had made up their minds, "No, we will stop now." That is more or less the way it was, as I look back very coolly, that things happened.

Q. I want to know if, as you review all these separate instances where there were pacts made with countries, followed very soon by invasion and war, if you don't find that in every instance the war was started because of some intelligence that was brought in, or some rumor, and was what you might call a defensive war, but in fact it was a mere breaking of the treaties?

A. If the Fuehrer were here, he would answer you that all these steps which he had to take were in the interests of the people out of self-preservation.

Q. Irrespective of his treaties?

A. That he would answer, yes.

Q. What is your answer?

A. The Polish question is really very simple.

Q. This is a case of what we call second-guessing now, you know. This is after the game is over and you can sit back, and it is very easy to tell what mistakes were made. All I am trying to do is to develop whether or not you consider those things to be mistakes.

A. Well, the result is, of course, disastrous; there is no doubt about that. Did I tell you about the various endeavors that were made for peace during the war?

Q. With whom?

A. Well, I tried the first time to persuade the Fuehrer to do it. In Bromberg the night after your landing in '41—or was it '42—in Africa, I tried to persuade the Fuehrer to make a peace with Stalin at once and afterwards make a big peace offering with America. I tried again in '43.

Q. With whom?

A. I tried again to get the consent of the Fuehrer. I got it, but definitely when I got it for the first, to try to do something with Stalin, was in '44 when it was too late.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What about this Hess business? Did Hess make his flight with the consent of the Fuehrer?

A. No.

Q. Did the Fuehrer know anything about it?

A. No, nothing about it, absolutely nothing.

Q. Did you?

A. No, absolutely nothing. He was rather a nice fellow, Hess, a little extraordinary; it shows in his flight to Scotland. He thought he could go there and come to an arrangement with the Duke of Hamilton, whom he didn't even know. I knew him very well, but he didn't know him at all. He thought he could drop in there in his castle and arrange a new British Government against Mr. Churchill. It was quite extraordinary.

Q. What was his mental condition at that time?

A. I don't know. I don't know. Not quite normal I don't think. I think not quite in order. He had all sorts of people around him, you know, what do you call the people—"Star lookers"?—people who prayed about health; well, queer people he had around him. Then I tried again. You probably know that. I tried again, and this is something that I did without the Fuehrer, only during the last month in '45, I sent a man to Spain to finish the thing and to get in contact with Mr. Murphy. You probably heard about it. Events went too quickly after that. It didn't come off.

Q. What was the purpose of that?

A. I wanted to try to see what perhaps could be done, if there was anything to be arranged, that could be arranged, if something should be arranged. He asked me to get in contact through Mr. Murphy with Mr. Roosevelt.

Q. Who asked?

A. I asked this man I sent to Spain. He got in contact with Mr. Murphy. I think I still have his wire that he got in contact through some high Catholic authority. I don't know exactly who it was, but a high Catholic personality. My view was to see what the other side thought, whether it would not be possible to get some understanding outside of unconditional surrender, and then if there was the possibility, I had the intention of getting three or four or five people and going to the Fuehrer, and going to him and saying, "We must make an end." That was my view then, but that was too late.

When the Fuehrer died, of course, you know that I told Doenitz that we had best change the government at once and liquidate the whole thing. I don't know whether you know this man. I don't know whether it got to Mr. Murphy or not, but I think in Mondorf somebody told me they had news that some person of mine got in touch with him.

Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 October 1945, 1030-1200, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present: Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

The Hitler-Chamberlain Conference at Godesberg

A. [In English] I may perhaps tell you one or two incidents which are interesting. When I was at Mondorf* here, there was one of the Englishmen who was up there. I discussed that with him. He was at Godesberg, and he asked me why I had excited the Fuehrer at Godesberg, having brought in certain papers during the Godesberg conference between the Fuehrer and Chamberlain. I couldn't recollect for a moment. I said, "that is interesting. I think you were at Godesberg yourself."

He said, "Yes," he was there and, as a matter of fact, Sir Horace Wilson was also there, whom you just mentioned here. What happened was this: During the Godesberg conference, there came news, various news from the Sudetenland, reports which were brought in to the Fuehrer. I think one or two were put into this session here, that were important reports. I may point out these were not reports that came from the Foreign Office. They came from the Party. We had nothing to do with it at all. So I could tell this Englishman that the Foreign Office had nothing to do with the speeches, but then it struck me that a paper was brought in, I think from the military side, of the Czech mobilization, and when this paper was brought in, I remember that the Fuehrer stood up, rather abruptly and said, "Well, it is no use. If this Czech mobilization has come, there is no use talking any more." Mr. Chamberlain got up also and he said, "Well, there is no use continuing this conference and we had better interrupt it," and so on. So I got busy. I saw that the Fuehrer was on the verge of breaking up the conference. I think I said to Mr. Chamberlain, "Well, I think after all, first we should have the interpreter read out certain proposals that have been made. Let's first discuss it. Let's carry through the discussion to the end. There is no use of our losing our nerves about the Czech mobilization," and so on. I went to the Fuehrer and proposed that Schmidt read this through, because the Fuehrer was on the verge of going away. So we all sat down and after two or three hours of negotiation everything was quite in order, and we made a very good communique, a very good agreement of the Godesberg conference. I am just explaining this to you, because this Englishman asked me why I had excited the Fuehrer. So I reminded him that he was there himself, and that I had saved the situation. A few hours later the Fuehrer thanked me for having saved the situation. It only shows that the basis of the whole policy of the Fuehrer was the sentiment that all these vital German questions, the Sudeten question, also the Corridor and Danzig, that these were questions which were of no concern of England, having almost a third of the surface of the world at her disposal, that these were vital problems of Germany and that England really had no business to interfere there. I know he often said, "these English people, they always act like a governess with me." He didn't like that. That was his fundamental attitude toward the whole thing, which I think you must understand.

*See footnote, p. 1193 of this volume.

September 22, 1938.

INTERROGATIONS

The Decision to Invade Poland

Q. So that when you marched into Poland, you were asking for a war with England?

A. I think that the Fuehrer at that moment probably said, "I am going to do this." He didn't tell me that—but he must have said to himself, "I am going to take this risk, because this problem must be solved."

Q. The reason he felt that way was because it was his opinion that England was too weak to wage a successful war; is that correct?

A. I don't know about that. I don't know. We never discussed that, really. He never discussed that.

Q. You were very close to the councils at that time?

A. Yes, but he never discussed that.

Q. He had received several reports that England was strong?

A. I don't know why he definitely did it then. Of course, there was great excitement in those days, all these reports coming in and so on.

Q. Wasn't he depending on inspiration at that time?

A. I think I had told you before that there are some things, you see, in the Fuehrer, which we all never got quite behind. He told me once at a decision, that he suddenly feels, I don't know what you'd call it, a somnambulist feeling that comes over him and then he must do a certain thing in the interest of his people.

German Ultimatum to Chamberlain at Berchtesgaden

Q. Do you remember the Berchtesgaden conference with Chamberlain?*

*September 15, 1938.

A. Yes. When Chamberlain visited the Fuehrer?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes, I remember that, but during the conference itself I have unfortunately very little recollection of that conference because I was not present. You know they were alone.

Q. Actually at the conference they were alone, but you were there?

A. I was there in the entourage of the Fuehrer at that time, yes.

Q. Do you remember that certain demands were made by Hitler on Chamberlain, and during the discussion that you stated that Great Britain would have three days in which to accept the demand?

A. That I said that?

Q. Yes.

A. Never; complete nonsense, nonsense.

Q. What did you say?

A. Complete nonsense. So far as I remember the whole—Good Heavens what are these remarks?—absolutely complete nonsense. I can tell you, not a word of truth.

Q. How many days did Chamberlain get to accede to those demands?

A. I don't even remember the demands at the moment. I know that Chamberlain came and went up with the Fuehrer, I think in his room, talked with him for a few hours, I think. I don't know whether there was a tea afterwards, whether there was a general talk afterwards, I don't know. I cannot recollect at the moment what the Fuehrer told me about this conference with Chamberlain.

Q. Do you remember that Sir Horace Wilson was there?

A. That is possible, that he was there.

Q. Do you remember talking with him?

A. That is possible, yes. If he was there, I surely did talk with him. I don't remember it now. Was he with Chamberlain?

Q. Don't you remember that both the attitude of Hitler and yourself was very firm; as you said before, you both adopted a very stern attitude with respect to those questions?

A. Yes, but I never said anything about three days.

Q. How many days? How many days was given to Chamberlain?

A. No; I don't even know—no days at all, surely not. The Fuehrer would never say to Chamberlain—Good Heavens no—say to Great Britain, three days.

Q. You may not remember details, but certainly you remember the general atmosphere of that meeting. If you don't remember it now, I wish you would think it over because every report I get on that is that both you and Hitler and, the whole conference on the part of the Germans, showed a very stern and uncompromising attitude, and you presented the demands and gave a very short period of time for Great Britain to accept them. In fact, so short, that it was impossible for Chamberlain to go back to his cabinet and get the approval of the cabinet. It was that one minor point that caused the whole thing to fall.

INTERROGATIONS

A. That can't be, because it was about Sudetenland.

Q. Yes.

A. But afterwards, after Berchtesgaden was the conference of Godesberg; after the Godesberg conference was the conference at Munich.* You see there were three conferences. There cannot be the question of days, because Chamberlain then came to Godesberg. They had another conference with the Fuehrer, about which I told you before, and then afterwards at Munich.

Q. That is right.

A. One thing I can tell you certainly. I'm sorry I have no recollection of what the Fuehrer told me as to what he discussed with Chamberlain, I don't remember that, because the Fuehrer generally when he did that had a talk like that, he only informed me very shortly in a very few words. He said a few things about it. He never was very lengthy in his explanation of his talks with statesmen. Sometimes only weeks or months afterwards I really knew and heard what had been going on. So I don't remember at the moment, and I have already thought it over for a few months, I don't recollect what the Fuehrer told me about this conversation with Chamberlain. The general outline I remember, that I had the feeling that the Fuehrer was right. I didn't have the feeling that Chamberlain was discontent. That I should have said to Sir Horace Wilson, that this or this should be done, while the Fuehrer was discussing with Chamberlain—I didn't know what the Fuehrer would say to Chamberlain—that is to my mind quite out of the question. I would never commit myself or do anything without knowing what the Fuehrer had said to Chamberlain. May I point out to you again, once he discussed with me before what he was going to tell the statesmen; very, very seldom, very, very seldom, perhaps once. Then he said a few words, "I am going to say this or that." But at most of these conferences the Fuehrer went into the conference—it shows you how much he had all these matters in his head and in his hands, that he did not inform me before and only in short afterwards what had been discussed.

*September 29, 1938.

*Excerpts from Testimony of Joachim von Ribbentrop,
taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 17 October 1945, 1430-
1540, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present:
Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.*

The Meaning of "Weltauffassung"

Q. [In English] Do you have a definition for Weltauffassung?
A. Weltauffassung?

Q. Yes. When you say "World perception" do you mean that?

A. That is very difficult really. I always translated it as world perception, but I don't know whether that is the right translation.

Q. I have heard the term used so many times, and I cannot find anybody yet, who can tell me what it is. As a matter of fact, I have had some people tell me that that is the reason for the present disaster that has come upon Germany. Still nobody can tell me what it is.

A. Well, to be quite frank, I think that it is to a certain extent right. I couldn't tell you myself. I mean really, definitely, I have so often thought about this during these last months, how this really all came about. I don't know, I think if you ask a dozen party people to give you a definition of the word Weltauffassung, you probably would get different opinions. I mean you would get from everyone a different one. Of course, some fundamental things are quite clear: It is a question to have the National tendencies and; secondly, to have Socialistic tendencies. I mean these are the good parts of the Weltauffassung, national states.

Q. How could it be a good part of something, when you don't know what that something is?

A. What it means as a whole. I mean if you ask me for a real definition, I would not be able to give it to you.

Q. I was told that the German women don't use rouge on their lips because of Weltauffassung.

A. That is not right.

Q. Everything seems to be done in the name of that.

A. That is not quite right, because I have seen women in the Fuehrer's presence, who had rouge on, and the Fuehrer didn't mind it at all. That is not true. That is absolutely not true, but there were radical fools who went in that direction.

Q. Do you think that he knew what it was?

A. Personally, to be quite frank, I cannot give you a definite real definition of that word.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Do you think of anybody who could give us a definition on it? How about Rosenberg?

A. I should ask Rosenberg, because he was always considered the Dogmatica of the Party. He may know about it, but I heard the Fuehrer say, about Rosenberg's book, that he didn't understand it.

Q. Everything was done in the name of that particular thing and yet nobody seems to know what it means.

A. I am not surprised. I told you that before.

Q. You say "world perception" and by that you mean the same as Weltanschauung; is that correct?

A. It is the translation which I always used. I don't know whether that is right or not.

Q. What is in your mind when you say world perception?

A. What is in my mind you mean?

Q. Yes; in other words, what do you mean by world perception?

A. What the Fuehrer and the party meant, and were aiming at, I could not tell you. I couldn't give you an answer, I don't know. But what sectors it comprised, of course, there is the racial question, the religious question, socialism, nationalism, and so on. I mean those are vague sectors, which are comprised, were meant by this word, but a definition, what is really meant as to these various sectors, I could not tell you. I don't know. I never have known and I never could find out.

IV. WILHELM KEITEL

Testimony of Wilhelm Keitel, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 28 September 1945, 1530-1700, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair A. Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

The Truth about Rommel's "Suicide"

Q. Do you appreciate the fact that you are still under oath?

A. Yes, I am conscious of the fact.

Q. Are you going to tell the truth?

A. Yes; that is self-understood.

Q. You are not going to commit perjury today?

A. Only if I don't know something, I must be able to say so.

Q. How is your recollection today? Better or worse than it was yesterday?

A. Through those many years my memory is not such as I hoped it to be. Unfortunately, I did not keep any diary and thus I have only a few recollections.

Q. Does it go back as far as October of '44?

A. I hope so.

Q. So do I. Do you know General Burgdorf?

A. Yes.

Q. What is his first name?

A. I don't know his first name. The only thing I know is that he was a successor of General Schmundt.

Q. That is right. What was his official position?

A. Chief of the Army Personnel Office.

Q. For how long a time did he hold that position?

A. Ever since the death of General Schmundt; that is, since August, 1944.

Q. Did you have many dealings with him?

A. I really had few dealings with him, but he was constantly in the headquarters and he also took over the functions of the Chief Adjutant to the Fuehrer. I saw him almost every day.

Q. At the headquarters?

A. Yes; in the headquarters.

Q. That included October '44, did it not?

A. Yes, certainly. He was in the headquarters with few interruptions since August 1944. He was in the habit of leaving for a few days, every once in a while, to go to the Main Personnel Office of the Army, which was not at the headquarters.

Q. Then he would come back again; is that right?

A. Yes; he returned then.

Q. Did you also know General Maisel?

A. Yes. General Maisel was one of the assistants in the Personnel Office of the Army. He had either a department, or a group of offices there.

Q. What was his official position?

A. I believe he was deputy to General Burgdorf.

Q. During what period of time?

A. I believe from the moment when Burgdorf became the Chief of the Personnel Office of the Army, Maisel as the senior officer present, became his deputy.

Q. Did you have occasion to see him around headquarters, frequently?

A. No, I only saw him very rarely in the headquarters because he worked constantly as a Director in the Personnel Office of the Army. As far as I know, he only was very rarely at headquarters.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. When did you last see General Burgdorf?

A. In Berlin, in the Reichschancellory.

Q. When?

A. That must have been either on the 22d or the 23d of April. I don't know exactly which day, but it must have been either the 22d or the 23d of April.

Q. '45?

A. Yes; 1945. That is April of this year.

Q. What has happened to him, if you know?

A. That I do not know. I never heard from him again. I don't know whether he is a prisoner of war or even if he is alive.

Q. When did you last see General Maisel?

A. It must have been either at the end of August or in September 1944. I know that for certain, I saw him there.

Q. You saw him after that too?

A. I cannot remember that. I only saw him at conferences, when I asked him to report to me in Berlin. I don't believe that I ever saw him again after September.

Q. I say you did, in case it is of any interest to you.

A. I cannot recollect that at the present time.

Q. Are you acquainted with a Captain Alldinger?

A. Possibly you could tell me with which department he was. Was he with the Personnel Office, or some adjutant, or what?

Q. Possibly I could and possibly I couldn't. In any event, I am asking you whether you knew him or not?

A. The name is not unknown to me. However, I cannot remember either his face or his functions. There was also a General Alldinger who was a general from Wurttemberg and I know him well.

Q. You know what I am leading up to, don't you?

A. No; that I don't know.

Q. You have no idea at all?

A. I don't know, for I had nothing to do with the Personnel Office of the Army. I only saw Burgdorf every day. Alldinger, I don't know. The name is not strange to me, but I don't know just what functions he had.

Q. Don't you remember a little job that was pulled off by those two generals in October of 1944? Forget about Alldinger.

A. Burgdorf and Alldinger, yes. The two generals: Burgdorf and Maisel?

Q. That is right. I say, don't you remember a little job they pulled off in October of '44?

A. I?

Q. Yes, you; a little order that you gave them by direction of the Fuehrer.

A. It may have happened, frequently, that I had told him to do something at the direction of the Fuehrer. That is General Burgdorff.

Q. But this was kind of a big deal.

A. I used to give directions to fifty or sixty or seventy different places and to officers during day and night, and I cannot remember what kind of directions I gave to Burgdorff, as the Chief of the Personnel Office.

Q. Maybe I can help you remember.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember a general named Rommel?

A. Yes, Field Marshal Rommel.

Q. You do remember him?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember what happened to him?

A. He committed suicide, General Rommel did.

Q. That is right. How do you know?

A. That is what General Burgdorff told me, because General Burgdorff was with him.

Q. That's right. So was General Maisel, wasn't he?

A. That is not known to me. Burgdorff I know, because I sent him there.

Q. That is what I thought.

A. Whether Maisel was sent along, I don't know. I didn't send him.

Q. So, if Maisel went along, he might have gone along to help Burgdorff; is that right?

A. That can be answered only by Burgdorff. I don't know whether he took anybody along.

Q. Burgdorff has already answered that.

A. You mean when he took Maisel along?

Q. Yes; the whole story. What did you say to Burgdorff before he went over there?

A. I gave him a note, personally, to take to Marshal Rommel to say that he would be tried under martial law and that he would have a trial for treason.

Q. What else?

A. I gave him this news and I said to him to draw the consequences for himself, or otherwise in the shortest time possible, he would be put before a court. There was testimony from witnesses from two different places, which said that Marshal Rommel had declared himself ready to take part in a putsch, possibly against Hitler.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Did the Fuehrer tell you about that?

A. I knew it and the Fuehrer knew it because the papers about that came from the People's Court (Volksgerichtshof).

Q. Did you report it to the Fuehrer, or did the Fuehrer report it to you first?

A. That I don't know any more. All I know is that I learned about it and it is very possible that I learned it from the Fuehrer.

Q. Tell me exactly what you learned about it.

A. I know that it was concerned with a Lieutenant Colonel, whose name I have forgotten. He was an Intelligence officer in Paris for—

Q. Let's not forget his name. Let's try and remember it.

A. I never met the person, and I don't know his name, but at any rate I know that this Lieutenant Colonel does not live any more. He was condemned by the same court. I also know, though, that he was the liaison officer between the Paris office and the Berlin office. He belonged to the staff of the Military Commander in Paris. All I know is that he was a Lieutenant Colonel and his name started with "von." Maybe if I think about it long enough, and concentrate, I can remember his name.

Q. Will you try to do that?

A. I will endeavor to remember his name. I will try to find out. Unfortunately, I never knew him and never met him, but I believe that originally he was part of the air forces.

Q. Who was the Military Commander in Paris at that time?

A. At that time it was General von Stuelpnagel.

Q. This Lieutenant Colonel was on his staff?

A. Yes; he belonged to his staff and, as far as I know, he was a liaison man between Stuelpnagel in Paris and the, well, what should I call it, the putsch committee in Berlin. That was Heinrich von Stuelpnagel. I remember his first name.

Q. What did he report?

A. He testified that he had contacted Rommel and that he had informed him of the plans and that Rommel, after some thought, had said that they could count on him.

Q. What plans?

A. The plan for the elimination of Hitler and a putsch against the government.

Q. When you say he testified, what do you mean by that?

A. I mean that he said that he accomplished this task by the kind of an answer he received.

Q. I don't understand that.

A. This Lieutenant Colonel, when he was interrogated at the court (Volksgerichtshof)—

Q. What court?

A. The People's Court, said that in accordance with his task, he had accomplished the trip to Rommel, and then he testified to what kind of a result the conference with Rommel led.

Q. Which was what?

A. Rommel had him tell all about the plans and then he said that he could be counted in.

Q. Yes. What kind of a hearing was this at the People's Court?

A. That was an investigation against all those who were either suspects or accused of having participated in the planned putsch.

Q. Was it a trial or an investigation or a hearing, or what kind of a proceeding?

A. I do not know. These accused officers were transferred to the Volksgerichtshof, by the order of Hitler, for the purpose of being judged. Then what happened at the Volksgerichtshof, I don't know. As far as I know, the suspects were first arrested, and then an investigation against them was initiated. I believe I can say that most of them admitted that they were in some way involved in the preparations, and then they were transferred to the Volksgerichtshof.

Q. Who were these other officers?

A. Unfortunately, there was a great number of men. Possibly, I can find them, as I tried once to make a list of all their names.

Q. All right. You try to do that, will you?

A. According to the notes which I made from memory, about thirty officers were condemned to death. I believe it was about eight who committed suicide, and four of them were shot on the day of the putsch, right at the place where it took place.

Q. Was Rommel condemned to death?

A. No. He did not come under any court procedure whatever. At the instigation of the Fuehrer, I sent Burgdorf there with a copy of the testimony, and the order to Rommel that this was testimony against him. If it was true, he was to take the consequences. If it was not true, he would be exonerated by court procedure anyway.

Q. You didn't really believe that, did you, at the time?

A. Yes; I believed it at the time, because there was some connexion there to Field Marshal Kluge and also to Field Marshal Rommel; also there was a connection between Stuelpnagel and Rommel to this liaison officer, which was later on confirmed by Rommel's Chief of Staff.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Who was that?

A. I didn't know him, but I am trying to think of his name all the time. It is difficult to find the name. He was also involved in a court procedure; however, he was exonerated because he himself had nothing to do with these matters.

Q. Who else testified about Rommel besides this Lieutenant Colonel?

A. I believe there was testimony given from two places: One was by this Lieutenant Colonel, and this was the one which involved him, and that is the one that was shown to him.

Q. Who was the other one?

A. I don't know any more who that was because I didn't know all those persons. As far as I know, I only had Marshal Rommel informed of this one testimony and I had him informed that if this was true, he had to count upon being condemned by a court, possibly, the Volksgerichtshof.

Q. You received your orders from the Fuehrer?

A. Yes. I informed Rommel of the fact, and also the testimony which I had, and I believe I sent a note with Burgdorf that said if this was not true, of course, it would be all right. However, if it was true, that he, as an officer should know what consequences to take.

Q. No; I say, did you receive your instructions from the Fuehrer with respect to communicating with Rommel?

A. Yes. The Fuehrer ordered me to send somebody to Marshal Rommel and show it to him and ask him whether it was true or not, because the Fuehrer thought very much of Marshal Rommel.

Q. What else did the Fuehrer say to you?

A. He only told me to let Rommel know about this, and then I thought about it, and then I thought that Burgdorf, as the Chief of the Personnel Office of the Army, would be the best man for that.

Q. Did the Fuehrer tell you what to say to Rommel?

A. I don't know whether I remember every single word of it, but so far as I know, the Fuehrer said to me "There are only two possibilities here: One is that you have to inform him; and the other is that you have to arrest him, immediately, and initiate court-martial procedures." I think it is quite possible, that I told the Fuehrer that it would be better to simply inform Marshal Rommel of this, as to give him a chance to state his position. I felt at that time that it would be a terrible scandal in Germany, if this well-known, and well-recognized Field Marshal, would be arrested and would be put in front of the People's Court. That was my personal opinion, that no matter how the procedure would end, it would be always against him, that he had been arraigned before the People's Court. I was also of the personal opinion, if this fact of the visit, which moreover had been confirmed by all members of his staff, was not true, that he would have taken into account all possibilities.

The only time that I did not tell the truth in this matter, is when I answered to the question of what happened to Rommel. I answered that he had a stroke. He suffered from a very badly fractured skull, which happened a few weeks before, and thus it was a very credible story.

Q. You know what actually happened to him, don't you?

A. I know that he committed suicide. When he got to know about these things, he was told to think about them and he took his own life.

Q. And you instructed Burgdorf to take the poison down with him, when he went to talk with him, didn't you?

A. Yes. I told Burgdorf to take poison along so that he could put it at his disposal, if conditions warranted it. I would have put the pistol on the table for every officer, who was accused of such an important thing as high treason. It was entirely up to him whether he would use it or not.

Q. What did Burgdorf report to you about it?

A. As far as I know, Burgdorf reported to me by telephone that Field Marshal Rommel was no longer alive, and, as far as I know, he reported to the Fuehrer also. He reported to the Fuehrer himself that he had talked to Rommel very quietly about these things, and that he had let him read the testimony—I believe that he took the original along with him—and that he gave him time to think about all these matters. Then, as far as I remember, he asked permission whether he could drive away, either in his own car or in the car of General Burgdorf.

Q. Did General Burgdorf report that he had gone off in the car with him and General Maisel?

A. He said that they had all driven away from the house after Rommel had parted with his wife, and then the car had been in front of him and suddenly the car stopped, and then it was found out that Rommel was no longer alive. He was to go to the doctor in Ulm anyway, who was to make out an affidavit about the state of his health. I believe that this came about, because before that, the Fuehrer had brought up the question whether it was possible or not to use Marshal Rommel again. At that time I had written a handwritten letter to him and asked him when he could be used again, and at that time nothing was known about all these things. He wrote then that he still suffered from very strong headaches, and that the fracture of his skull had not healed, and that he was not in a position at that time to accept employment. As far as I know, he lived in a house in the country near Ulm.

INTERROGATIONS

I also told General Burgdorf to try and spare his wife the terrible news that he had committed treason, that he had become a traitor. I don't know whether this actually happened, but I believe that General Burgdorf returned and talked to Mrs. Rommel himself. I want to emphasize the point, that this is the first time that I am clearing up the facts, such as they happened, without any ambiguity, because the whole matter concerned a Marshal, who was well proven, and also close to the Fuehrer.

Q. Did you also tell General Burgdorf to tell Rommel, that if he would commit suicide, that he would be given a fine funeral and monuments built in his memory, so that it would not appear that he had been guilty of any wrong-doing?

A. I did not say anything about that in the note. However, this happened; he received a state funeral in Ulm and he was buried with full honors. That was an express order by the Fuehrer and I told General Burgdorf at once that this was to be prepared. As far as I know I did not give any directions to General Burgdorf about this.

I merely limited myself to tell him if it was not true, the Field Marshal could well face any court proceedings. If it was true, as an officer, he would know what the consequences were. Anyway, in this testimony of the Lieutenant Colonel which was shown to Rommel, it contained exactly just what this Lieutenant Colonel proposed to him and what his answers had been.

Q. What you really told Burgdorf to tell Rommel was that either he would stand trial, or he would take the poison; isn't that right?

A. No; that was not the case. That if it was not true, what I told him was, he could easily face any investigation and could easily be confronted with the witnesses. If it was true, this was a question, which every officer would know how to answer for himself.

Q. That amounted to the same thing, didn't it?

A. Well, in substance this is the same thing, that is, to a certain degree. I had to decide how to present a highly-placed officer with such news, and since he was not convicted yet, it had to be done in a decent manner.

Q. It was a little more diplomatic way of putting it; is that right?

A. Well, that is the manner in which this is done among officers.

Q. Also you directed General Burgdorf to take the poison along with him; right?

A. I told General Burgdorf to take along both poison and the pistol, which he always wore. Then he went to tell Rommel that he was going to leave him alone for ten or fifteen minutes, and then he would hear what he had to tell him. I don't know whether Burgdorf gave this to him, upon his own initiative, or whether General Rommel had asked for it. Burgdorf did not tell me these details. When he returned he said that when Rommel looked at the statements, he was very startled and then later he saw the name of it and then the whole thing was clear. If I may add, I want to say something, especially since there are more people around here, that Marshal Rommel was one of the most courageous officers I have known. He had the order Pour le Merit, that he got as a young officer, in the first World War.

Q. You didn't really think that he had anything to do with the putsch, did you?

A. Unfortunately, it was not ambiguous from what we saw. His position was not ambiguous and this is the only thing that could be deduced. He told the involved, that he could tell the gentlemen in Berlin, and give them the information that when things were ready, he would be glad to be of use. So far as I know, he used the words "You can count on me." I can well imagine that the putsch people in Berlin wanted the support of a man, who had a high standing among the German people, because of his military ability.

I only want to tell the Colonel this again, that so far I have treated this as an entirely internal question, like between brothers, and whenever I was asked whether he had committed suicide, I said "No." In this way, his great reputation and his honor as a soldier was not prejudiced, and in this way he has been respected by the German people, as a soldier. Otherwise, he would have been treated like a criminal. He had a skull fracture in two places, and it was so complicated that bleeding could very well have started again, and, so far as I know, the doctor in Ulm confirmed this, that he died by a stroke.

INTERROGATIONS

I wish to add here that, for instance, Marshal Rundstedt who, at the order of the Fuehrer, directed the act of state, that is, the celebration and made the speech, does not know that Rommel died this way.

Q. But you have told so many false stories about it in the past. Why did you do that?

A. No, I did not. The only thing that I always answered was that Rommel died from bleeding in the brain.

Q. But you knew that wasn't true?

A. Yes; I knew that, but I meant to render him that service of comradeship which, as an officer, I had to render him.

Q. Then you must have not believed in the fact that he had been guilty of wrong-doing; correct?

A. Well, I believed that fact, but just because somebody had confessed to a crime, and then taken the consequences himself, it was not necessary to tell the whole world that he had committed suicide. It was only a natural consequence that he should have died from injuries to the brain after this complicated fracture.

I also told Jodl, whom I saw every day, and Reichsmarshal Goering, and Grand Admiral Doenitz the same thing, namely, that Rommel had finally fallen victim to this complicated skull fracture; and that I supposed that, when he was riding in his car, a sudden concussion had resulted in a stroke. This was a very plausible consequence of this complicated fracture he was suffering from.

Q. If you had really believed that Rommel was guilty of treason, you wouldn't have been so interested in protecting his memory and erecting monuments and so on, would you?

A. Because his name had become known to the whole German people, right down to the last little boy. His name was probably that of the most popular and able general that we had. Why create this disappointment for him, for the family and for the whole German people, when it was not necessary? I couldn't decide the whole, the same as I couldn't decide the act of state. Hitler decided this because he personally was close to Rommel, and thus I kept the secret of my real knowledge of those things, but if you interrogate me under oath here, I have to tell you the truth.

Q. You are doing better today than you did yesterday. I will say that for you. Did Bergdorf report to you what actually happened in the automobile?

A. No. I don't know whether he himself was in the car. He only said that the car made a short trip and then it was reported to him that Rommel was dead, or that he was no longer alive. As far as I know, the death was ascertained in Ulm.

Q. He was dead when they got to him, wasn't he?

A. Certainly he must have been dead.

Q. From where did the poison come?

A. I cannot say any more. The doctor said he was dead when they got there.

Q. I say, where did the poison come from that Burgdorf took to him?

A. That I don't know any more. So far as I know, he got it from some doctor. I didn't give it to him.

Q. Is General Speidel supposed to have given testimony against Rommel with respect to wrong-doing?

A. He was Chief of Staff to Rommel. He was not there. However, he confirmed that this man had been with Rommel once or twice. The Chief was not present at that talk with the officer from Paris. Hitler frequently gave expression to the suspicion that Speidel knew something about these things.

Q. Did you instruct Burgdorf to confront Rommel with any statements or testimony from Speidel?

A. No, certainly not from Speidel.

Q. Just the testimony of the Lieutenant Colonel; is that correct?

A. As far as I know, the testimony of this Lieutenant Colonel was written out on paper, and then there was also a note added that somebody else had made the following statements, explaining it; however, this was not Speidel.

Q. Did you direct Burgdorf to guard the house during this interview so that no escape might be made by Rommel?

A. No. That was not necessary, because this was a visit, which was announced to him, and it was said that it was necessary for him to have an affidavit from a doctor in Ulm. If that happened, that is entirely new to me.

Q. He had previously been told to come to Berlin for a conference with you, had he not?

A. Yes, I wrote that. I wrote him whether it would be possible to take some opportunity and meet me in Berlin, because I wanted to talk to him. He answered me, that this was not possible because of the state of his health. I wanted to talk to him because of possible further employment of him.

Q. There were various telephone conversations between him and you, or Burgdorf, in Berlin with regard to that subject; is that correct?

INTERROGATIONS

A. I had no telephone conversations with Rommel.

Q. Didn't Burgdorf have some at your direction?

A. No. I only told Burgdorf that he had to announce his visit. It was necessary for him to announce the fact that he was coming there.

Q. Generals Burgdorf and Maisel had an SS man along as driver of the car; right?

A. That is not known to me. I gave no order to involve anybody from the SS in these things.

Q. It appears that several automobiles, filled with SS men, were stationed near the house and on the exit roads of the village. How did that happen?

A. That is entirely unknown to me. That may be something that Burgdorf thought well or necessary to do, but it is unknown to me. I know nothing of it. I gave no directions whatever, that SS men were to be involved in this. The only interest I had in it was that this was done in such a way, that it drew the least possible attention.

Q. So that if the SS was in on this transaction, it was at the request of Burgdorf, is that right?

A. I must suppose that, because it couldn't have happened just like that. Burgdorf must have brought that about in some manner. If I had known about that beforehand, I would have forbidden it.

Q. Why?

A. There was no reason for that. The SS was not at all concerned with it.

Q. Can we agree that the date of this occurrence was on October 15, 1944?

A. I am sorry, Colonel, but I cannot remember the date as such. I remember the whole process and the facts, but I don't know just on what date it happened.

Q. If I told you the name of the Lieutenant Colonel, do you think that you would be able to remember it?

A. Yes; I think it quite possible.

Q. Von Hofacker?

A. Yes.

Q. Lieutenant Colonel von Hofacker.

A. It is strange, but I cannot find him among my notes.

Q. But in any event, you now recall that it was Lieutenant Colonel von Hofacker?

A. I am certain that this is the right name, von Hofacker. I never have seen him myself and, therefore, have no picture of him in my imagination.

Q. I think you stated that he was dead. How do you know that?

A. I must suppose that, because he had been the liaison man for months between Paris and Berlin. He was responsible for, in fact, an exchange of intelligence and opinions and, therefore, he must have been accused of high treason. I had no confirmation that he was condemned or executed, but I must suppose for certain that the Volksgerichtshof passed judgment on him.

Q. Looking back on this matter today, you don't really think that Rommel was guilty of treason; do you?

A. I must suppose so, because when he was confronted with the statement, and when he was told that he had said "You can count on me," I cannot imagine, from my personal knowledge of Rommel, that he would have done anything if it wasn't true. He took the consequences and that proves it.

Q. He wouldn't have had much chance if he had stood trial at that time, would he? He wouldn't have had much chance of an acquittal if he had stood trial at that time?

A. Well, that was his free decision. If he had thought that that was perjured testimony, he could have told me through Burgdorf that all this was nonsense, and that he intended to thrash it out, and he could have come up to see the Fuehrer and talk to him about it.

Q. So you infer from the fact that he didn't do that, that he was guilty; is that right?

A. Yes. Especially also from the fact that he committed suicide. Otherwise, he would never have done that, as an officer. That is, he admitted his guilt. I only can say that because that is my judgment of him.

Q. As a matter of fact, at the time when you directed the testimony to be shown to Rommel, von Hofacker had already been hanged; isn't that right?

A. That is not known to me. The judgments of the Volksgerichtshof and their executions are not known to me. So far as I have learned about them, I have noted them down.

Q. If he had already been hanged, it would have been pretty difficult for Rommel to refute the story of a dead man, wouldn't it?

A. But I didn't know myself that Hofacker was no longer alive at this time. I didn't know that.

Q. You could have found it out by merely making inquiries in the proper places, couldn't you?

A. I was not ordered to do that. The only thing I was ordered to do is to inform him of these facts and to leave him entirely free in his decision as to the consequences. I have found the numbers about the executions and suicides which resulted from this affair. There were thirty people executed in the court of the late summer and the early fall, that is, they were condemned to death. Eight of them committed suicide and four of them were shot on the spot on the evening of the 20th of July 1944, right in Berlin. There may be a difference of one or two persons here or there.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Were any of them of any importance other than Rommel? I mean, were they high Army officers?

A. There was Field Marshal von Witzleben, who had already declared his intention to obey the Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces by his signature. Colonel General Hoepner, who had taken over as the Supreme Commander of the Home Army. Those were shot in the night from the 20th of July to the 21st. There was General Olbricht, Colonel Merz von Quirnheim, Colonel Stauffenberg, and Major Haeften, and the former Chief of the General Staff, General Beck, committed suicide. That was on the afternoon when I called up General Fromm and told him that the attempt had not been successful and that both the Fuehrer and I were alive. Then General Beck shot himself.

Q. Was it reported to you as to whether or not Rommel admitted his guilt after reading these papers?

A. According to my knowledge, the first thing that he said to Burgdorf was the question, "Does the Fuehrer know about this?" and then he asked for some time to think. He did not say that this was true. He merely asked if the Fuehrer knew about it, and he requested a time of ten or fifteen minutes to think. I believe that is what Burgdorf brought back to me, because I asked him what kind of an impression it made on Rommel, and Burgdorf made the remark that he had not had any doubt about it at any time, and that he was under the impression that that was so from the way Rommel had acted, and he had taken the consequences. The words which are still deep within me are his words "You can count on me in Berlin."

Q. That was supposedly said to whom?

A. That was contained in the protocol of von Hofacker. It was the answer that he received when he prepared to leave.

Q. But to whom was it supposedly said?

A. He said that to von Hofacker. Von Hofacker had the task to familiarize him with the entire plans and there was a long exchange of views, and following that, a discussion on these plans; and when he prepared to leave, Hofacker said that Rommel said "Tell the people in Berlin, that they can count on me."

Q. For how long a time had it been known to the Fuehrer, or to yourself, that Rommel was not acting, we will say, with 100 percent loyalty?

A. It was not known to me before that Rommel would be untrue in any respect. I did not believe that.

Q. Was it previously known to the Fuehrer?

A. That I don't know. He never mentioned it to me. I must say, however, that he was a little worried at that time because the entire leadership in which, however, Rommel did not have any direct part, was not quite understandable; at least, looking back I cannot say anything else.

Q. Was Rommel's view of existing conditions pessimistic?

A. Yes. When he was there the last time before his accident, he reported to me on the situation, and to me he was pessimistic; however, not to the Fuehrer. He was not pessimistic in the way that he was hopeless about the situation, but he said to me, "You must talk to the Fuehrer and must see that I get complete liberty of action." From that I deduced that he must be pessimistic in some way or another. He and General Rundstedt were at the Berghof together to make a report, and it was in the middle of the big battle after the invasion, I believe, maybe in the third week, if I remember correctly, that was the end of June. I know that the report which he personally made to the Fuehrer did not contain any pessimistic views.

Excerpts from Testimony of Wilhelm Keitel, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 October 1945, 1040-1305, by Mr. Thomas J. Dodd, OUSCC. Also present: 1st Lt. Joachim Stenzel, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Reporter.

Hitlers Reaction to Hess's Flight to England

Q. Do you know that Hess appears to have lost his memory? I wondered if you had ever observed any signs in him before he left to go to England?

A. Well, the last period, and the flight to England, I know only from the description given by Hitler. I remember distinctly at the Berghof, we were at Berchtesgaden, Hitler was walking back and forth with me in his big study, and we talked, and he was touching his forehead and he said "Hess must have had a mental derangement. He must have had some sort of mental disturbance, and that I can see also in the letter that he wrote to me." Hitler also said, "Well, the letter that he has written, in it I can't recognize Hess. It is a different person. Something must have happened to him." You see, it was a letter that Hess had dispatched by means of a courier, but it was delivered only after Hess had arrived in England. Hess, who had a very fine sensibility, said that "a war with England is bound to be disastrous, and I believe certain knowledge I have of the English way of thinking"—after all, he was born in Cairo—"and therefore, I think that possibly something could be done." But naturally, from the attitude of Hitler, I merely can say that Hitler thought that that to him seemed insane. I remember in the morning after this news reached us, he ordered all the Gauleiters and Goering to meet for the purpose of communication to them and discussing with them the repercussions of this fact.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Was it published? Was the fact that he had gone made known publicly in the press?

A. Well, I was just going to come to that. I remember that after I had talked with him, he said, "Well, I have to talk to Goering right away." Goering was at his house in Berchtesgaden, and also the chief of the press, and I think also the Foreign Minister; and he said, "Well, we have to talk it over with these people and figure out how we are going to publish this, how we are going to present this." And naturally, during the first days of it, there had been received no confirmation of the fact that he had landed in England, that is, he might have dropped into the sea. Naturally, in the beginning, the question was, first, "We don't even know that he arrived." In the letter he says "I am going to England. I am going to try to use my relationship to British leaders to bring about some sort of an agreement." That is just about what it must have said in the letter. But Hitler said, "Did he ever get there? Did he have enough gasoline to make the trip, to bridge the gap between the continent and England? Goering, how is this business? Can he do it with this type of plane?" And all these considerations must have been dominant during the first and second day. They rendered the presentation of the matter to the press very difficult; and the admirable thing about it was that Hess was entirely alone in that plane, and that obviously he must have placed a considerable number of reserve cans in that plane in order to refuel. Otherwise, it wouldn't have been possible; and that he must have had means of orienting himself, that is by maps or a compass in order to maintain his course.

Q. From where did he take off?

A. From Augsburg, from the airdrome of the Messerschmidt works he took off, and he flew across the channel to England, and flew all the way into Scotland.

Q. How was he ever able to make those arrangements without something being known about it, and some discovery being made that he was preparing to leave?

A. Well, I remember that was the question that occupied Hitler immediately, too, and I remember, I was pretty sure that right away Hitler ordered that Professor Messerschmitt was to be locked up. On the other hand, Hess had free access to all plane factories, and experimental airdromes and training airdromes; and he was an old flyer himself, and I know that he was absolutely free to come and go as he pleased. It could not be proved of Messerschmitt that he had even the slightest inkling or knowledge of the plans. That was definitely established, and his wife, that is Mrs. Hess, didn't know either. He was a great champion —Hitler told me that, too—of the idea that one should mine ports by means of planes. I remember that he always insisted that at the beginning of the war, all the ports of England should be mined by planes, dropping mines into the ports. I remember Hitler used to say, "Well, Hess says it should be done with planes, and I always am in favor of dilettantes, for the specialists always come and say, 'It can't be done!' They always have reservations, while I am in favor of dilettantes, and Hess has ideas." And I remember Hitler's always telling himself that he had conversed with Hess on that, and that they had both agreed that planes were supposed to be used for mines.

Hitler's Return to Berlin in April 1945

Q. I wanted to ask you about the last days in Berlin when you last saw Hitler, and what the situation was there in Berlin?

A. Well, I would like to begin perhaps with the 20th of April, which was the birthday of Adolf Hitler. At that time he was quiet, and gave the impression of being rested, clear, not nervous, and rather balanced.

Q. Had he been nervous, disturbed, and restless prior to that time?

A. Well, it wasn't so much that, but during the last period in Rastenburg, he wasn't well at all. He had some stomach and intestinal trouble, and was under medical attention all the time. Then, furthermore, through the bursting of the eardrums, he had some sort of suppuration, and also some trouble with his vocal chords. His voice used to be quite loud, energetic, and passionate and at that time it was rather weakened and faint. And at times he used to spend two or three days in bed, but all the same, every day he did receive the situation reports, and for that he would always rise. He was rather fussy. That is, he didn't want to have anybody in his room when he wasn't completely dressed. Then he usually called me in first and said, "Well, be sure that the gentlemen won't keep me for more than half an hour, because it is too much of a strain on my voice." I think that I can actually consider myself responsible for having gotten him out of Rastenburg.* That was about the beginning of December. I always believed that that actually would be done by the doctors, Professor Morell and the others, but they didn't have any influence with him. I got him to realize that in this bunker, in this cellar, he couldn't possibly have this operation. After all, it was not a very big operation, but it was supposed to be performed by this Professor—I can't remember the name now, but I remember him very well. He operated on me too. I said to Hitler, "This Professor has a terrifically large clientele, and he would have to travel all night to get here, and then operate on you in the morning, and lose a lot of time." He looked at me and said, "You are right, I will go." Because until then he insisted that he would always stay in East Prussia, and then always said, "I am staying in Rastenburg, because if I leave East Prussia, then East Prussia will fall. As long as I am here, then it will be held." On the other hand, he also said, "Well, really, I must speak one of these days. I must address the German people, and I must find an occasion for that. Let's say, Christmas or so, and in order to do that I must restore my voice. I must get it straightened out." So we did travel to Berlin and there we prepared the Rundstedt offensive, which was then in the drafting stage. Then that little operation was performed, and during the days right after the operation he wrote everything down. That is, he would write little notes, for the most part, to Jodl or to myself, and we would answer him; and within a period of about a week or eight days, his voice was absolutely restored. And his stomach and intestinal troubles at that time had also disappeared. Then the situation report discussion took place in the normal quite large circle, and then towards evening, when all the other gentlemen had gone, he was talking with Goering and myself, and he said, "Well, the Reichsmarshal just suggested that he go to Berchtesgaden, and I don't have any objection to that." But I merely observed that naturally with the Reichsmarshal, it had to be discussed in great detail where the car could still pass in order to get through to Berchtesgaden. Then the Reichsmarshal continued to stay with him, and I left. It was normally about seven o'clock, and that was really the last moment we had to get under shelter, because that was the time the big attacks began, the big bombing raids.

INTERROGATIONS

*Hitler's military headquarters in East Prussia.

Hitler's Last Days in Berlin

The next day of this observation was the 22d of April. That day he was very restless. That was quite in contrast to his normal way, when he was very determined and gay, and gave very orderly instructions. He summoned one of the adjutants, and he told him that Minister Goebbels should come right away; and a little later, maybe a half hour later, another order that Mrs. Goebbels and the children should come too; and when it was reported that Minister Goebbels was there, he went out, he left the gathering, and after ten minutes he came back again, and the situation report discussion continued in the normal course after that. Goering had already gone to Berchtesgaden, and Doenitz was not present that day. And when the situation report was finished, he called me back and also Bormann. He simply said, "I will never leave Berlin, never." Well everything had already been prepared in Berchtesgaden, and a considerable number of the Staff personnel had already been sent there. After, I must say, very, very hard difficulties or fights, he finally had consented—it must have been about the middle of April—to the forming of two separate staffs, one for the North and one for the South, for the eventuality or possibility that Berlin might become separated from the southern part of the Reich; and he had appointed Doenitz for the northern area for the coastal area; he was supposed to have a very small section of the Leadership Staff, and of the General Staff, and liaison officers of the Air Staff; and he was supposed to be in charge of the northern section. At that time, there were still German groups in the corner of East Prussia, in the area around Danzig, in the entire area northwest of Stettin; and then naturally, there was still the area around Hanover and Hamburg, which was sort of closed in, and naturally for all this, there was the sea lanes connection, that was the possibility of evacuation by sea from the northern part of Latvia and East Prussia, and even perhaps withdrawal of troops from Stettin to Schleswig-Holstein; and for this entire task, Doenitz was designated with a small staff, fitted for these functions. On the 20th of April, Doenitz was given this command. I remember standing with him on a little hill, overlooking his home at Dahlem, and from there we observed the great aerial attack on Berlin that was taking place on the morning of the 20th of

INTERROGATIONS

April. And that evening, Doenitz took formal leave to take over the command position in the area around Hamburg; and from the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces, OKW, there had already been selected the various specialists for the field in the north, and also for the southern half; and this order on the two separate areas, the north and the south, I remember that we had to change it several times. Jodl had to change it in such a way—because he didn't want the designation "North" and "South," but he wanted it designated as "A" and "B." Well, then I first presented this matter to him for his signature, he said, "I'll never sign it. I'll never sign it. Away with it."

Q. This was Hitler, you mean?

A. Yes. Well, for the southern section, we had selected the better talent; and for instance, from the Leadership Staff, we had already sent down the assistant of Jodl, General Winter. He had already gone down to Berchtesgaden. So that at the very time that we were still in Berlin, we already had the staff of Doenitz in the north and the staff for the southern area, and everything had been prepared for travel by plane. That is, we were supposed to go by plane to the south, and then very suddenly on the 22d, came this new decision to us, where he said, "No, I will never leave Berlin." Well, naturally, I was absolutely astonished. I was perplexed, and I said, "Well, if we don't do it now or within a very few days, we must fly, we must fly to Berchtesgaden." And then he said—I think he left the room. I don't know exactly. I think he left the room and called for some representative of the Press Division, and wanted to know whether his statement, that he was never going to leave Berlin, had already gone on the streets. Then I asked for some information as to what sort of publication that was; and I was told that during the situation report, a news announcement had been made over the radio, in which it said the Fuehrer was in Berlin; that the Fuehrer would stay in Berlin; that he would never leave Berlin; that the Fuehrer would defend Berlin to the very last. Then he said, "You are ordered by me to leave tomorrow for Berchtesgaden" (pointing to the interrogator).

Q. Pointing to you that way?

A. Yes, pointing at me with his finger, he said, "You go to Berchtesgaden tomorrow." Then I asked, "Well, when are you going to Berchtesgaden? When are you coming to Berchtesgaden?" He said, "I will remain in Berlin." I said, "Well, then, I shan't go to Berchtesgaden either." He said, "You will follow my orders. Where is General Jodl?" Then General Jodl was called in, and Bormann was sent out. He then repeated this order and said, "You will accompany Field Marshal Keitel to Berchtesgaden, and from there this thing will be directed." Then Jodl said, "Well, you can't direct anything from here; if you don't have your Leadership Staff with you how can you lead anything?" Well then, he made some sort of remark, he said, "Well then, Goering will take over the leadership down there. He is down there and he will do it." Then I left the room, because I wanted to find out what actually was going on, and when I left, this order was sent to me in a verbatim form, this order that had also been passed on to the Berlin radio. Then he sent everybody out, and I tried to talk to him alone, and I told him, "If you have made the statement once that you will fight before Berlin, in Berlin, and behind Berlin, then that is the way you will have to do it; but it is simply impossible that, after all this time that you have been directing and leading us, all of a sudden you should send your staff away and let them lead themselves." Then I told him, "The Western Front, the Balkan Front, the Eastern Front, and the Italian Front, they make up three-fourths of the armed forces" (indicating on map, and pointing to the southern area); for just to the south of Magdeburg, near Halle, there had been this pincer movement to cut Germany in half. Then I told him also, that first of all down there were the large portions of the forces, and that after all, from down there the arrangements or the peace offers and the dispositions had to be made as to the conduct of our activities, and then he merely said, "I have taken a position, I have taken a fixed position, and I can't leave it." I think he also said something along the lines, "Furthermore, Goering is much better at those things. He can deal much better with the other side." Then he cut off this particular topic and said "What's the situation with the Army Wenck?" That was the army that was supposed to be drawn from the west and put to attack on the southern side. It was supposed to be placed in the area of Jueterbog and reestablish a connection with the 9th Army which was fighting south against the Russians. The Army Wenck was an army which he had kind of made up himself. He, himself, had selected all the different divisions, the armored divisions, and so forth, and it represented sort of a reserve that he had selected himself during the last few weeks. And when Jodl—whose eyes I know quite well—and I were standing there and looking at him in this particular situation, we just told ourselves silently, that there was nothing we could do about him. Then I told him "Well, General Jodl remains with you here in Berlin"—or rather at that time we were not in Berlin but we were in a small suburb called Krampnitz, between Berlin and Potsdam—"and I shall go immediately to the Commander of the Army Wenck, and I shall give them all the new instructions that you have given regarding the deployment of the army south of Berlin, to make the junctions with the 9th Army, and tomorrow morning I shall report to you on the conditions of the army." Then he didn't say anymore regarding my going to Berchtesgaden, but merely said, "All right, I agree to that, but now you had better come along with me and go to my place, for you have to eat something;" and I said, "No, I want to leave right from here. I don't want to bother going into Krampnitz first. I want to leave right way." It was eight o'clock then. Well then, he had something brought for me to eat, and he sat with me and was quiet. I mean, he was perfectly quiet, not nervous, and he took personal care of the fact that there were sandwiches prepared for me, half a bottle of cognac, and chocolate, and things like that. But then in spite of that, I still drove about half way to Krampnitz with Jodl, in order to discuss once more with him other matters, and kind of clear up between ourselves what new situation had arisen, and we both realized that through this publication an entirely new situation had arisen; but when I took leave of Jodl, I said, "Anyway, I am leaving now for the Army Wenck, and I will get there as soon as I can, and will return tomorrow morning early. Let's both go together to the Reich Chancellory." Then Jodl said, "There is no doubt about it. It is an entirely new situation. I will study it now the whole night long, for now it's just the fight for Berlin." And I remember still saying to Jodl, "Well, you know, I have only one thing to say to Wenck, and that is, it is now the fight for Berlin, and the fate of the Fuehrer is at stake." Then I drove in the general direction of Brandenburg. Well, I passed Brandenburg, and from there I went to the General Staff Headquarters of the Army Wenck, and when I arrived at Wenck's Headquarters, I told Wenck about the situation. I didn't tell him anything about the events in the Reich Chancellory, but I merely explained to him that that was the great task—that this was actually the first time that I took an active part in the direction of the war. Then I said to Wenck, "I am going to remain here. I want you to issue an order, and I want to take that order with me." Then I took this order, and went with it to the various divisions, and talked personally with all the different commanding generals of divisions, and with the two commanding generals who belonged also to the army, and went ahead to the front and talked to the regimental commanders, and told these people what was at stake, and

INTERROGATIONS

I had a very good impression of the commanders and of the troops. Then at noon, at about 12 or 1 or 2 o'clock, I was back in Krampnitz, and then I discussed everything with Jodl again; and he issued further instructions for certain necessary measures, and Jodl announced our coming at the Reich Chancellory, that is, he told them we were on our way; and then about two or three o'clock—I don't know—we did drive to the Reich Chancellory, and at that time already the long range artillery was actually covering the center of Berlin. That is, single shots. I mean, it was no barrage, just stray shooting; and then I reported on my night visits to the various people, told them what I had done all night, and finally gave him the order of Wenck.

Q. That is, to Hitler?

A. Yes, and then again, just as normally, the general situation was discussed. The entire general situation on the various fronts of the war was discussed, and he appeared very quiet and rested and sort of satisfied, if one could say so, in that situation; he had a satisfied expression. And I remember saying to Jodl after we came back, "Look, we kind of got him quieted down. Yesterday was a very exciting day, but today we got him quieted down pretty well." And I told Jodl, "I will sleep for a couple of hours, and then I will immediately go out again." Jodl remained at Krampnitz, and then I went to the Headquarters of Wenck again; and then afterwards to the command posts, north of Berlin, that is, to the different commands that were in the northern section; and I merely said to Hitler, "I am driving out to the front again, and I will report to you again tomorrow." He then said, "Well I guess you can't possibly do it all in one day. Perhaps the next day then, that is, perhaps the day after tomorrow, you can go and see the Northern Army Group"—that is, the one under General Heinrichi. Then in the evening—well, I wasn't there then—the reports arrived that the situation at Krampnitz was getting very dangerous, because there were reports that Russian forces were going around Berlin in the North, fairly close to Berlin, and were threatening the big highway, from Magdeburg, by way of Nauen, and Brandenburg to Berlin. For at that time, we had already placed the commands north of Berlin, under the general supervision of Wenck, so that Wenck with his northern wing was actually resting on the Army Group of Heinrichi in the northwest of Berlin; and on the morning of the 24th, when I came back from the visit to the various divisional and regimental commands, upon my return to Wenck, I was told that Jodl had left Krampnitz, and he had taken up headquarters in a camp in the woods, north of Krampnitz (that was in the woods near Fuerstenberg); and that Jodl had arranged by telephone with Hitler. And any command of going to Berchtesgaden wasn't even brought up. And on the 24th around noon, I arrived at the new headquarters (at this camp in the woods where Jodl was) and I ordered an airplane from the airdrome in Rechlin, an order to get to Berlin in the late afternoon or evening; and this plane ride could not be made, because there was a very thick fog over Berlin, and one couldn't get to any of the airports, and not even to the Heeresstrasse, where a runway had been fixed on a wide street; so that my flight of the 24th was rendered impossible. Then I wanted to fly on the 25th. Well, on the 25th, there was a telephone call from Berlin, for we had communications with the Reich Chancellory, there was a telephonic order that some battalion was supposed to be flown into Berlin and some ammunition. I remember talking to Hitler on the telephone then, and he said, "Well, first the ammunition and the troops must be flown in, and then you can fly in." Then I got news from the Adjutant at the Reich Chancellory (that is von Below) and I was informed that I could not land on that big street in front of the Brandenburg Tor, because there had been several hits and the runway was damaged. By the way, all the time there was telephone conversation with General Krebs, the second man under Guderian. That is, he was the Chief of Staff, and he was right there in the Reich Chancellory, and in fact, all the orders and all the measures had only one purpose, and that was the relief of Berlin. And I considered it my task, from then on, to make it clear to the troops and make it clear to the commanders what that task was, that is, what was at stake; and the channel of command then ran from the Fuehrer through Krebs to Jodl, and there were two different lines of attack; there was the Army Wenck in the southeast of Berlin; and then there was the attack of the armored units in the area around Hamburg.

INTERROGATIONS

Well, then the next day, I wanted to fly to Berlin at night, because during the day one could not fly anymore, and that was forbidden me by the Fuehrer, and he said, "I will send you General von Greim"—he was a general of the air force, and he was supposed to be the Supreme Commander of the air forces. "You wait until General Greim comes to see you, and then we will talk about it further." General Greim had already received a shot through his leg at the time of his landing in Berlin; and Greim actually did leave, and he did reach us, but at that time we had already left our headquarters at Fuerstenberg, and had proceeded in a general direction towards Mecklenburg. There a new situation had arisen from the fact that General Heinrici had withdrawn his right wing from the East; and we slipped away from the Russians with maybe a half an hour's respite. Jodl had already urged me several times, that we were supposed to get out of there, but I didn't want to leave as long as there was a connection with the Reich Chancellory; and this connection existed, first of all, by telephone, and then when the wires didn't work anymore, through the transmitter; there was still a connection by voice, that is, radio telephone. When this radio telephone didn't function anymore from the transmitting tower, I don't know for what reasons, we let a balloon fly. We sent a balloon up in the air, and talked by radio telephone from the balloon to Berlin, and it was still a perfectly good radio telephonic connection, that is, one could speak. Then naturally, one could use Morse. Then on the 28th, about noon, the Russians shot the balloon down with a plane; and from then on there was no more voice connection, and Jodl at that time was just talking with the Supreme Commander in Berlin; it was a commanding general; and from then on, the connection with the Reich Chancellory had been separated; and then we had to leave, and as I said, we just barely succeeded in getting away. That evening, I did meet General Greim, who had his leg bandaged; he was shot through the leg. He gave me the news that Hitler and Goering had a severe quarrel, and that they didn't agree anymore; and that he, Greim, had been nominated the Supreme Commander, and that he was going to fly down to Berchtesgaden the next day in order to take over the air force. Then he actually did fly to Southern Germany, and I learned that he died of an inflammation in the wound that he had received. So then I and Jodl got into contact with Doenitz, who was in the general area of Kiel. After the 23d, I did not see Hitler anymore. Well, as I say, I didn't talk to him. I mean, I didn't see him anymore on the 23d. On the 28th, in the headquarters at Waaren (for as I told you, the first movement was from Krampnitz to Fuerstenberg, the camp in the woods, where we were on a big farm)—well, at Waaren I received a telegram from Hitler. That was a telegram, not a radio telephone conversation.

Q. Do you remember what that telegram said?

A. Yes, I still remember quite well what was in there. It said, "I expect the relief of Berlin. What is Heinrici's army group doing? Where is Wenck? What is happening to the 9th Army?" The 9th Army was withdrawing from the Eastern front, south of Berlin, and I think there was also a fourth question—Let's see —Wenck, Heinrici, 9th Army, and—Oh, yes, "When comes the connection between Wenck and the 9th Army?" And then the last question was "Well, what is the situation on this armored attack from the north of Berlin?" (that is, going south towards Krampnitz and Potsdam). Then, well, Jodl and I prepared a telegram, that is, Jodl gave me a telegram which we prepared during the night, and which naturally was rather unsatisfactory, and it ran about like this: "Of the 9th Army, we don't know anything, that is, we have no connection with the 9th Army. Wenck advancing very well with his northern wing south of Potsdam." (His units had already reached the extremities of the lakes south of Potsdam.) "Armored attack in the direction of Krampnitz not successful." That is, it had not succeeded because the forces had to be sent in the direction of Heinrici, in order to support his southern wing. "Southern wing of Heinrici in process of yielding towards the West." If I remember there was still one sentence which I added myself, and that was that "I, with the gentlemen of your Leadership Staff, am on the road day and night in order to explain to the troops and to the commanders what their tasks are and what is at stake" (Illustrating on map). And, then the staff withdrew even further, for that naturally had been just an interim Headquarters overnight. We withdrew into the area southwest of Luebeck; and there I was called to Doenitz, and Doenitz showed me the telegram that he was the successor of the Fuehrer; and there followed that afternoon when I was with Doenitz—together with Field Marshal Busch, who was the commander in the Hamburg area (it might have been the next day, the 30th perhaps)—that the telegram arrived, saying that the Fuehrer was deceased.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Who sent that telegram, do you know?

A. I think that came from Goebbels, but naturally I don't know that particular thing, because at that time Doenitz simply said it to us that way, and he received the telegram. I only remember receiving a telegram myself, the day before, where it said that one of the adjutants was on the way with new orders from the Fuehrer.

Q. Was that a telegram from Hitler to you?

A. That was from Hitler. That must have been on the 29th. I believe that was on the 29th, and what orders they represented it didn't state. Doenitz had received the same sort of telegram, and I don't have any doubt that that established that in the case that he should die or be killed or should he fall in battle, because that naturally wasn't stated, Doenitz was to be his successor, but the document itself I never did receive.

Q. You mean, the orders?

A. This, this order, "I appoint Admiral Doenitz my successor."

Q. That is the order that you never received?

A. Yes, these documents I have never seen. They must have been sent also to the prominent personalities involved, certainly to Admiral Doenitz and to myself, determining his successor. Well, this officer had never shown up, this adjutant, he never showed himself anyway. Yet, for the 27th, about fifty planes had been ordered to the vicinity of Berlin, and I had the impression that they were supposed to be used for the transporting of personnel from Berlin, but I repeat, the adjutant never showed up. That such an order, executed by Hitler existed, is confirmed in a statement by Doenitz where he says, "I received a telegram," or something to that effect. But about those things, Doenitz is better informed, because all these matters I merely learned when I was maybe an hour or maybe half an hour with Doenitz. At any rate, on the 30th of April in the evening, we knew that Hitler was not living anymore. Doenitz, that very night, discussed with me and with Jodl the offers for an immediate armistice, and I think that must have been on the first—no, on the second of May—that Admiral Friedeburg flew to Marshal Montgomery and afterwards to Eisenhower; and our principal idea was which troops could be saved, that is, could be put into the American and English sector of military activities.

Q. And then the final arrangements were made in a few days.

A. That is, as soon as Hitler was dead, more or less the principal point was this: If somebody else has the responsibility, then the only thing to do was to seek an immediate armistice and attempt to save whatever can be saved. But naturally, up until his death, I considered it my greatest task, and so did the others, to battle to get him out of Berlin, that is, to relieve Berlin, so that he could get out.

Q. Do you think he would have lived if you had been able to relieve the city?

A. Well, it is possible, that is, if the Wenck Army had succeeded in reaching Krampnitz and brought about a link between Berlin and the West, and if the armored attack had succeeded, then it is possible that he would have realized that his original statement, that is, "That I am remaining in Berlin; that I shall defend Berlin to the last," would have been interpreted in such a way that now that Berlin was linked to the rest of the territory to be defended, that he would have withdrawn with us, but nobody could look into the inside of his soul. I only can make these deductions, because I remember him always saying, that "I, alone, take all responsibility, and I shall bear this responsibility to the very end."

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpts from Testimony of Wilhelm Keitel, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 October 1945, 1505-1655, by Mr. Thomas J. Dodd. Also present: 1st Lt. Joachim Stenzel, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Reporter.

Keitel's Analysis of Hitler's Character and Traits

A. And now, I would like to report, since it seems to interest you, on the general atmosphere, and what I have observed as some very salient characteristics in the personality of Hitler.

Q. I would like you to do so.

A. The first was that attachment, which to us was almost not understandable, to the so-called "Alte Kempfer," this is, to the old fighters of the Party. He found no way of separating himself from them, even after they had grown to be inadequate and had become responsible for actions that were in no way in order, and could in no way be corrected. There was together with us at Mondorf,* and I think also here, one of the former Gauleiters, whom he has never dropped, or, that is, whom he may have relieved of his office but, whom he never denied.

Q. Streicher?

A. Yes, and of this kind there is really quite a long list. That was, as I said, an attachment that was almost not understandable, and certainly unlimited, which did not end even when the object of his affections had brought himself in conflict with even criminal law. Inversely, if some one of the generals, or of the military gentlemen had come into some sort of objection to him, then there seemed to be no difficulty at all to sever relations. But even then, he usually chose an occasion when something had gone wrong to justify the removal. At such an occasion, as we called it, somebody simply had to be sent into the desert, that is, on the occasion of some bad strategic action or some mistake. There was no possibility of compromise. Somebody had to bear the brunt. For example, he twice separated himself from Field Marshal von Rundstedt. The first time in the East, when the first crisis took place near Rostov, he, in that case, was the one that had to put his neck on the block. But then, that situation was straightened out comparatively quickly, that is, the fall was caught, as it were, and Rundstedt was again reinstated in the west. Then, when the landing and the invasion had been made, I recall his saying, "Well, he is an old man. He has lost his nerve. He just isn't up to the situation. He must go." On the other hand, since he liked him and didn't want to hurt his feelings, he presented the matter in such a way that he sent him a very nice personal letter in which he said he had the impression that possibly his nerves were not quite up to par, and he had the impression that it would be a good idea for him to take a vacation. Then after two months, he said, "I'd rather like to see and have a word with Field Marshal von Rundstedt, and check on whether he had regained his health." And then Field Marshal von Rundstedt spent three days at Rastenburg, and he asked me "What am I supposed to do here? What is the story?" And I said "Just wait awhile, and he will finally tell you whether you are supposed to leave again; you'll just have to sit tight." Then I approached Hitler and said, "Do you have any intentions with Rundstedt?" He said, "I will tell you tomorrow." And the next day he said, "Today I don't have any time for that." Then the third day he said "Come in the afternoon, at such and such a time, with Field Marshal von Rundstedt," and then, after an hour's talk, in which only general things were discussed, all of a sudden he said, "Field Marshal, I would like to place the Western Front in your hands again." Then Rundstedt merely said, "Whatever you order, I shall do to my last breath." Then after he had gone, Hitler said, "You know, the respect that Rundstedt enjoys with the other services, that is, not only with the Army, but with the Navy and Air Force and with everybody, that is absolutely unique. He can push anything through, and I don't have anybody else that enjoys that sort of respect, who can push everybody else before him." But when the offense of the Ardennes had failed, then naturally, he turned around again and said, "He is too old. He doesn't have the grip. He can't actually influence the generals enough that they will follow him all the way. He doesn't control them right, and I guess I will have to separate myself from him again." He also said, "I simply can't demand from a man of his age that he should travel around from one command post along the front to another, day in and day out. We just have to have a younger, a more active person in his place." Then I replied, "You have Model for that. Put Model in his place. He has the entire front from Lake Constance to the border, and he is traveling all along this front." To that I received no reply. The name, Model, during the entire period of the offensive in December and January, December '44, and January '45, was practically never mentioned. I simply can't help having the impression that for this unsuccessful offensive, somebody had to go, because before the eyes of history, he wanted to plant the responsibility directly with somebody, and while he was perfectly willing to take the overall responsibility, he also wanted to have on the record some rectification of this situation. And to me, he always said, "I like von Rundstedt very much. He is a wonderful man, and I like him extremely, but as Chief of Staff, he is no good; he is absolutely no good." So von Rundstedt had to come to Berlin to meet Hitler, and I must say that Hitler was extremely friendly in his treatment of Rundstedt. He gave him a further decoration, that is, the Swords to the Oak Cluster of the Knight's Cross; and he also said, "Well, do something for your health as fast as you can. I want you to get well. I need you again, because I know that I can't do without you." And I remember when he left, Hitler said to me, "I wish that this man were 10 years younger, because then I would have made him Supreme Commander of the Army, and then we would really have something." And he also added, "I know perfectly well that Rundstedt is a general of the old Prussian royalist tradition, but he is an awfully good general; and he is not a National Socialist, and he is not a Party man, and he doesn't want to have anything to do with us. I know that perfectly well. But, Keitel, history must know this, and I want to say this right here, history will know that that thing will never have prevented me from selecting the best man for such a purpose. I don't appoint a Gauleiter to the post of a commanding general, but inversely, I don't want to have a general become a Gauleiter." The thought, naturally, was that the one man is a politician, and soldiers do not understand anything about politics; and what a general has learned from a military point of view, no Gauleiter or anybody else could learn. That would be the first quality that I would like to point out, and as we always called it, the "Faith of the Nibelungs."

*See footnote, p. 1193 of this volume.

INTERROGATIONS

The next characteristic was his very high sensitivity, and he was particularly sensitive to the idea that the generals do not recognize you fully.

Q. Didn't recognize him fully?

A. Hitler, speaking to himself, says "The generals do not recognize you fully."

Q. I see.

A. Naturally, he never pronounced it that way. He never expressed it, but to put it, let us say, quite bluntly, he said to himself, "The generals consider me merely like the corporal of the last World War, and all of the things that I am telling them, they question and they say 'Well, how am I supposed to know all this?" "That, as I say, was never expressed, but I, as a silent observer, always had the impression that this particular sentiment was extremely deep set within him, and unfortunately that feeling was felt not only by me, but it was also felt by others in his surroundings; and in fact, a lot of people, in order to get him angry with somebody, would insinuate that this particular person might have expressed a sentiment of that sort, just because they wanted to get him excited. That is, one knew perfectly well that in order to render a general absolutely impossible before the eyes of Hitler, one merely had to say that this general had been overheard as saying, "This is a ridiculous thing. That is impossible," and then the man was finished. Even today, I have not been able to learn what actually was brought against Field Marshal List. There must have been some sinister forces at work that deprived Hitler of the slightest confidence that he might have had in List. I was sent by Hitler to tell List that he was supposed to resign his command of the army group down below, in the Caucasus. As far as the leadership, the military leadership of List is concerned, according to Jodl and myself, there weren't any reports that could be made. But when the attack of that army group from the Caucasus to the Black Sea—to the place, what is the name, I forget—failed, when that failed everything was over. It was finished. Hitler said, "I can't do anything with a Field Marshal that comes to me with a map on which one can't see any progress." And yet, on the other hand, it was forbidden to fly with a map on which any sort of troop movement had been marked, because in coming, especially from the Caucasus to the north, one was flying over a considerable portion of Russian territory. There were some dark forces, some indefinitely sinister forces, some intelligence—it might have been from Himmler, I don't know—but it succeeded in blacking the name of this gentleman. I remember saying to him, "You were so well satisfied at the time when List was conducting the campaign against Yugoslavia and Greece; you were quite content with him." And in this connection, it is interesting that the Russian commission that talked with me for about two days at Mondorf*—at the end of the conversation, one of the generals took me aside and said, "Tell me, how did it come that you sent your very best generals home? We, too, have sent generals away, but we brought them back afterwards. We have put them back into their jobs." And he mentioned the name of Timoshenko. He said Timoshenko too had lost the battle of the—some place north of the Caucasus, I can't think of the name now—but afterwards he was put back; he was given

*See footnote, p. 1193 of this volume.

INTERROGATIONS

his command, "Whereas you, you are working now with third-rate people."

And the third thing, the third characteristic was his overwhelming mistrust. And he must have sensed it quite often that we, too, would have noticed his attitude. And he said then, "You don't have to take it that way. I simply must be distrustful, that is, I simply must always feel that something is going on; I mean, I must rather depend on my nose and some sort of sixth sense. I must be distrustful. That is, in all of the reports that I receive, all the reports from the front, and all the reports of action within the country, I must be just as mistrustful as I am against persons, against all individuals. I must have that deep-seated mistrust." That is, until the facts would prove a matter as being absolutely settled and successful, he would always have the greatest mistrust for it.

Q. Would you say he was pessimistic as well?

A. No, he wasn't a pessimist. On the contrary, he was an optimist, but he always said he had to be distrustful, because he had such a deep-seated hatred for reports that had been doctored up, that had been beautified; reports that he called "reports made on purpose;" and he would always say, "I must be distrustful like this, because people are always trying to report things to me the way I want to hear them, and therefore, I must doubt them until I have absolute certainty of their correctness." After that must be added, that he sensed perfectly well in a way that in the military personnel that surrounded him, he had actually a trace of the old bourgeois world of olden days; that is, not of the world of National Socialism—that is, in the sense that he did not have any revolutionaries that had grown out of their own power, but they were in a sense the most conservative elements that Germany ever had produced. Then it is not insignificant that he should have made the statement: "You know, with the youth that is coming, a new generation is growing up," and in this connection the putsch of the storm troops in 1934 must be understood; that is, Roehm wanted to draw the youthful elements from the army and the storm troops and create a new revolutionary military caste. And that naturally was condemned most sharply by Hitler, because he did not want to do without the ability and the knowledge and the study of the old generation, because he knew perfectly well that those things had to be learned and had to be studied and had to be based on experience. And this entire distrustful being, this entire distrustful characteristic, one can't explain; that is, at least I can't explain it any other way to myself except by considering that he was a revolutionary person; and the fight that he fought from 1919, '20 to 1933, that is the time that he called "the fifteen years of fighting," all that he considered a fight against the old State organizations; and he looked distrustfully upon any element of that as being pointed directly against him. That is, I can't explain it any other way except this: that his characteristic of mistrust grew from this revolutionary period. On the other hand, he was absolutely convinced that he was a very thorough connoisseur of human character; and naturally he was not, to the degree in which he thought himself. For he often formed an opinion after conversations of two hours, and I could have said, "You don't know this man. I have known him for 25 years." He asked me before the Norwegian campaign began, "Whom are we going to charge with responsibility for the Norway battles?" I suggested to him General Falkenhorst,* who had been with the Iron Legions in the Baltic states, Latvia and Estonia, and who had also been in Finland together with von der Goltz. He said, "I want to see the general. I want to talk to him personally." He talked with the general for one hour, and then without even consulting with me or giving me any idea, he said, "I charge you with this task." And after he had gone, he said, "The general makes an excellent impression, a very fine impression." After the Norwegian campaign, with all its bloodshed, with all its failures, had after all succeeded (for it did succeed in the overall strategy) he said, "You see it was an excellent proposal. He is an excellent general, and he is a fine general. I said that right away." Then there were three points; there was one complaint from Goering, in which he said he had sent parachutists up to Norway, and that Falkenhorst had put these parachutists in three different spots, and Goering complained about that. And then Falkenhorst, at the beginning of the Russian campaign, made that advance towards the Murmansk railroad from Rovaniemi. There was one element—that was a regiment of the Waffen SS—and Falkenhorst complained about this regiment, and said that the regiment had not been trained very well, and that it had not filled its function, had not met its task; and there, he did his first wrong step, that is, the step that led him towards disaster, because naturally, Himmler now stood up for his SS; and from then on they said, "Falkenhorst has done everything wrong from the very beginning."

Q. Himmler said that, or Hitler?

A. It was Himmler who said that to Hitler, and then Hitler naturally started getting suspicious and distrustful right away,

*See interrogations of Nikolaus von Falkenhorst, p. 1534 of this volume.

INTERROGATIONS

and said, "No, it isn't my SS regiment that is bad; it has the bad leadership of Falkenhorst." Then the remainder was accomplished by Terboven, who quite openly, whenever he was with Hitler, detracted from Falkenhorst and always said that "Falkenhorst was no good; Falkenhorst didn't do this right and didn't do that right," and so on. And that went on so far, that years later it was even stated that Falkenhorst, during the advance from Trondhjem to Lillehammer, had actually been seen sitting in a ditch on the highway, crying. I have fought against that all the time. I have tried to insist that he come, that he should make a report, that he should receive him, to have him make a statement, and he always said, "No, I don't want to see him. You can handle it perfectly well. I don't want to have anything to do with him." And I said, "Well then, at least get him relieved. It is a very difficult position for a general who, after all has a position of confidence and responsibility, to be sitting up there with the absolute certainty that he does not enjoy the trust of the Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces any longer. Let's get him relieved." Then he would always say, "No, we will think about this later;" and it was always the same thing whenever Terboven was there for an audience. Then afterwards the shooting would start against Falkenhorst again. That is just one of so many examples.

Now I would like to state a very last example in this connection: The 9th Army was deployed east of Berlin, between Frankfurt and Kuestrin, towards the Russian front. In the central sector, the commanding general was General Weidling, who was known to me as a very courageous and extremely good general. By some source of intelligence (I don't know which, I think it was the SS or Himmler) news was brought to the Chancellory that General Weidling had already pulled back his staff, that is, he was pulling back his front, and that he had already pulled back his staff to Doeberitz, which was a town near Berlin. Actually, the General has merely removed from his headquarters the supply trains, well, the service troops, because you don't use those in your fighting position. The order was given that the General was supposed to be taken immediately and shot. I mediated, that is, I stepped in there and stopped that. That is, the General Staff of the Army had been ordered that the man should be arrested on the spot and shot. On the 23d, the last day that I saw Hitler, this General was at the Reich Chancellory, for he had said, "That is out of the question. I am going right to the Reich Chancellory. I am going to see Hitler." Naturally, I didn't get to see that any more, for that was handled by Krebs; but Weitling came personally and said, "I want to talk with my commander-in-chief about this." And when I was already in that camp in the woods near Waaren, I was called up to the phone by Krebs, and Krebs said, "Listen, I will have to tell you something interesting that has happened. General Weidling has spent two hours with the Fuehrer at the Reich Chancellory, and the Fuehrer has given him the command over all the troops in Berlin, and has stated that he is an excellent general."

Now comes the fourth point of the characteristics that were strong in him, and that would be the exaggerations. And this element I am bringing up especially now, because in these documents of the conversations in the General Staff or at the headquarters, it is so evident that he always suspected this front formed by the armed forces against him; and against this front which he accepted, he used the most incredible exaggerations in order to impress them. And then he didn't talk with any one individual, but he got himself the entire group, the Supreme Commanders; the Supreme Commanders of the services, the Commanders of the army groups, the Commanders of the armies, and then he just gave out with a propagandist speech; and then would come these exaggerations as "Our border must be the Urals," or "Through the Caucasus, we must penetrate into Syria," or "We must maintain bases against England so that she will never be able to set foot again on the Continent;" and he talked himself into these frantic moods of exaggeration. And that mood did not apply to the goals in military operations, but also to the demands, for instance, in armaments and munitions. As an example: Question: "How many field howitzers, light ones, are we producing per month?" My answer: "About 160 perhaps." "I order 900." Another example: Question: "How many rounds of flak ammunition, .88, are being produced a month?" Answer: "200,000 rounds." "I demand 2,000,000." Well, I simply said, "How can we do it? Every single grenade or flak grenade has an automatic clockwork detonator. We don't have enough. We have very few factories that make clockwork detonators like that." Then he would say, "You don't understand that. I will talk it over with Speer, and then we will just build the factories, and within half a year we will have these detonators." Still a third example: the one-inch flak battery, flak gun, wasn't adequate in its range and height. It didn't shoot high enough, and so a heavier gun was to be built, a gun of 3.7 centimeters; and I was present when he discussed this with Speer. Speer then said, "We can only produce that if we stop the production of 2. centimeter guns, because we will just substitute the 3.7 guns for 2. centimeter guns as before.” Answer: “That is absolutely out of the question. We will continue with the production of 2. centimeter guns, at the rate of 2,000 a year, and as far as the others are concerned, within a year the same number of 3.7’s.” When I talked to him about this later, he said, “You see, I had to take this entire production and armament business away from you because you always see only the difficulties. I had to give this to an organizer, to an industrialist, to a man who knew about factories, because you people just can’t do that. I had to take it away from you.” Well, those things naturally went day and night, things of this matter went day and night. I remember one incident that happened around the winter of 1944, more exactly, Christmas time ’44, when he called Speer. “How many machine guns are we producing now, Speer?” And Speer replied, “3,500.” Hitler then said, “As a Christmas present from you, I wish, that beginning January, we will produce 7,000. I don’t have any further questions for you. My Christmas present, I have just told you about.” But all these are absolute realities, that is, actually the things took place the way I tell them. And naturally, when he was in a good mood we would occasionally talk about this, and then sometimes he might say something like this: “Keitel, one must demand the impossible, because then one perhaps obtains the possible.”

INTERROGATIONS

Well, naturally, these were the four points, and regarding these exaggerations, I have seen him for many years, and therefore, I naturally came to the point where I didn’t take them seriously any more. At first, I must confess, they left me perplexed, that is, they made me “fall off my chair,” so to speak; and then finally I just realized that I had to tell myself, “These things aren’t eaten as hot as they are cooked.”

Then another example that happens to come to my mind: After the invasion, that is, after the Americans and British had gained a foothold on the Normandy coast, he told me at Klessheim, down there near the Bavarian border—that was on the same day that Horthy was there, and although at that time naturally the negotiations with Horthy stood in the foreground—he still said, “If we have a front to contend with over in the West, then we have to form some more divisions.” So I said, “Very well, I will get in touch right way with the Army of the Interior and see about these reserves.” And when he said, “What do you say, how many?” I said “I guess I will ask for 10 divisions to be formed from the army of the Interior.” Then he said, “That is absolutely ridiculous. Forty divisions, that is what I want.” Well then, naturally, one was absolutely physically sick; and then finally we compromised on 25 divisions. The placement into service of divisions of that sort wasn't something that could be done formally, with regular tables of organization, and so forth. It was strictly an improvisation. Then he would say, "Naturally, to set this thing up according to the normal tables, it would be very easy, and you could do that alone, but when it comes to improvising, that is where I am needed." And then, at such an occasion, he would summon Jodl; and he would summon the Chief of Staff of the Army; and he would summon the general commanding the army of the reserves or the interior; and everybody else who might be in any way involved in this project; and then he would have the whole circle together and give them a sort of a propaganda speech; and at the end he would say, "I demand, at the end of 8 days, a tangible, concrete proposal of how the thing is going to be done." Then, all sorts of subterfuges and substitution devices were made; that is, regiments were pulled out from certain sectors of the front and were enlarged into divisions, and things of that sort were done; and with the greatest difficulties, we actually did get up 25 divisions, and 5 armored divisions, that is, we got up 30 divisions. And then at the end, maybe I would still have to hear something like this: "If I had depended on you, then I would have had maybe 10 divisions, whereas by my demanding the impossible, I obtained the utmost possible."

And now, finally, there is one more subject which is very characteristic and significant for Hitler. He had, I might call it, three different languages, that is, three different patterns and directions in which he spoke. Before the political leaders, the Gauleiters, the old fighters, he had a very characteristic, very peculiar way of presenting his thoughts, of speaking. The second was when he was talking to the public, be it in the Reichstag or be it to the entire people, that was entirely different, and yet on the same subject. Then he also used quite different idioms and quite different formulas for expressing thoughts, and he always wound up in a sort of inspiring thought at the end, and he always turned to the Almighty. He had a very definite singular way of talking to the people, and all his speeches, be they to the Reichstag or be they to the Gauleiters, he always dictated them personally. For the Gauleiters, he normally talked freely, that is, without manuscript, and his speech was then afterwards taken down by shorthand during the speech; and whatever was published of that, he corrected personally, that is, he would get the transcript and correct it himself, and strike out and determine himself what was going to be given to the press; whereas the speeches in the Reichstag, he always dictated personally, and then he read through them and he redrafted them two or three times, and then presented them in final form and read them off the manuscripts. And then finally there was a third form, and that was when he spoke before the officers, that is, before the generals; and then, well, he naturally spoke to the generals in smaller groups, but occasionally also in a very large group. It was at least twice or three times that he addressed a very large body of officers in the building where the Reichstag convened, that is, the theater, the Kroll Opera, and he worded his speech in such a way that the officers in the end would always leave quite impressed and satisfied with his oratory; and into all these speeches he would always bring his main ideology. He would always find a way of getting his ideology into these speeches, saying "Where would the company be if everybody had a voice and said 'Well, let's vote on how we are going to do that'; and the gentlemen of the officer corps will certainly confirm this, that that would be an impossible situation." And then came the famous slogan: "A criticism from bottom to top doesn't exist. There is only one criticism, and it goes from the top down. The regimental commander can criticize his officers and his men, but his men can never criticize the commander." And he said, "I am a soldier. I have gone through the World War, and I look at my political life from a military point of view, and I maintain that there is no criticizing from the bottom towards the top. There is only one, from the top down."

INTERROGATIONS

Hitler's Relations with Eva Braun

Q. I have wondered about Eva Braun; did you ever meet Eva Braun, Field Marshal?

A. I have seen her, yes. She wasn't very tall; she was between small and medium; very slender and very elegant appearing. At the Berghof, I probably did meet her in the corridors, for naturally when there were soldiers, you didn't see anybody of the environs; they were all gone.

Q. We heard that Hitler had two children by Eva Braun. Have you ever heard that story? Do you think there is anything to it?

A. I don't believe it. I don't think that is true. I never knew of that. She was, as I said, very slender, elegant appearance, quite nice legs—one could see that—but I never got to know her very much—she seemed to be very, not shy, but reticent and retiring, and a very, very nice person, dark blonde. She stood very much in the background, and one saw her very rarely. It was merely by chance that one saw her.

V. ERNST KALTENBRUNNER*

Excerpts from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 21 September 1945, 1430-1645, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present: Siegfried Ramler, Interpreters S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Reporter.

Kaltenbrunner's Opinion of Ribbentrop and His Diplomacy

Q. You mentioned the name Ribbentrop. What sort of person is Ribbentrop?

A. He is an exceptionally industrious man and he is very concerned about every material factor in his work. I think that any work that he has taken over he will carry out with the utmost devotion to duty. A different form of his nature is his exceptional conceit and ambition, even more conceited than ambitious, externally and in all his activities as Foreign Minister. This has shown itself especially in the following way, namely, that he has never allowed anybody to take a hand in any part of his field or allowed anybody to mix up in it. He especially pointed out that he, according to the list of rank, is the highest and the most important minister of the Reich. In his relation to Hitler, he was exceptionally obedient, and I do not believe that he ever dared to carry out anything, against the will of Hitler. He was very anxious to find out the opinion of Hitler about any specific thing, and very often, as it seemed to many lookers-on, he took this for his own opinion and then presented it to Hitler, partly because he wanted the favor of the Fuehrer.

In regard to his ways of life, his forms of discussion, his mannerisms, his relations to his subordinates, and to people outside, he behaved in a very peculiar manner. At times, he gave the impression of being a very dignified, quiet, well-informed man. Then he could be very polite and even amiable. On the other hand, he was at times very nervous and sometimes even rude, and he sometimes even went to the point of insulting people.

In the first place, it has to be said that he was a very intolerant man. It was never possible to teach him or to advise him. At the very best, he would respond, "Oh, yes, I have thought so, too, and this is my opinion, too."

Q. Did you have any official relations with him?

A. Yes.

Q. In what regard?

A. I was in no way his subordinate, but I wanted to bring to him those results of work which belonged to his ministry, namely,

*Kaltenbrunner's capacity for evasion and denial reached the point at the trial where he even refused to acknowledge his own signature. A caveat is therefore entered as to the veracity of Kaltenbrunner's statements in these interrogations on matters touching his personal responsibility.

INTERROGATIONS

starting from the beginning of 1944. In this respect, he was very deaf and he tried to refuse the accepting of any information that did not belong strictly to his ministry, because he had a point of view that only professional diplomats would understand foreign political affairs, whereas he quite overlooked the fact that he himself did not come under this classification either. He believed that his information should come from two sources, firstly, from the different legations—that is, from the foreign representations that he had—and from an information service of the Foreign Office, which was subordinate to different people, at one time to a certain Henke. He only relied upon a few people that he named.

It was very difficult to get in personal touch with him, in order to prove to him the correctness of one's own opinion and the necessity for obtaining advice from different other sources. Not only was there no subordinate relation with him, but it was also difficult to receive an invitation to him. If such conferences did result, at times he was amiable. At times, he was curt and rude. In this direction he was a man whose nature was not adjusted to any certain form. He never made it possible for anybody to be present at any conference between him and Hitler.

Q. Wherein can you place any responsibility on Ribbentrop for the disaster that overtook Germany?

A. This is a huge question. Perhaps for an introduction to all these questions, it should be said that one generally spoke about the fact that Herr von Ribbentrop was very much subject to the influence and to the thoughts of his wife.

In foreign political things, I think I have only got to know Ribbentrop at the end of 1943. This was a time when the war had progressed so far that an end of war would have to come about not by military means, but by a diplomatic means, which had not occurred so far. This was a time where the wide public and naturally also higher placed persons looked around in vain for some activity of Ribbentrop. For me personally, it was then not clear whether there was a lack of activity on Ribbentrop's side or whether it was so that Ribbentrop could not dare to proceed against the wish of Hitler. In this time I had practically never been with Hitler and did not know his own opinions about it.

I first remarked on the mistakes of Ribbentrop in the southeastern province. A very important thing in the southeastern politics of the Reich was that one delivered Croatia to the Italian influence, and, certainly, that one looked upon Bulgaria as a power which was a friendly power to Germany in the Balkans.

While, according to my opinion, which was not only my opinion but this was in the first place the opinion and basis of activities of the envoy Neubacher, not Bulgaria but Serbia should be looked upon as a friend of Germany in the Balkan States.

It seemed to me, according to reports, that the Balkan affairs were handled in the following manner: The Reich had favored Bulgaria, which in its whole interior structure had already leaned towards Bolshevism. This one could especially notice by the economical construction of Bulgaria, namely, in the agricultural communities. This was partly due to the activities of the agricultural unions that wanted to go away from the patriotic ideas of the farmers and go over to a more union form of a system, meaning that they wanted the farmer to act independently and only be influenced by his family and not be led by a union.

This system of unions opened the doors to all sorts of Communistic propaganda in Bulgaria, and one could almost see when Bulgaria was going to be ripe for Communism.

Serbia, on the other hand, had just as before kept up all this individual structure, their land structure and their structure on the farms. It was influenced by way of religion through the Serbian Orthodox Church. All Serbian farmers, that is, all Serbian agricultural people, were of an anti-Communistic opinion. In a war between an anti-Soviet Germany and a Communistic Russia, Germany selected, through the Foreign Minister Ribbentrop, Bulgaria and not Serbia.

Hitler's "Inner Circle"

Q. Now that you have a chance to look back, who do you say were the men that made up the inner circle around Hitler?

A. Hitler was so sure of himself that influence on his person would have been very difficult. Despite all this, the surrounding people should have brought about a certain influence on him, and of those who surrounded him, there are in the first instance Bormann. Bormann has been with Hitler daily ever since Hess had flown away. Then Goebbels was in his close circle. These are the two people who have the greatest possibilities of exercising an influence on Hitler.

Then we come to the second group of people who had regular access to Hitler and could have exercised a certain amount of influence and of whose judgment Hitler thought something. He didn't always think a lot of them, but he listened to them. They are Ribbentrop, Goering, and Himmler; from the time of Todt's death and Speer becoming Minister of Armament, also he was in the closer circle of Hitler. But Hitler always cut off any reports by his people and expressed his own opinion regardless of what the others wanted to say. Only people like Bormann and Goebbels, who were for years in his close surroundings, should have exercised a larger influence on him. Goering's influence was relatively very small. I could show proof of this by a few examples quite easily.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You mean towards the end it was small?

A. I think that Goering lost his influence already two years prior to the end. Goering's influence ceased to exist virtually completely from the moment it was evident that the German air force was inferior technically to the air force of the allies. Hitler did not hold Goering responsible for the failure as regards technical developments of the air force, because he said that "It is my own fault. I knew that Goering was no technical expert, and yet I have made him Chief of the air force." He was of the opinion that he had only appointed Goering as head of the aircraft personnel.

Responsibility for Concentration Camps

Q. Can you explain why the SS has gained its reputation as a gang of criminals?

A. I should think that they have to thank Hitler for that reputation, because of his order to Himmler. They were ordered to conduct the concentration camps. Though the concentration camps were instituted before Himmler by Goering, they were not in that form.

Q. Do you know that to be a fact of your knowledge, the fact that these concentration camps were being operated by Himmler through Hitler?

A. I know that Hitler said to Himmler that "I take the full responsibility of what takes place in concentration camps." Whereupon Himmler said, "I will take that responsibility."

Q. Well, do you believe Hitler knew to what extent people were being gassed and tortured and killed in concentration camps?

A. Besides Himmler, nobody would have known that. Up to a certain extent he must have known.

Excerpts from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 3 October 1945, 1445-1745, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: Capt. Jesse F. Landrum, Reporter; Mr. Bernard Reymon, Interpreter.

Responsibility for Mobile Gas Chambers

Q. When did the use of the mobile gas chamber van first come to your attention?

A. I can't say when it was but as soon as I read it in the foreign press I immediately took up the matter with Goebbels and sent at the same time a photostatic reproduction of the article to Hitler with a letter in which I expressed the terrible consequences which such things would have.

Q. Why did you take it up with Goebbels?

A. Because he was responsible for the press and it was he who allowed the foreign press to enter Germany; and because he was the man who had dared against Himmler and over Himmler to talk to Hitler.

Q. Was your objection because the news had gotten out in the foreign press and that was going to be embarrassing?

A. Certainly not; because I was myself shaken by these facts.

Q. Why didn't you go to Himmler? You say you knew he was responsible for these things.

A. Precisely because I held him responsible for it.

Q. Why didn't you take action in your own RSHA?* That was the instrument through which these accusations were being carried out.

A. This information has not the slightest foundation.

Q. Witness after witness, by testimony and affidavit, has said the gas chamber killings were done on general or special orders of Kaltenbrunner.

A. Show me one of those men or any one of those orders. It is utterly impossible.

Q. The testimony of one of the high officials was that most orders initiated with Himmler, the killings could not happen without order of Hitler or without knowledge of Himmler but practically all of the orders came out through Kaltenbrunner.

A. Entirely impossible.

*The RSHA (Reichssicherheitshauptamt) or Reich Main Security Office, headed by Kaltenbrunner, included the SD, the Gestapo, the Kripo, and other policing agencies. See document L-219, vol. VII, p. 1053; charts 16 and 19, vol. VIII (in pocket).

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpts from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 5 October 1945, 1030-1210, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: Capt. Jesse F. Landrum, Reporter; T/5 Gunter Kosse, Interpreter.

Kaltenbrunner's Stand on Concentration Camps

Q. You had information at your finger tips from all over the Reich; you made reports on conditions and must have included matters of new inmates for concentration camps and new forced labor groups?

A. No. I had nothing to do with shipments to the concentration camps; I naturally knew that there were concentration camps but that's all I knew about that.

Q. Well, according to the sworn statement of Colonel Mildner,* orders for deportation of Jews, in the Reich and in countries occupied by German troops, to labor and concentration camps were issued by Himmler. Orders had his signature and were classified TOP SECRET. They passed through you, and before you, Heydrich to Mueller.

A. No.

Q. Orders also went directly from Himmler to local headquarters, but you were always informed.

A. No, that's not true, either.

Q. Orders of Himmler concerning type of labor employment of prisoners and for the extermination of Jews went directly through Pohl and from him to Gluecks, either written as TOP SECRET or sometimes orally, and always as adviser to Himmler was Kaltenbrunner on all Jewish questions, on all deportations to camps.

A. Never. He must mix that with Heydrich's time.

Q. We are only concerned at this point with Kaltenbrunner's time.

A. But I am the one who is accused here and, therefore, I have to take some kind of a stand.

Q. That's your right. The basis for Colonel Mildner's statements as to channels through which orders were issued were his conversations with Mueller and other people in the SIPO [Security police].

A. He must have talked with Mueller about that, then.

Q. That's what he swears.

A. That might be possible, that Mueller tried to push the fault on somebody else; I don't doubt that at all, but I can only say again that Mueller was only the tool of Himmler. I must say again that I never got any plenipotentiary for the Gestapo. I said many times before that I took a stand against many things but there was nothing I could do.

*See document L-35, Vol. VII, p. 780.

Q. There is nothing in what I have brought to your attention that shows any disposition for Mueller to dodge his responsibility; it's merely the inclusion of the channels which included yourself through which these orders passed.

A. Like I said, that a basis for this Mildner got through conversations with Mueller and therefore I say that Mueller is trying to push the fault on somebody else. Mildner himself gets all mixed up because in one paragraph he says that a report went from Himmler to Mueller and then he said it went from Himmler through me to Mueller.

Q. That's correct. On different occasions the channels differed, as you have said, but he adds what you failed to add, that you were always informed.

A. Everybody in Germany knew that those were affairs of the Gestapo and the deportation of the Jews was done by the Gestapo on orders from Himmler.

Q. After being arrested and sent to concentration camps, in whose charge was the treatment, health, and assignment of work for the internees?

A. Pohl.

Q. What reports were received by Kaltenbrunner from concentration camps?

A. Not one.

Q. What was the basis for your classifying camps into classes one, two, or three?

A. I never classified them myself but that was all over.

Q. What office did it come out of?

A. That could only have come from Pohl or from Himmler.

Q. What was the purpose of such classification?

A. Probably the difference of work production.

Q. Was there any distinction made as to the character of the inmates, whether they were there because of alleged racial inferiority—as the Jews—or because of their political beliefs?

A. I don't know that but I am sure to know that was not the reason. I think it was more the kind of work, like agriculture or industry.

Q. Who picked the location of the concentration camps?

A. Maybe Himmler.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Why do you say that?

A. Because that was his work and he was supposed to build them up.

Q. Who caused the building of the gas chambers that were designed as shower rooms?

A. I don't know that.

Q. You don't like to have questions asked about gas chambers, do you?

A. Why shouldn't I like such a question? I can only say again that already in Bamberg a paper was showed to me where I was accused of being a specialist and adviser to Hitler concerning these gas chambers and that naturally could not be very pleasant and right to me.

Q. When did you first have any knowledge of the use or the planned use or the result of the use of gas through chambers, mobile vans, or other means of exterminating these unwanted people?

A. I don't know the time, but as soon as I got foreign reports about that I showed them to Hitler and Himmler—not to Himmler but to Hitler—and Goebbels.

Q. What did they say?

A. I didn't show it to them personally, but I sent it to them by mail, and a few days later I got word that both of them are going to talk this over with Himmler.

Q. And after that, the use increased, didn't it?

A. I don't know that.

Q. And Kaltenbrunner was sending in advice all the while?

A. That's a statement which I cannot verify at all.

Q. That's a statement that many, many other representatives of the Nazi government continue to make.

A. That is a lie if anybody makes such a statement. I want you to consider that between 1933 and 1943 ten years passed in which I did not have anything to do with that office. How can you make such a statement, because at that time, as it was reported from foreign countries, things like that were done by Himmler.

Q. Because they continued to be done through 1943, 1944, and until the allied armies overran the concentration camps in 1945, and through those years Kaltenbrunner was Chief of the RSHA which had them in charge.

A. No. I was never in charge of any such, but orders were done, as I said in my statement in London, by Himmler or Pohl. No commander of any concentration camp in any part of Germany can say that he ever got the slightest order from me.

Q. Would it surprise you to know that that is substantially the same answer that everyone else is giving that has had anything to do with these matters?

A. I can't know but I cannot explain that nothing else otherwise can be proved through evidence.

Excerpts from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 5 October 1945, 1440-1465, by Lt. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: Nancy M. Shields, BCV, Reporter; H. E. Mankiewitz, Interpreter.

"The Gestapo Never Harmed Anyone"

Q. Let us consider what some of the officials think about your personal responsibilities for Amt IV* of the RSHA, with particular regard to repressive measures in the concentration camps. You have known Schellenberg a long time, haven't you?

A. Since 1943.

Q. And he has served in Amt VI during that period?

A. Yes.

Q. In his opinion, Kaltenbrunner was responsible in conjunction with Mueller for all punishments and protective arrests of important persons.

A. Will you let me face Schellenberg and some of his group leaders and they will tell you that it is absolutely untrue. Schellenberg must be the person who knows best what is the connection between Amt IV and Himmler because Schellenberg has been previously in the Gestapo himself.

Q. And was, therefore, responsible himself for some of the punishments and atrocities that were committed?

A. I don't know. I don't know in what department of Amt IV he was employed but he was fully aware of the authority and he must have known very well that those authorities were not mine.

Q. Amt IV, the Gestapo, was the active organization that performed the repressive action and punishments and executions in concentration camps, isn't that right?

A. This information is certainly wrong and I refer to my statement in London and the reason is because I consider Himmler himself responsible for those things.

*The Gestapo.

See footnote, p. 1299 of this volume.

Foreign Political Intelligence Service.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Who did the job locally? The Gestapo?

A. No, the concentration camps. The concentration camps themselves and they only acted on the orders of Himmler, Pohl, or Gluecks.

Q. Who, in concentration camps, inflicted punishment, performed executions, gassed prisoners, and all the other various atrocities?

A. That I could not say—it must be men who were subordinate to the commander of the camps.

Q. It was the Gestapo, and you know it was the Gestapo for the most part!

A. The Gestapo most certainly had no man in concentration camps who had ever done any harm to anyone.

Q. That is the best one yet!

A. You must make a mistake between the guards and the Gestapo. That is something entirely different because the guards of the concentration camps were not subordinate to the Gestapo but to Pohl and that was entirely different.

Q. Those guards were Deathshead SS, were they not?

A. Yes, but the Deathshead SS were not Gestapo. That is proof that they were not Gestapo. The Deathshead organization is the concentration camp guardsmen.

Q. And you say the dirty work was done by them, is that it?

A. Of course.

Q. How do you know that?

A. Because there were no men in the concentration camps who were subordinate to the Gestapo but the guards who were there who were only subordinate to Pohl and over Pohl to Himmler. Otherwise, the guards were subordinate to Mueller and they were never subordinate to Mueller as things were. Will you ask any man from the concentration camps if he has ever been subordinated to the Gestapo and they will tell you that they were not.

Q. Will he also tell you that when he had a mass killing to perform that he had a few Gestapo brought in to do the job?

A. No, certainly not. The Gestapo had nothing to do with executions.

Q. Are you sure?

A. I have never heard anything about it.

Q. Then how can you be sure?

A. Certainly I am not sure but I would have heard something about it. The concentration camps were not subordinate to Amt IV and that must be known here, and this does not merely include the buildings but all the staff who are subordinate to Pohl.

Q. And all of those who performed the exterminations and shooting and gassing and all the other means of killing, is that right?

A. I don't know about this. I don't know who was carrying out the shootings.

Q. You were being pretty positive about Pohl's responsibility. I would like to have you carry it clear through, for all the activities of the camp.

A. I have given a statement about concentration camps and that is all. That is not known to me as secret knowledge, but it is known to everybody else and I don't know any more. I have made representations and I have called Hitler's attention to certain conditions. I have repeatedly talked to Hitler about his responsibilities, which he has charged himself with, in these concentration camps.

Q. Hitler?

A. Yes.

Q. What did you say to Hitler and what did he say to you?

A. His stereotyped answer was, "That is none of your concern. That is my arrangement with Himmler and how Himmler carried out his work is his own affair. He is responsible to me."

Q. On what dates did you have these conversations with Hitler?

A. This was when I took office and then several times later.

Q. You have told us here frequently that you knew nothing about concentration camps. How were you even well enough informed to discuss it with Hitler?

A. As much as I knew about concentration camps I have put down in my statement and that is as much as I discussed with Hitler. Primarily, I had to rely on the foreign press. In this respect I saw the second big damage towards the Reich, apart from the inhuman or humanitarian concern.

Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 8 October 1945, 1030-1210, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: Capt. Jesse F. Landrum, Reporter; Pfc. George W. Garand, Interpreter.

Hitler's Antipathy to Lawyers and Educated Men

Q. Isn't it true that Hitler and that Himmler both were hostile, had an antipathy for lawyers generally?

A. Well, that one cannot say generally. In many questions Hitler has held himself the utmost exactness to laws and was very much respecting the fact that all forms of law should be observed.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Now, you are being ridiculous and you know it. It is a well known fact that Hitler did not like lawyers, right?

A. Now you are speaking of persons.

Q. Speaking of lawyers in general.

A. They have been repeatedly verbally attacked.

Q. By him?

A. Not only by Hitler but also all other party elements. There have been times where every academic educated man was considered a disturbing element. At least a man who thought too much as a result of his education was called that.

Q. How were you able to gain his confidence in view of your attainments as a lawyer?

A. As a lawyer I had not been known because I had not been in practice; but I had studied law and that was in any case well known. The reasons why Hitler tried to get me to Berlin are in many forms, have to be discussed for a long time, which I have asked for already repeatedly but then nobody wanted to know. But this is by all means necessary because otherwise no one will ever be able to understand my whole character.

Q. We want to understand your character, but we also want to fix the responsibilities for acts that were carried on in your name.

A. Completely agreed. But above all I would also like that persons should be heard who really know me, and not only people who are looking for somebody responsible for what has happened. The man who really is responsible cannot really be made responsible.

Q. Name him.

A. They have been named repeatedly: Himmler, Pohl, Mueller.

Q. What about Hitler?

A. You are speaking of my responsibility. With that you mean the police responsibility. For war and several other things, of course, several other people have been responsible.

Excerpts from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken in Nurnberg, Germany, 8 October 1945, 1945-2110, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: Pfc. George W. Garand, Interpreter; T/4 R. R. Kerry, Reporter.

"I Will Be Hanged in Any Case"

A. That is completely wrong. I know such a thing will make no difference to me because in any case, you will sentence me. May I put an addition to this? The colonel in charge of the London Prison that I was in has told me that I would be hanged in any case, no matter what the outcome would be. Since I am fully aware of that, all I want to do is to clear up on the fundamental things that are wrong here.

KALTENBRUNNER

Q. Have you been subject to any treatment that you consider to be intimidation, coercion, or undue influence since you have been brought to Nurnberg?

A. I have not suffered from wrong treatment.

Q. Have you suffered any threats or any preconceived statements that you are guilty of any crime?

A. Not directly, but I am treated as a man that is already in a criminal prison.

Q. You have been examined at great length because of the multitude of evidence and witnesses that have been presented in the field where you are active.

A. I have not complained about any treatment and I am not complaining now. The difference between the treatment here and in London is like day and night.

Q. The purpose of this extended examination, which today has gone even into the night is to try to crystallize the facts insofar as we are able to get you to testify. Is that clear?

A. Yes.

Q. Let me go ahead then.

Excerpt from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 9 October 1945, 1030-1230, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: Capt. Jesse F. Landrum, Reporter; T/5 Gunter Kosse, Interpreter.

Was Hitler a Criminal?

Q. Whose picture is that?

A. Hitler's.

Q. Was he an honest man?

A. I couldn't find out about his character but it is possible that he was not always honest.

Q. On the basis of what you now know, is he a criminal?

A. I ask not to be asked that question because I am not able to understand everything quite right, but I was not in agreement with his policies during the last years.

Q. You have already been asked the question. Maybe this will make it a little easier for you to answer. Does he look any more like a criminal in that picture where he has on all his paraphernalia?

INTERROGATIONS

A. This picture is not very advantageous.

Q. You know he was a criminal by causing other people to do criminal acts, don't you?

A. Well, it is quite certain that he gave orders that you can consider as a criminal act.

Q. Brought on the war and caused all the killing and brought you here today? Right?

A. I don't think I can make history as a prisoner.

Excerpt from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken in Nurnberg, Germany, 11 October 1945, 1050-1230, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: Capt. Mark Priceman, Interpreter; T/4 R. R. Kerry, Reporter.

Use of Prisoners for Broadcasts to Allied Troops

Q. Will you look at the make-up of Group IV A with subsections 1, 2, 3, and 4?* What dealings did you have with any of the subchiefs? Consider the next name on the list, Kopkow. Did you have any dealings with him?

A. No. With this section I had no dealings. I met Kopkow only once. This was on the occasion when he was making a report to Himmler. Kopkow's section was concerned with furnishing signal material to enemy agents.

Q. You mean counter-sabotage agents?

A. They were concerned with equipping allied agents, who had parachuted in German-held territory and had been captured by the Germans, with a signal material to make broadcasts to the allied side. Their status was that of German prisoners. This is how I happened to recall the report by Kopkow to Himmler, which I saw in Himmler's place. On that occasion, I did not see Kopkow personally. Kopkow was introduced to me later on at some celebration; I believe on the 9th of November 1944.

Q. What part of your work was concerned with political falsifications as stated in this description of functions here?

A. That I do not know.

Q. What does that refer to?

A. It may be that this signal equipment was meant by this.

*Section A (Amt IV of the RSHA) dealt with opponents, sabotage, and protective service and was subdivided as follows: A1, Communism, Marxism and associated organization, war crimes, illegal and enemy propaganda; A2, Defense against sabotage, combatting of sabotage, political, falsification; A3, Reaction, opposition, legitimism, liberalism, matters of malicious opposition; A4, Protective service, reports of attempted assassinations, guarding, special jobs, pursuit troops. See Document L-219, Vol. VII, pp. 1053, 1068.

Excerpts from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 12 October 1945, 1545-1715, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: Capt. Jesse F. Landrum, Reporter; Capt. Mark Priceman, Interpreter.

The Mass Execution at Lublin

Q. Did you know a Herr Morgan?

A. No.

Q. Inspector of concentration camps?

A. No, definitely not.

Q. Maybe it will help to refresh your recollection if I recall to you a few of the facts that occurred late in the autumn of 1943 as set forth in the report of Morgan,* following the visit to Lublin. You do recall the time when several thousand Jews were slain in Lublin in one day?

A. No.

Q. And that their bodies were thereafter burned, there being so many that it caused a light dust to lie over the whole town and penetrate the air like smoke?

A. These three stories are such fabrications, especially inasmuch as my person is concerned.

Q. It was during the period in which you were Chief of the Reich Security Police.

A. As I said, these stories are pure inventions, and besides your idea that I had anything to do with it in my official capacity is erroneous.

Q. Referring again to the Lublin murders, the result of this mass execution could not have escaped your attention because as reported by Morgan after his inspection, it resulted in losing much of the available labor supply. There were no more people to work machines and in the handcraft shops. The factories were left with a tremendous stock of raw material, and the people in charge said that the order of the execution came as a complete surprise.

A. I never saw any such report, and I never heard about them.

Q. The local SS Oberfuehrer Muszfeld, who was formerly a confectioner, at Zuckerbaecker in the neighborhood of Kassel, was in immediate charge of the butchery at Lublin, and he told Morgan that he took credit for killing 20,000 by his own hand. Was he known to you?

A. No.

Q. A man of those attainments would certainly be pretty well known throughout the service, would he not?

A. He definitely did not belong to my staff.

* Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You say that you received no reports of the effects of this mass extermination because of the loss of manpower?

A. Definitely not. Even if this report were true, it is obvious that such a report would not have been addressed to me, but it would have been addressed to a person concerned with manpower questions, for instance, Pohl, chief of the concentration camps, or to Himmler, because Pohl carried on production right inside the concentration camps. He was interested in manpower questions. If I ever had received a report like this, I would immediately have taken it to Himmler or Hitler, and I would have declared to them that things shouldn't be done this way.

Q. The message that came, ordering the mass execution, read in the following terms: "By order of the RFSS,* the Jewish company in the camp Poniatowa is to be carried to its final conclusion."

A. I have never seen any such order.

Q. I will read you the description that Morgan gave as to what took place: "The proceeding was always the same. The night before the execution came the order to build very hastily shelters in zig-zag against air raids. In the early morning came troops and the execution began in these trenches. The prisoners had to leave their work and to attend in the neighborhood of the trenches. When their time came, they had to undress and naked, pass through the trench one after one in an infinite line. Coming to the first dead the victim had to lie down on the dead body and then was killed by a shot from a gun in the neck. This went on so long until the trench was filled and the last person was dead. Then the trenches were closed. The naked men had their own trenches, and the women theirs. Children were with their mothers. None of the victims had been ill-treated before executions. All passed in a methodical, silent way. The troops formed only a cordon and had nothing to do with it. There had been a few German police, and the most were Ukrainian. On each place there were only two or three killers who were placed above the trench. Behind them were two or three other men who spent all their time charging empty magazines. So the executions were going very quick, and the responsibility was only in the hands of very few men." Here is a second sentence: "It was the old, tried system." Do you agree that it was an old tried system?

A. I am not familiar with the method.

Q. Further on, this report of Morgan's states that extermination had been so complete that there was at last nobody left to burn the cadavers, and it was only with great difficulty that they rounded up enough Russian prisoners of war to do the burying. Did you know SS Sturmbannfuehrer Wippern, in command at Lublin?

*Reich Leader of the SS (Himmler).

A. No.

Q. What became of all the money, jewelry, and gold of the dead prisoners out of these camps?

A. I don't know.

Q. Didn't you ever receive any report as to what was done with these valuables?

A. No.

Q. You disclaim any knowledge of this incident that took place in the autumn of 1943 at Lublin?

A. Yes. It is impossible that this report had been sent to me. I would have been to see Himmler or Hitler on the very first day; on the very same day.

Q. When Morgan made inquiries into the reasons for the mass executions, he was told by the local Sturmbannfuehrer that this was top secret but that it had been ordered by Himmler himself, after a personal report by Dr. Kaltenbrunner. How do you account for that?

A. Absolutely impossible.

Q. What report did you ever make on the camp at Lublin, or camps holding Jewish inmates elsewhere, that contained any recommendation which would lead to extermination of these people?

A. I never in my life made any such recommendations.

Q. That's all you have to say about it, is it?

A. Yes.

Excerpts from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 16 October 1945, 1030-1210, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: Nancy M. Shields, BCV, Reporter; Captain H. W. Frank, Interpreter.

Lynching of Enemy "Terror Aviators"

Q. I would like to have you tell us about the conference that was held at the Fuehrer's headquarters on 6 June 1944 at Klessheim in the afternoon.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall that conference?

A. I don't know which conference you are talking about.

Q. (Referring to Doc. 735-PS) You reported to the Assistant Chief of the Command Staff of the Wehrmacht that a discussion was held a short time before, between Goering, Ribbentrop (as Foreign Secretary), Himmler (as Reichsfuehrer SS) on the subject of the treatment of enemy "terror aviators".

INTERROGATIONS

A. I have never made such a report.

Q. Let me refresh you further. Whereas the Foreign Secretary had wanted to include every type of "terror attack" against the domestic population, agreement was reached at the conference that only strafing committed directly against civilian populations would be deemed a criminal act.

A. I have never participated in any such conference.

Q. I show you a photostatic copy of the secret summary of Warlimont's conference with Kaltenbrunner on the lynching of certain allied aviators, in its German text and ask you to read it and tell us what you recall about the conference.

A. (Reading document) This is totally incorrect.

Q. Finish reading it, then tell us what you think you know about it.

A. This must be a mix-up with the Reichsfuehrer SS or some other person. I have never received an invitation to comment on this question, but much later when I heard about it I have spoken against it in reports.

Q. How much later?

A. That I cannot say but I assume it was in the summer of 1944.

Q. From whom did you hear about it?

A. These reports came from various districts of the Reich, saying that the population intended to lynch these fliers who had inflicted such punishment and caused so many victims.

Q. But that was only after you had set up through your organization a plan for going into and reporting on such cases, isn't that right?

A. No. I have never made a plan but have summarized the reports which I received and submitted the summary to a higher authority, saying that such action was impossible. You can see from one of the last paragraphs of this report that the highest people in the Reich were occupied with this question and I did not belong to that highest department.

Q. Without regard to what you belonged to, the fact is that you conferred with Warlimont and you expressed views as shown by this document?

A. No. I had no conference with Warlimont.

Q. Do you believe that this is not a correct copy of an official document?

A. I don't know, but the contents are not correct.

KALTENBRUNNER

Q. You know that a very efficient German General Staff would never write a top secret document without being sure of the facts; isn't that right?

A. This can only be an error on the part of Warlimont regarding the person.

Q. Another instance where everyone else is wrong but Kaltenbrunner?

A. Permit me to suggest that you ask Warlimont. I have no recollection of having had any discussion with him and under the circumstances I do not believe that he would have said it.

Q. What did you say when Warlimont asked whether cases involving supposed criminal enemy fliers arose, of whether the SD were in a position to investigate and construct such cases in all details?

A. I have never discussed this subject with Warlimont.

Q. But you recall you told him that you were not in a position to make such investigations or to prepare such cases?

A. No.

INTERPRETER: He says it is necessary for him to say some more on the subject. Do you want to hear it?

Q. As long as it is pertinent.

A. Warlimont says here: "To hand over to SD". Ask Warlimont whether he considered the SD an executive department or not.

Q. Let us first ask Kaltenbrunner what he said when Warlimont suggested that the procedure for the segregation of such fliers should be handled through the SD?

A. He has never discussed that with me at all and I could therefore have made no definition of my attitude. I am fully convinced, however, that I know whom he has talked to about this, but it was not me.

Q. Who was it?

A. It could only have been a person authorized by Himmler, because this was a matter for the OKW,* the Foreign Minister and the Reichsfuehrer SS office.

Q. It could have been anyone.

A. And it could only have been a person authorized in this case by Himmler, who had continuous contact with him.

Q. It could have been anyone and this paper shows it was Kaltenbrunner.

A. There is only one thing—confront me with Warlimont and see what he will say. He will say "No," because he cannot say anything else.

* The OKW (Obercommando der Wehrmacht) or Armed Forces High Command, headed by Field Marshal Keitel.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. There is only one Obergruppenfuehrer Kaltenbrunner, is there not?

A. That is correct, and these matters were always handled by one man in negotiations with the OKW and the Foreign Ministry, who was authorized by Himmler, and that man was Fegelein.

Q. Why do you persist in giving these answers which are obviously in error and probably constitute perjury in the face of established facts?

A. My punishment, I assume, will be the same in any case, and I have therefore no cause to lie to you, but there is no point in confirming someone's error in this case. I cannot do that.

Skorzeny's Use of American Equipment at Friedenthal

Q. I am going to ask you now about your dealings with Skorzeny and what you had to do with the concentration of American guns and vehicles at Friedenthal?

A. Nothing at all.

Q. What use did Skorzeny make of such guns and vehicles?

A. That I do not know.

Q. What use was made of American uniforms by Skorzeny's men?

A. That I do not know, either.

Q. What did you and Schellenberg have to do with these operations?

A. He was the chief of Amt VI and in particular of Department MIL.

Q. You recall, of course, that Skorzeny had special missions such as the rescue of Mussolini?

A. Yes. This he was ordered to do directly by Hitler.

Q. And he also was active on the western front later?

A. That I do not know. I didn't know at the beginning, but I heard about it later.

Q. My question is, what did you have to do with helping his operation? The operation which involved the use of American uniforms, vehicles, guns, and other equipment?

A. I had not helped him in any way and I knew nothing whatsoever about this. Ask him yourself.

Q. You recall, don't you, furnishing him certain foreigners out of concentration camps for special purposes?

A. No.

Q. You had nothing to do with that?

A. No. Ask him. He is here. Put him on this chair, and I will guarantee you that he will say, "No, he had nothing to do with me and never discussed these matters with me." It would be very important for me that you do this and this would furnish proof that I had nothing to do with these matters. If he required assistance from the concentration camps, he could have achieved this through Himmler or Mueller, but not through me.

Kaltenbrunner Considers Himself "A Substitute Guilty Party"

Q. How do you account for the fact that in all these matters concerning concentration camps, you say that it was the responsibility of Himmler, Mueller, Pohl, Gluecks, and others, yet other witnesses always mention Kaltenbrunner?

A. I am convinced that not all other witnesses did say that. I am also convinced that you have never put a statement to the contrary before me, just as I am convinced that hundreds of witnesses would prove me right. If Himmler were alive, I guarantee he would have these questions put to him by you, and not I.

Q. Was Himmler's word good?

A. Not because his word is good but because you would then not be embarrassed about the personality of, in fact, the guilty party.

Q. Let me refer to your own description of Himmler. In some of your earlier interrogations you made reference to questions involving the cases of non-Germans where they became involved in criminal cases and you said that those cases were always referred to Himmler personally to determine the punishment?

A. This is not correct. This concerned a special type of non-German criminals.

Q. Don't you recall, you said: "These examples show, not only what sort of a pedantic old schoolmaster he was and the pleasure he enjoyed by personally inflicting punishment but also how all authority for passing sentences, that is, executive power, was forbidden me?"

A. Yes.

Q. That was your description, wasn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. You would like to have him as your witness, is that correct?

A. Not that he were my witness, but that he were alive so that you could address these questions to him as the guilty party and not me, Kaltenbrunner, because you brought up the question how it is that everybody is always talking about me, while I am always talking about Himmler, Mueller, Pohl, and Gluecks, but whenever I find that these questions you should have addressed to these men (and I don't know if they are alive; all I know is that Himmler is dead) I must come to the conclusion that you are looking for a substitute guilty party.

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpt from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 18 October 1945, 1435-1715, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: Capt. F. W. Frank, Interpreter; S/Sgt. H. Joyce, Reporter.

Absorption of the Abwehr into the RSHA

Q. Who directed the reorganization of Amt IV in 1944, after the RSHA had absorbed the Abwehr?

A. I should like to make a lengthy statement for your information. The Department Abwehr in the OKW was headed by Admiral Canaris. Hitler was dissatisfied with the activities of this department during a number of years. For which particular reasons I am unable to say. It is possible that Himmler carried out psychological preparations for Hitler, but I have reason to believe that the particular reason why Hitler wished to dissolve this department was because he had been inefficiently informed about two important military matters. He called Admiral Canaris the guilty party for this, and I thought he considered it improper procedure to have information obtained from a body of officers which was not altogether satisfactorily coordinated. Secondly, he ordered (I think it was in the middle of February 1944) that this department (OKW-Abwehr) was to be separated from the OKW and to be taken over by the Reichs Leader SS Himmler. He desired, in the first place, the creation of a coordinated German Intelligence Service. For this reason the Department OKW-Abwehr was divided into numerous departments. It was divided into: Department Intelligence-Defense; secondly, a Department of Active Intelligence; and lastly, a Department of Intelligence Proper. I have had the experience in London* that the German word Abwehr has a completely different meaning in the German language than that which you know. I do not know whether this is known here. OKW-Abwehr was a much larger conception than that you have of Abwehr. It meant not only Abwehr, but also Offensive Espionage and Intelligence on British questions. After this decision had been made by Hitler after lengthy negotiations with Himmler, and, I believe Keitel—whether Admiral Canaris was also present it is impossible for me to say—I was also called to the Fuehrer's headquarters one day, and told that I was to take over, by order of Himmler, the intelligence side.

*Kaltenbrunner was interned and interrogated in England before his transfer to the Nurnberg prison.

Q. What was the date?

A. It must have been on the 18th or 20th of February 1944. Other functions of the Department OKW-Abwehr were given by Himmler to Mueller and Schellenberg. I do not believe that the negotiations, lasting for months and dealing with the dissolution of the OKW-Abwehr and the taking over of the entire department [Abwehr] and its personnel, were brought to a conclusion before the end of May or beginning of June. These negotiations were conducted, in the first place, by Schellenberg, and in the second place by Mueller. My personal feelings in the matter, if I may say this, are that a large percentage of this department [Abwehr] was actively involved in the events of 20 July. This feeling of mine was confirmed when I had heard statements from fellow detainees of mine in London. Something which, in spite of my repeated remonstrations, you have not so far believed, may in this manner become a little clearer to you. That is that the 20th of July brought about a considerable earthquake in the organizations of the Reich, and that Himmler became Chief of the German Reserve Army. Previously he had taken Department Abwehr away from the OKW; now he became Chief of the Reserve Army, and thus, the nerve center of militarization.

He also had some considerable interest in the matters of military intelligence, just as the Army had before, a function which the Army was reluctant to part with. This was the reason why he obviously had to retain the immensely important Amt VI /Mil.

Q. What did you have to do with the formation or organization of VI/Mil and the other changes which took place in 1944?

A. Nothing, insofar as I was still expecting that this department would introduce political reports into the masses of reports which previously went through channels reaching the OKW. The Department OKW-Abwehr received political information and intelligence, not only military intelligence. That was the original cause of the friction between Himmler and Canaris, and there was supposed to have been agreement in the past; quite a number of orders were received, according to which OKW was only to concern itself with military organization, and political matters were to go to Himmler's organization. But these, I believe, were never obeyed.

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpts from Testimony of Ernst Kaltenbrunner, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 November 1945, 1430-1545, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, IGD. Also present: John Albert, Interpreter; Frances Karr, Reporter.

Q. You are not asked to speak under oath. You understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. Referring again to the draft of a message found among your papers, just what did you do that caused this message to be written?

A. I do not think it is possible for me to prepare, at the same time, my defense counsel and the prosecution.

Q. Do you mean you want at this time to be with your counsel?

A. I would like to talk with my defense counsel about this piece of Kaltenbrunner writing before I make statements here. Apparently my statements yesterday were not believed here because I was interrogated on it yesterday.

Q. Well, you recall that we interrupted your interrogation to permit you to talk to counsel. We had not completed. However, it is your privilege to talk to your counsel and I would not infringe on that.

A. Now, I do not have any consultation with my lawyer at the moment.

Q. Well, I am not going to ask you any more questions about this document until you have had a chance to see him.

Treatment of Commandos and Airborne Troops

Q. When did you first have knowledge as to the order issued by Hitler, dated 18 October 1942, dealing with the treatment of commandos and airborne troops?

A. I do not know that order at all.

Q. Never heard of it?

A. No.

Q. I show you a photostatic copy of the original order (498-PS) and ask you to examine it, particularly to examine the signature and tell us what you know about it.

A. (Witness examines document.) The signature I identify as that of Adolf Hitler.

Q. Others have already identified it too. It seems to be well known. What else can you say about the order?

A. The order itself has not been known to me but I read something in the German press about this addition to the order of the armed forces, but I do not recall very much what provisions were made from the German side. I recall mainly the propagandistic evaluation of the brutal measures of the enemy.

Q. Well, if you will let yourself reflect, you will remember that is a basic order that was referred to right down through the war as the standard treatment for those kind of prisoners, and that it was carried into practice.

A. I do not know that it was executed. I had nothing to do with the treatment of war prisoners.

Q. If that is true, how do you explain your letter of 23 January 1945, which makes reference to the earlier order of 18 October 1942 (535-PS) ?

A. (Witness examines document.) This letter cannot have originated with me.

Q. Isn't that your signature?

A. Yes, it certainly resembles my signature. I cannot recall that I ever signed such a letter.

Q. Well, the letter speaks for itself. It is not very old, it is only from January 1945. You have a pretty good memory on other matters. Think a little longer on it and tell us how it came up.

A. It certainly originated with Amt IV and I myself had never been in written communication with an office of the armed forces. Therefore, I do not believe that I signed this letter. Maybe a rubber stamp was used.

Q. Maybe anything. Why don't you tell us what you know about it instead of being so evasive?

A. I am not giving evasive answers. I just don't know anything about it.

Q. You don't know anything about the Fuehrer's order of 18 October 1942?

A. No. That which I have been shown before, no.

Q. You don't know anything about your conference with Warlimont on June 4, 1944?

A. No. About this I was interrogated by you in the other room before.

Q. That is correct and you denied the authenticity of the minutes which were made by Warlimont and it was on the same subject as this letter.

A. Yes.

Q. And now you say that this letter, although signed by you, was never seen by you and never known to you?

A. No. I never signed it.

Q. How do you expect any reasonable man to believe you in the face of this written evidence?

INTERROGATIONS

A. That I don't know. I hope that I will be believed because I will be able to prove in various other matters that I am telling the truth.

Q. I will prove in another matter that you have not been telling the truth.

A. I hope I will also be able to prove that Mr. Warlimont was not always used to telling the truth.

Kaltenbrunner Denies Observing Gassings at Mauthausen

Q. Let me refer to another little matter which has been the subject of considerable questioning. In your interrogation in London and here, both before other officers and myself, you have denied ever having visited a concentration camp, isn't that right?

A. Yes.

Q. Well now, in anticipation of what you can expect the prosecution to show, I will tell you that a very well known Gauleiter from Austria has testified and given an affidavit that he visited Mauthausen, in company with you and Himmler, in 1942.*

A. I can imagine why Gauleiter Eigruber said so.

Q. I didn't say it was Eigruber.

A. In his Gau the only concentration camp in Austria was located.

Q. That has nothing to do with the statement of facts that I have just made. The point is, you visited the camp which you consistently deny.

A. I have never visited it, neither with Himmler nor with Eigruber.

Q. Another witness will testify that you not only visited the camp, but you were seen going to the observation point, where the gas chamber was operated, while a gas operation was in progress in which human beings were gassed to death, and you were seen leaving that same point.

A. I want to die on the spot if that is correct.

Shooting of Prisoners of War

Q. Don't you recall who had charge of the military administration in prisoner of war camps?

A. No.

Q. Do you know General Berger of the SS?

A. Yes, I knew him.

Q. You will recall General Berger had the administration of

*See document 3870-PS, Vol. VI, pp. 790, 795.

See document 3846-PS, Vol. VI, pp. 783, 785; affidavit E, Vol. VIII, p. 630.

KALTENBRUNNER

prisoner of war camps under the SS from 1 October 1944 to the end.

A. I think that is incorrect because the prisoner of war camps were not put under the SS but Himmler, as the Chief of the German Replacement Army, was put in charge of all matters concerning war prisoners.

Q. And in turn, General Berger of the SS, acting as Himmler's deputy by direct order of Hitler, was put in charge of the PW camps?

A. It is correct that Berger was the general deputy of Himmler because he was Chief of the SS Chief Office. That such an order was signed by Hitler, is unknown to me. But I know that Berger repeatedly represented Himmler in questions of war prisoners.

Q. How did that come to your attention?

A. One discussed such matters.

Q. Well, tell us about the procedure where, when prisoners escaped from prisoner of war camps, they were turned over to the Secret Police, and what was done with them thereafter.

A. They were not turned over to the Gestapo but were given back to the War Prisoners' Office.

Q. You remember the case of the 80 British flyers who escaped from Stalag Luft 3, that took place in March 1944?

A. That case is unknown to me.

Q. Don't you remember what Hitler said should have been done to these men?

A. No.

Q. Then some of the army officials said that they could not violate the Geneva convention?

A. No.

Q. But your police reported to General Keitel that 50 of them had already been shot?

A. No.

Q. Don't you remember the reports you got from the camp commander at Goerlitz?

A. No.

Q. I am sure that was an important enough event to come to your attention. They took them outside the camp to shoot them and then cremated them later.

A. You tell me things I do not know.

Q. General Westhoff attempted to find out from the Gestapo what had happened to these men.

A. If he had negotiations with the Gestapo he did not negotiate with me.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Are you sure?

A. Yes.

Q. You deny knowledge of these 80 British flyers, British prisoners, having been captured and turned over to the State Police? What do you say about the general proposition that the escaped prisoners were turned over to the Gestapo?

A. Such cases are not known to me and in any case, it is incorrect. I would like to call your attention to the following fact. You talk now as if always war prisoners, who escaped and were recaptured, would be turned over to the Secret State Police. At another point you believe Herr Warlimont when this man says they were turned over to the SD. There is a discrepancy.

Q. You said that meeting never took place.

A. I only said now you believe Mr. Warlimont when he says—

Q. What I believe has no bearing on my question to you wherein I state a fact, as I am about to state, that over 600 American prisoners were found in a Gestapo concentration camp.

A. That I do not know. That only should have been done on order from Himmler to the Gestapo. I had nothing to do with such orders.

Treatment of Commandos and Airborne Troops

Q. Well, let us go back to the subject we took up earlier, before we got on the question of veracity. I showed you your letter of 23 January 1945 which makes reference to the earlier Hitler Order of 18 October 1942, as to how commandos were to be dealt with. Let me show you some other documents. The first two documents (540-PS) appear to be a draft followed by the letter that was signed. Those two are dated 30 January 1945 and 8 February 1945.

I will read this paragraph into the record: "On recommendation of the Chief of the Security Police and the Security Service (SD), the letter of 28 September 1944 is corrected as follows:

"The Fuehrer's Order on the elimination of terrorists and saboteurs in the occupied territories of 30 July 1944, as well as 18 August, 1944 (No. OKW/WEST/Qu2/Verw. 1 009169/44g/Kdes) refers only to non-German civilian persons in the occupied territories.

"For the treatment of commandos the Fuehrer's Order of 18 October 1942 (OKW/WEST Qu2/Verw. No. 003830/42 g.Kdes) is still valid."

"By direction—"

To which there is a reply, which contains this last paragraph:

KALTENBRUNNER

"However, since the Security Service (SD) does not agree to this, a difference of opinion in this case appears to be immaterial. Earliest decision is requested since answer to SS General Doctor Kaltenbrunner is to be sent as soon as possible."

Now, do these communications serve to refresh your recollection any?

A. No.

Q. You still deny knowledge of the letter of 23 January 1945?

A. I do not recall the letter.

Q. And you deny knowledge of any subsequent action taken by the Commander of the Southeast?

A. Of course. Apart from the fact that this commander of the Southeast was not subordinated to me, he was subordinated to the armed forces commanders.

Q. We understand how the police operated in conjunction with the army. It was not necessarily a direct channel of command.

A. But this was a letter from the Supreme Commander of the armed forces to the Commander Southeast of the armed forces.

Q. That is clear from the document but it makes reference to the letter that has to be sent to you as soon as possible. And they even revised the draft, which is the first copy, to include the sentence referring to you in the signed copy, showing that he had knowledge of your letter and the action that was to be expected.

A. From that it can only be seen that the armed forces intended to write a letter to me. Whether rightly or wrongly and whether I was the right authority to write to, is open to question. In any case, the armed forces wanted to get in touch with the Gestapo, as can be seen from this exchange of letters and I am convinced that an officer of the Gestapo, namely that one mentioned on top of the letter, has written this document (pointing to 535-PS).

Q. Well, this is the letter that you know nothing about, but that nevertheless established just how you accomplished your desires by writing to the Supreme Command of the armed forces. That is very clear.

A. But I deny that I have written this letter.

Q. No, you just didn't know about it, but now you deny it?

A. I not only did not know the Hitler Order, but I also did not know this letter.

Q. But you acknowledge your signature?

A. I did not say that this is my signature, I only said that it resembles my signature and I also said it is possible that a rubber stamp, bearing my signature, was used. I cannot recall a letter of such contents, signed by myself.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Would it be any more convincing to you if you saw the original letter, signed in ink?

A. I could be more convinced but it would still not prove that I signed in ink.

Q. There was only one Dr. Kaltenbrunner on 23 January 1945 who was chief of the Sicherheitspolizei?

A. But maybe this certain Ernst Kaltenbrunner was not in Berlin just at the time.

Q. Just answer my question first. Is that true?

A. Certainly.

Q. And you were the man?

A. No. I did not have the function which you imply this man had.

Q. I do not imply anything. I ask you if you are the man who held this position?

A. No.

Q. You are not the man?

A. There was no other Ernst Kaltenbrunner who was Chief of the Security Police. But this Ernst Kaltenbrunner, who sits opposite you and whom you call Chief of the Security Police and SD on January 23, did not write this letter. (To the Interpreter) I did not say this. I said this Ernst Kaltenbrunner, who sits opposite you, did not have the function of Chief of Security Police and SD on January 23, 1945.

Q. What was your function at that time?

A. As I described to you frequently, I was in charge of the Intelligence Service.

Q. You have, of course, denied responsibility for anything that was done in AmT IV and AmT V and AmT VI, except in a minor way in the latter case.

A. I denied any responsibility as to AmT VI, as far as AmT MIL was concerned. The reports on foreign policy, made by AmT VI, I partly used in my reports.

Q. The testimony of other witnesses, who served many years in the RSHA, is that you were, in fact, the Chief of the RSHA and that you exercised and executed control throughout the organization as you would have been expected to do.

A. That testimony is incorrect.

Q. And further, that during the period between Heydrich's death and your appointment to the Chief of RSHA, Amt Chiefs did deal directly with Himmler and that thereafter, everything cleared through you, with a few exceptions.

KALTENBRUNNER

A. That testimony is also incorrect but I think it is also incorrect to use me for elaborating on the prosecutor's case against me.

Q. Well, this is for your benefit, unless you find this boring.

A. It is not boring to me. I have had the feeling in all my previous interrogations, that you are always looking for evidence of my guilt and that you are not taking into consideration any points which would be in my favor. I find myself now in the state of preparation for my defense and I do not find it appropriate that you continue to look for material which would incriminate me.

Q. Is your statement made in the form of an objection to further questioning?

A. In that sense as I stated it right now. If there is a possibility to be confronted with witnesses and do something about testimony in my favor, I would be very glad to continue. But even there, I have the feeling that it would be better to do this during the evidence at the trial itself. I believe I should discuss this first with my defense attorney.

Q. If there is any question in your mind about whether you should go further in any interrogation by the Office of United States Chief of Counsel, I think you should talk to your counsel too. You have never been under any compulsion to answer either before or since this indictment was served. I think you will agree your treatment has been fair in all the circumstances.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you now desire to see your defense counsel and then send a message through your guard, if you are willing to submit to further questioning?

A. Yes. I will do so.

Q. In view of a doubt in your mind as to whether you should go forward any further with these interrogations, we will suspend. I do want to point out, however, that confrontation with documentary evidence has, of course, worked both ways. It is to put you on notice of things that are evidence against you and at the same time, to give you an opportunity to explain, if there is any explanation. That will be all for now.

A. And after I have talked to my defense counsel on Monday I should report the result here, is that right?

Q. Only if you desire or are willing to be interrogated further by the Office of the United States Chief of Counsel.

INTERROGATIONS

VI. ALFRED ROSENBERG*

Excerpts from Testimony of Alfred Rosenberg taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 14 August 1945, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD. Also present: Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD; Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD; Maj. Arne Brogger, FA, OUSCC representative in Norway; Mr. Thomas Dodd; Mr. Jens Hauge, Legal Secretary to the Norwegian Prime Minister; Mr. Helge Silvertsen and Mr. Ivar Follestad, representatives of Norwegian Government.

Nazi Dealings With Quisling

Q. What part did Quisling play in the military plans designed and carried out by this special staff?

A. When Quisling came to me in 1939 he came to me with his troubles dealing with the Norwegian situation. I, as a German citizen, believed it my duty to inform the Fuehrer about it. So did Raeder. Also, I seemed to think that the Fuehrer made it a point not to let Quisling know about the operation in advance.

Q. From what did you gather that?

A. Because the Fuehrer at the time told me that this question was being dealt with by the OKW and he also told me not to contact anybody about this subject.

Q. Was the appointment of Quisling, on 9 April 1940, and of his Government in Norway, a part of the military plan?

A. Of course, Quisling made the political remarks that he would be the logical man to bring about the correct changes. With the beginning of the military operation, it was the Foreign Office which took charge of the political situation. I heard afterwards that Under-Secretary of State Habicht was in Oslo at the time and dealt with that question.

Q. What job was Quisling promised after the proposed German occupation of Norway?

A. As far as I know, Quisling himself felt to be the Prime Minister and I also believe that he felt himself able to bring about changes in Norway by himself.

Q. I don't care what Quisling thought. I want to know what you and the Fuehrer planned about this matter.

A. I do not believe that the Fuehrer made any sort of promises to Quisling.

Q. What about you?

*See also document 3719-PS, Vol. VI, p. 436.

See document 004-PS, Vol. III, p. 19.

A. In this case, I of course thought that it would be the correct thing for him to be the Prime Minister.

Q. Did you not indicate that to him?

A. I believed that to be the case. I cannot, however, speak to him about any position which might be given out in the future. When Quisling was ousted, a new Reich Commissioner, Terboven, was put in.

Q. I don't believe you have been telling the truth at all about the negotiations between yourself and Quisling and the Fuehrer concerning this Norway situation. It is impossible for you to have occupied the position which you had in the negotiations and still not know, for example, what Quisling was to get out of this arrangement. We don't want you to waste our time this way. You have already stated that you thought of Quisling as becoming Prime Minister. Is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you not convey that thought to Quisling? Yes or no.

A. It is possible that it was talked about.

Q. Anything is possible, and I don't want to hear about its being possible. I want to know whether actually you didn't convey that impression to Quisling.

A. I conveyed that thought myself, and I of course accepted it as a fact.

Q. In other words, you encouraged that thought, did you not?

A. He did not need any help for that purpose.

Q. Did you discourage it? Yes or no.

A. No.

Q. Did you not also convey the same thought to the Fuehrer?

A. As far as I can say now, I never talked to the Fuehrer about later possibilities in any stable form.

Q. Is it not a fact that Quisling was led to believe that he was to become Prime Minister?

A. To the best of my knowledge, Quisling was to bring about a change in Norway with more or less help from Germany. He conveyed the thought that he would be the Prime Minister of Norway. To my knowledge the Fuehrer could not have made him any promises because otherwise the newly formed Quisling cabinet in Norway would not have been ousted by the German Government.

Q. But the Fuehrer could have been of some assistance in that respect, could he not?

A. I believe in this case the Fuehrer was holding back very much.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Would it not be fair to say that Quisling, as a result of the conversations which he had with you and with the Fuehrer, believed that he was to receive a reward in the shape of becoming the Prime Minister?

A. This seems believable to me.

Q. It is apparent, is it not, that you were working out plans with Quisling for the taking over of Norway?

A. The reason for Quisling's coming to Germany was brought about by a fear that in any event of change, the northern part of Norway might be occupied by Russia via Finland, and the southern part by the Western allies. This seemed to be sound reasoning to me, and therefore I hoped Germany would help him. I also will state that Quisling hoped to work together with the King.

Q. But how about these people that you were planning to put into certain positions?

A. Quisling was evidently thinking of putting his own men, men like Hagelin, into responsible government positions.

Q. You knew that, didn't you?

A. I did not know very many Norwegian people.

Q. Were you trying to help Quisling in his effort to put his people into these positions before the operation had been completed?

A. Quisling mentioned several names, but my knowledge of Norwegians was limited, until 1939, to Quisling and several Norwegian writers.

Q. Did you not report to the Fuehrer the plans which you were making with Quisling for the taking over of Norway?

A. Quisling had a fantastic plan for the seizing of Norway. He was to bring Norwegians to Germany for training purposes and use these troops later on. It is possible that I told the Fuehrer and also Goering about these plans. Probably we listened attentively to these plans. If they were of consequence for the operation, I don't know.

Q. It is not only possible, but it is a fact, is it not, that you discussed it with Hitler and Goering?

A. The Fuehrer told me that he always had intended to keep a neutrality between Germany and the Scandinavian countries. After the facts disclosed by Quisling to me and transmitted by me to the Fuehrer were so evident and concrete, that the Fuehrer saw himself forced to act accordingly. After the Norwegian campaign the Fuehrer told me of German navy ships coming in contact with British naval craft at Trondheim.

Q. How many troops and how many people were going to be brought into Germany by Quisling?

A. I cannot recall the amount of people. I only know that he wanted to bring some male admirers of his into Germany.

Q. You know that he proposed to have troops in Germany, don't you?

A. Yes. That he wanted to train his Norwegian followers.

Q. For what purpose?

A. To help him secure a change of government in Norway.

Q. But you do recall that you had worked out plans with Quisling for taking over Norway, all of which plans were from time to time reported to the Fuehrer and received his approval; and with Goering also.

A. The messages were given by Staff Leader Schickedanz to State Secretary Koerner and he was asked to submit all the messages to Goering. If Goering was widely interested in all this, I do not know. Of course, according to my duties, I kept the Fuehrer informed on all these situations.

Q. Why was Quisling dismissed on 13 April 1940 as head of the Norwegian Government, to which he had been appointed on 9 April?

A. This is not known to me because of that fact that at the moment of military operations, the Foreign Office took charge of all Government matters.

Q. Did you not discuss it with representatives of the Foreign Office, or with the Fuehrer, or with Goering?

A. Of course, I kept the Fuehrer instructed on all matters which were brought to my attention.

Q. Is it not a fact that Quisling was ousted later because he didn't deliver Norway to a peaceful state after the German invasion?

A. Do you mean by this question that—

Q. I mean that Quisling failed to carry out his part of the bargain. Isn't that so?

A. That I don't know. I had absolutely nothing to do with the ousting of Quisling.

Q. But didn't you hear about it?

A. No.

Q. Nothing?

A. No.

Q. I don't believe it.

A. I was very much disappointed when I heard about the later developments.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. It is inconceivable that you don't know more about it than you are stating.

A. I want to mention that I did not even know and was not informed that a Reich Commissioner was put into power in Norway, and I was only informed about it when I came back from travels.

Q. Didn't Terboven oppose Quisling because of his failure to deliver on his part of the bargain?

A. Which bargain?

Q. The bargain that we have been talking about. The arrangements between Germany and Quisling.

A. Quisling made only the reports to him, and he reported to the Fuehrer.

Q. What was your policy toward Quisling after April 1940?

A. Quisling paid me a visit in Berlin which was quite unofficial because I was forbidden to mix into any business affairs concerning Norway, because a Reich Commissioner had been appointed.

Q. What was the conversation at the informal visit?

A. Quisling complained about the Reich Commissioner Terboven.

Q. What was the complaint?

A. He told me that Terboven was not familiar with the Norwegian mentality and that he had several incapable assistants.

Q. What else was talked about between you?

A. This visit occurred at the time when Quisling was restored to his position as Prime Minister.

Q. What was the approximate date?

A. I cannot recall it, but the date may be established out of any newspaper.

Q. What did you say to him?

A. I told him that I agreed in some ways with him, but that he had to go the official way through the Foreign Office, or to the Fuehrer directly. Not the Foreign Office, but the Chief of the Reich Chancellory, Dr. Lammers.

Q. Were you present at any conversations subsequent to April 1940 between the Fuehrer and Quisling?

A. I never attended any discussions between the Fuehrer and Quisling.

Q. Did Quisling ever tell you that if a peace was concluded by the German Government with his Government, that he would see to it that a number of Norwegian divisions be furnished the German Government for its operations?

A. I have to say that I cannot recall. As far as I recall it, things did not go that far at the time. Quisling had the wish that Germany establish a peace with Norway and that a Norwegian Ministry be established in Berlin.

Q. Did not Quisling propose to overcome Norwegian resistance by any means possible?

A. I cannot recall that this was being discussed. Of course, he was very confident and hopeful to get German assistance.

Q. You don't deny, do you, that it was being discussed?

A. According to the Denkschrift (memorial) which was brought to my attention a little while ago, Quisling was confident to get the German Government's assistance after his establishment in Norway.

Q. That was the whole plan, was it not? Yes or no.

A. This was Quisling's plan, which was brought to our attention.

Q. And in which you cooperated?

A. Due to Quisling's fears, meaning now the occupation of Norway by Russia and the Allies, I saw myself compelled to talk to the Fuehrer about it.

Q. And you did, didn't you?

A. I very seldom talked to the Fuehrer. Most of our business was transacted in writing.

Q. I didn't say seldom or often. I said you did on this occasion, did you not?

A. Hitler's disposition on all military matters and the fact if he agreed to Quisling's plan or not, I don't know.

Q. You found out eventually, didn't you?

A. I got the news out of the newspaper that Norway was being invaded.

Q. What suggestions did Quisling make as to the number of German troops necessary for the carrying out of plans for the invasion of Norway?

A. I do not know if he had any intentions of making a major operation, the way Hitler brought it about. If there were any military discussions on this subject, they were without my knowledge.

INTERROGATIONS

Testimony of Alfred Rosenberg, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 24 September 1945, 1430-1530, by Lt. Col. Thomas A. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Origin and Activities of the Hohe Schule

Q. At one of the previous meetings, you stated that one of the previous positions you held was with reference to the development of the Hohe Schule; is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Just exactly what was this school intended to mean?

A. It has been found necessary in the general educational program of the Party to establish a school which would be for further education outside of the daily politics and pamphlets which were issued. Several offices intimated that they had the wish to establish such a school, and it was then established.

Q. By whose order was it established?

A. The Fuehrer empowered me, by decree, to make the necessary preparations even during the war, although this was in small measure.

Q. Actually, this school had been started prior to the commencement of the war, had it not?

A. Thoughts for the founding of such an institute had been expressed for a long time. However, the first decree to establish such a school was only issued in 1941.

Q. Isn't it a fact that as early as 1938, this school had been contemplated?

A. Yes, although the wish for such a central school of research had been discussed for many years.

Q. Isn't it true that even the name had been given it as early as 1938?

A. There had been many suggestions as to the name of the school, among others there were Hohe Schule or Central Academy, and then at the suggestion of Dr. Ley in 1941, the Fuehrer chose this name.

Q. From where was it expected that the material used in this school would be obtained?

A. I founded several smaller institutes of research in preparation for this school. Then we also bought a number of scientific libraries in the Reich, and also scientific books abroad, from, among others, Denmark.

*The Hohe Schule was originally designed to become the center for Nazi ideological and educational research. See document 136-PS, vol. III, p. 184. It soon developed, however, into a project for the seizure of cultural treasures, and became known as the Einsatzstab Rosenberg. See document 141-PS, vol. III, p. 188.

Q. Where else did you expect to get materials for this school?

A. In 1940, it was learned that several Jewish institutions had collapsed in Paris, and when it became evidenced that these Jews would not return, I got permission to collect several scientific libraries from these sources.

Q. From whom did you get that permission?

A. From the Fuehrer.

Q. Did you inform him of the fact that these libraries were available?

A. A suggestion as to this came from many sides, also as to objects of art which had been left. Part of these came from one of my assistants, part of it from people from the Luftwaffe and also, I think, from the press.

Q. Were these suggestions made to you and in turn you made them to the Fuehrer, or were the suggestions made directly to the Fuehrer?

A. I don't remember exactly. So far as I know, some of my assistants talked with people in the Party Chancellory, and also with people of the Luftwaffe and then I got this mission.

Q. Did you inform the Fuehrer of the availability of this material and ask his permission to obtain it for the Hohe Schule?

A. As I explained, my assistants got in touch with people from the Party Chancellory, and then, as far as I know, this was reported to Hitler. So far as I know, I did not talk with him personally about it but I only got permission to get these things.

Q. You were interested, prior to 1940, in obtaining material for this school, were you not?

A. Yes, I had interest in getting material for research when the thing became acute.

Q. You had, as a matter of fact, also obtained materials for this school; isn't that right?

A. You mean before it was actually founded?

Q. Yes.

A. The materials were secured anyway for further research work; then later they were in turn secured by the central library for the Hohe Schule for further research work.

Q. That was under your direction, wasn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Weren't large amounts of material for use by the school obtained through the confiscation of Jewish property in Germany?

A. As far as I know, I received little or nothing from that source. The confiscation was executed by the police, and, so far as I know, they kept the material.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Do you remember having any communications with Bormann regarding the obtaining of materials for these schools?

A. I would like to make an addition to a question, which I was asked before, when I was asked whether I had received any materials from confiscated property in Germany. I did not receive any for the Hohe Schule, but long before that, in 1933, when a great number of communistic libraries were confiscated, I did take quite a number of copies for my Party office then.

Q. Didn't you later transfer this material to the school?

A. I don't think so. I believe it remained in the indoctrination office, which I maintained.

Q. From whom did you obtain this confiscated literature to which you have just referred?

A. This material was stored in police warehouses and several of my acquaintances went through it and selected whatever they wanted as correct historic literature of this period.

Q. Didn't you suggest to the Fuehrer that Communist libraries should be seized and liquidated?

A. This was an action executed by the State with the Police and the Propaganda Ministry. So far as I know, I never made any suggestions regarding this matter to the Fuehrer, but after I heard about it, I then requested material for my indoctrination work.

Q. What was your opinion with regard to the confiscation of private libraries in order to benefit the Hohe Schule?

A. You mean from abroad?

Q. Anywhere.

A. This was an action decreed by the State against institutions that were in opposition to the state or against individuals who were politically in opposition to the state.

Q. Did you suggest to the Fuehrer, that you be appointed as the person to collect the objects of a cultural, or a scientific nature, in the various occupied countries?

A. As I said before, this was discussed in several conferences, and then he finally appointed me. Here is something about the confiscation of materials from institutes and societies, also objects of art value; it was in the first place a removal of these objects to security. The Fuehrer wished to decide himself later on what was to be done with them.

Q. I show you a letter dated 18 June 1940, addressed to Reichsleiter Martin Bormann, and ask you if you didn't send that letter to Bormann. For the record, the file is 067-PS.

A. Yes, this certainly must be a letter of mine.

Q. Is it, or is it not?

A. Yes, I remember I wrote something like that.

Q. Whose initials appear on the first page thereof?

A. I don't know. It appears to be an "H". It may be "H.H."

Q. In any event, you don't know whose initials they are?

A. No, I don't know.

Q. I invite your attention to part three of that letter. I invite your attention, furthermore, to the first paragraph thereof. Have you read it?

A. Yes.

Q. What was your thought with regard to private collections as set forth in that letter?

A. The thought was that such collections usually contained details of particular interest for historical research, which were not always evident from the usual sources. I wish to admit here at this time that this third part is a little exuberant, or going over the limit.

Q. In what way do you think that it was over the limit?

A. Speaking of Canterbury was exuberant.

Q. What about your reference to the private collections, was that exuberant too?

A. I want to say here that research into private libraries is always of interest. Yet, however, a confiscation of them is not necessarily connected with that.

Q. You state in the letter about confiscations, don't you?

A. Yes. However, the confiscation is a little different from "taking it away". This still leaves open the possibility of returning it.

Q. There is always a possibility, is that the answer?

A. Yes.

Q. I invite your attention to the third paragraph of part three. Is that the paragraph in which you suggested the formation of the Einsatzstab Rosenberg?

A. I don't know whether the Einsatzstab was founded on the 18th of June 1942. I don't even know whether it was discussed at this time. This was merely a personal suggestion in this letter.

Q. Isn't the suggestion to the effect, that you have a personal representative in order to pick up these materials we have been discussing?

A. I made the suggestion to send somebody there to examine the materials, and also to do some research on them.

Q. When was the Einsatzstab Rosenberg founded?

A. When did the German troops march into France?

Q. In May 1940.

A. Several of my assistants went to Paris and also there was the Luftwaffe, which had occupied several castles, and they made reports about treasures of art, which had been left behind. Then the Fuehrer decreed that the Einsatzstab was to be founded later on to handle these things.

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpts from Testimony of Alfred Rosenberg, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 25 September 1945, 1415-1630, by Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Bernard Reymon, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Looting of Libraries and Art by Einsatzstab Rosenberg

Q. Do you recall any further correspondence with Bormann regarding the acquisition of materials from libraries and archives?

A. It is possible that I did correspond with the man, but I don't remember it.

Q. As a matter of fact, with reference to the statement that you have just made regarding private property, you wrote to Bormann on 1 July 1940 along that line, did you not?

A. I can't remember that.

Q. Didn't you set forth some theory, by which it could be justified, in the case of the French masonic lodges?

A. We had assumed that those great masonic lodges in Paris had carried on an anti-German policy for years. I, as a matter of course, wanted to find out from the libraries whether I could find confirmation or otherwise of the opinion which we had been holding on that subject.

Q. You advocated a confiscation of those libraries, didn't you?

A. Yes; a confiscation of such libraries.

Q. What was the principle on which you believed it justifiable to confiscate those libraries?

A. I didn't consider that as an ordinary private French property, but as the property of an organization, into the activity of which I wanted to go.

Q. What was the basis on which you made this differentiation between property of this organization and any other private property?

A. I told myself that it was actually a fighting organization, directed for some time against the German Reich.

Q. In other words, you convinced yourself that it was all right; is that it?

A. It so happened that some material was of interest to the police, and had been confiscated by the police. I only got hold of such material as was necessary for my research, to get the precise picture of their activities.

* Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

Q. The fact of the matter is, is it not, that at least some of the materials in these masonic lodge libraries was confiscated for your purposes?

A. Yes.

Q. I show you a letter dated 1 July 1940, addressed to Reichsleiter Bormann, and ask you if you didn't send this letter to Bormann. The document is identified, for the record, as 065-PS.

A. This corresponds with what I have told you.

Q. Did you write that letter?

A. Yes; I certainly have written it.

Q. In fact, were the available books and the historical archives of the Paris masonic lodges given to the Hohe Schule?

A. They arrived at Frankfurt and we set them up separately with other libraries. On account of the air raids, those libraries had been transferred to Schloss-Hungen, a fact which I disclosed at Mondorf.* It is possible that on account of the transportation, those libraries are no longer in the state in which I had them set up.

Q. The transfer of these materials resulted from this letter; is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you receive a communication from Bormann in response to the one that I have just shown you?

A. It happened on the strength of power which I received subsequently. I did not do it that time on my own initiative. To this effect, the Einsatzstab had been created.

Q. When was the Einsatzstab Rosenberg created?

A. Some time after this communication.

Q. When?

A. I don't remember the date.

Q. Approximately the date?

A. It may have been the end of June or in July.

Q. In 1940?

A. Yes.

Q. This letter is dated 1 July 1940, so the organization probably was in existence at that time, was it not?

A. Some time. I can't remember the date. After this letter the question has been discussed and then I received the mission from the Fuehrer.

Q. What was the mission you received from the Fuehrer?

A. I received the mission to confiscate Jewish and other libraries, which were to be considered as hostile and for a purpose of scientific research. In conjunction therewith, I also received the mission to safeguard the works of art, which had been left in the houses and castles.

*See footnote, p. 1193 of this volume.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Did you establish an organization to carry out this mission?

A. There was in Paris a representation of this Einsatzstab. They visited the various organizations and the various castles where those works of art existed. There a brief outline of them was made. They were packed up and forwarded to Germany. All things concerned with the free masons and Jews were forwarded to Frankfort-on-Main.

Q. What was your relation, or the relation of the Einsatzstab Rosenberg to Goering's art collecting activities?

A. At the beginning those were two separate things. At the outset I was to safeguard all those objects of art collected. At the first transportation, Goering safeguarded—I say safeguarded for himself—a certain portion of these collections. I instructed my man in charge of it to put down the things taken by Goering. When Goering was advised by the fliers who had been billeted in those various apartments and castles, that objects of art were there, then he also got hold of those collections. All these objects of art, and there was much more of them than I had anticipated, were put down in a catalog and then forwarded to Neu-Schwanstein. As that place was not found quite air-raid proof, those art collections, on the order of the Fuehrer, were sheltered in a dry mine located in Austria. All these objects of art were put down very carefully in the catalog with the precise designation of the owner. I forbade, in a very strict manner, all of my collaborators to appropriate even a trifle object as a souvenir, or even to acquire them in France against a certain payment as I found out had happened several times. On my first interrogation at Mondorf, I already have given all these particulars.

Q. What was the relation between the Einsatzstab Rosenberg and the military?

A. Inasmuch as the Einsatzstab was functioning in occupied territories, both in the West and in the East, it had been agreed upon that they were to be considered as Wehrmachtsgefolge, which means being a part of the Wehrmacht. It means that they are attached to the Army and that the Army takes care of them.

Q. Between whom was this agreed?

A. Between the representative of my Einsatzstab and the representative of the OKW.

Q. During the course of your statement, you have used the term "safeguarding": What do you mean by that?

A. I mean to say to put them in safety, in custody.

Q. Why was it necessary to remove them from the places in which they were found?

A. There were several points of view in this case. In the first place, those objects of art were left without any guard in those various castles, which were intermittently occupied by various military people, coming and going. In the second place, with the development of the air warfare, there was the possibility of such places, where the art treasures were, being demolished by the raids. In the third place, I must mention it, this is also in connection with the various Jewish fighting organizations and individuals. It was agreed that all of these properties were to be put eventually at the exclusive disposal of the Fuehrer himself, who would deal with them as he saw fit.

Q. Are you sure about the last statement that you made about the disposal of the Fuehrer of all these art objects?

A. The Fuehrer later on told me that none of these objects of art should be withdrawn or should be lent or given to anybody, not even for scientific or research purposes.

Q. Isn't it a fact that Hitler wasn't the only art collector in Germany and that not everything was reserved for him?

A. That is correct.

Q. Who else collected art?

A. I could only guarantee the safety of those objects of art, which were under the supervision of my confidential man, who was quite a trustworthy person. My confidential man was Robert Scholtz. He informed me once of a case where a Jewish collection had been seized, but at that time not by the Einsatzstab Rosenberg, and at that time the French government expressed a desire to have a priority to acquire that collection.

Q. When you say "he", to whom do you refer?

A. Robert Scholtz.

Q. Who was Robert Scholtz?

A. He was my art expert.

Q. Who besides Hitler was collecting art in Germany and in the occupied territories?

A. I can't say the particulars. Goering had his big collection.

Q. And you had a pretty good collection too, didn't you, at the Hohe Schule?

A. Of objects of art?

Q. Objects of historical or research interest, which could also be considered art objects.

A. Under objects of art, I understand paintings, old furniture, sculpture, and tapestry.

Q. What did you have at the Hohe Schule?

INTERROGATIONS

A. At the Hohe Schule I had all the works concerning the question of Jews and Free Masons. The other books, not dealing with either the Jews or Free Masonry, but also of scientific value, were transferred to the library of the Hohe Schule at Tanzenborg near Klagenfurth.

Q. Did there come a time when a collection was made at the Louvre at Paris of these various objects which had been collected from various places throughout France?

A. Not at the Louvre itself, but in what is called the Jeu de Paume. There they had been transferred in order to make a careful inventory and then to be packed and to be forwarded.

Q. To be distributed; is that not correct?

A. No. As far as my department is concerned, those objects were shipped to Robert Scholtz, who transferred them to Neu-Schwanstein.

Q. You don't deny, do you, that the document that you have identified as having been received by you, [141-PS] mentions art objects, with reference to what you were to receive?

A. Yes; I admit that.

Q. What happened to the materials that you gathered, not only in connection with this order, but in connection with paragraph 6 therein, that refers to the "further securing of Jewish art property in France will be continued"? What happened to that property after it was secured?

A. Well, if I remember, there seems to be confusion in this. It was provided that all the further art treasures and collections should go through my Einsatzstab in collaboration with the Militaerbefehlshaber. So that the whole thing should be closely followed up by my own collaborators.

Q. When were you appointed by the Fuehrer to collect these various research materials, library materials, and other materials that you have discussed, in the Eastern occupied territories?

A. Well, this function was enlarged, extended after the war was declared, to the Soviet Union.

Q. In other words, you just operated this organization in the West until some time after the territories were occupied in the East; is that correct?

A. Well, I pursued my activity in the West, and when the war started in the East, similar problems came up in the East where there were a certain number of Communistic libraries, and besides there were certain art treasures which we wanted to put in safety. There was a certain number of Communistic libraries confiscated and carried to Ratibor.

Q. In your activities in the West, isn't it true that you collected, through the Einsatzstab Rosenberg, more than just books and pamphlets, as you have so far admitted collecting?

A. Well, books, objects of art, writings.

Q. You took everything that had a cultural value; isn't that correct?

A. Yes; everything that had a scientific value.

Q. Not only scientific, but cultural.

A. Yes.

Q. Such as paintings, statuary, tapestry, furniture, ceramics, pottery; anything that had a value along the artistic line?

A. Yes; that much I have said.

Q. That was all transported by you, or your organization, to Germany.

A. Yes.

Q. There a distribution was made, was it not?

A. Of objects of art?

Q. I am speaking now of all the materials you collected, including the books and pamphlets and the objects of art.

A. It was not distributed. All those objects of art and ceramics and tapestry, all these things had been put down in a catalog by Scholtz. They all must have been found by the American troops in the mines.

Q. Did you ever discuss with Hitler his idea of establishing an art museum to the memory of his mother?

A. To his mother? Hitler had ordered, quite a time ago, from Italy, and elsewhere, objects of art for a museum which he desired to establish near Linz. Now, I don't know whether that museum was to be dedicated to his mother.

Q. Weren't these objects of art, that you were collecting, intended for that museum?

A. No. I only collected them with a view of making a very careful list and to keep them very carefully in custody.

Q. What did Hitler intend to do with them?

A. He didn't tell me anything about them.

Q. You had numerous discussions with Hitler, did you not, as to the disposition to be made? Didn't you make reports to him of the objects which had been acquired?

A. I sent him a photographic reproduction of the most outstanding objects of art.

Q. What did he tell you after you reported to him on these outstanding pieces of art which had been acquired?

A. In the evenings after his military discussions, he used to look at those pictures. It was a relaxation for him.

Q. What did he tell you as to what he intended to do with those pieces of art?

INTERROGATIONS

A. He didn't tell me anything about it. He told me simply that those pieces of art, which I had sent through Scholtz, should be kept at his disposal. I overheard once a conversation at the headquarters of Hitler. He was addressing several gentlemen and showing them the reproduction of some exceptionally beautiful pieces of art. He made a comment to the effect that he realized France's desire to come again into possession of such objects of art.

Q. You are not serious in your suggestion that this art was ever going to be returned to these countries, are you?

A. In a certain measure, it certainly was provided for that.

Q. What do you mean by "in a certain measure"?

A. I mean there were a certain number of pieces, which Hitler thought of particular value to France; again there was a certain number of things which were of particular interest to Germany. Certainly Hitler thought that later on he would take it up with France.

Q. How do you know all that? I thought you never discussed these things with Hitler.

A. This I assume.

Q. You know perfectly well that you had numerous discussions with Hitler regarding the disposition of this art, and that disposition didn't contemplate returning most of it, or even a substantial part of it, to the places, from which it had been taken; isn't that right?

A. The Fuehrer had to attend to it later on. I only received the mission to get hold of those things.

Q. Yes, but you knew what he intended to do, didn't you?

A. I did not know it exactly.

Q. But you knew it substantially. You knew he was going to increase his museum at Linz, didn't you?

A. Well, for that museum he had made acquisitions for numerous years.

Q. Yes; and he wanted other acquisitions there; is that right?

A. Yes; most certainly he did.

Q. There were German art museums that were going to be enriched by these pieces too, weren't there?

A. To handle those questions, he reserved the right for himself.

Q. Maybe, but he discussed it with you, didn't he?

A. I saw so little of the Fuehrer during those war years—

Q. Never mind about that; just answer my question. He did discuss it with you, didn't he?

A. He did not discuss with me what he was going to do with all those pieces of art.

Q. But you knew what he was going to do with them, didn't you?

A. I assume it myself that he wished that a large portion of it remain in Germany. Again from other conversations, I surmised that such objects, which were important from the point of view of French culture, he might possibly return them to France.

Q. Did it ever occur to you that keeping those objects, which he planned to keep for Germany, might be illegal?

A. Well, that topic, he was to take up eventually with the French authorities.

Q. How do you know that?

A. Well, I assume that much on my own.

Q. You seem to have assumed an awful lot about this art that you were collecting in such large amounts; isn't that right?

A. I had no right of disposal over them.

Q. What about the materials that you transferred to your school?

A. The books, in the very first place, I wanted to keep them in Germany for research.

Q. Did it ever occur to you that it might be illegal to keep those books?

A. Well, the legal forms would have to be taken care of eventually after the war.

Q. How do you know that?

A. I don't know it, but it might have happened.

Q. Anything might happen. The fact of the matter is when they were taken, the laws were not passed, and the compensation was not paid; isn't that right?

A. The owners were all away.

Q. I show you a document dated 1 March 1942, signed by Hitler, and ask you if you ever saw that before? For the record, that is identified as 149-PS.

A. That is correct.

Q. You have seen that?

A. Yes.

Q. According to the terms of that order, you were appointed, were you not, to act in cooperation with the chief of the OKW to seize materials of various kinds in the occupied territories?

A. To confiscate, yes. These are the full powers which were subsequently completed. I already mentioned to you that an extension of powers were given when war was declared in the East.

Q. I invite your attention to the last sentence of that order, wherein it is provided that the regulation applying to cultural treasures, which are the property or in the possession of Jews, which are ownerless, or the origin of which cannot be clearly established, are to be seized. Is that the practice under which you had been operating in the Western territories?

INTERROGATIONS

A. In the East we had not to confiscate any Jewish property.

Q. What about the West?

A. I don't understand your question.

Q. I say, what was the rule under which you were operating in the West? Is it the same as was stated in the last sentence of the order you have before you?

A. In the West I used to operate according to the principles of paragraph 2.

Q. That is, that property which belonged to Jews, which was ownerless, or the origin of which could not be clearly established, was taken away by your organization; is that right?

A. Yes. They were being confiscated and shipped to Germany.

Q. By what authority was that being done?

A. Well, the Fuehrer had already explained that the group in question was to be considered by us as a fighting organization, which had been waging a struggle against Germany already for some time.

Q. The owners of ownerless property, or the property, the ownership of which could not be established, were those people included in that group?

A. Yes; they were included in that group.

Q. How do you know that?

A. Those German emigrants which had gone abroad had a very large backing on the part of the Dutch and French Jewry. Those political refugees not only did enjoy the political hospitality, which would be a natural thing, but they were backed financially to publish their papers. They had been financed and backed by the whole Jewry of those countries.

Q. What difference did that make? It was still private property, was it not?

A. In that sense it is no longer property of French or Dutch citizens, but property of a certain hostile fighting organization.

Q. That is your conception; is that it?

A. That was my conception.

Q. That was the conception under which your organization operated; is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. What about this property which was considered ownerless, or the origin of which could not be clearly established? How did you justify your taking that?

A. Well, that must have been the case of things which belonged to people, or to a person who had left, and we wanted to safeguard it from further depredations.

Q. What do you mean by further depredations?

A. I already mentioned several of those empty houses that were variously occupied or billeted.

Q. Why was it necessary, if your only thought was to safeguard this material, to move it from the countries in which it was found, to the Reich?

A. Well, that was in conjunction with the whole matter of putting things in custody.

Q. You couldn't have put them in custody in the places in which they were found; is that right?

A. I cannot on the spur of the moment judge it. As I already mentioned before, the French government itself subsequently set up a commissar in charge of those collections and, eventually, they bought up a certain portion of it, leaving to the Fuehrer the second right, or right after priority, to make the acquisition.

Q. With respect to the property of Jews, you were concerned not only with cultural objects and objects of scientific research, but you were concerned with things as prosaic as household furniture; isn't that correct?

A. Yes. That came up later on. At the outset, that was not considered at all. Subsequently there were two viewpoints: in the first place, in the Eastern occupied territories, there were houses which were completely empty, where you had to simply sit on the floor. Immediately afterwards another viewpoint came up and that was regarding the bombardment of German towns. Then the idea came up that that Jewish furniture and household articles may be used for the German women and children who had been bombarded.

Q. It resolved itself into a simple question of taking it away from the Jews and giving it to other people; isn't that right?

A. The corresponding furniture and household articles were sent by train to the corresponding Gaus.

Q. That doesn't answer my question. My question is: it was merely a question of taking it away from the Jews and giving it to the other people; is that right?

A. Yes; in this case it is quite clear, obviously.

Q. This was done in the occupied territories, both West and East; isn't that correct?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Only in the West.

Q. Only in the West?

A. And in the East there was nothing.

Q. Did you raise any objections to this kind of procedure?

A. I had no objection against it.

Q. As a matter of fact, you agreed with it, didn't you?

A. Yes.

Q. There wasn't any question of safeguarding this kind of material, was there?

A. No. In this case it was simply compensation for hundreds of thousands of women and children who, in the course of a night, had lost their shelter. Shall I say how it was being done?

Q. No. By what means was the furniture seizure from the Jews carried on?

A. The man, the Paris Dienstelle, had that furniture removed, with the help of French workmen, and then they were brought and centralized to a certain place and from there they were shipped to Germany, into the bombed areas.

Q. With reference to France, how do you account for the fact that these furniture seizures were made after the armistice was signed, the terms of which did not contemplate such seizures?

A. Right at this moment I cannot give you a definite answer. I will answer the question. I received a mission from the Fuehrer, and while I was well aware that it was something quite exceptional, and against the law, and again was aware that it was not a case where confiscation had been made with the provision of the possible return, yet, the situation in Germany was so terrible that—

Q. In other words, you didn't concern yourself with its legal aspects; is that it?

A. I admit that in this case I didn't construe it very well.

Q. Do you recall ever making a statement in words, or in substance, that an armistice may have been concluded with the French, but the war against the Jews continued?

A. I don't remember. Was it in a conversation? I don't know.

Q. You just don't remember at this point; is that correct? You may have said it?

A. Yes. Each beneficiary of that furniture had to make a certain provision with the Finance Ministry. A certain fund was instituted with the Finance Ministry, which might have been called upon subsequently for a possible compensation.

Q. Anything might have been. For what was the fund used? Do you know?

A. I can't say.

Testimony of Alfred Rosenberg, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, on 29 September 1945, 1022-1152, by Lt. Col. Thomas A. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Bernard Reymon, Interpreter; S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Court Reporter.

Reason for Harsh Treatment of Eastern Peoples

Q. Why were the occupied countries of the West treated differently from the occupied countries of the East?

A. Because those whom we considered as our adversaries or opponents from the point of view of our conception of the world are different in the West from what they are in the East. In the West there were certain Jewish organizations and Masonic lodges, and in the East there was nothing more than the Communist Party.

Q. Well, I am not speaking now so much with reference to organizations, but to racial groups. Why was the treatment accorded the racial groups in the East different from that accorded the racial groups in the West?

A. I don't understand your question.

Q. Well, the question is very simple. You know and I know that the treatment accorded the peoples of the eastern occupied territories was quite different from that accorded the peoples of the Western occupied territories, and I want to know why.

A. Inasmuch as I could in my capacity of Reichsminister for the East bring about a fairer treatment of the population compatible with a state of war, I did it.

Q. You don't really mean that, do you?

A. Well, I used to see those reports about those collisions and certain struggles between the mutineers and the police. As I already told you once, all the confidential people of those racial groups were represented in my department, so as to centralize in my department all of their claims and complaints, in order that they may be remedied as far as possible.

Q. Well, wasn't there a policy in existence in the German Reich which called for much more harsh treatment of the peoples of the East than accorded the peoples of the West?

A. Yes, that is indeed correct.

Q. I am not speaking of that. I am speaking of the situation where people in the occupied territories of the West were treated in one way, and the people in the occupied territories of the East were treated in another way. Now, I want to know why the difference in treatment.

A. Well, on the whole we had to face the actual Bolshevik danger, and when large numbers of those eastern elements had been sent to Germany we had reason to believe that there may emanate from those masses a certain danger to Germany.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What about the situation of the Poles? You know and I know that the Poles were not favorable to the Russians, that they were anti-Bolshevik too. Why were they treated in the manner in which they were treated?

A. Well, I have never had anything to do with the Polish question, but the persecution of the German Nationals in Poland for the last 20 years would certainly have been a reason for it.

Q. Didn't you discuss that question with the Fuehrer on several occasions?

A. I submitted to the Fuehrer the various instructions which I had issued to the commissars, and he approved of them.

Q. I am not speaking of that. I am speaking of the Polish situation. Isn't it a fact that you held several discussions with the Fuehrer regarding your theories of racial superiority and racial inferiority?

A. Well, of course, we spoke about these various peoples.

Q. And isn't it a further fact that the Poles were decided to be one of the inferior peoples from your viewpoint and that of the Fuehrer?

A. The Poles were considered in such a way that they had a certain layer of cultured, educated people, but that the masses had been left sadly behind and in a low state.

Q. Wasn't it decided that the best way of dealing with the problem was to dispose of the masses of the Poles?

A. Well, I didn't speak to the Fuehrer about the Polish policy.

Q. You knew the Polish policy, didn't you?

A. Well, I saw it on the exterior.

Q. Yes, but you were familiar with what was happening, isn't that so?

A. Well, yes. At the first Polish campaign I heard of the slaughter of 50,000 German Nationals.

Q. I am not talking about the slaughter of German Nationals. I am talking about the treatment accorded the Polish population, and you know what I am talking about, so why don't you answer my questions? Now, my question is, did you not know of the policy regarding the treatment to be accorded the Polish people?

A. Well, I did know that in the course of these rather difficult events, the Poles were treated in a harsher way.

Q. Yes, not only a harsher way—

A. But as far as I know, the Governor General Frank was always endeavoring to bring about a better state of things.

Q. I am not talking about Governor General Frank. I am talking about the situation where the Polish people, whether in the General Gouvernement Poland or in occupied Poland, were accorded treatment along a particular line and with a particular aim in view, and my question is, did you not know of the policy regarding this treatment?

A. Well, I did know that the policy there was rather harsh.

Q. From whom did you learn that?

A. Well, there was talk about it.

Q. Talk by whom?

A. No. I never meddled into this business.

Q. It isn't a question of meddling. You stated you had talked about it, and I want to know from whom you heard that talk.

A. No. I can't. I once made a speech in Poznan.

Q. My question is, from whom did you hear regarding the treatment accorded the Poles?

A. Well, I can't say.

Q. As a matter of fact, it was a matter of common knowledge throughout Germany, wasn't it?

A. Yes. Of course, there was quite a great deal of talk about it.

Q. And the German people knew that Polish people were being killed, didn't they?

A. Yes. Killed why?

Q. I am asking you why.

A. Well, what we did know was that in the course of the war, and those things had been found out after the war, a certain number of executions did take place. That much I do know.

Q. You knew during the war that executions were taking place, didn't you?

A. Well, I had no certain information.

Q. Never mind about that. Just answer my questions. Did you or did you not know that these executions were taking place?

A. Well, I can't give any specific answer to this question.

Q. Why can't you? You know.

A. Because I can't remember whether I received any reports on such things.

Q. It is not a question of receiving reports, formal reports. You had all kinds of discussions with various people regarding this policy.

A. Well, I didn't discuss the matter, but, of course, those were things about which people did hear.

Q. Yes. As a matter of fact, the activities which were carried out were along the lines of your ideology, isn't that right?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Just a moment. An ideology has nothing in common with executions. Those are special cases of emergency which may arise in cases of war or revolution.

Q. And didn't you also advocate the theory of racial superiority?

A. I simply voiced the theory that certain peoples have certain superiorities for certain tasks, while other peoples are gifted for other tasks.

Q. Isn't it a fact that in your discussion and even in your writings, you advocated an expansion of the German Reich to the East?

A. That is correct.

Q. And, isn't the easiest way to expand, territorially speaking, to remove the people who are already occupying the land into which you wish to expand?

A. Well, this is a matter which had been debated within the Party, and it was agreed upon that those territories which had been separated or torn away from Germany had to reenter the German realm.

Q. Those weren't the only territories that were to be reincorporated or to be taken into the German Reich, were they?

A. That is something which one could behold practically. All of the Polish revolutionary units of Upper Silesia—

Q. I wish you would just answer the questions that I ask. It seems to me that this morning every time I have asked you a question, you go off on a tangent and do not give a direct response. Now, my question is, wasn't it contemplated that territories other than those which have formerly been part of the German Reich be made a part thereof by conquest or by other means?

A. Well, yes. Through the creation of the province of Wartheland, a certain portion of that territory was to be incorporated into Germany.

Q. So, it didn't surprise you any, did it, when you heard that Polish people were being killed, as that would be a very logical way to make room for Germans to move into that territory?

A. Well, such a policy of murdering Poles, such a policy was not expected.

Q. Not expected by whom?

A. Well, in the previous 20 years, about one million Germans had also been expelled from Poland.

Q. I am not asking about that. Why don't you answer the questions as I ask them? Will you read the question?

(The question was read by the reporter as set forth above.)

The question is: You stated that the policy of murdering Poles was not expressed and I want to know the people who would make an expression thereof if they were going to. In other words, who created the policy?

A. Well, if there was anybody at all who had to determine the German policy in Poland, then that was the Fuehrer himself. I can't intervene into things which officially don't concern me.

Q. Do you recall conferring with Himmler regarding the policy in the East?

A. In the occupied Eastern territories?

Q. Yes.

A. I had a conference with Himmler regarding the relations between the ministry and the police.

Q. Do you recall any other conferences, particularly one on the 16th of November 1943, at which, among other things, questions concerning Estonia and Lithuania were discussed?

A. Yes. The problem of an autonomy for Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania was discussed in that year several times.

Q. What about this conference that I just asked you about? Do you recall it?

. A. Yes. Now I remember the 16th and 17th of November '43. It was the last time when I was in the headquarters to report to Hitler, and there I met Himmler.

Q. What was the subject of the conversation between you and Himmler?

A. Well, the subject which brought us to the Fuehrer was to discuss the autonomy, whether in a larger measure or a smaller measure, of these countries.

Q. That is not all you talked about either, is it?

A. The outcome of this conference was a proclamation to be issued to those three peoples.

Q. My question is: That is not all you talked about with Himmler, is it?

A. I also discussed with him a rather ugly incident which had taken place between an official of the administration at Minsk and the organizations to fight the partisans, which belonged also to the police.

Q. What was the nature of this incident?

A. Apparently in a state of inebriety, a few officers, after threatening, eventually killed the Commissar.

Q. That is not the incident I am concerned about. Think some more and see if you can't remember what else you talked to Himmler about.

A. I cannot recollect.

Q. Do you recall writing a memorandum regarding the meeting on 16-17 November 1943?*

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

A. I do believe so.

Q. Do you remember making a statement therein to the effect that you had had a heart-to-heart talk with Himmler?

A. No.

Q. Do you recall in the course of this conversation or this heart-to-heart talk that you impressed upon Himmler that it was quite impossible that he should repeat certain remarks of the Fuehrer? Do you recall that?

A. No, I don't.

Q. Now, these remarks were made in connection with the policy in the East and purportedly had been made to outsiders and to representatives of foreign nations. Does that help you to remember?

A. With my best recollection I don't remember what it was.

Q. Does it help you to remember if I tell you that these remarks had created what you described as an awful mess?

A. It can only be that Hitler will have spoken to Himmler about a larger autonomy to be granted to Estonia, Latvia, and so on, and Himmler will have repeated such remarks, and this will have created a certain mess. It was not his duty to comment on any political matters.

Q. What else could it have been besides the theory that you just advanced?

A. Those two points were the actual kernel or the gist of those conferences.

Q. Well, was it not a fact that Himmler had repeated certain remarks made by the Fuehrer with reference to the treatment to be accorded the peoples in the Eastern occupied territories, including Estonia and Lithuania, and that Himmler's repetition of these remarks had a bad impression?

A. With my best will, I cannot recall this.

Q. You think about it and I will ask you about it at some future time.

A. Well, I usually jot down certain recollections of years past. Otherwise, they just fall into oblivion.

*Testimony of Alfred Rosenberg taken at Nurnberg,
Germany, on 4 October 1945, 1030-1215, by Lt. Col.
Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: 1st Lt. Joachim Stenzel, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.*

"The Final Solution of the Jewish Problem"

Q. I show you a photostatic reproduction of a six-page document, which is undated, and I ask you if you recall receiving the original of this document? For the record, it is identified as 212-PS.

A. I cannot imagine who could have sent in this report.

Q. Do you recall receiving it?

A. And I do not recall having read it.

Q. Were the ideas expressed therein in accordance with the ideas that you had expressed at various times?

A. The entire handling of the Jewish problem was very definitely in the sphere of the Chief of the German Police. On the other hand, I myself was in strict accord with the idea of curbing the individual activities of the population, to limit the Jews to certain districts, to put them to work, and so forth, and I have expressed that at various times.

Q. Isn't it a fact that the things set forth in this document were things which actually happened to the Jews in Russia?

A. I have not read that thoroughly. I did not read the report thoroughly, but, as I mentioned before, there have been incidents, and there have been attacks and outrages on Jews, that were committed during the advance of the Wehrmacht, particularly, on Jews that were in any way identified with the Soviet government.

Q. Were not Jews required, for example, to wear the Star of David in Russia?

A. I don't remember whether that was ever put through, because in Russia the Jews were living in separate districts in the villages and towns anyhow.

Q. They were segregated, were they not, into ghettos?

A. That was done gradually. At the very beginning, it was not done yet, but then as things developed they were segregated.

Q. Wasn't an effort made to remove Jewish influence from political, economic, cultural, and social fields?

A. To me, the important thing was to remove the influence of the Jews from the work of the Ukrainian population. What they did internally I do not know, and I never received any reports on that anyway.

Q. You have a report before you that indicates what was contemplated would happen to the Jews, isn't that right?

A. Well, I don't know whether those things were ever put into practice.

Q. Did you ever try to find out if they were?

A. I remember discussing the business of the Jewish life within Germany with Himmler once, and he said that in the camps, within 10 days, they had created their own social life, and I got the impression that the entire internal living conditions or social life of these people was more or less left to their own devices.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You will note, in the first part of that document, that a statement is made to the effect that the whole Jewish question would be solved in general for all of Europe after the war, at the latest.

A. Well, this document was supposedly sent to me, by somebody; I don't even know what officer or what agency could have sent it to me. I don't know anything about it.

Q. Did you ever hear it discussed that a solution of the Jewish problem would be found after the war at the latest?

A. I have never participated in any discussions on the Jewish problem at all.

Q. You never have, at any time?

A. No, I have never taken part in any sessions or conversation on the solution of the Jewish problem, but I had my own views on that particular subject. I always felt that gradually it would be possible to increase the influence of Zionism and reduce the number of Jews in Germany by creating a place where they would be all by themselves in their Jewish homeland.

Q. Did you know the responsibility that was to be assigned to the SD and the Gestapo in the final solution of the European Jewish problem?

A. There was a very definite and very clear decree, in which it was stated that the entire administration and solution of the Jewish problem was the responsibility of the Secret State Police, and of the Security Service, and that no other agency was supposed to take part or mix themselves into these affairs.

Q. Don't you identify that document, that you have before you, as being a report on the manner in which Jews were to be handled in the areas that were under your jurisdiction, even though you did not have jurisdiction over the police functions?

A. This evidently was a sort of memorandum that was sent in to me, and which, I have no doubt, was filed like so many other memoranda and circulars and bulletins of a similar sort on various subjects, but I have no recollection of this particular document.

Q. Isn't it a fact, that the Jews were treated in the areas under your jurisdiction, as indicated in that memorandum?

A. I cannot say that, because as I said before, they were kept separate, and I had no reports on the internal conditions in these separate areas.

Q. As a matter of fact, wasn't it part of your problem to feed these people?

A. Well, the matter was no doubt handled like this, that the police reported to the Food Administrator the number of persons that were to be fed.

Q. Didn't you have representatives in all the larger towns and cities of the areas which had been assigned to you, and didn't those representatives make reports from time to time of their activities?

A. Well, I wish to emphasize again that I was sitting in Berlin, and I was responsible only for the entire policy in its greater lines. For the territories, separately, the Reichcommissars were responsible, who had been placed into their positions by the Fuehrer. Under the Reichcommissars were the general commissars. The only reports I received were from the Reichcommissars and from the general commissars, and I had no other separate system of reporting. I did not have a board that would travel and give me any special reports besides those that I received through the normal channels, from these Reichcommissars and general commissars.

Q. That may be, but you not only received written reports, but you had numerous people come to Berlin to tell you about these things that were happening in these areas, isn't that right?

A. Oh, yes, there have been people who were sent, for instance, from the staff of the ministry to have discussions with members of the territorial administration, or maybe one of the commissars was coming by, or maybe other officers, that had lived in the area, would come and report to me informally.

Q. Yes, and many of them talked to you, didn't they?

A. Very frequently I would say, but certainly I do remember a few with whom I talked.

Q. You have been interested in the Jewish question for years, haven't you?

A. But I was so overburdened with the work of establishing my own Ministry, and the entire Jewish problem was so neatly separate from any of my responsibilities, that I did not spend any time on that, and concerned myself exclusively with the responsibility that actually lay with me.

Q. You mean you never discussed the Jewish problem with anybody from the time you were appointed Minister for the Eastern Occupied Territories, is that your statement?

A. Well, it is correct that I have not spent any more time on those details, that is right.

Q. You have been interested in the Jewish problem for years and during the time that you were editor of the Voelkischer Beobachter you wrote numerous articles regarding it, isn't that right?

A. Yes.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. I find it a little difficult to believe, that with all interest you have had in this problem for so many years, that you would drop it so suddenly when you became Minister for Occupied Eastern Territories, and wouldn't have enough curiosity regarding the treatment of the people under your own jurisdiction, that you wouldn't ask anybody or receive any reports about it.

A. It was always our habit that, once an assignment was given to a man, nobody else meddled with the man that had the assignment.

Q. That may be, that it wasn't your responsibility. I will go along with you to that extent, regarding the treatment of these Jews, but you were certainly informed of the treatment that they received, and you knew about it.

A. Well, in great lines I naturally had to assume that they were being housed fairly well, and that they were fed, and that they had work to do like, for instance, in the city of Lodz.

Q. You know that isn't the report you received, as to what was happening to these people, in the areas, over which you had jurisdiction. You know that the reports you received indicated that they were being treated, just as the memorandum you have just read indicates they were going to be treated, isn't that right?

A. That they were separated, that they had working assignments, that they were making coats and shoes and things like that, like they did in the city of Lodz, that I knew, but that the conditions were naturally somewhat difficult, I fully realized.

Q. Yes, and you knew that they were being treated very much in the manner set forth in this memorandum.

A. That I cannot state in detail, because I was not informed in detail.

VII. HANS FRANK

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Frank, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 1 September 1945, 1320-1425, by Thomas S. Hinkel, Lt. Col., ISG. Also present: S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Court Reporter; Cpl. W. Magnus, Interpreter.

Rise of the Nazi Party Lawyer

Q. When did you join the Nazi Party?

A. I had been a member of the Nazi Party for a very short time in 1926, but in October of the same year I quit the Party. And in 1927 at the request of Hitler, I rejoined the Party in my position as lawyer.

Q. This request was made to you personally by Hitler?

A. To be able to state before a court that I am a member of the Party, yes. Hitler expected from that a great effect on the court due to the fact that I was a member of the Party.

Q. I don't quite understand what you mean. My question was, in 1927 did Hitler ask you personally to rejoin the Party?

A. Yes. May I add something to this?

Q. Yes.

A. At the time I was a young lawyer and I quit the Party again in 1926 because of certain things about the Party I did not like. I was active at the time at the law section of the technical school, the School of Technology at Munich, to become a teacher of law, but I was registered as a lawyer at the same time. Then one day I saw in the newspaper the following ad: "We seek one lawyer to defend members of the Party without means before a German court to make it possible to give them a legal defense." This was a trial held in Berlin. And I told Hitler I would like to defend those young people. And therefore the first trial ever held was this trial in Berlin. It happened this way that Hitler learned that here is a young lawyer ready and willing to defend members of his Party. In this way Hitler took up connections with me in Munich and when he met me one day at the Party office which was at the Schilling Strasse he asked me if it was a good idea for me to work for the Party. I told him at the time that my object was not to become a lawyer, but rather to pursue an academic career, but I told him, "If you need me, I'm willing to do it." Officially I remained with the School of Technology in Munich until 1929, but at that time the trials became so numerous that I had to make a new decision. I joined the Hitler movement as a lawyer and I worked in the Party as a lawyer.

Q. When was this?

A. It began in 1927 and the trials became more and more numerous. Since I was willing to do it without money, I did it.

Q. Were you ever a member of the Reichstag?

A. Yes.

Q. When?

A. Since September 1930. This was also in connection with such trials, because as a member of the Reichstag, I got a free ticket on the railroads and I could move easily. Therefore, the trial expenses were taken care of.

Q. Were you not elected a member of the Reichstag as a member of the Nazi Party?

A. Of course. I was on the Party list.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. And you sought election on the basis that you were a member of the Nazi Party?

A. I hadn't sought it, but Hitler put me on the list. I was on a holiday trip, and when I returned my wife said, "Look here. You are on the list for members of the Reichstag."

In March 1933, I was made Bavarian Minister of Justice and remained there until December 31, 1934, and then I became Minister of the Reich.

Q. Were you not also made Reich Commissioner for Justice at the same time that you were made Minister of Justice of Bavaria?

A. A little bit later. It may have been in April of 1933. I was not reelected commissar for General Justice. I was the commissar for equalizing the laws of the various states with the Reich. By that I mean the reorganization of the law administration.

Q. Do you mean by that that your position as Reich Commissioner of Justice required you to take the laws of the several different sections of Germany and to codify them or to make them uniform or just what did you do? I don't quite understand the term "equalize."

A. No. It was only a matter of the administration of the justice, and the effect of this was the taking over of the justice administration of the German states by the German Reich on January 1, 1935.

Q. What states do you have reference to?

A. Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, Thuringia, Anhalt-Lippe. There were about 18 states altogether.

Q. You mean there were minor variations in the laws of these several different parts of Germany, and it was your duty to harmonize them?

A. This task was taken care of by the Minister of Justice, Dr. Guertner. My job was the preparation of the reorganization of the administration of the various German states which were taken over by the Reich 1 January 1935. May I add something?

Q. Yes.

A. In this capacity I was responsible to the German Minister of Justice, Dr. Guertner. I was a member of his special staff for this particular task. I was not a member of the cabinet.

In my position as a legal man in the Party, I came more and more in conflict with the direction as represented by Himmler and Bormann. This whole development as to concentration camps and so on, as also adopted later by Hitler himself was very much against the original Point 19 of the Party program which talked of a common law for Germany. In addition, Hitler gave an oath before the Reich Supreme Court in Leipzig that he would come to power only legally and if he came to power he would govern legally. As long as the Fuehrer was in the position before he came to power to need lawyers and judges, he could need me, but once he had come to power, I felt more and more that he would drop these formalities and rule in an authoritarian way, as a dictator. This development can be traced in a constitutional manner. While before he came to power he told me continually how happy he was to have me, those ties were broken immediately when Hitler came to power. I noticed already on 30 July 1933, that he had promised me that I would become the Minister of Justice, but then he must have made up his mind that I was too legal-minded. Then in 1933 I began to notice this, because I founded the Academy of German Law. This academy was a public corporation, and I called into this academy of German law all prominent German legal minds without respect to party connections. This academy was the center of the fight to maintain the idea of law in Germany. The development makes it clear that thereby I got more and more into a position of opposition. This is generally known in Germany. I don't want to say more about it. One should hear a lot of people in Germany who know these facts, for this was the content of my life.

Frank Claims He Opposed the Fuehrer's Lawlessness

Q. As I understand your statement you had an intellectual opposition to the course which the Fuehrer's Government was taking?

A. It was more than merely intellectual. Even if I could not stop Germany from becoming a state of terror, I saved the lives of hundreds of good men. I was the only one who dared to get up to say in 1940 that the Reich is going to perish because there is no law. I would like to have this speech used. It was a sensation in the public mind. I was discharged immediately.

Q. Discharged from what?

A. From all offices. I was discharged from offices that I had created myself.

Q. How often did you see Hitler?

A. During the fight for power I saw him relatively often.

Q. During what period of time?

A. Between 1929 and 1933. I had to go and see him about the trials and I had to get the necessary authority for these trials from Hitler. I want to mention the matter of concentration camps which I brought up before in connection with the question of the Colonel, for from this period on I noted that the Fuehrer avoided to talk things over with me. And the second period of conflict was the Roehm Putsch, during which time as the Minister of Justice I had to sit with the arrested men to avoid having them shot by SS. This made Hitler furious. Hitler called me in personally and said, "I demand that you hand these men over immediately for execution." I was sitting in the room of the prison director. I told Hitler, "I am the Minister of Justice in Bavaria, and without legal authority I cannot hand these men over." Then he said, "I am the Fuehrer of all constitutional and political matters in Germany, and I take the responsibility that these men be handed over." Then I said under reservations of Reich law which Hitler had promised to proclaim, I told him to hand me a list of the men who had to be surrendered. While originally there was a list of two hundred names, after long hours of consultation, the list was reduced to eighteen names, so that my interfering in this matter on that day saved the lives of over two hundred men. That was the beginning of the end for me as Justice official and the law was proclaimed and all the steps taken by Hitler were legalized. Hitler said, "I believe we have made an entirely wrong man the Bavarian Minister of Justice."

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Didn't you also tell me that you considered that Hitler's actions in making himself into a dictator were opposed to the principles of the Nazi Party and to the German law as it stood?

A. For instance—

Q. Just answer my question.

A. In my opinion, yes.

Q. How do you account for the fact that you wrote a book in 1938, five years after you say you started to oppose Hitler and his ideas of dictatorship, and in this book you set forth a juridical, a legal foundation for the Nazi Party state?

A. Hitler had been legally elected the head of the German Reich after the death of Hindenburg. In this capacity one cannot say he was a dictator. He was not a dictator. In a constitutional way he was not a dictator. He simply had united in one person the head of the State, the head of the Government, and the head of the Party.

Q. Did he do all that legally in your opinion?

A. It was legal since it had been consented by the German people by vote, through a vote. What I accuse him of is the doing away of the independence of the court and judges, the introduction of concentration camps, and the loss of the individual legal rights.

Q. All these things happened before 1938, didn't they?

A. Yes. They happened before 1938 but I still had the hope to be able to force him back again sometime.

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Frank, taken in Nurnberg, Germany, 6 September 1945, 1015-1200, by Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Herbert Sherman, Interpreter; T/4 R. R. Kerry, Reporter.

The Aim of Nazi Law

Q. You remember making the address at the Nietzsche Archives in Weimar in 1934?

A. That I did not as Minister of State for Bavaria but as president of the Academy of German Law. This speech was at a meeting of all the law professors in Germany—not all of them but only the law professors, law-philosophy professors, and I invited Rosenberg and some other professor. The reason that I had it there was that I knew personally very well the sister of Nietzsche who still lived at this time. It was Mrs. Foerster Nietzsche. That was the reason why we met at the house where Nietzsche spent the last years of his life.

Q. Now, do you remember stating in the course of the speech that you made in Weimar at the Nietzsche Archives that the aims of the Nazi law were not the protection of the weak at the expense of the strong?

A. That was just torn out of the whole speech. That is the idea of Nietzsche. Nietzsche said that.

Q. Did you or did you not make that statement?

A. In the way it was shown here I certainly had not said it, although it might have been in the whole speech. Naturally the law always aims to help the strong and to develop the strength of the healthy part of the State. If you want to try to pose this little part of the whole speech in a way that I have said, you just eliminate the weak at the expense of the strong, then I am sorry to say that is entirely wrong.

Investigation of Conditions at Dachau in 1933

Q. When did you first visit Dachau?

A. Only once, in connection with all the Party leaders. This happened after a Party Congress in Munich. I don't know in which year it was. I think it was in 1935 or '36.

Q. As a matter of fact, didn't you make a report on your visit to Dachau?

INTERROGATIONS

A. On this occasion there was a parade of the police force in the camp. We saw the general set-up, but we didn't actually see the prisoners and so on.

Q. To whom did you usually make reports?

A. I don't believe that I made this visit during the time I was Minister of the State of Bavaria.

Q. I don't care about that. Did you or did you not make it?

A. I cannot remember that I made any kind of report.

Q. Didn't you order an investigation to be made of Dachau back in 1933 or 1934?

A. That was just the discussion with General von Epp which we discussed in our last session.

Q. What did you discuss with General von Epp?

A. It was about the first event we had in the concentration camp of Dachau. The court of justice asked to make an investigation about several killings at Dachau. I asked General von Epp to make an investigation about this case and to make the report at Munich. At the same time I addressed myself to Reichsminister of Justice Guertner, and I asked him to come to Munich, and he came to Munich and I insisted that he himself had to talk to Adolf Hitler, to whom he had to report directly, and to explain those events. He took all available material with him. Later it was explained that those were only single cases and were taken care of and that no repetition of this kind of accident would happen again. With this kind of explanation we had to satisfy ourselves because there was no more we could do about it.

Q. The fact of the matter is that you knew about Dachau back in 1933 and General von Epp, or whoever made this investigation for you, told you about the conditions which existed, didn't he?

A. Not General von Epp, but my state prosecutor told me and I reported to General Epp.

Q. So you did make a report on Dachau, as I stated some time ago?

A. It was only a protest against this system they used at this time at Dachau.

Q. What was the system they used at that time at Dachau?

A. Just arresting people without court trial, without judgment, and intern them or even kill them and then explain that they only shot them in an attempt to escape. I made this protest and I always kept up my protests against this kind of unlawful dealing.

Q. As a matter of fact, wasn't the use of Dachau and similar concentration camps part of the general plan some of the people in the Party had to control Germany according to their own dictates?

A. You cannot always connect the 200,000 or 2,000,000 of the Party with the aims of Himmler or Hitler. Hitler was the might as the legal Reich Chancellor. He got his position in a very legal way.

Q. But weren't these activities as well as other activities part of a general plan on the part of a few people including Hitler, including Himmler, and including other people to take over the German Government?

A. Yes. Himmler and Hitler and Heydrich and perhaps even Goering certainly had this in mind and were aiming to get hold of the German government by this means. But these aims were developed in an "inner circle" and nobody else could have taken part, especially not because Hitler was at this time still under Hindenburg and had to keep faith anyhow on the exterior.

The Difference Between Legality and Illegality

Q. What did you consider illegal about the way Hitler was operating?

A. There were different things to consider.

Q. Let's consider them one at a time.

A. The first illegal thing was the introduction of concentration camps. He had no right to do so because he was under oath as a Chancellor of the Reich and was bound to the law of Weimar, but he legalized that later by asking the Reichstag for this change of law.

Q. Well, didn't you consider that in violation of the fundamental rights of the German people?

A. Yes, very much so.

Q. Did you as a member of the Reichstag vote in favor of that change?

A. Those changes to the German republican law never referred to the introduction of concentration camps.

Q. You knew what they meant and for what?

A. Hitler just asked the Reichstag by a majority vote to give him the right to change the German constitution so everything would be legal. At this moment we agreed to it. We did not know to what extent Hitler would use his might.

Q. Did you personally agree to that change?

A. Yes. Even the members of the Center Party, the German Nationalist Party, too. We would never have voted for that if we would have known in advance what happened later.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You knew then, that Dachau was in existence?

A. No. That was before. It was during the Reichstag session when Hitler for the first time appeared as Chancellor of the Reich. It must have been around March 1933.

Q. Let's go back to my question: Wasn't it a matter of discussion among Party members prior to the time that Hitler became Chancellor that one of the means whereby the power of the Party would be effectuated was that Hitler would become the absolute ruler of Germany?

A. From my point of view, the very fact that Hitler became Chancellor of the Reich was quite sufficient for the aims of the Party.

Q. My question still is: Was it not a matter of discussion prior to the time that Hitler became Chancellor that he would take over complete power in Germany?

A. I don't know if this was discussed in Party circles. In my circle of Party lawyers it was not discussed.

After the death of Hindenburg, ordinarily Germany would have had to have an election to elect a president. The fact that Adolf Hitler did not do that at that time but instead put himself in this position, that certainly was the abolition of the German constitution. But later on he legalized that by asking the German people to vote for it, and the vote of the German people gave him the legal right. The influence of the German people was tremendous.

Q. And so when you came back to Munich and found on your desk a notice to the effect that, as I understand your words, the Reichstag had voted power to Hitler, that wasn't any great surprise to you, was it?

A. No. That's just a law like every other law. Why shouldn't he have the might? If it is only done in a legal way, why shouldn't he?

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Frank, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 6 September 1945, 1430-1700, by Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Herbert Sherman, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair van Vleck, Court Reporter.

The German People—"Hitler's Private Property"

Q. You said you were in opposition to Hitler and disagreed with Hitler in various things. We have discussed concentration camps. What are the other things you had in mind?

A. Hitler brought everything in a legal way by passing laws.

All of those points I am now going to criticize were formerly legal laws. The first things I accuse Hitler of is the fact that he abolished the idea of the creation of the German Reichstag. We discussed this morning that the Reichstag voted by majority full power to Hitler under the condition that the Reichstag in itself, and its rights, would continue the same way it was working under the Weimar system. Practically, Hitler kept his word, because actually there was a Reichstag up to the end, but the moment he dissolved all the parties, the real meaning of the Reichstag didn't exist any more. The German people, accordingly, were represented only by the Party in the Reichstag. That was one of the reasons why I founded the Academy of German Law. I called to this academy all those persons who were of importance in German Law, without special consideration for their Party membership. The idea was to try to have operative law in Germany through this academy. Is that sufficient or do you want me to explain it further?

The next point I criticized is the fact that Hitler dissolved the Reichsrat. The Reichsrat was a representation of the different eighteen states, eighteen or sixteen states, which altogether represented the German Reich, such as Bavaria, Prussia, and Hamburg. By the fact that Hitler dissolved the Reichsrat, these different countries did not have any influence on the law making in Germany any more. Up to this date the influence of the Reichsrat on the German law making was quite important. Now, Reich law could be made by the Reichstag without consulting the Reichsrat.

The third point is the position of the Reich President, which Adolf Hitler dissolved in 1934 after the death of Hindenburg. In the case of the Reichsrat and the Reich President, Hitler could explain that he never took an obligation to keep that up, contrary to the continuation of the Reichstag, where he took the obligation to make no change whatsoever. The next point would be the fact that Hitler dissolved all the existent little states into one Reich. He degraded those states to provinces. Those states lost their character as a state and were dependent entirely on a centralized government of the Reich.

Now, I am coming to something else that I wanted to criticize very strongly, and that is the fact that Himmler was able, under the protection of Hitler, to build up a state in the state, with the help of his SS. This SS state in the German state was expanding and growing every day, taking over more rights and control through menace or influence. The rules for the SS were made by

INTERROGATIONS

Himmler. Himmler had executive rights, not only for the SS, but for the police. He had his own law making. He made out the life rules for the members of the SS. A leader of the SS could marry only with consent of Himmler. The SS had their own SS courts where any kind of crimes or theft was dealt with. The biggest disadvantage Adolf Hitler brought into Germany was the fact that he let grow this SS state in the state. Those special assignments Hitler gave Himmler were made known not only in the Party but in the state. The knowledge of those rights Hitler gave Himmler was made known not only on a high level in the Reich, but down to little states and provinces.

Himmler built up his own science. He created his own institute for scientific research. Himmler had his own representative in the various groups of economy everywhere in Germany. In those parts of the government where Himmler had not direct control, members of the SS were sent, in order to control those parts, informally, for Himmler's advantage. Himmler himself could never be accused by anybody in the Reich. He could not have been prosecuted by anybody in the Reich, but he had the possibility to prosecute or to accuse everybody in the Reich.

Everything that is coming now is strictly connected with what I said before; for instance, one of the most serious reproaches which can be made to Adolf Hitler is the fact that he broke the promises he made to the Christian Religious Organizations and the churches. I mention for instance the Concordat Hitler made with Rome. This Concordat was made in '33 or '34 and was quite promising for the Catholic Church, but thanks to Himmler, the Catholic Church in Germany had a terrific situation during the period beginning '35 to the end of the war. Everything protected through the Concordat was abolished. The Catholic faculties at the universities in Munich were dissolved in contradiction of the Concordat. I tried on several occasions to do something against this abolishing of now existing rights but without any success.

Nearly the same thing happened to the Protestant Church but not that bad because the Protestant Church did not represent the same state, might, and power the Catholic Church had through Rome. A good example here is the case of Pastor Niemoeller. All those were the first steps toward the final breakdown of any kind of law in Germany. The security of the individual to find his rights in justice, or at court, were nonexistent by the fact that everybody, even if the court decided that the man was innocent, could have been picked up at the back door by Himmler's SS and be put into a concentration camp, internment camp, or political prison.

Q. Have you finished?

A. No. One of the worst things is the fact that Hitler introduced, during the war, the responsibility of the whole family for the fault of one member of the family, and named that Sippenhaftung. That was by far the lowest grade law could attain.

Now I should explain all those different points with various examples if you should like me to do so. In the very beginning when the Reichsrat was abolished, and things like that took place, nobody realized what the future would be. Now, looking back, we see that everything served the sole purpose: to make the whole German people the private property of one man, Adolf Hitler. For me there was only one possibility left. I wanted to save the independent judge. If I only could help to have an independent judge, then law in Germany would have been granted, and you will not be able to show me in any of my speeches in which I did not point out that we needed in all of Germany an independent judge. The whole character of the state was false. What was in the beginning a voluntary people movement became later a forced institution. It was not only contradiction to law; it was contradiction to the Party program itself, because the Church was mentioned in the Party program, so was the maintenance of law mentioned in the program.

Treatment of Jews in Government General of Poland

Q. What was your job in September 1939?

A. I was drafted and I was a lieutenant in the Army.

Q. What was your job in October 1939?

A. I was nominated by the Fuehrer as Governor General at Cracow.

Q. Why did he give you that job?

A. There are many who say that he liked to see me in such an exposed place.

Q. Never mind what many of them say. What do you think? Why do you think you got that job?

A. I sincerely believe at that time that Hitler wanted to give me a chance to prove to him what I was able to do, as a man of administration, but I lost his confidence already after one week when I saw what kind of responsibility Hitler gave to Himmler and to Goering in the same area I was supposed to be the responsible man. My first action was that I resigned.

Q. It is pretty hard to believe, isn't it, that you had all this opposition to Hitler from 1933 to 1939, and that he would give you such a nice job? You don't think that is odd, do you?

INTERROGATIONS

A. I was a member of the Party. I was known as a man of law. I was known on an international basis. I visited Poland twice. The same way he made von Neurath Protector in Prague, he nominated myself a Governor for Poland.

He told me that this was not a situation for me to be a lieutenant in the Army during the war. I was the only minister and Party leader who was active in the military force. I told him, "I am an officer in a very proud regiment and now we are at war, and now we have to give an example with a gun in the hand." Hitler said, "I don't care about that. You will have a special war task and you just have to take your assignments." Hitler said, "I promise you I will help you to overcome all difficulties, and you may see me any day you want to discuss anything with me."

Q. What did he tell you he wanted you to do in Poland?

A. For Hitler the most necessary thing was to get order in economy and travel. It was general administration and to take care that all troubles we found in Poland would be eased.

Q. What special instructions did he give you with reference to the treatment of the Polish population?

A. He only said that the situation in Poland was especially difficult right then. He said I must understand that, therefore, he would have to give special jurisdiction to Himmler and to the Army to guarantee that order will be reestablished as soon as possible.

Q. What was your first official action when you were appointed Governor?

A. After my entry into Cracow, on November 1st or November 7th, a proclamation to the inhabitants of Cracow.

Q. What did you do about getting labor?

A. It was a voluntary demand to the population.

Q. As a matter of fact, your first official action really was on the 26th of October 1939. Isn't that right?

A. No.

Q. And it wasn't on entering into Cracow, was it?

A. I was nominated on the 26th of October.

Q. You were appointed that day, too, weren't you?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember a decree introducing forced labor for all Polish nationals of Jewish descent?

A. If I signed it, it came from me. I don't know if it was the 26th of October.

Q. Was it the 27th?

A. That I don't know.

Q. Do you remember the decree?

A. Yes. I remember.

Q. What else do you remember about it?

A. It was not forced labor; it was an obligation to work.

Q. Did you order that all Jews be brought together in special places for this voluntary work, as you describe it?

A. I would like to see the decree, if it was a general order, or if I have signed this special order.

Q. You will be shown it soon enough. In the meanwhile, I want to test this memory you spoke about this morning.

A. At the very beginning, Buehler (nominated by Frank as chief of his office) and some other representatives of different ministries handed to me decrees I had to sign.

Q. Did you read those decrees?

A. I did not only read the decrees, but I studied them. I agreed entirely, that during a war, it was quite all right to use this kind of labor the way we did, naturally, in the interests of the Reich.

Q. I am not talking about that right now; I am just talking about whether you did, or did not, on or about the 26th day of October 1939, issue the kind of decree I just told you about.* Did you or didn't you?

A. If that is my signature, then I did.

Q. Don't you remember?

A. Yes; it was a special wish of Adolf Hitler that under any condition we had to start at once with the work.

Q. So you did issue those decrees, didn't you?

A. Yes.

Q. Of course you did, and it was your first official act too, wasn't it?

A. No.

Q. It was the second decree that you signed. Is that it?

A. It seems that all those decrees were together on the first number, where different laws were passed.

Q. When did Hitler tell you to issue this decree?

A. Already during the conversation I mentioned before.

Q. Why didn't you mention this decree when you told me about that conversation?

A. I told you that it was Hitler's special wish, to reconstruct as soon as possible, Poland, and to get order into this country.

Q. How about the Polish Jews, did they like you?

A. I was not responsible for the Polish Jews. It was Himmler who was charged with all the rules referring to the treatment of Jews in Poland. In a case where the Poles were part of a resistance movement, even those Poles were under the jurisdiction of Himmler. As a result, the Polish Jews worked under police supervision, and you must find it in one of these decrees.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You had something to do with the Polish Jews, though, didn't you?

A. Yes. I tried to save some of them at my residence.

Q. Did you save many of them?

A. During the time I went to the Reich, they took them away from me. I had a possession near Cracow. I was living on a summer residence near Cracow, and there a Jewish couple were in charge of my stable, and I tried to save them, too, but during the time I had to leave for Germany they were taken away from me.

Q. What about this decree of October 26th?

A. This decree on October 26th mentions the fact that the Jewish forced labor had to work under police supervision.

Q. That is all the dealings that you had with the Polish Jews, just that one decree?

A. Yes. It must be the only thing. I don't remember anything else. It might be possible that I had another decree. I made another decree concerning the ghetto in Cracow, but I am not sure about it. It might be that even the order for the construction of the ghetto was a part of the police administration, not of mine.

Q. Do you remember now any other decrees that you signed dealing with Polish Jews?

A. I don't know if you mean by that one of the decrees where the Polish Jews were obliged to have the Star of David on an armband.

Q. Do you remember that one?

A. I don't remember if I made the decree.

Q. You know very well that you signed that decree, don't you?

A. Did I sign that? If I did, then it is all right. I don't want you to believe that I want to deny anything I signed. I have been in prison for four months, and you must realize it is very hard for me to concentrate myself. I don't want you to have the impression that I want to deny anything I did.

Q. Didn't you on the 23d day of November 1939 issue, above your own signature, a decree calling for the segregation of Jews in the General Government of Poland, and compelling all Polish nationals of the Jewish race, above the age of ten, to wear a white armband with the Star of David?* This decree threatened imprisonment and a heavy fine on all who failed to comply.

A. Yes. In my subconscious mind I remember that.

Q. What about your conscious mind?

*See document 2672-PS, Vol. V, p. 368.

A. During this time, it was a rule in the whole German Reich that the Jews had to wear the yellow star on their breast. I didn't want to have the same thing and thought it would be a good idea to have something else, because I judged it much better than to have this yellow star; so I suggested the white armband with a star, because all the German workers anyhow had some kind of an armband. I thought it was not so discriminating for the Jews to wear an armband, something similar to those of the German workers. It was a rule in the Reich, and I considered it much better than those the Reich had now in order. It was much less discriminating. Besides that, those were all general orders coming from the Reich.

Q. Where was it intended to concentrate the Jews?

A. In the East.

Q. Whose intention was that?

A. From Hitler and those men, Himmler, and those men around him.

Q. Did you ever get any written directives or instructions with reference to that?

A. No. Never.

Q. Then how did you know it was Himmler's plan to do that?

A. Somebody told me in Cracow, that all the Jews were to be sent to Theresienstadt and the East. At this time we considered the East as containing all of Russia.

Q. Do you remember stating, during that speech, that it had been decided that instead of concentrating all the Jews in Poland, that Poland was to serve merely as a transmission camp and that the Jews actually were to go further East?

A. That is a question of the policy concerning the Jews that was only in the hands of Himmler. He was so much in charge of this question that he even was not obliged to make it known to the countries concerned about what kind of action he was about to take.

Q. You don't remember then making the statement about which I have just told you?

A. I don't want to deny that on some occasions I did mention something about the solution of the Jewish question, because this question at this time had to be brought to its end.

Q. Do you mean the solution of sending them East?

A. No. We were waiting for a solution from Berlin, to know exactly what we could do about those poor men.

Q. What was your suggestion for the solution?

A. I never was supposed to make any solution. We worked quite well together with the Jews. They were distributed through the country, and without the Jews there would never have been any commerce. The Jews in Poland are specialists, like tailors or shoemakers. Without those little Jewish commercial men, it would have been very hard to get along. My government had always the intention to keep those Jews in their places because we needed them in their work. We proved that. We had to shut down the factories after the moment Jews were deported from Poland.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Who established the ghettos in Poland?

A. The police started with it. They concentrated them together in certain living quarters.

Q. What was your connection with that?

A. I tried to get a certain law into all of these decrees, and I remember now, that I made a decree about the construction of Jewish living quarters.

Q. You established the ghettos, didn't you?

A. I only made these decrees lawful. It was not the task of the police to consider the question of sewage, water, and labor and taxes for these ghettos. That was my task.

Q. My question is this: Did you or did you not, by decree, legalize the setting up of ghettos?

A. I only tried, when these ghettos were erected by the police, to get a legal background and foundation for those things.

Q. You did that by issuing a decree, didn't you?

A. In the interests of everybody, and especially, in the interests of the Jews.

Q. All I am saying is that it was your ultimate responsibility, as Governor General of Poland, to administer these ghettos. Now, you did it by one means or another, but the fact of the matter is that it was your responsibility; isn't that so?

A. Originally, these ghettos were erected by the police. I later had two decrees to legalize those facts. Furthermore, I was charged with administration, but we had terrific difficulties with the police who did interfere daily in our administration measures. The idea of my decree was only to protect these Jews, who, without any special decree and law, would have been diminished or eliminated. There was always the talk about the elimination of the Jews, and I tried, by these decrees, to save them. It was entirely wrong. I know that you will always want to put me in a position where I will be accused as the originator of these ghettos, but that is not the truth. They were already erected, and it was only my task to legalize these things.

Q. Did you ever visit the ghettos?

A. No. Once I went to the ghetto in Warsaw.

Q. What did you find there? What were the conditions?

A. The conditions, in the long range, were absolutely impossible. Under any conditions, a change was necessary, and then started the biggest battle I ever had. It was impossible to get the necessary foodstuffs for these 100,000 poor men. We did what we could, but the land was poor. The country was poor, and all around was the police. We really had to smuggle in food. I ask you to hear Governor Fischer who was at Warsaw, who is able to give you a detailed report confirming what I just told you. For a certain time, conditions in the ghettos were better. The Jewish inmates in the ghetto made treaties with German industries for deliveries of uniforms and other things.

"Frank's View of The Jewish Problem"

Q. I haven't any impressions at all regarding your Jewish activities, but I want to find out from you just what your opinion is with respect to that.

A. We had to solve the Jewish problem in Germany. My idea of the solution was to get the Jewish population out of Germany through emigration. That means to go into other countries who would like to have them. It was very difficult in the years after the revolution for the German population to live together with the Jews, and it was originally Hitler's program to emigrate all the Jews from Germany.

Q. What was your opinion of the laws which were enacted depriving Jews of their full rights as German citizens? Did you agree or disagree with these laws?

A. Basically, I agreed with these laws. The Jews are a special people, and they should have their own state. The best thing would have been if they would have been given a state and they would have lived over there and would have been happy. This Jewish problem is not a specific German problem, it is an international problem, and starts to be a problem in every country all over the world. It is not only a problem of this time we are living in, actually, but it is a thousand-year-old problem.

Q. How do you reconcile your professed desire to have the German state operate on a legal basis and, therefore, your opposition to Hitler because of some of the things that he did, and your statement that you agreed with these laws that made Jews less than German citizens?

A. That at that time was my opinion about the Jewish problem. That really at that time was my opinion. I was at that time a very poor man. I saw the Jews had all very rich positions and fortunes, and out of this youthful criticism, I came to my judgment about the Jews.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. As a lawyer, did you consider it right and proper, and in keeping with fundamental concepts of German law, that by decree Jews of German nationality were deprived of certain citizenship rights?

A. If the Communists would have gained power, the way Hitler gained power in Germany, they would have deprived all the Germans of their rights, fortunes, and so on.

Q. Never mind about that. Just answer my question. How do you reconcile these opinions?

A. I didn't have at this time any reluctance to these laws against the Jews. Today, naturally, I am more awake. Today I naturally realize that you cannot solve the problem this way. You have to have a big international conference or you have to make provisions where to put the Jews in a normal way. Besides that, I think we should have made a difference between the Jews, those Jews who were citizens a long time, and those who came after the revolution in the east into Germany.

Q. Did you, in any of your writings, point out that it was contrary to the fundamental German law to deprive one part of the population of citizens' rights on a racial basis?

A. I never wrote against this question, but I did agree with the development of the Jewish question in Germany.

Q. Did you agree with the Nurnberg laws?

A. Yes. I did, because I considered it as a very necessary law.

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Frank, taken in Nurnberg, Germany, 7 September 1945, 1030-1215, by Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Siegfried Ramler, Interpreter; T/4 R. R. Kerry, Reporter.

Persecution of the Jews in Poland

Q. Do you remember the removal from Warsaw of a large number of Jews in 1942?

A. When should that have been?

Q. During the period 22 July to 3 October 1942.

A. This might have been reported to me later on. Was this during the time of the ghetto rising?

Q. You know whether or not it was reported to you that a large number of Jews had been removed from Warsaw during a period in 1942?

A. I have understood the question. State Secretary Buehler would know it. I know that a conference had taken place between the City and the State Secretary, but I had not taken part in this conference.

Q. Well, wasn't the result of the conference reported to you?

A. No. The competent authority was in Warsaw.

Q. Is it your statement that as Governor-General of Poland, you didn't know that a large part of the population of Warsaw had been removed therefrom?

A. Certainly I got to know it. That's quite clear.

Q. That is my question to you. Wasn't it reported?

A. It certainly was not told me by State Secretary Buehler, to whom the report was directed. If a report had been issued, perhaps it was by Governor Fischer, who was personally in Cracow.

Q. I am not trying to quibble with you on words. When I say report, I don't mean necessarily that a formal written document was presented to you concerning these matters. What I mean generally is, were you not informed by one means or another whether orally or in writing of these events?

A. The question about the transportation of Jews has certainly been reported to me not only from Warsaw but other sources.

Q. What other sources?

A. Out of the whole Reich.

Q. Didn't Buehler tell you who told him about these things?

A. Not only Buehler spoke about it, but also Secretary Boepple spoke about it, and besides that, this was a general plan where always the names were mentioned because this was a problem that affected the administration all over Germany; but what we did know was that Himmler was the Reich Commissar for Jews. Only once a written document came into my hands from Lammers in which was written that all affairs in the Reich and all occupied territories of the Reich are under the jurisdiction of the Reich SS Commissar Himmler. This document has been repeated in various forms. Once it came in a connection where the police alone could dispose of the property of the Jews: that all the property that belonged to Jews who were being evacuated came under the charge of Reich Commissar Himmler and not in the charge of State authorities, and this also applied to the General Government.

Q. I still say that as Governor-General of Poland, when reports were made to you by your subordinates regarding instructions that they had received from Berlin while they were in Berlin, that they must have told you from whom these instructions were received and who these people were that gave the instructions that you refer to.

INTERROGATIONS

A. I think the best man who would know about this is SS Gruppenfuehrer Krueger.

Q. That may be, but I am asking what you know about it.

A. I know what has been reported to me.

Q. And what was reported to you?

A. That the Jews on the order of the Fuehrer should be transported towards the east in stages, that this plan was not discussed very often because we often administered those things ourselves and there was also a different town, Theresienstadt, which was also taken into consideration, but that had not been notified to us in writing.

Q. Now, you said that your subordinates, including Buehler, on occasion told you about instructions which had been received concerning the treatment to be accorded the Jews or other matters in connection with the Jews, and I want to know from whom your subordinates received these instructions.

A. First the word "instruction" is far too grand a word. It was not really an instruction. It was just the result of conversations and rumors. Himmler had never expressed his plans so clearly, and what I have said and done then was just the result of beliefs which were quite clear to me.

Q. The question is this: Did you or did you not take action in response to the message that you received from one of your subordinates as to what the people in Berlin wanted you to do with the Jews?

A. In no case have I had anything to do with the transportation of Jews from Warsaw, which was a clear internal affair of the SS.

Q. What connection did you have with the Jews?

A. I had no competent authority on this particular field. I had a few Jews in the castle with me as workers, but I personally had nothing to do with the Jews.

Q. You stated that after you talked with Buehler that you took action with reference to the suggestion that Buehler told you about as coming from Berlin. What were those actions to which you refer?

A. I have not said that I took action.

Q. What did you do?

A. I don't know what you mean by action, but I often talked to Dr. Fischer, and it is a fact that the transportation of Jews from Poland to different places was very bad for the economy. We have gotten in touch with the Chief of the SS, with the Oberkommando of the Wehrmacht Keitel, and the Reich Minister to prevent Jews who worked so well producing uniforms from being transported away from Warsaw. My point of view was that it was crazy to do such a thing in the middle of the war when one must have every button of every uniform. We had armament officials that came to us and begged us to leave the Jews because their factories would have to stop.

Q. What did you tell Hitler about the Jews?

A. I told him in 1940 that the special thing about the Jews in Poland was that they were a different class of people from what we had in Germany. In Germany the Jews are the rich ones. In Germany they are not manual workers; they are not people who stand in factories and work. In Germany they have been bankers, doctors, merchants. In Poland, on the other hand, the Jews are the small manual workers. They are the bootmakers, the tailors, and not only that, they are also semi-skilled workers in industry.

Q. What else was said?

A. And then I also told him that they are really quite well off, that they are very industrious and behave well, and that we cannot dispense with them in Poland because the Pole has not the nature that the German Jew has. The Jew in Poland was the man that brought the trade into the village because the transportation of the country was so very bad. There were no railways, and that was terribly important.

Q. What did Hitler say to all this?

A. That interested him but he did not talk about it further.

Q. Did you tell him about how the Jews were being treated?

A. That I could not tell him because nothing special had happened to the Jews.

Q. What happened after that?

A. The Colonel must remember that I came with very few men into a completely alien country. From the 7th of November it took me a quarter of a year until I occupied all my service posts, until all these posts were able to communicate with the central post or orders from the central post could be given to the different administrative sections. Besides I had in the country the Wehrmacht commander, who had nothing to do with me, who was not under me at all, and who was not responsible to me for any reports, and they had already been in the country since the 1st of September. The SS and police had already been in the country, as I said before. It is my personal opinion, although Adolf Hitler never told me in the course of all this time, that Himmler influenced Hitler to make a very great anti-Jewish campaign, using the reason that the Jews were guilty of the war against Germany. This of course contributed in ever-increasing measure to the more difficult problem of the Jews. The SS never allowed any of my workers to get involved in their Jewish campaigns. At first they started to gather together the Jews, saying that anyway the Jews had their own parts of the town in every town they lived, and it was then we tried through the formation of ghettos to keep things in order at least in the bigger cities. In these ghettos all Jews were to be rounded up together; they were to be under the protection of the police; they were to have their own administration there. I want to point out that the order we talked about yesterday about the forced labor of Jews, that those orders had actually never gone into effect, that the SS acted under their own orders and declared that the General-Governor had nothing to order.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What happened to the Jews?

A. We already talked about the fact today that these ghettos came into their greatest difficulties, especially Warsaw, where food was concerned. And then in accordance with the general plan, the general transportation of Jews towards the east was carried out.

Q. What was your participation in that?

A. That I fought against that until the very last moment, as I said before.

Q. Then what did you do at the last moment?

A. I went to the highest authorities of the different departments in order to interest them in my opinion, but I got the decision of the Fuehrer from the Oberkommando of the Wehrmacht Keitel, who told me himself that the Fuehrer wanted the transportation of the Jews to the East carried out under any circumstances.

Q. After your opinion was overruled, what did you do?

A. I have already told the Colonel before that eight times I offered my resignation.

Q. How many Jews were killed or liquidated during that 1943 period?

A. In the rising?

Q. Yes.

A. The number has never been told to me. I once asked Himmler to show me the photos of the ghetto but that was not shown to me. Nobody could enter this territory. It was shut tightly. It had been declared a military wartime restriction, and the civilian administration was kept outside completely. I just had a very superficial report with no exact information, and whenever I had a question, I just received the answer that the question hadn't been cleared up. It was always very difficult to ask questions because the police and the Wehrmacht said, "Mr. Governor-General what have you to do with that question? You should sit in the castle and be a representative."

Q. Did you hear that more than 50,000 Jews had been killed or captured or liquidated one way or the other?

A. This number I am hearing for the first time. I have not heard any numbers but I heard it was thousands. I was also told that the losses of the German police and Wehrmacht had been very substantial.

Q. What action, if any, did you take in connection with the destruction of the Warsaw ghetto in 1943?*

A. I asked for reports from the Wehrmacht and the police, and it was reported to me that there was really a big rising with weapons, with cannons, machine guns of all kinds, that it was an internal civil war.

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Frank, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 September 1945, 1440-1720, by Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Capt. Jesse F. Landrum, Reporter; Bernard Reymon, Interpreter.

Administration and Exploitation of Poland

Q. My question is, what was your principal duty?

A. My principal duty was in a country completely liquidated by war to establish an administration. The administration placed under my authority was in charge of the following departments: in the administration firstly, the division was the following—under the Governor General were governors and under each governor of the district there was a Kreishauptmann a title coined by me, and under the authority of the Kreishauptmann was the Polish voit (a Polish word) and each Polish voit had 10 to 20 communities under his administration. That was according to the number of the population, and all the Polish voits of one district formed, so to speak, the staff of the Kreishauptmann. The task of the Polish voits was to apply beneath them the orders coming from above and to transmit the claims from below to authorities above. That was the inner administration.

For the cities, there was instead of a Kreishauptmann a Stadthauptmann and under the Stadthauptmann there was a Polish Buergermeister. Also, I had the seat of my General Government in Cracow, and each governor in his turn had his own administration. That is what I call the backbone of the administration; and then come the Departments of Education, of Finance, Agriculture, Health. There were about 12 or 13 departments in all. And besides this administration, as outlined by me, there were in the country the following administrations which were entirely independent of and from me: the most important there were the Police and the SS. It had been said officially that the Chief of the Police was under my authority; but that was simply a personal way of emphasizing his rank was not above mine; and subsequently, by an order of the Fuehrer (which was published in a general order), the Police was entirely removed from my jurisdiction to such an extent that it had its own State Secretary, which State Secretary received his orders directly from Himmler.

*See document 1061-PS, Vol. III, p. 781.

INTERROGATIONS

To mark the complete separation and distinction of the Police and the SS from my administration, no member of the Police force or SS was a member of my administration; whereas, all the officials of all departments under the order of the Governor General were being paid out of my treasury, while the personnel of the police and SS were being paid directly from and by the cash of Himmler and Berlin. So that I had not even any disciplinary authority over the Police as any chief is supposed to have. Any attempt to manage the Police had to go in the shape of a request, not in the form of an order. On the top of all this, the Chief of Police was not only a direct representative of Himmler as Chief Commissar of the General Police, but also "fuer die Festigung des Volkstums," and besides, in the question of the Jews, this system was quite impossible and I had continually to envisage my resignation as I was in continual conflict. I wish only to say that my fight with or against the Police and the SS was known throughout the whole country. It was only the Polish Emigré-government in London which did not see the picture as it was; whereas, the native Poles at home, with whom I collaborated, they saw the things as they were. It is only after three years of struggle that the head of the police, Krueger, was finally recalled. This recall of Krueger was, to a certain extent, a triumph for me as it was a symbolical proof that my policy had got the upper hand; so that the successor to Krueger, Koppe, was a rather decent person. It is evident that the reports sent by Krueger to Himmler at Berlin, and Himmler being my enemy, are for me today the most glamorous justification because in those reports I was depicted as a regular formalist, as a weakling, as a man who was not in good standing with the Poles and who did not carry out the very policy for which Himmler stood.

Q. How do you know that?

A. In my continual visits to Berlin this was told me by Minister Lammers and in one of the few interviews I had personally with Hitler—it was in 1943 in the presence of Bormann—Hitler himself made reference to those reports by and from Himmler. This conference probably took place sometime in May 1943. I again offered to resign, saying that I could not keep on in that manner. Buehler is well aware of these facts and I wish you could give him a hearing.

The economic life in Poland was in three directions: in the first place, all matters of agriculture were taken care of by the agricultural representative of my government; secondly, departments non-agricultural and non-important from the war point of view were attended to by the heads of the departments, also within my government. But while the most important part of the economy was continued by the Chief of the 4-Year-Plan, Hermann Goering, or by and from the Minister for Armaments, Goering even had the right to issue orders, which had legal force in the General Government, without consulting me.

Q. Did he ever do that?

A. This is printed in the legal publications.

Q. Did he ever issue any such orders?

A. Unfortunately, more than once. The worst of it was regarding the furnishing of foodstuff in the first two years of the war. Thus, once he asked for 500,000 tons of cereal (corn) from the General Government.

Q. Did you furnish it?

A. I did not furnish it. I had a very grave conflict with him. Goering said he didn't care whether anybody starves in Europe, but the German people ought not to starve. I furnished only a part which went to the Wehrmacht. From that time on, Goering called me "King Stanislas."

Q. Do you recall receiving an order from Goering regarding the exploitation of Polish natural resources?

A. This order was some time around December 1939, and thereupon, I went to see Adolf Hitler and I told him it can't go on. Goering wanted, at that time, that we break off every second track of the double railway lines.

Q. What did you do, in response to this order that was received from Goering, besides complain to the Fuehrer?

A. We didn't carry it out.

Q. You didn't? You didn't do anything at all?

A. We didn't do anything and what he did do, he did it with his own personnel.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What did the Fuehrer tell you when you complained to him about this order?

A. Hitler sided absolutely with me. He said it was madness.

Q. Was the order ever withdrawn?

A. I don't know whether it was formally withdrawn.

Q. Isn't it a fact that Poland was exploited?

A. I should remind you that I came into the country in November 1939. At that time, there was a delegate of the OKW, Buehrmann, and he was especially in charge of transportation of the most precious machinery to Germany; and as soon as I took up my duties as Governor-General, I received from all the governors a complaint to the effect that the situation was getting impossible. Things reached a climax where we in the General Government had not a single ton of copper because all the copper had been taken away. The machinery from Polish factories had been, long before my arrival, carried off by Buermann.

Q. What about the natural resources? Let us forget about machinery.

A. Anything which was available at all or any other commodities had been carried away totally to Germany and that is why when I arrived I immediately asked for those 600,000 tons of corn which I have just mentioned.

Q. Did you get it; did you pay it back?

A. If I had not received it, there would have been a catastrophe.

Q. Did you pay it back?

A. I can't remember.

Q. Is it your testimony that those orders issued by Goering in connection with the Four-Year Plan, were not executed by you?

A. Some plans I did execute; there were some reasonable plans.

Q. Which ones, for example?

A. One of these orders of Goering was the rebuilding of the factories for purposes of armament. That was before the Minister of Armaments, Speer, was appointed; at that time, Goering was alone in charge of it. Goering was the man I feared the most on account of his enormous needs.

Q. What other orders of Goering did you consider reasonable?

A. The rebuilding of navigation on the Vistula. Of course, the question is not what Goering asked me to do in favor of the Poles; the question is, what were the needs of Goering from Poland—that's the question.

Q. The question is, you stated that some of the orders that Goering issued as head of the Four-Year Plan were executed by you because you thought they were reasonable. I am trying to find out which orders you thought were reasonable.

A. That was the general scheme of the rebuilding of the armament industry within the General Government—those were very important propositions.

Q. How many thousands of workers did you supply to the German Reich from Poland?

A. When you speak of Poland, you, of course, mean the General Government.

Q. Yes, the Government General of Poland.

A. Within those 5 years, some 500,000 Poles and some 200,000 Ukrainians.

Q. How did you recruit those workers?

A. Those workers were reported to the Labor Office and were sent as volunteers.

Q. What do you mean "volunteers"?

A. It was my hardest fight always to obtain these volunteer workers.

Q. What do you mean by "volunteers"?

A. By volunteer workers I mean those who followed an appeal, reported voluntarily to the Labor Office, stating that they were willing to work for or in Germany.

Q. Isn't it a fact that you used to receive a quota of the number of workers that were desired from you on a regular basis?

A. When Sauckel became Reich Commissar for Labor, the number of workers furnished by the General Government was already so high that he was satisfied with a very small quota of say 50,000 laborers a year. Why, that could be obtained without any further ado.

Q. You mean to say that all the Polish labor that came from the Governor-General of Poland into Germany came voluntarily?

A. Absolutely, so far as they came from the Labor Office under my authority.

Q. Well, where else did they come from?

A. Well, but the Luftwaffe was in the country, the SS was in the country, and I had to fight for years to oppose any violent measures in this respect. And to give an instance, the police once surrounded a movie and was going to deport all the people coming out from it. Well, I was fighting with the utmost energy against such methods. I myself saw those trains with volunteers for Germany and I spoke to them. I sometimes gave them gifts and saw them off to Germany. I also obtained in the Reich a report on the treatment of Poles which, at the beginning, was rather harsh.

INTERROGATIONS

Well, the Poles had to wear a patch with the letter "P" on it and only in 1943 did I obtain authority that this "P" be removed. I had to negotiate for some 18 months to obtain the permission to send Catholic priests to the Polish laborers, which priests had been forbidden by Himmler. In places where Poles worked, they dared to put inscriptions on the churches, "No Admittance for Poles," and such cases of sheer madness I have continued to fight against. Well, we saw the kindness of the Church and also of the German people who didn't attach any importance to the official stuff; the Poles were well-treated by the German peasants, and they wrote accordingly to their families at home, and that again drew other Poles to Germany. There are also hundreds of thousands of Poles I had received within my General Government, some 800,000 Poles which had been sent from the Polish territory within the Reich, and it is from those Poles that I could recruit a labor force. Not exclusively from those, but also from those. But this was an additional charge for a small General Government since I didn't receive any additional foodstuffs. Those Poles were sent back under gruesome conditions and we had to set up our own sanitary establishments and equipment to take care of them.

Q. What about Maidanek?

A. What?

Q. You know what I mean. What about Maidanek, the concentration camp?

A. I gave an explanation the last time. What had taken place at Maidanek, I had heard that only from the foreign press.

Q. You are sure about that?

A. Maidanek was occupied by the Russians last summer and they had set down the conditions of the camp and made them known to the press of the world; and one day I received a visit of the Chief of Police who told me, "Here's the whole affair of Maidanek." I immediately saw the SS Gruppenfuehrer, Koppe, and told him what monstrous news I had received about happenings at Maidanek and I instructed him to proceed immediately to make an investigation.

Q. You mean to try to tell me that you didn't know Maidanek, that it existed, prior to the time of this press report?

A. Absolutely nothing. This I wish to say and that I did say under oath the last time.

Q. Didn't your assistants, those who were acting for you in the vicinity of Maidanek, didn't they know about it?

A. No. There had been a whole number of entirely closed-out camps—not only camps for Jews, but camps of all descriptions:

camps for POW's, which is the same as in Germany—the whole General Government was sprinkled with such camps.

Q. Did you ever ask anybody who was in those camps?

A. Well, I did ask and I was told those were camps for prisoners of war, camps for Germans returning from the Reich, etc., and access to those camps was severely prohibited to me or the civilian population.

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Frank, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 13 September 1945, afternoon, by Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Siegfried Ramler, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Reporter.

Frank Claims Ignorance of Concentration Camps

Q. What about other concentration camps besides Maidanek? What did you know about them?

A. The SS did not construct any bigger concentration camps—I am talking about all these years—of the style of Dachau, because outside of the General Government in Upper Silesia, they had a camp in Auschwitz.

Q. Did you know about that camp?

A. I knew that the camp existed there. One passed it on the train. It was a huge camp. One could always see the barbed wire when passing on the train, and this was always considered to be the central camp for the whole eastern territory.

Q. Is it your statement that the only concentration camp that you know of in the General Government of Poland was at Maidanek and that you didn't find that out until after the Russians had captured it?

A. It had been clear to me that concentration camps had been erected in the General Government from time to time, but that they had any mentionable size, it always seemed improbable to me, because I was always told that the people from the General Government should be sent to the concentration camp Auschwitz.

Q. You have been to Lublin, haven't you?

A. Yes.

Q. You have been there numerous times, haven't you?

A. The last time I was there was 1943.

Q. In the course of your travels to Lublin, if you turned your head to the right or left, you would have seen Maidanek, wouldn't you?

A. I was in the town. I don't know that. It was outside the town.

Q. You don't seem to know very much about what happened in the General Government of Poland, do you?

INTERROGATIONS

A. That is right.

Q. You were only there five and a half years. You were not there very long, were you?

A. What has that got to do with it? This is no reason why I should know everything that happened in the country. It is quite impossible.

I always tried to release people, officials, that used to be Poles and had been arrested for any reason.

Q. How many did you get out of Maidanek?

A. I cannot remember. I cannot say that I ever got any officials out of Maidanek.

Q. Did you ever try to get any out?

A. I can't say with certainty that I ever got anybody out of Maidanek, not I personally.

Q. Did you ever try to get anybody?

A. No. I have never received any official report that somebody had gone to Maidanek.

Q. How about unofficial reports?

A. I didn't receive any.

Frank's "Safeguarding" of Polish Art Treasures

Q. Wasn't most of the art removed from the Warsaw gallery?

A. Not by us.

Q. By whom?

A. If anything had gone, the SS might have taken it away or the Police or the Wehrmacht, the Luftwaffe. Anybody might have entered in this time. How should I know? What we found out has been registered.

Q. How about the Cracow Art Gallery? Is your answer the same on that?

A. There we could have saved most of the things that we found there.

Q. Didn't you?

A. Yes. The most important paintings, a Raphael, a Leonardo da Vinci, and so on, had been kept.

Q. Kept by whom?

A. We kept it with the state property of the General Government.

Q. How about other art galleries in General Government of Poland?

A. The same system has been followed everywhere. One tried to get to the art objects as quickly as possible after the war had finished and safeguard them. There has been a list published about the paintings, officially, and those paintings have been then distributed in the usual way. They have been used to beautify official buildings and so on, but not the very valuable ones. The most valuable ones have always been kept together and have been safeguarded.

Q. Where were they kept and by whom were they safeguarded?

A. There were different art storages constructed that were subordinate, for the main part, to Muehlmann.

Q. I am talking about the ones that were preserved by the Governor General of Poland.

A. It has been kept in storage in Cracow. There were big cellars full of those properties.

Q. There were a lot of them hanging on the walls of your apartment too, weren't there?

A. In the whole castle.

Q. Why didn't you leave those paintings hanging in the Cracow Art Gallery instead of removing them to the castle?

A. The art gallery was locked up. It wasn't open. It had another name. It wasn't called art gallery, but anyway it is what we mean. This one Leonardo da Vinci painting had to be protected by me, mostly because of the Reich. This was one of the reasons why I collected these paintings in the castle. The State Secretary Muehlmann wanted this painting for Goering. It had already been in Berlin once, then I had a very hard fight to get it back.

Q. What argument did you use? That it belonged to you?

A. That it is state property of the General Government and that it is not private property. I think that Goering got the least of the paintings from the General Government, if he got one.

Deportation of Slave Labor from Poland

Q. How many workers did you furnish Sauckel?

A. Sauckel had come very late, comparatively. When Sauckel came along, he only asked for very few people. That I have said before. These were voluntary workers and we could fulfill that without any trouble.

Q. How about Funk? How many workers did he want?

A. Funk was generally in charge of everything that the industry in Germany needed. Altogether we delivered a number somewhere around 800,000.

Q. You mean to Funk, Seldte, and to Sauckel, all three together?

A. To all different departments of the State.

Q. As I remember your statement before, it was to the effect that 90 percent at least of this labor was voluntary; is that correct?

INTERROGATIONS

A. They were all voluntary. The few that wanted to try to force these people we dealt with very rapidly and we avoided this action. They wanted to start this method with us too, but we were able to avoid it.

Q. Your statement is that there were no laborers obtained among Polish workers, for work in Germany, who did not volunteer for that job?

A. Yes. Out of the General Government, out of their own free will. You can see that from the numbers involved, because even before the war hundreds of thousands of workers went out of Poland every year. I have talked to the Colonel about it. We had our work offices all over the country and things ran comparatively very easy. We even carried it through that people should be able to come back for a furlough, to the General Government. The mail situation was brought into order. Our main job was to care that those Poles in Germany should be treated decently. At first, this was very bad. At first, these Poles were looked upon as enemies. That we could notice right away because the number of the voluntary workers declined. Then we saw that they obtained priests, that the whole treatment became a more sensible one and then the people came into contact with the different firms and works, and the people there had their own interests to keep them. Towards the end everything became fine. You can see that from the many Poles who did not even want to return to Poland. There were 400,000 that did not want to return.

Testimony of Hans Frank, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 3 October 1945, 1430-1700, by Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD, OUSCC. Also present: 1st Lt. Joachim Stenzel, Interpreter; and Pvt. Clair S. Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Pillage of Agricultural and Food Products

Q. Who had charge of establishing the quotas on agricultural products that were to be produced, or would be produced and taken from the Polish peasants?

A. That was determined by the Chief of the Four-Year Plan, Reichsmarshal Goering, and in collaboration with him by the Minister for Food and Nutrition.

Q. Was that done in a manner such as this: that is, you would be called on to furnish so many thousands of tons of a particular food, and you thereupon allocated it throughout the General Government of Poland?

A. We attempted to handle it. A drastic example of that sort was, for instance: in the year 1942, Reichsmarshal Goering simply ordered that the General Government of Poland was to provide 700,000 tons of foodstuffs, and, in addition, we were supposed to feed the military occupation forces in the General Government of Poland. I thereupon declared immediately that it was absolutely impossible and in negotiations, that lasted between three and four weeks, I was able to reduce the requirement to a basis that was more reasonable.

Q. To how many hundreds of thousands of tons was it finally reduced?

A. It was reduced to 560,000 tons. However, these were not passed on to the Reich, but they were also counted toward the requirements for the military occupation forces within the government.

Q. In other words, a total of 560,000 tons of foodstuffs was to be supplied to the Wehrmacht and to Goering?

A. Yes. However, I should say, about 80 percent, I should estimate, remained in the country and was consumed by the military.

Q. Taking the 560,000 tons as an example, did you thereupon distribute to all the agricultural areas of the General Government of Poland a certain quota, or part of that 560,000 tons? That is, each section had to produce a certain percentage of the requirement?

A. The harvest, naturally, was much higher than 560,000 tons. Let's assume the harvest of that year might have been something like 1,800,000 tons.

Q. Is it not a further fact that it was positively prohibited by the German authorities that any extra nourishment for Polish children be furnished?

A. That was tried, but it never succeeded. The German Reich, under the guidance of Goering, always assumed that the Reich comes first and everybody else comes afterwards. Thus we have taken a lot of measures without any regard to the Reich. That holds true especially after 1942, when this awful decree came out, and ever since then we made ourselves rather independent.

Reasons for Polish Hostility toward Germany

Q. Didn't you report in June, 1943, that one of the measures, which had led to a substantial deterioration of the attitude of the population of the General Government of Poland towards Germany, was mass arrests and mass shootings by the German police, in accordance with the system of collective responsibility?*

INTERROGATIONS

A. I certainly am convinced that I did not do that. In general, my protests were always against the measures of the police.

Q. With further reference to this report of 19 June 1943, did you not state therein that one of the measures which had led to a substantial deterioration of the attitude of the population of the General Government of Poland towards Germany was the confiscation of a major part of the Polish estates and the ex-appropriation of Polish peasants?

A. That referred to one very specific case, to which I made reference then. In a certain portion of the southern district of Lublin, overnight, so to speak, the Police and the SS had chased out the Polish farmers, and had brought in German settlers from somewhere in Russia, whom they wanted to settle in this area. We had to make the most frightful efforts in order to get new homesteads for these people in some other portion of the General Government. There was the same thing when the Army increased its combat training terrain. They would merely take over a village and leave to us the responsibility to provide new homes and new homesteads for the people.

Q. In line with that, didn't you state, further, in that report, that one of the causes for the deterioration in attitude towards the Germans was the encroachments that had been made upon industry, freight, and private property?

A. Certainly, it happened that a train was passing, and then the police and the Army would come and clean it out completely.

Q. How about industry and private property? Did you not also set forth those encroachments on those as contributing to this deterioration of feeling towards Germany?

A. Encroachments? It wasn't exactly anything in the way of expropriation, but rather a sort of temporary occupation of an industrial concern, if the industrial owners were in the occupied territories; that was more or less along the same lines as what was being done by the military governments everywhere, and even at present in Germany. For instance, in the case of the Hermann Goering Works, they would merely come in and take over a certain industrial establishment that possibly belonged to the General Government, and in that case there would be long negotiations in order to safeguard the administration of this factory independently. I recall one incident where an industrialist came from the Reich and offered me 3,000,000 zloty for an industrial establishment that would have been worth 30,000,000 zloty, and naturally I balked at that sort of an arrangement.

*See document 437-PS, Vol. III, p. 396.

Q. Included in these measures, which had led to a substantial deterioration in the feeling towards Germany, was the extensive paralysis of cultural life. Do you remember that?

A. That was my continuous fight. I, for instance, endeavored to reopen the theaters, and I created a Polish Philharmonic Symphony, and I endeavored to revive all these cultural efforts, but the Reich Propaganda Ministry opposed that and continuously tried to curb all cultural enterprise. That became particularly acute when the theaters and the concerts were closed in Germany and, naturally, one demanded the same thing from me in the General Government, and I turned it down.

Q. Do you remember including in these measures also the closing of middle schools and universities and the limitation, even exclusion, of Polish influence in the civil administration?

A. I have always endeavored to create, parallel to the government of the Governor-General, a native Polish government, and this was at all times stopped by the Berlin government. Probably, the Colonel was referring to that because actually there were about 200,000 Poles in the government, in the civil service. But no doubt the Colonel was referring to the higher sort of administration, to the effort of creating a separate government of Poles.

Q. Do you remember including in those measures, the fact that Catholic influence had been restricted, including the closing and taking away from the Catholic Church monasteries, schools, charities, and various institutions, in many cases with only a moment's notice?

A. Wherever I could, I would stop these things, but the Colonel must remember that whenever I tried to stop any of these efforts, then one would answer me saying that the same measures had already been taken in the Reich, and that it was merely an effort to create a system of legislation in the General Government parallel to the Reich. For instance, the sanctuaries of Poland, in order to protect them, I had placed under my personal protection. For instance, the monastery of the Camaldulensian monks and the sanctuary of Czenstochawa were under my personal protection, but on the other hand, one must realize that when the military entered into a city, then the monasteries or the schools or the churches would immediately be taken over because they were the only stone buildings. Everything else would be of wood. Then my efforts would be to try to protect these things and to take them away from the military; naturally, I had not always success.

INTERROGATIONS

Misconceptions Regarding Frank's Regime

A. The fourth was the problem of the police and of the shooting of hostages.

Q. In what way are these things exaggerated, that you have stated in the report were exaggerated, that is in what I am interested.

A. It was exaggerated in the sense that somebody could derive from this report, the idea that all great estates had been eliminated, or that every day mass recruitments of forced labor took place, or that every day there were mass arrests and mass shootings, and that naturally was not true.

Q. It did happen, though? They did happen on occasion, did they not?

A. Naturally, those things did take place, but the Colonel should also remember at all times that for the SS, the term "General Government" did not exist. The SS called itself "SS Command East".

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Frank, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 8 October 1945, 1545-1615, by Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Bernard Reymon, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Introduction of Compulsory Labor Service

Q. Did you ever hear of an organization called the Baudienst?

A. Yes, I do remember it.

Q. Tell me what you remember about it.

A. It was in the district of Cracow.

Q. What kind of an organization was it, what did it do, and how did it get started? Give me all the details as you can remember concerning it.

A. The immediate task of this organization was to get rid of the rubble that was caused by the war. It became a general compulsory service, but I can't remember the details. It was an idea of mine to introduce labor service similar to that which existed in Germany. In Germany it is called the compulsory labor service.

Q. Do you recall issuing a decree pertaining to this Baudienst?

A. Well, such a decree must be somewhere, all you have to do is show me the decree.

Q. I would like to see what you remember about these things.

A. The Baudienst was a very useful organization for the country itself.

Q. Do you remember extending the operations of the Baudienst on April 22, 1942, to all Polish inhabitants, between the ages of eighteen and sixty?*

A. The Baudienst? That much I don't remember; that I would like to see. We set up that service exactly on the same lines as the compulsory labor in Germany. The German boys served in the German labor service.

Q. By the way, was it necessary to set up the Polish Labor Service along the same lines as set up in Germany?

A. I don't quite understand the question.

Q. My only question is this: Were you required to do the same things in the General Government of Poland, that were done in Germany?

A. The Reich had asked for it without interruption.

Q. Had asked for what without interruption?

A. Had asked for it all along.

Q. Asked for what?

A. Well, in Germany the whole population was required to work, and naturally they had to do the same in Poland.

Q. My only question is this: Were you directed to issue the various orders, or did you issue them of your own volition, in order to take care of conditions that you thought existed?

A. Those things were always required either from me or my officials, whenever they went to Berlin.

Q. Did you ever receive any written directives from anybody telling you to put out the particular orders that you did put out?

A. Yes, from Adolf Hitler, from Goering, or from the Reich Labor Fuehrer, but it was always implied that if you wish for something you have to do it yourself.

Q. Were you directed to put out these orders, or did you derive that from something that was said to you by somebody, either in Berlin or elsewhere?

A. Yes, you may put it that way.

Q. You have told me that before; what I am interested in is whether you received a directive to put out the particular orders that you did put out, or whether you put those orders out because you thought, that by so doing, you would be in conformity with what you thought somebody wanted?

A. They were not simply desired, but they were required. That is one of the main reproaches that was made to me when I was in Berlin. They kept on saying, "Why don't you have the population work?"

Q. Who directed you to put out the decree of October 26, 1939?

A. What is it about?

* Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

See document 3468-PS vol. VI, p. 169.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You know the one that did what you called, "introduced an obligation to work"?

A. That was a personal order by and from Adolf Hitler, who wanted the population to be called to work right away and particularly in connection with the very heavy damages in that territory.

Q. When did Hitler give you that order, and by what means?

A. On September 17 of '39, already.

Q. How did he convey the information, by letter, by word of mouth, or how?

A. Orally.

Q. Who else was present at the time that this direction was given?

A. Nobody.

Q. Just the two of you?

A. Well, Goering may have been present.

Q. Anything might be, we know that. Was Goering present, or wasn't he?

A. No, he was not.

Q. In other words, just you and Hitler were there; is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. This order of 14 December 1939, by which the district governors were given discretion to extend the old order of October 26 to juveniles between ages of fourteen and eighteen, who gave that order?*

A. That was an order, which had been given in a general way from Berlin that was a measure taken in Germany with regard to the youth in Germany.

Q. By whom was the order given in Berlin and in what manner was it communicated to you?

A. It was a circular letter of the Minister of Labor.

Q. It was a written document; is that right?

A. It might have been also from the Four-Year Plan, but it was a written document.

Q. What about the order of 13 May 1942, which stated that all Polish inhabitants, regardless of age or sex, could be called up for compulsory labor; did he give you an order to issue that decree?

A. I really cannot say. Then it must be from the same channel.

Q. Was it orally or was it in writing?

A. It most certainly has been in writing.

Q. Is that your best present recollection?

A. No, I have not any.

*See document 3468-PS, vol. VI, p. 169.

Q. I refer you to this order of 22 April 1942 regarding the Baundienst?*

A. Well, this is a sample of the German compulsory labor service.

Q. Do you recall issuing that decree?

A. Yes.

Q. Who gave you instructions to issue it?

A. That refers to a previous order of the 1st of December. It is not a special decree, it is simply an official extension of the old decree.

Q. My question still remains; who gave you the directive to issue that order?

A. Well, it came from the same channels.

Q. How did it come to you, orally or in writing?

A. It certainly must have been in writing.

Q. My question still remains: Were there any people taken from the General Government of Poland into the Reich for labor purposes that were not taken on a voluntary basis?

A. That is quite possible in connection with those departments which were not under my authority.

Q. Which departments were not under your authority with respect to the labor?

A. Always the same departments—the Wehrmacht, the Police the Four-Year Plan, the very important Ministry of Transportation, and the very important Ministry of Munitions, who had the whole industry.

Q. Didn't these people operate through you?

A. Unfortunately no, they always operated outside. I want to cite an example so that you can see how things were happening. A factory at Czenstochowa, which was subject to the Four-Year Plan, had one day been surrounded by forces and the whole personnel was rounded up and was going to be sent to the Reich. At the eleventh hour our intervention prevented it. To preclude the possibility of those ever-recurring interventions, it was necessary to issue those decrees.

Q. Was Lublin within your General Government?

A. Unfortunately, yes.

Q. Do you recall ever receiving any communication from Sauckel with regards to Lublin?

A. No.

Q. What happened at Lublin that particularly sticks in your memory?

A. You probably mean in point of view of labor?

*See footnote p. 1393 of this volume.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Yes; or the people as a whole.

A. The most terrible thing I remember is the day when the peasants were driven from their homes.

Q. When did that happen?

A. Well, I don't remember, it might have been in '42. It was the southern part of the Lublin district.

Q. Were you there at the time?

A. No, I was not.

Q. You knew it was going to happen, didn't you?

A. No. I heard of it through a report. That was the work of Globocnik, a man who has been mentioned so often.

Q. Who is he?

A. I don't know him any more. He was an Austrian.

Q. What caused this driving of people from their homes in Lublin?

A. As a letter subsequently came, it was an order of the Reich Fuehrer SS, to settle there the racial Germans. We had tremendous work in order to shelter somewhere those unfortunate beings.

Q. What was your participation in that?

A. I just told you. I protested this madness.

Q. To whom did you protest?

A. Himmler.

Q. When did you protest?

A. The very day when I learned it. I don't remember the date.

Q. How did you protest?

A. Passionately.

Q. How? By letter or orally?

A. By a phone message, or teletype and by letter. That matter kept us busy for months.

Q. To whom else did you protest?

A. Well, the competent person was Himmler, as Reich Commissar.

Q. You didn't protest to Hitler about this one, did you?

A. Perhaps Hitler had received the protest from me in a general declaration. Yes, I remember I gave it to Lammers.

Q. Isn't this one of the occasions you offered to resign?

A. I was continually on the point of resigning.

Q. I am talking about this particular occasion. Did you offer your resignation then?

A. It is possible, I don't know. I would like to refer to the report to Hitler, which I read the last time to the effect that it was quite impossible to treat the population in such a manner. On top of it, the Wehrmacht had evacuated villages in order to perform their drilling and exercises. The Luftwaffe and the SS simply wanted to evacuate villages, and all they had to do was to see how we could take care of those unhappy populations.

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Frank, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 2 November 1945, 1430, by Lt. Col. Thomas Hinkel, IGD. Also present: Alfred Booth, Interpreter; John J. Murtha, Reporter.

Support of Anti-Jewish Congress in Cracow

Q. Do you recall plans being made at one time to hold an anti-Jewish congress in the Government General of Poland?

A. Yes.

Q. What do you recall regarding that?

A. If I recollect correctly, a representative of Rosenberg had been in Cracow and wanted to hold such a congress. We ourselves had nothing directly to do with such a congress; it was only to take place in Cracow.

Q. Did you offer to participate in it?

A. Offered? I would have been present, of course.

Q. Well, did you ever communicate with Rosenberg that you would participate in this Congress?

A. With his representative, not with himself. He invited me. The affair was to be conducted by Rosenberg, if I am not in error. And the representatives of all the anti-Semites of the various countries were to be invited.

Q. As a matter of fact, you offered to pay part of the expenses, didn't you?

A. Yes, because I promised myself a great gain from this. Many people from all over were to come. It would mean a sort of boom for Cracow.

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Frank, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 14 November 1945, 1430-1520, by M. Mounier, French assistant prosecutor. Also present: Leo Katz, Interpreter; Wilhelmina Frey, Court Reporter.

Economic Spoliation of Poland

Q. [In French] Didn't you exercise the functions of presidency in the Four-Year Plan program?

A. In March 1940 I took over the functions of a delegate for the Four-Year Plan for the interior of the Governor Generalship. But the matter concerned here had already taken place and there were emergency measures which I had to take. But that which is concerned here, this question, was already obsolete. I would like to say that the measures taken by the Governor General were to put the economy on its feet again as fast as possible and for that purpose we required the resources of the country and for this reason these orders were issued. You have to bring into the Governor Generalship here all the things which are necessary for the conduct of the war. Furthermore, I had the biggest personal interest to stop the further lootings of the country. To begin with, then, existed this plan to demolish the economy. There were commissions under Goering, who were functioning in the country who took away resources such as iron, copper, and other material, railroad tracks, and in the middle of these actions the General Government was erected, this civil administration. I protested against these methods and said: "The country is going to the dogs with these methods." In January 1940 I had a detailed consultation with Hitler about these questions; and as a result the course was changed to erect a home economy within the Governor Generalship, an autonomous economy within the country. If you think of what has happened, you must understand that these orders had as their aim the reinstating of the economy; because the country itself had been looted and all its material resources had been taken away. In the course of the years, a change in attitude was experienced because people admitted the necessity of industrial factories and natural resources. For instance, the petroleum was extremely important for the war; and the factories had to be reinstated immediately. It was my duty to take care that this should not be done by private organizations in the Reich, and done by agencies of the Governor Generalship. I was completely dependent upon myself in this matter. I had to build up a monetary system and I did not have a single piece of gold. Therefore I had to take care that the fiscal system should be reinstated. That is also applicable to the objects of art. In the Reich there were several groups active, who wanted to get these art treasures away from us and I took care immediately of the registration of all objects of art; that they were registered officially, that they were declared state property or state-protected property to stop their being taken away even by the governor of the Reich. I had them recorded in a big book which was distributed to all authorities which were competent; so that any object of art could not be confiscated or seized by one of the outside agencies.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What were your relations with your authorities and your administration and the Einsatzstab Rosenberg and other organizations?

A. It was to prevent the activity of this Einsatzstab in the governorship that I took care of the registration of these things.

Q. Do you know that, for instance, complaints were made to the head of the Einsatzstab that Goering took many objects of art for his personal use?

A. But not out of the governor generalship. He did not get anything from us; nothing came from there. Nothing was taken because it was secured by the state.

Q. What you have told us so far is the theoretical foundation. In practice you succeeded to secure and to prevent the confiscation of these properties?

A. I know nothing about what happened during November and October 1939, but I saved the most important pieces of art from the moment on when I was able to, and it was possible in the country, as far as I myself was concerned.

Q. What happened before October or November with regard to this looting?

A. I do not know, but from that moment on I am sure I guarded and covered everything. That was October and November 1939. I would like to cite an example where we were too late, where we did not succeed any more. It concerns the Veit Stoss altar in Cracow. The SS and Police and Wehrmacht had, before we built up our administration, already dismantled this altar and taken it away and this altar was taken away by the authorities. I personally protested to Hitler. He sent to me the mayor of Nurnberg, Liebel, who went to Cracow by order of Hitler, and the assistant of Hitler, Mr. Brueckner, went personally to Cracow and Brueckner telephoned he wanted it over here. Even in 1944 when I saw Hitler for the last time I tried to recover this altar. To get back—possessors of these treasures were spread all over the country and it was difficult to register them. Where collections were centralized in one place we left them as they were. For instance the famous collection of Count Potocki. That was the most important one of our collections in Poland. For the economical matters, I wish to say something. Machines were taken away which we had no use for in the Reich. Representatives of the air force came and went to Radom and got the best machines away from the factories and left the empty space to us, and it was to prevent this that it was absolutely necessary to formulate a fiscal law within the country. Towards the end we had more than 600,000 workers in the factories which were under our control. So that in the course of the years a big industry was able to reestablish itself. It is very difficult to build up a little order out of chaos.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You certainly know the ROGES, Raw Material Trading Association (Rohstoff Handelsgesellschaft); can you explain to us how this association operated in the General Government?

A. I do not know how to explain it. I do not know anything about this ROGES. All the raw materials were taken away by the Four-Year Plan by a Wehrmacht organization and the head of this organization was a General Buermann. He took care of these things, and to oppose him, I took the necessary measures. That was more difficult because he was a Wehrmacht general. This organization never had any official relations with me. I only heard talk of General Buermann and his staff. This association seems to be a little later, perhaps in 1939 or 1940. It had not yet been established. Presumably this was an association which took care of these matters and it seemed these things came under the Four-Year Plan administration, and it may have been part of the Four-Year Plan.

VIII. WILHELM FRICK

Testimony of Wilhelm Frick, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 1030-1230, 6 October 1945, by Mr. H. R. Sackett. Also present: Capt, Jesse F. Landrum, AGD; T/5 Gunther Kosse, Interpreter.

Decrees for Persecution of the Jews

Q. What was the purpose of requiring Jews to deposit their stocks, shares in mines, bonds and similar securities in a bank?

A. So they would not own part of any business.

Q. It also was just a preliminary measure to take the property away from them, wasn't it?

A. These were preliminary measures so they could not be active any more; they could not vote in any directors' meetings, and so on. But I had nothing to do with the execution of this law. This was all the business of the Ministers of Finance and Economics.

Q. But if you signed the law, you approved of it being executed by the Finance Minister, didn't you?

A. That goes with the law.

Q. Your answer is "yes"?

A. Yes. I want you to know once and for all I am responsible for anything that is signed by me.

Q. This law tended to deprive the Jews of their private rights as well as their political rights, didn't it?

A. This only concerns separate economic affairs; it had nothing to do with political affairs.

Q. This is another one of those situations you really didn't believe in but you signed and assumed the responsibility rather than resign?

A. There was nothing I could do. Even if I would have tried to resign, Hitler would have said, "you stay." Then if I said I didn't want to stay, then I would have been a rebel.

Q. And that is why you stayed, is that right?

A. Because there was nothing else to do for myself; I was in it and had to sign it; I couldn't get out of it. You could not convince the Fuehrer of anything opposite; he had his own ideas about it and he stuck to it.

Q. By signing such a law as this you led the public to believe that you were wholeheartedly in favor of it, didn't you?

A. Naturally, that I agreed with it.

Q. Weren't you thereby really deceiving the people of Germany?

A. You can't actually call it deceiving. You might be of different opinion to the Fuehrer but you cannot get through with the ideas; there is nothing you can do.

Q. Didn't it have the effect of a lot of your friends and political supporters believing you were for something when you really weren't?

A. You can only concern yourself with the signature itself; and that's what the public believed in. What went on within me, that only concerns me and myself and nobody else knows about that.

Q. Then you wanted the public and your friends to think that you were for it, even though you weren't?

A. I wanted the public to believe that the cabinet favored the policy a hundred percent and holds the opinion of the Fuehrer.

Q. The reason I am asking some of these questions is that it is difficult for me to understand that you, with a legal background, can say one thing to the public and not really believe in it.

A. You should have been present in the whole leadership of the government at that time. I believe it's very hard for an American to think himself into a setup the way we had it at that time; it was a whole new system.

Q. To my way of thinking, it is absolute dishonesty in government.

A. Yes, it became more and more dishonest as time went by because the men who were actually responsible for the leadership of the government were bypassed and their jobs given to men who did not know what responsibility means. Actually, it would not have made any difference if I would have signed the law or not because the Fuehrer would not be influenced by my signing or not signing the law and he would have made it legal anyway.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Then, on 6 July, 1938, there was a law passed by the Reich Government listing certain businesses that Jews could not engage in, such as real estate, etc.*

A. Is that also a law from 6 July, 1938? I don't remember exactly any more but it must belong to the economic sector. I think it is a law that Jews were not allowed to be active in leading positions any more.

Q. That was part of the Party program, wasn't it?

A. No, that is not in the 25 points of the Party program.

Q. Well, it was part of the government program at that time, wasn't it?

A. It was not a program of the government because I don't think in 1933 there was anybody who thought it would take such a development. All this happened step by step. The measures taken against the Jews increased through happenings like I mentioned before, Gustloff, vom Rath, and so on.

Q. It was part of the government program in 1938, was it not?

A. You could not call that a government program; it just was the wish of the Fuehrer.

Q. Well, it was what the government did in 1938, then, wasn't it?

A. It was the execution of the wish of the Fuehrer.

Q. What do you know about the decree imposing the atonement fine on the Jews of one billion Reichmarks?

A. That's the atonement decree, I remember, but I don't remember exactly any more what it was caused by, whether caused by the killing of Gustoff or the affair of Rath. I don't think this law was signed by me. I think that was the affair of the Minister of Finance.

Q. The cabinet discussed it, didn't it?

A. There were no more meetings of the cabinet after 1937.

Q. Before this fine was levied, it was talked about between you and other cabinet members outside of cabinet meetings, wasn't it?

A. This was, but it did not happen too often that members of the cabinet met socially.

Q. At the time at least you thought it was a good plan to levy this fine on the Jews, didn't you?

A. I probably agreed upon it if my signature is on that.

*See vol. I, pp. 980-981.

Wilhelm Gustloff, a Nazi propagandist in Switzerland, was killed by a Jew in February 1936. His death was seized upon by Hitler as the occasion for a violent attack in Jewry. Eduard vom Rath, Third Secretary of the German Embassy in Paris, was murdered on 7 November 1938 by Herschel Grynszpan, a young Polish Jew. This incident served as the pretext for a vast pogrom throughout the Reich, ordered by the Nazi government. See documents 374-PS, vol. III, p.277; 3051-PS, vol. V, p.797; 3058-PS, vol. V, p.854.

Q. Whether your signature is on it or not, at that time you thought it was a good idea, didn't you?

A. I don't know if you want to call it good; it was a personal measure.

Q. You thought the Jews should be punished as a group because of what had taken place, didn't you?

A. That's not a question of whether I thought it good or not, it was ordered by the Fuehrer.

Q. Well, can't you say whether you favored it or disfavored it?

A. When this draft went through me or my office and I did not oppose it; I probably was in favor of it.

Q. This really was the culmination of a plan to take the Jews' property away from them, wasn't it?

A. To take their property away from them and to have them retire.

Q. In other words, in sequence, there were laws fixed to require them to register their property, then to pledge certain of their property, then finally an enormous fine was levied taking away a great part of their property, is that true?

A. The money they had to pay was a punishment; but the property that was taken away from them, they got some pay for that and, therefore, they were able to retire and live from that money.

Q. But this was one method of not having to pay for all the property, wasn't it?

A. The punishment was an individual affair.

Q. And this fine was levied because some Jew had allegedly assassinated a German in Paris, isn't that the case?

A. That was the sense of the general punishment. It was said that all Jews were responsible for the killing.

Q. You didn't protest, did you?

A. No.

Q. So you signified your approval, didn't you, by not protesting?

A. Well, like I said before, it would not have made any difference if I would have signed it or not, it would have been done anyway.

Q. I understand that, but by not protesting and going along with the program, you signified your approval, didn't you?

A. If I had not done it, I probably would have ended up in the concentration camp next day.

Q. But my question is that you did subscribe to it by not dissenting. You can answer that "yes" or "no."

A. Naturally, I did not object because if I had objected to it, I probably would have ended up in the concentration camp.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Did you think it was just to levy a heavy fine on some woman here in Nurnberg, for example, that didn't even know this Jew that was supposed to have committed murder?

A. I would not have made such a law. You are right: You cannot make anybody responsible just because he belongs to the same idea.

Q. In other words, you didn't think it was just, did you?

A. I probably did not agree with it inside of me. My activity in this whole affair was probably very passive; all I did was sign.

Q. In 1941 you were a member of the Ministry for the Defense of the Reich, were you not?

A. Since 1939.

Q. Yes. And do you remember the decree that was issued by the Ministry on 4 December, 1941, and signed by you, with reference to the treatment of the Poles and Jews in Poland?*

A. That doesn't come under the laws any more.

Q. This is a decree of the Ministry for the Defense of the Reich, issued 4 December, 1941, and it has reference to treatment of Poles and Jews in Poland; do you recall such a decree?

A. Only as far as the treatment concerning the law was concerned, if they were brought up before a court.

Q. I hand you a copy of the decree, which is signed by you, and ask you to look at it and see whether it refreshes your recollection (hands witness a document).

A. That only concerns Poland and southeast Prussia. That is only a territorial rule and that does not concern all of Germany.

Q. Well, the purpose of that decree was to set up some special judicial procedure for occupied territories in Poland, wasn't it?

A. A new judicial procedure was founded according to the situation as it was existing at that time.

Q. In other words, this decree created a special judicial procedure for Poles and Jews in Poland different from the judicial procedure in Germany proper?

A. A special procedure for Jews and Poles in these territories.

Q. And the rules of procedure were much more harsh and severe than they were in Germany, weren't they?

A. Because from the experience that these people were the ones who committed these acts. In charge of all this was the Minister for Justice, but since he was not represented in the Defense Ministry, I just took it over to bring it into this office.

Q. This decree provided for the death penalty for Jews and Poles for any act of violence against the Germans, didn't it?

A. This was done to give a possible protection to the Germans because there were always fights between the Germans and the Poles.

*Document 2746-PS, Vol. V, p. 386. R-96, Vol. VIII, p. 72.

Q. Well, the law does so provide for such a death penalty, doesn't it?

A. Well, if it is in that law, it must be.

Q. Well, look at it and see if it isn't in it?

A. (Witness looks over document) Well, this is for any acts of violence against any Germans or against higher German authorities.

Q. The law also provides that the death penalty can be meted out to a Pole or Jew for having any anti-German sentiments.

A. What do you mean?

Q. By that I mean by making statements that he is opposed to Germans he can be shot and killed, can he not, under this decree?

A. I am not informed about the details of this decree.

Q. Let me ask you this: It also provides that a Jew or Pole can be shot for tearing down any sign that is posted by a German, does it not?

A. There were special measures taken for the safety of the German people.

Q. Well, you consented to and signed a decree which approved shooting a person for tearing down a sign off a wall, didn't you?

A. In this decree (indicating document) ?

Q. That's right.

A. It would have been an act of sabotage.

Q. Don't you think that's a pretty severe penalty for tearing down a sign that is posted on the wall?

A. At that time it was still during wartime.

Q. No, but this was civil administrator's regulation, by the department of Interior, generally, under this decree, wasn't it?

A. This was handled by the Minister of Justice.

Q. The military government did not have to have any law to shoot a man if they wanted to; they just shot him. This was a civil administration, wasn't it?

A. It was not time of war any more but probably the situation was not considered very steady and, therefore, some kind of protective measure had to be taken.

Q. Well, you favored a law providing that if a man tore down any kind of a sign, he could possibly be shot for doing so, is that right?

A. Where is that written about the sign?

Q. (Interrogating officer indicates section of document to witness who reads it.) Did you subscribe to a code of justice that a Jew can be shot for tearing down any sign that is posted?

A. You must consider that as a semi-war-time measure.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Well, you subscribed to this sort of decree under the circumstances that existed in the civil government in the territories at that time, didn't you?

A. Naturally, that was an exceptional decree.

Q. This decree also provides with reference to judicial procedure that Poles or Jews cannot object to a judge because he is prejudiced.

A. That is possible; that they may not refuse a judge.

Q. In other words, you subscribe to a code of justice that provides that even though the judge is prejudiced you would be tried by him anyway, is that right?

A. Because these were exceptional times it was said that no one can refuse a judge.

Q. Under the times that existed then you thought it was fair to have a Jew or Pole tried before a judge who was already prejudiced against him?

A. During times of war you don't have time to refuse a judge.

Q. But this was the civil administration of these territories after the war was not in progress in Poland, was it not?

A. The war was not over; only Poland was beaten at that time.

Q. There was not any fighting going on in Poland in 1941, was there?

A. There was actually no more war but just because such a law was passed, you cannot say that everything was not quite—

Q. Assuming that would be true, you still think that it is a fair and judicial code to have a trial before a judge who is prejudiced?

A. In such cases it can't be done any other way, and I probably would not have signed any such decree if I saw it could be done in any other way.

Q. Why couldn't a law provide that you pick an impartial man to try Jews?

A. It is not said that the jury could be prejudiced; it's only done to prevent a sabotage so that the accused could not refuse one judge after the other.

Q. Well, if the defendant could show that the judge was prejudiced, don't you think it would be right for him to have an impartial judge?

A. If actually such a prejudice would exist on the side of the judge, I think the judge would not agree to handle that case.

Q. But he didn't have to refuse to act under this decree, did he?

A. It was up to the judge then.

Testimony of Wilhelm Frick, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 2 October 1945, 1435-1655, by Mr. H. R. Sackett. Also present: T/5 Gunther Kosse, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Court Reporter.

Frick's Part in the Reichstag, and Views on Jewish Rights

Q. After Hitler got out of jail in 1924, from then on to 1933, you saw him quite often, did you not?

A. Yes, I saw him, because I was a member of the Reichstag.

Q. When were you made Reichsleiter of the Reichstag?

A. At the Party meeting in '33. I was Reichsleiter in my capacity as leader.

Q. Leader of the Party faction in the Reichstag?

A. The Party was represented in the Reichstag by a faction, and I was the chairman of this faction, and as such, I was the Reich leader.

Q. Well, as I understand it, you were the leader of the Party in the Reichstag in 1933, and as such, you were called "Reichsleiter."

A. As such, the Fuehrer gave me this title.

Q. Were you not the leader of the Party in the Reichstag, prior to 1933?

A. My connection with the Party started in 1924, when I was elected to the Reichstag. Even though the Party was not allowed at that time, up to 1925, the people who elected me to the Reichstag were former members of the Party.

Q. My question was, prior to 1933 were you not considered by the Party as its leader in the Reichstag?

A. Only in 1933, the Fuehrer said, "In order to give you a position in the Party, I am going to make you the Reichsleiter." The faction was a body by itself. I had a special position in the Reichstag. I always consulted Hitler and asked him about the outlines, and what he wanted to have represented in the Reichstag.

Q. That was prior to 1933, to which you are referring now?

A. That was before '33. I was leader of the faction after the elections in '27. In 1927 and '28, we did not have the Voelkische Arbeitsgemeinschaft (People's Working Community) any more; we only had the National Socialist Party. We were 12 members in the beginning.

Q. How many times were you elected to the Reichstag altogether?

A. Since 1926, I was elected every time.

Q. And how often were elections held?

A. In '24; and then maybe again in the fall of '24 or '25; and then maybe there was an election again in '27; from '24 to '33, there were about four or five elections; and then after '33, there were again about four elections. My task also was to choose the candidates for the party. I did all this in the name of the Fuehrer.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. How did the Fuehrer decide upon who were going to be candidates?

A. We made a list of prominent members, such as Gauleiters, and so on, and gave them to the Fuehrer. He approved of them, or sometimes even added some names.

Q. Did you assist these people in their campaigns for office?

A. There were special representatives of the Party, who prepared the campaigns according to their own territories.

Q. Were you in charge of this?

A. I had to make the preparation for the others. The lists had to be brought to the election commissioner, and so on. In September 1930, after the elections, we had 107 members instead of 12.

Q. How many members did you have in December 1932?

A. There was another election in July '32, and then we had about 230 members.

Q. And that was out of a total membership of how many, did you say?

A. There were more than 500 members.

Q. As I understand it, in the early days of 1923, you were not very close to Hitler, but by 1933, you were one of his close advisors; is that right?

A. Naturally, because the faction in the Reichstag grew larger and larger. Therefore, I had to get to know him better.

Q. And it was through the Reichstag and through you that Hitler decided to try to come into power, was it not?

A. In a legal democratic way, according to the rules of the Weimar Republic.

Q. When was it that Hitler first preached anti-Semitism?

A. Shortly after the Raeterepublik in Munich.*

Q. To what year are you referring?

A. It was already in the program of 1924.

Q. On many occasions you talked with Hitler about the Jewish question; did you not?

A. During these election campaigns, the Jewish question was not important.

Q. Wasn't the Jewish question mentioned in the campaigns?

A. Naturally, because it was a point of the Party program.

*The Raeterepublik was the name applied to the brief government formed by the Communists in Bavaria after the 1918 revolution.

Q. Well, in general, what was said by the Party speakers on the Jewish question, prior to 1933?

A. It was said that the influence in politics by the Jews is a bad one, because the Jews were always considered by the people as a foreign body in the German Government. This also could be seen in the Weimar Republic, because many Jews were active in prominent positions, as Ministers, and so on.

Q. Well, the Party opposed the Jews whether they were Communists or not; didn't they?

A. That is a question of race.

Q. Well, I don't know whether I understand you or not. Let me ask you this: Was it your feeling that the Jews should not be entitled to have political rights, but all other constitutional rights that they were guaranteed by the Weimar Constitution, they should be allowed to keep?

A. The freedom of speech is not a political right, to be compared with the election to the Reichstag, for instance.

Q. And you thought that Jews were entitled to freedom of speech; did you?

A. That they should not be treated any differently in that respect than the other German citizens.

Q. How about their freedom from arrest, search, and seizure?

A. Exactly the same as the others, that is, a protection of personal freedom.

Q. Why is it you distinguish so much between the rights of the Germans and the Jews to political freedom?

A. There is the question of what is the right of the citizen of Germany.

Q. You don't think the Jews should be entitled to be citizens?

A. They should not be allowed to be a citizen, since this is limited only to people of German blood, just as any foreigners are not allowed to be citizens.

Q. But the Party and Hitler advocated the taking away of their property rights as well as their political rights, did they not?

A. That was not the case from the beginning on.

Q. When did that become the case?

A. I believe it was only done in '37, when the first laws in that respect were passed in the economic field.

Q. And in 1937, also, you changed your mind about the right of the Jews to own property and enjoy freedom of speech; did you not?

A. I was not concerned with these things. All this was discussed in the Ministries of Interior and the Four-Year Plan.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Well, my question was, did you change your mind or not?

A. No, I did not change my mind. I considered it better to keep on doing it the way I just mentioned to you.

Q. Do you consider the Jewish people an inferior race?

A. I look at them as a foreign body in the German State, which should not be allowed to assimilate with the Germans.

Q. Well, the Party attitude against the Jews, originally arose out of the fact that they were powerful politically, and the Party wanted to get into power; and they had to dispose of the Jews in politics to do so; did they not?

A. In comparison to the number of Jews in Germany, they had a much too strong influence in politics.

Events Leading to Hitler's Acquisition of Power

Q. I wish you would tell in your own words, generally, just what happened in the latter days of 1932, and the early days of 1933, when Hitler became Chancellor?

A. That was a natural development in a democratic way. In July, '32, there were elections to the Reichstag, and we had 230 representatives, and as such, were the strongest party in the Reichstag. We had far more than the Social Democrats who, up to then, were the nominating party. Then there was a new election to the Reichstag, in November 1932. At that election the Party suffered a setback, and had about 30 members less. Then we had about 196 representatives; but we were still, by far, the strongest party in the Reichstag. Therefore, no other party had the right, according to the Weimar Republic, to take over the leadership of the state. It was impossible to form a government without the National Socialists, since we were the strongest party. That was already impossible since July '32; and then they put in Papen as Reich Chancellor, as an emergency measure, and then later, General Schleicher was put in.

Q. Put in by whom?

A. The President called him in.

Q. You mean von Hindenburg?

A. Yes. That was not the way any more, as it was said, in the Weimar Republic, because the laws laid down there said the strongest party was to represent the Reich.

Q. And by that you mean, that the Chancellor should be selected from the strongest party, by the President of the Reich.

A. Or the government was to be represented by a member of the strongest party; and if there was not one strong party, then several parties were put together, and one member out of these was to represent the government.

Q. And how did it come about that Hitler was appointed Chancellor under those circumstances?

A. We were by far the strongest party in the Reich, but we did not have the majority in the Reichstag. Nobody wanted to let the National Socialist Party come to power. Therefore, the government was formed under Papen and Schleicher.

Q. Do you mean by that, that the National Socialists and the Social Democrats compromised upon von Papen?

A. No, the President did that himself, because he had his ministers, and therefore he had the right to do so; but the government always had to have the confidence of the Reichstag. However, when Papen was presented to the Reichstag a lack of confidence in Papen was perceived.

Q. In other words, the Party was not satisfied with Papen?

A. No, because we considered it unjust to be excluded from the Government, since we were the strongest party.

Q. To what party did Papen belong?

A. Papen belonged to the Centrum Party. He was not in that party any more; he had his own politics, and he had a special position.

Q. Did Papen have members in his cabinet who were members of the National Socialist Party?

A. No, he never had any members of the Party, or the Centrum Party, in his cabinet, only officials.

Q. And whom did Hindenburg appoint to succeed Papen?

A. Papen had to retire after the mistrust became known, so that the Reichstag was dissolved. Papen had to retire, also, because the new Reichstag, which was elected in 1932, did not give him the majority either. Therefore, the President named General Schleicher as the Reich Chancellor.

Q. And to what Party did he belong?

A. Schleicher was a general, and not a member of any party.

Q. The National Socialists were not satisfied with him either, were they?

A. Schleicher, also, like Papen, was not in the government, representing a party; he was a member by himself. Therefore, he would not have gotten the majority in the Reichstag, just as Papen did not get it.

Q. You mean by that, that he could not receive a vote of confidence in the Reichstag?

A. No, he could not get a vote of confidence in the Reichstag. But it did not go that far any more. The President then saw that it was not possible to work without the approval of the Reichstag.

INTERROGATIONS

Schleicher then wanted to rule as dictator, without the Reichstag, and the President refused this, because it seemed too dangerous to him. He was afraid it would lead to a civil war; and to prevent this danger, he, therefore, called the Fuehrer into the Government in '33, and released Schleicher.

Q. And Hitler was appointed Chancellor on the 30th of January 1933, was he not?

A. On the 30th of January 1933, in order to have a quiet development in politics.

Q. How long after his appointment was it before the Reichstag was dissolved?

A. There were again elections for the Reichstag on the 7th of March in '33.

Q. Who was it that suggested that the Weimar Constitution be suspended in February 1933?

A. This was done after the fire in the Reichstag, in the Ministry of Interior.

Q. Well, who was it who suggested that it be done?

A. I, because I was Minister of Interior.

Q. And why did you think it was necessary to suspend the constitution?

A. Because we had to consider this attack on the Reichstag as a revolutionary one, and a revolutionary beginning, and if we would not do something to give more power to the government, we would have to expect more attacks.

Q. This was a very extreme measure, was it not?

A. But this was not the first of that kind. There were other such measures taken by other men. I remember Bruening, making a decree, taking away the basic rights of the people.

Q. My question was, this was an extreme measure, was it not?

A. Naturally; it was a special decree. That is what we called the special occasion, which was already accepted in 1920, at the time of the revolution.

Q. And on how many other occasions was the Weimar Constitution suspended?

A. In my opinion, it must have been a half a dozen times.

Q. Were they all considered to be emergency situations?

A. These were emergency measures, as the name itself said.

Q. Under what legal authority was the constitution suspended?

A. There was a special law, in the Constitution of the Weimar Republic, Article 48, which gives these powers to the Reich President. To answer your question more exactly, this was suggested to the President, by the complete cabinet, and the President decided upon that.

Q. Article 48 of the Weimar Constitution only provided for temporary suspension of the constitution, did it not?

A. That's right. I was also of that opinion. I was of the opinion that this should be done for a limited time.

Q. Well, Article 48 of the Constitution says that it should be suspended only temporarily, does it not?

A. I don't remember exactly the wording of it, but I remember that it says that it is not to be a rule, but is only to be for a limited time, but we could not change this law any more, because there were consecutive Communistic activities against our government.

Q. You say you were one of the men who suggested the Constitution be suspended, and that your reason was the Reichstag fire, is that right?

A. Yes, as a member of the Ministry, as Minister of the Interior, I was of the same opinion, that there had to be some kind of protection now.

Q. You were appointed Minister of Interior the same day that Hitler became Chancellor.

A. Together with Hitler, on the 30th of January 1933.

Q. Were you present in Berlin when the Reichstag fire took place?

A. Yes.

The Reichstag Fire

Q. Tell us what happened, from your point of view, and from your understanding of the Reichstag fire.

A. During that evening, I was at the Kaiser Wilhelm Society. All the members are scientists there. About ten o'clock in the evening, there was a phone call, and we received the news that the Reichstag was on fire.

Q. What did you do?

A. I was told that Goering, who was the Minister of the Interior for Prussia, was there, and already active, so I stayed with the society. I did not go to the Reichstag later on, but I heard that the Fuehrer and other members of the Reichstag went up there.

Q. Did you talk to the Fuehrer about it later?

A. We talked about it. I can't tell you exactly the details about it, but I think we talked about what measures we would have to undertake now.

Q. Well, who started the fire, did you conclude?

A. There was an open trial, in which many Communists were convicted of having started the fire.

INTERROGATIONS

Law-Making in a One-Party State

Q. Who suggested the law of 14 July 1933, making the National Socialist Party the only permissible party?*

A. The Fuehrer demanded that.

Q. Did you write that law?

A. It was worked out in the Ministry of Interior.

Q. And you signed it, did you not?

A. Naturally.

Q. That law prohibited all parties, not just the Communist Party, did it not?

A. Yes, all parties were prohibited, and the National Socialist Party was the only party acknowledged. That was the reaction to the very bad party system. We had 46 parties. You don't know such a thing in the States, and this was very bad for the German people.

Q. Well, the theory of this law, and the effect of it, was to give the National Socialist Party absolute control of the government, was it not?

A. It was the only party, and as such, represented the whole German people.

Q. This was strictly contrary to the democratic theory of government, was it not?

A. But this was wanted by the German people, because later on, even though there was only one party, the German people were asked if they wanted a National Socialist Party, or if they didn't want it; so there was an election where they had to vote "Yes" or "No," and they voted "Yes."

Q. But the effect of the law itself was to put the National Socialist Party in absolute control of the government; isn't that true?

A. Absolutely.

Q. And this was strictly contrary to the terms of the Weimar Constitution; was it not?

A. This was a change in the Weimar Constitution, but it was protected by this one point in the Weimar Constitution, which says that such changes can be undertaken.

Q. But the Constitution of the Weimar Republic states specifically that the changes are to be temporary, does it not?

A. This all does not concern Article 48, but the Reichstag, with the majority of two-thirds, gave the right to the government to make any changes in the laws of the country, and as such, this law was made.

Q. So you mean to say the Reichstag could change the constitution any time it wanted to, under the principles of the constitution?

*See documents 1888-A-PS, vol. III, p. 962; 2403-PS, vol. V, p. 71.

A. Naturally, because that is even in the constitution of the Weimar Republic; I think it is in Article 78; that is, the constitution can be changed, but only if there is a majority of two-thirds or more; and since there actually was a majority of two-thirds in the Reichstag, this law was accepted.

Q. But that vote was taken after a law prohibited the existence of all other parties but the National Socialistic Party; was it not?

A. Up to the 14th of July, the parties were still allowed. Only by reason of the special decree, the Communists were not allowed in the Reichstag any more, because they were guilty of the fire in the Reichstag.

Q. In other words, the constitution was suspended in order to prevent the Communists from causing a revolution; is that right?

A. Yes, but not only this; it was also done to create a new law for its protection.

Q. And also to give the Party the absolute control over the government.

A. To have one party, and to have a united political policy that could not depend upon the frequent changes in the Reichstag.

Q. And by these actions, the fundamental form of the German government was changed.

A. Naturally, yes.

Q. And it was these things that made it possible for Hitler to have the extreme power that he soon had.

A. This power grew more and more. That was a development that continued. In the year 1933, it still was the government. At that time the government made the law forbidding all other parties.

Q. I want to ask you this: Between the years 1923 and 1933, how were the laws of Germany passed, the mechanical procedure of passing laws?

A. If the Government wanted to pass a law, the party that was demanding this law gave a draft of it to the government. If the Reich Cabinet and the Reich President agreed on the draft, it was passed on to the Reichstag.

Q. And did it have to pass by majority vote of the Reichstag, in order to become a law?

A. It had to be accepted by the majority.

Q. Well, as a member of the Reichstag, not as Minister of Interior, could you propose a law on the floor of the Reichstag?

INTERROGATIONS

A. A law could be suggested during the course of the Reichstag, if you had 30 signatures.

Q. And if such a suggested law was approved by a majority of the Reichstag, did it become a law even though the cabinet did not want it as a law?

A. The cabinet had to accept it, and the President, naturally, too.

Q. In other words, it took the President, the Cabinet and the Reichstag to approve a law before it became a law?

A. That is the way it is.

Q. Now, after 1933, that continued to be the case, did it?

A. It was still the case, but it was all one unit.

Q. Well, how did a proposal become a law after 1933?

A. This law was made by the cabinet, which at that time had the power to make the laws.

Q. What do you mean by a "law made by the cabinet which has the power to make the laws?"

A. For instance, this law forbidding all parties was made by the cabinet itself and did not go through the Reichstag.

Q. Well then, prior to 1933, in order for a proposition to become a law, it had to be approved by the President, the Cabinet, and the Reichstag; but after 1933, is it a fact that the Cabinet could just make a law without the Reichstag or the President?

A. That is the way it was. There were two ways, the old way, through the Reichstag, the Cabinet, and the President; and then there was the other way, by which the cabinet could make laws, because of the power that was given to them by the Reichstag.

Q. In other words, prior to 1933, it took three groups to make a law; is that right?

A. Yes, the three had to agree upon it.

Q. But after 1933, the Reichstag said that if the Cabinet wanted to make a law, it didn't have to come back to the Reichstag and have their approval.

A. That was a power given to them.

Q. And by whom was that power given?

A. The Reichstag, by reason of their majority of two-thirds, gave this power to the cabinet.

Q. And did they also give the power to the Fuehrer to make a law without the consent of either the Cabinet or the Reichstag?

A. That was a development which happened later.

Q. Well, tell us about that?

A. This authoritative regime became stricter and stricter, and even later on the cabinet did not meet any more. The last meeting of the cabinet was in 1937; and it so happened that a decree of the Fuehrer was equal to a law.

Q. Was there ever any constitutional provision, or a law of the Reichstag, that said the Fuehrer could pass laws by himself?

A. There was no such law. That was a development of the government, which went very slowly and was unnoticed by anybody. I think in 1942, the Reichstag gave complete power to Hitler.

Q. But Hitler issued decrees and laws prior to 1942; did he not?

A. That was a development about which I talked before, that the power of the Cabinet was assumed by the Fuehrer.

Q. In other words, on the theory of the Fuehrer Prinzip, the Fuehrer just made laws whenever he wanted to; is that correct?

A. Yes, that is the way it was. The Fuehrer decreed it.

Q. And then after the elections in the fall of 1933, there was really no point to having a Reichstag at all; was there?

A. The Fuehrer used the Reichstag as a loudspeaker to the public.

Q. Well, did the Reichstag ever refuse to pass a law that the Fuehrer sent to the Reichstag and told them to pass?

A. No.

Q. Did the Cabinet ever refuse to pass a law or make a law that the Fuehrer directed it to make?

A. That was impossible since there was only one party, and the Fuehrer was at the same time head of the Party.

Q. Well, theoretically, the Reichstag could disagree with the Fuehrer if it wanted to, could it not?

A. Naturally, but it never happened.

Q. Why didn't it happen?

A. Because all the members of the Reichstag were members of the Party, and the discipline of the Party was very strict; but there were also cases where the Reichstag acted in passing laws. For instance, in January 1934, the law about the rebuilding of the Reich was accepted in the Reichstag.

Q. Why was it that sometimes a law was just a decree of the Fuehrer, while at other times, it was a decree of the Cabinet; and at other times it was passed by the Reichstag?

A. Originally, they could accept laws, but by reason of giving the power to the cabinet, the laws were made by the cabinet itself. Later on, when the Cabinet did not meet any more, this power slowly was assumed by the Fuehrer.

Q. Well, there were other agencies which had a right to pass laws, too, were there not?

A. No, there was nobody else.

Q. How about the Ministerial Council for Defense of the Reich; could it not make laws?

INTERROGATIONS

A. This Council fell asleep very shortly, and they never met.

Q. Well, it had the right to make laws; did it not?

A. They were to represent the government. It was a committee from the Cabinet.

Q. Well, it issued decrees and laws, didn't it?

A. Yes, that power existed.

Q. Did the Reichstag after 1933 ever pass any laws without its being ordered to do so by either the Cabinet or the Fuehrer?

A. Yes, it sometimes happened that initial suggestions were made by the Reichstag, and they were signed, and they were executed; but these suggestions were only made with the acceptance of the Fuehrer, in his capacity as Chief of the Party.

Q. In other words, after 1933, the Fuehrer could make a law without asking anybody; is that right?

A. From 1933 on, only the Cabinet.

Q. My question is this: If the Fuehrer wanted a law passed, he could issue a decree, if he wanted to, without asking the Cabinet or the Reichstag, could he not?

A. It never happened that the Fuehrer passed a law that was not accepted by the Cabinet, but as I said before, later on, Hitler and the Cabinet were not active together.

Q. But didn't Hitler and the Cabinet ever disagree over any laws at all?

A. No, that did not happen.

Q. Then what was the purpose of having a Cabinet?

A. Therefore, it was not active any more. That was the unfortunate development that led to it, that there was nothing left but the Fuehrer. We didn't have anything to say any more.

Q. You, with a long legal background, and one of the leading attorneys of the Reich, did you subscribe to that sort of procedure?

A. We were not asked. All this happened over our heads. What could I do? I could only give my disapproval; and I, myself, told the Fuehrer so many times.

Q. You were a party to creating the situation in July 1933, when you eliminated all opposition to the National Socialist Party; were you not?

A. The situation at that time was that everything still went through the Cabinet.

Q. You favored doing away with all parties except the National Socialist Party; did you not?

A. There was a big problem that there were too many parties, and there just couldn't be anything but one party; and there always was the problem of seven or eight million unemployed.

Q. Well, wouldn't it have been possible to issue a decree or pass a law, permitting two or three parties, rather than to say there could only be one party, and therefore save one semblance of democracy? Wouldn't it have been possible to issue a decree or pass a law in July of 1933, allowing the existence of two or three parties instead of just one party, so that there might be a democratic process in the future?

A. That would have been very nice, but we didn't know which one to take of the '46.

Q. Well, just because there were '46, didn't mean you had to eliminate all but one, did it?

A. Which should we favor? The two-party system, as you have in the States, is ideal, and that would have been also ideal for us.

Q. Well, let me ask you this: Isn't this what actually happened, that the National Socialist Party, in its desire to gain the absolute rigid control of the government, under the guise of getting rid of Communists, really took over the government completely?

A. Yes, they were limited by the law of June '34.

Q. And you favored that procedure, did you not?

A. Yes, if you could have foreseen the development to such an extent, the way it is now, it is very unfortunate to give the power to one man. We have got to look at all these things, not from what we know now and today, and from things that happened in the meantime, but from the way things were in those days.

Q. But the truth is that the public was deceived by the procedure that you followed.

A. I don't think they were deceived, because there actually was an acute danger which would have led to a civil war.

Q. Well, when you suspended the constitution, you told the public you did it to prevent Communistic acts of violence, but you went further and prevented an action by anybody, let alone Communists.

A. This was not also done to eliminate all other parties, but to eliminate the great misery that existed at that time. There was a catastrophe in the agricultural field, and there were many unemployed, and something had to be done.

Q. How long after the temporary suspension of the constitution was it before you suggested that it be reinstated?

A. We have to make a difference between the decree of 28th of February, against the Communists, and the decree of 14 July, which led to the complete prohibition of all parties.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Well, did you ever advocate going back to the Weimar Constitutional form of government?

A. No, it was impossible though it would have been the ideal thing then.

Q. What do you mean it was impossible?

A. Because that decree, passed on the 28th of February, which was supposed to be an emergency measure for a limited time, had to be continued since there was always the danger of the Communists. Then the war started and nothing could be changed any more.

Q. You mean in 1936, you were still afraid of the Communists?

A. There were still individual activities. There were cases where Hitler youths were killed.

Q. Why, in 1936, all Communists were in concentration camps, were they not?

A. That is not right. There were still enough Communists at large. Only Communists who were active were brought to concentration camps, but not the ones that had Communistic ideas.

Q. Well, you weren't afraid of the inactive Communists, were you?

A. But they could become active.

IX. JULIUS STREICHER

Excerpts from Testimony of Julius Streicher, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 1 September 1945, at 1415, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present: S/Sgt. Howard M. Levy, Court Reporter; Rudolph Pressburger, Interpreter.

Origin and Development of Streicher's Anti-Semitism

Q. What about the teaching of the preservation of blood lines of the master race?

A. Yes, I wish I could express myself openly.

Q. Well, go ahead.

A. Before the first World War, I belonged to the Young Democratic Party. The leader of the Young Social Democratic Party was a Mr. Kramer, who worked at Kohn's bank in Nurnberg. I have talked very often at the evening meetings of the Young Democratic Party. I didn't know any racial questions at that time. During those discussions, I received opposition from young lawyers who were talking against me. This holds true especially when I talked about nationalistic matters. On my way to Rome, I was warned by this Mr. Kramer that I should express myself in those meetings more carefully, since all those young lawyers were Jewish, and I asked him what the word "Jewish" means.

This Mr. Kramer told me: "Streicher, be careful, the Jews are very mighty." This was the first time that I was conscious of the fact that the Jews are no religion but a race. Between Catholics and Protestants you cannot differentiate, but you can differentiate between Protestants and Catholics, and Jews, according to race. After the first World War I came as an officer from the front, and desired to work again at my old trade. I was a school teacher. Then I saw for the first time the red posters saying that the public should attend the revolutionary meetings. Time and time again I went to those revolutionary meetings, and I was astounded to see that all the speakers were members of the Jewish race. The speakers were inciting the working class and telling them of the good things of former times. I volunteered, one time, for a discussion and took opposition to one of those Jewish speakers. I told the workers that it was unnatural to be led by members of the Jewish race. I told them that it would be unnatural if a member of the Jewish race would go to Palestine and dare speak in a Jewish meeting against their own nation.

Q. Go ahead with your story.

A. This takes place in the spring of 1919. After this speech and this discussion, the whole room applauded me. I went to the next revolutionary assembly of the Communist Party. Everything was prepared so I didn't have to talk any more. I again reported for the discussion. At this time I was thrown off the speaker's platform. They spit at me and threw me out of the assembly hall. At that time I decided to hold my own meetings and enlighten the public. At that time, no one had heard anything about Adolf Hitler. Destiny brought me into this, not the hate for the Jewish race. Destiny told me to fight for my people, my race. My first assembly meeting in the Hercules Velodrome was crowded. Ten thousand people were standing in front of the assembly hall, and it had to be kept in order by the police. I spoke at this assembly for three hours. I told how the German people were enslaved by the Treaty of Versailles, and I said that it is impossible that in all states in Germany, Jews were made ministers. I also declared in this assembly that it is up to the German people to govern themselves. I declared that the Jews as a nation by itself would refuse to be governed by ministers of English, French, or German nationality.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You said "English, French or German"?

A. Nationality. I also declared that if Germany wanted to be free again the Treaty of Versailles has got to be broken, and also the reign of the Jews in Germany. Until the year 1921, I had a big mass meeting in Nurnberg every week. Besides that, I participated several evenings during the week in discussions, in smaller groups. That is how the mass movement of German workers got together in Nurnberg. In the year 1921, a wholesale man from Nurnberg asked me if I had heard speeches by Adolf Hitler. I got interested and went to Munich, to an assembly in the Buergerbrau of Adolf Hitler. At that time I did not know Adolf Hitler. At that time I heard him for the first time at Munich. He spoke for almost three hours. The enthusiasm was enormous. I myself was very enthusiastic. After Adolf Hitler was finished with his speech, I arose and forced myself through the crowd to the speakers' desk. I went towards him and introduced myself. I spoke to him: "Heil Hitler! I heard your speech. I can only be the helper but you are the born leader. Here is my movement in Nurnberg." On that evening I gave the movement which I created in Nurnberg to Adolf Hitler. With that I was a member of the movement of Adolf Hitler. It carried the name of "National Socialist German Workers' Party." I carried on my business in the movement in Nurnberg. The name of "Gauleiter" did not exist at that time. The movement of Hitler called itself "Partei" at that time, but it was not an organized movement. At that time, everything was a movement at the beginning. With the handing over of my movement to Adolf Hitler, the bridge was built between southern Germany and northern Germany. For myself, I left Nurnberg and in the next few years made a lot of speeches, in all the larger cities of Germany.

The terror against the National Socialist movement was organized in all Germany. Many assemblies were interrupted by the Marxists, but we succeeded in getting the working people on our side. I again and again told the workers at the meetings that Marxism is the creation of world Jewry. I again told the workers that the creation of Marxism was to keep the power of the workers down. I also told the workers that Marxism would not bring about world revolution but would help world capitalism. I also told the workers that the destination of the Jewish world regime meant the enslaving of the workers.

Q. Now, following that, you then joined with the Party and continued to preach those things; is that right?

A. Yes, since 1921, as I remember.

Q. Well, as a leader of the Party and the leading exponent of anti-Semitism, didn't you know that over two million Jews were killed in concentration camps?

A. No.

Q. Well, when these Jews were put into concentration camps, and never appeared again, what did you think happened to them?

A. After the taking over of the power, all Jewish leaders in political life were put into concentration camps, but a lot of Jews emigrated to other countries. Whatever happened thereafter, I don't know.

Q. Well, when a Jew was put into a concentration camp, and you never heard from him again, don't you believe it was your duty to make inquiries?

A. No.

Q. As you sit here now, and see the result of the Party's program, with respect to the race question, do you still believe that these theories were right?

A. The program as it was laid down in the Fuehrer's book "Mein Kampf," in the year 1920, all the world knows is right, but as a human being, the execution of the program, as it is known today, is not right.

Q. Well, isn't it a normal result from the preaching of race hatred?

A. Anti-Semitism is all over the world. There are about 12 anti-Semitic newspapers in the United States. Mr. Ford published an article in one of his papers. Radio Priest Coughlin can speak openly in the States. Mosley in England pronounced anti-Semitism in the open, and if the declaration about race hatred which I preached would lead to mass murder, we would have had a mass murder right in this town of Nurnberg. This is the most anti-Semitic city in Germany. There are millions of people in Germany who heard my speeches in which I declared: "The question of the Jewish race has got to be taken care of the legal, international way." I openly and repeatedly declared that "Who hits the Jews or one Jew, helps them," and I openly declared that it does not solve the problem of the Jewish question.

Q. Well, the fact is that there was mass murder of the Jews in Germany. Now, was that a result of this Party program or not?

A. It was never a part of the Party program. Whatever happened here was the result of a superhuman being, and it was not a Party program.

Q. Do you mean the "Super Race" theory?

A. Madison Grant, an American writer, published a book in

INTERROGATIONS

1913, in which he writes: "The most active race is the Nordic race," and he declares that through the mixing of races, the Nordic race will go down into a race of swamps.

Q. How many Jews did you put into the concentration camp?

A. I hereby declare—you might believe it or not—I do not know how many Jews were put into concentration camps in my Gau, as this was done through the Political Police of Mr. Himmler.

Q. I am asking how many Jews you put into the concentration camp?

A. I have not brought any into the concentration camp, and how many were brought in, I don't know.

Q. How many Jews did you turn over to the Gestapo to be put into the concentration camp?

A. I myself did not give any Jews into concentration camps, though the police had the list of those Jews and they took care of that.

Q. Who gave the police the list?

A. The police got those lists themselves, and the housing office got all those lists and gave the police the responsibility, most likely, to put up their own lists.

Excerpts from Testimony of Julius Streicher, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 7 October 1945, 1545-1555, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present: Lord Wright, head of the United Nations War Crimes Commission; Pfc. Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; WOJG Jack Rund, Court Reporter.

Streicher Summarizes His Jewish Policy: Zionism

Q. What action did you take with respect to the formulation and the enactment of the Nurnberg laws?

A. Unfortunately I had nothing to do with the Nurnberg laws. Unfortunately I had nothing to do with them, but the Fuehrer once mentioned the matter to me and he said that there was a Jewish law by Ezra, in the Old Testament. He said that an old Jewish law existed, which had been brought out by Moses, which said that Jews were not to marry any non-Jewish women. Then at a later time, Jews had married quite a few non-Jewish women, and Ezra acted against this.

Q. How many times did you talk with Hitler about your beliefs regarding the anti-Semitic program?

A. Well, Hitler published his book, "Mein Kampf," and thus he manifested his opinions about this subject for the public.

Q. Didn't that pretty accurately reflect your opinions?

A. Yes, of course.

Q. Where did he get his opinions from?

A. The Fuehrer tells in his book "Mein Kampf" that he mentioned a man by the name of—I believe his name was Luegel, and also another man by the name of Soureil. He says his anti-Semitic views stem from that time.

Q. In your opinion, were not the Nurnberg laws a crystallization of the beliefs that you had been teaching in Germany?

A. The Fuehrer did not tolerate any influences in matters of an ideological nature. You could not counsel him in such things.

Q. No, but you had been teaching, and writing articles on the question of blood and race.

A. I wrote those things already before I made the acquaintance of the Fuehrer.

Q. Yes, and before the enactment of the Nurnberg laws.

A. Yes. A long time before that.

Q. How many years?

A. I made my first speech in November of 1918, when I returned from the front.

Q. The first time you met Hitler you claimed that you had a following larger than his, is that correct?

A. I was talking of the number in Nurnberg, and that was a labor movement.

BY LORD WRIGHT:

Q. What did you advocate, in those days, as the proper treatment of the Jews?

A. I always stood for the Zionist opinion. I will only mention here Theodore Herzl, who was one of the most famous leaders of the Jews, and he wrote in his diary that you will find anti-Semitism everywhere. That is, you will find it in all those countries where Jews were present; and wherever Jews were settling to, anti-Semitism would rise there.

Q. But what were you going to do?

A. Like him, I advocated a National State for the Jews. It is interesting here that Herzl does not object to the racial question. He recognized the Jews as a separate state. The English Government was petitioned in the last war, and again in this war, and Mr. Churchill knows all that, that a certain part of Palestine was to be set apart, as an area for the Jews. Who was that English statesman in the last war—it was not Lloyd-George—oh, yes, I remember, it was Balfour. He made a declaration wherein he promised at the end of the war negotiations should be started, and the aim of these negotiations should be that the Jews were to receive an autonomous state in Palestine. Thus it was to be assured that they would have a political home in the world.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Do you know how large Palestine is?

A. Palestine itself is not very large. I believe that I read some Jewish books which claimed there were 16 million Jews in the world, and thus the land in Palestine would not be enough for them. However, their demands were to found a state of their own.

Q. You knew, then, that you couldn't get them all into Palestine?

A. Yes? Whether I knew that?

Q. Yes.

A. Well, I thought about it a great deal, and I thought that if they were to be given just Palestine itself, it would not be enough. Then people say that the Arabs were not at all in favor of this idea. I was thinking of Transjordan, and also Syria, that might be given to them.

Excerpts from Testimony of Julius Streicher, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 17 October 1945, 1050-1250, by Col. Howard A. Brundage, JAGD. Also present: Siegfried Ramler, Interpreter; S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Court Reporter.

What Streicher Meant by "Extermination"

Q. So, summarizing your testimony, there was a change in the basic teaching, merely because you read a book written by a man named Kaufmann?

A. Yes. One only has to read the edition of Der Stuermer that related to that and one can see that a tendency has been adopted which was far more radical.

Q. Just briefly, what was the teaching prior to that time?

A. Always the same. I have been asked before whether it was my point of view that I thought it right that a Jewish national state should be established. I can say now that between 1941 and 1943—I don't know exactly at what period—we wrote an article in our paper, where we asked that Madagascar should be given to the Jews. The German Censorship Department in Berlin sent back the finished article—I think it was already printed—and did not accept it. This can be certified by my chief editor, Ernst Hiemer.

Q. Did you approve everything that Hiemer wrote?

A. I have had different journalists. Naturally, I did not approve everything, not every single sentence; that is clear.

Q. Did you approve the articles as published in your paper?

A. Yes, certainly, mainly, yes. I want to amplify something in the question of Madagascar. There was an International Anti-Semite League. On every Reichsparteitag in Nurnberg, anti-Semites gathered in Nurnberg from America, from England, from South America, from everywhere. It happened every year. There, repeatedly the question came up regarding a Jewish National State. I want you to ask Mr. Rosenberg. Rosenberg, who was in charge of the ideological education, can certify that he has spoken about this question of Madagascar.

Q. What about Palestine?

A. Palestine is a request of the Zionist Jews. Theodore Herzl has been one of the most famous and greatest Jewish leaders. It was Herzl who caused the Balfour Declaration. Balfour, after the request of the Jews, has given a written declaration where he stated that Palestine should be given for the creation of the Jewish State. At the beginning of this war, discussions in this respect have taken place.

Q. If I understand you correctly, you have at all times advocated the removal of Jews from Germany?

A. Yes. Always on an international basis. I have always propagated in my paper that the Jewish question should be solved by the Jews forming a national state, just like any other nation, and should create a home there.

Q. What mechanics did you advocate that should be used for moving Jews out of Germany?

A. Whatever I have advocated publicly is here written down in my paper. I can declare under oath that there is nobody, not here in the prison or anywhere else, who can say that at any time I have been asked by the Fuehrer to discuss with him the question of the Jews. I can declare here that my paper was the only one which was not recognized by the Party. My paper did not bear the Party stamp of approval. All the other papers did. I have not been asked to take part in the discussions of the Nurnberg laws. Everybody can certify to that. Frick has been taking part in it, but I have not.

Q. Now will you direct your attention to my question. How did you preach that the Jews were to be moved out of Germany?

A. I have made no public suggestions.

Q. Did you ever use the word "exterminate"?

A. I think my chief editor used it once, and in this article he also cited Kaufmann. This must have been one of his last articles, of February or March—I don't know exactly. He pointed out Kaufmann's request. I don't know exactly, but I do not believe that

INTERROGATIONS

I myself have ever used the expression "extermination." Had I only used the expression "extermination" now, the extermination would have happened already anyway, as I found out here in Mondorf.* May I say something about that? It is quite a general explanation.

I want to declare under oath that there might be gentlemen present here, I don't want to defend them, of whom it is supposed that they know about this question. I declare that they did not know about it. In Mondorf a Jewish officer came to me and presented to me an illustrated paper which had been published by Eisenhower. I declare here, I was terrified myself. I did not think it was possible. I want to give another explanation. The Fuehrer is dead. I respect the majesty of the dead. I am not the defense counsel of the Fuehrer. In December 1938, when I visited the prison in Landsberg, [sic] I spoke to the Fuehrer for the last time. I declare here that up to the year 1938 I have not heard the Fuehrer express the opinion that the Jews should be exterminated, either in an unofficial talk or in a Party official talk.

Q. Did you ever use the word "liquidate"?

A. No.

Q. Did you approve the article that was written by Hiemer where he used the word "exterminate"?

A. "Exterminate" and "destroy" are two different words in the German language. At the moment I am speaking about destruction. This word "destruction" was used by the Fuehrer. A report might have come from the Fuehrer, "The English or American company has been destroyed. There were so many prisoners and so many dead." In the German language, when I say that somebody's life should be taken, I would use either "killed" or "murdered," but I think "kill" would be the right expression. Extermination can result by sterilization, as Kaufmann wrote. The word "extermination" does not necessarily mean killing.

Q. Now will you answer my question: Did you approve the article that was written by Hiemer?

A. I believe yes. I have approved it, because he was my chief editor. He stated what different Jews had said, and referring to what Kaufmann, this Jew, has said, he also used the word "extermination." He just used it in one article.

Q. Who became radical first? Hitler or you?

A. I only know about myself.

Q. When did you become radical?

A. As soon as the book was published by Kaufmann, but we did not write anything about killing or murdering.

*See footnote, p. 1193 of this volume.

Q. Basically, what was the change that took place after you read the Kaufmann book?

A. I think I have written that if the Jews want to exterminate us they should be exterminated, too. I think these articles should be presented to me. I cannot remember them in detail.

Q. They will be presented to you in due time.

A. Yes.

Q. Is that what you mean by becoming radical, that you merely made such a statement?

A. Yes.

Q. Is that the only time you ever made such a statement?

A. I believe yes. No letter and no correspondence exists in my file where I said or I suggested to anybody that Jews ought to be killed.

Q. Do you accept any responsibility for the killing of Jews in concentration camps as a result of your teachings?

A. Only such a person can testify to a thing like that, who is paid to falsify the truth. This is impossible. Here are the documents. The killings have been ordered from Berlin. Nobody in Germany would have carried through any killings without having received orders.

Q. Do you remember on the 11th day of August 1938, that you gave the signal for the destruction of the main synagogue of Nurnberg?*

A. No. No. I have not done that.

Q. Do you remember that the issue of the Fraenklische Tageszeitung of 11 August 1938 came out with a banner headline: "Julius Streicher Gave the Signal for the Destruction of the Main Synagogue of Nurnberg."

A. I have not read this article, but I have already said that the main synagogue of Nurnberg has been removed by the Oberbuergermeister.

Q. Do you remember seeing that edition where the entire four pages were taken up with pictures of yourself officiating at the ceremony and giving the text of your address, giving the order for the destruction of the synagogue?

A. Even before the acquisition of power of Hitler in 1933, I have already made speeches and said that, in Nurnberg, "An oriental building in the middle of the town is a shame and it is high time that it disappeared."

Q. Then you were there, and you did participate in that ceremony?

A. Yes. We have also removed a Protestant church in Munich,

*See documents 1724-PS, vol. IV, p. 224; 2711-PS, vol. V, p. 376.

INTERROGATIONS

because it did not fit into the street. However, that has nothing to do with the 9th of November, with the burning of synagogues.

Q. I didn't say it had anything to do with it. I asked you if you gave the signal for the destruction of the synagogue.

A. Yes, for this synagogue, yes.

Q. You then want the record to be changed where you said "No" the first time?

A. At that time I thought you were referring to the burning of the synagogues. I mixed it up.

Q. This article in substance says that "Many people are quite smug because the Jewish question in Germany is solved. The Jew is barred from civil life and politics. German blood is protected by the Nurnberg laws," and so forth. "Such persons," according to you, "are taking only a superficial view of the Jewish question. The German people will not be free of danger from the Jewish plague until the Jewish question is liquidated in its entirety. The danger of the plague infecting the German people will continue to exist as long as there is a seat of this pestilence anywhere in the world."

A. This has nothing to do with killing. With that is meant that as long as a Jew anywhere in the world has the possibility either to mix sexually or acquire the power in the individual country. I beg to point to some other of my similar articles where I wrote, "as long as the power of the Jews is not broken," and these articles referred back to this time.

Q. What do you mean by the word "liquidate"?

A. I have not used the word "liquidate."

Q. What is meant by that?

A. No more sexual intercourse. No more political influence. No more possibilities for them to play off peoples against one another.

Q. If you were proposing a safe haven for Jews, how do you consider that any seat of pestilence, as you say, can be cleared up?

A. All this belongs to the solution of the whole Jewish question.

Q. If you say there is a danger of the German people becoming infected so long as there is any place where Jews are in control, how did you propose to solve that question?

A. The Jews are the only people that are distributed among all countries, and in spite of that, they have remained a people, a race, a unified religion, and a nation. There is only one solution, and this solution can only be arrived at in an international way by a conference of the big powers. In this state, they would be under their king or president, citizens of the state, and just like any Chinese or Japanese, they could come into another country as members of their own country. This state would have the same international rights as every other state, with their ambassadors and delegations but the Jew would not have the right to make politics in another country as a member of a Jewish state.

Q. Then you say that in connection with that particular article, that you didn't mean that the solution of the Jewish question would be the liquidation of the Jews?

A. No.

Q. Do you admit that the reading of that article permits that interpretation?

A. Whoever knows all my writings and articles during my 25 years of journalism cannot have such an impression.

Q. Why did you permit Hiemer to use the word "exterminate"? In view of this article of yours, that permits of some wrong interpretation.

A. This is a way of expression which does not mean killing, but merely means exterminate them; get them out. At that time the article was read to me, but of course, I do not remember every detailed word.

Q. I will now show you the issue of Der Stuermer of the 19th of March 1942, and call your special attention to the editorial appearing on the first page, which runs over to the second page over your signature, and ask you to pay particular attention to that part which is marked with a red pencil, and I will ask you to explain what you meant by those passages. This article has to do with the prophecy of the Fuehrer. It goes on to say that the "Jewish penetration of Europe, especially of Germany, began under the protection of the Roman Empire, and that the solution of the Jewish problem became a question of life for Europe."*

A. Yes, this is my conviction.

Q. "There were two ways which might have led to the redemption of Europe from the Jews, expulsion or extermination."

A. Yes. I have written that purposely, but it is not stated here that killing should be that way.

Q. What do you mean by "extermination"?

A. This is the most radical and an impossible solution. Had I wanted the solution of extermination, I wouldn't have mentioned both of these ways.

Q. But you go on to say, "Just as the expulsion of Jews had led to temporary and partial results by virtue of the disunity in action of the European peoples, so also the attempt at extermination could not attain the desired purpose, as extermination was only carried out on a petty scale and within a few nations."

*See document M-31, vol. VIII, p. 19.

INTERROGATIONS

A. Yes, this is a historical fact. This is the reason why I say that extermination is not the way to the solution of the Jewish problem.

Q. But later on in the article, you say, "Fate has decreed that the 20th century would see the total solution of the Jewish question. In a proclamation of 24 February 1942, to the peoples of Europe, the Fuehrer of the German Reich has indicated how this solution will be achieved."

A. At that time I did not know that the Fuehrer had Jews killed in camps. The Fuehrer has repeatedly said—unfortunately, I was not able to quote it word for word—he said that finally the Jews will approach an extermination in England and America, internationally in every country, and I think that then he referred to the political power of the Jews.

Q. Don't you point out in this article that expulsion in itself is ineffective?

A. Expulsion alone would not be sufficient. There has to be some order. They must have to have some place to go to.

Q. How do you explain the part in this article that reads, "My prophecy will find its fulfillment that the Aryan race is not annihilated by this war. On the contrary, the Jew will be exterminated. Whatever else this struggle leads to or however long it may endure, this will be the final result, and then for the first time after the elimination of these parasites, a true peace will arise in a suffering world, and thereby mutual understanding between peoples will remain for a long time."

A. The elimination of the parasites means taking them out of the people.

Q. I know it means that, but what do you mean by the statement that "the Aryan race is not annihilated by this war. On the contrary, the Jew will be exterminated"?

A. I meant that the power of the Jews was being broken.

Q. Show me any place in that article where it says that.

A. The word is not said right here, but I have written it in other articles. If extermination was to be understood by that, I would have written the word "extermination."

Q. When you wrote that "The Aryan race is not annihilated by this war," what did you mean by that?

A. What I meant was that if it is managed to take the Jews out of the different countries and place them into a state of their own, then the Aryan peoples can continue to live. If, however, the condition carries on as it was up to then, that the Jews were allowed to mix freely sexually with other nations, then the whole world will go down to destruction.

Q. Why didn't you say that?

A. There were a number of editions of "Der Stuermer" where I wrote that the peoples are going towards their destruction by sexual intercourse.

Q. Do you want the record to be changed that you never used the word "extermination"?

A. Extermination has not the meaning, as I said before, of killing, but merely excluding. As I said before, during wartime, in the German wartime language, it was often used that such and such a company was exterminated with so many people dead and so many people wounded.

Q. I will now quote to you an article that appeared in Der Stuermer on the 7th day of May 1942,* appearing over the signature of Ernst Hiemer, and which you say was printed with your approval. This article reads as follows, as it appears in the last three or four paragraphs: "Today Europe is about to carry out the final solution of the Jewish question. Precisely on that account, it is well to learn from past errors and to recall again in this matter what history teaches; and what does history teach? It teaches, 'the Jewish question is not only a German affair. It is also not only a European problem. The Jewish question is a world question. Not only is Germany not safe in face of the Jews as long as one Jew lives in Europe, but also the Jewish question is hardly solved in Europe so long as Jews live in the rest of the world. Jewry is organized criminality. The Jewish menace will thus only be eliminated if Jewry in the whole world has ceased to exist.'" Give me your explanation of that.

A. I explain this, as I explained it before, that this question has to be internationally solved; that is, the Jews have to be taken out of all countries and an international solution created. It is proof that we always wanted the international solution of the Jewish problem by always being against any individual proceedings in Germany.

Q. How do you explain the following: "but also the Jewish question is hardly solved in Europe as long as Jews live in the rest of the world"?

A. Did I write this article?

Q. Hiemer wrote it.

A. This has been written rather illogically: This can happen very often; if you just take one sentence out of an article, it might happen. You have to read the article as a whole. May I hear it again? I want to be sure.

*Document referred to did not form part of the prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. "Not only is Germany not safe in face of the Jews as long as one Jew lives in Europe, but also the Jewish question is hardly solved in Europe so long as Jews live in the rest of the world."

A. This has not been expressed very cleverly, but what he wanted to say—

Q. Never mind what he wanted to say. We are only interested in what was said.

Now, when you consider that and also consider the following: "Jewry is organized criminality," what do you say to that?

A. We can prove that. With organized criminality we mean that the Jews were organized among all peoples in order to get all the wealth into their hands. The Old Testament is still looked upon as the whole history of Jews. In the Old Testament it is written, "The gates of the world are open for you and you should devour the people." The Jews are living in all the countries as Jews. For instance, the Jews in England are living there as English citizens, but they remain Jews. It says at the association between God and Abraham, it is said that God has made an association with Abraham, and the sign of this association is the circumcision, and this is how every Jew is part of this big organization by this mark of circumcision.

Q. If you believe that it is organized criminality, how could you honestly advocate the erection of a national state?

A. Why not?

Q. How could such a state exist without having some relations with other nations?

A. I have said that it should have relations with other nations, with ambassadors.

Q. Had you considered whether or not other nations would have any relations with an organized criminal nation?

A. If you take apart every one of my sentences that I have written during my past 25 years, of course.

Q. Of course what?

A. Of course, if you take out every single word, take it out of the substance, of course you can weigh it one way or the other, but what I meant by "world criminality of Jews" I made reference to the political side of it.

Q. I am not trying to trap you with any of my questions. I am merely trying to get the basic philosophy that you have been teaching. Now you say that you at all times advocated a peaceful solution of this question?

A. Yes.

Q. And that your peaceful solution was to move the Jews out of Germany and out of Europe, and to create a national state?

A. The Zionist leader, Theodore Herzl, requested that.

Q. Now you have advocated that you are able to prove that Jewry is organized criminality?

A. Yes, that I can prove.

Q. I want to put those two things together and want you to tell me what your solution is for the existence of such a national state.

A. Let us remain with the word "criminals." In France, criminals are being sent to Devil's Island. If I know that people are distributed in every country with the aim of the acquisition of the wealth that is in every country, and have as their aim to spoil every country racially, I have the right to speak about criminality.

Q. Do you take the position that every individual Jew belongs to that class?

A. No. Politically, yes. As a member of the whole community that has as their aim to enslave other nations.

Q. Did you advocate a selection?

A. International solution of the Jewish problem by the elimination of the Jews into other countries.

Q. And by that you mean all Jews?

A. With that I mean all Jews in all the countries.

Q. Without any selection as to whether they are criminals or not?

A. Yes.

Q. Then you had in mind the creation of a national state that would be something similar to Devil's Island?

A. I have said already before that Theodore Herzl and most of the Jews wanted a creation of the Jewish state. When I said "Devil's Island," I merely meant it in an illustrative fashion. I wanted to say that in France, criminals are not being killed by merely being sent to Devil's Island.

Q. What do you mean by the word "Jewry"?

A. Jewry is the conception for the whole of the Jews. You say, for instance, the world Jewry. The political aims of the Jews in the world is world Jewry.

Q. Well, would you consider that Jewry would be eliminated if this national state was created?

A. Yes. This program has started already. Cities have been built in Palestine. Agricultural schools have been set up in Switzerland, and many people have emigrated to Palestine and worked on the land.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. In this article you state, "The Jewish menace will thus only be eliminated if Jewry in the whole world has ceased to exist."

A. That means as soon as they have stopped to exercise any influence among the peoples.

Q. But you call it a Jewish menace.

A. I meant it a menace when people in different countries cannot assimilate themselves to the countries, but remain a united block, economically and politically.

Q. In the last few questions, I made a mistake by referring to you as the author of this article, but the article we have been discussing is the one by Ernst Hiemer.

A. I am ready to answer the question just the same.

Q. Well, I just didn't want to mislead you with those questions. However, do you accept this article as if it was your own?

A. Being as a whole, yes.

Excerpt from Testimony of Julius Streicher, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 6 November 1945, by Lt. Col. S. W. Brookhart, JAGD. Also present: Gladys Picklesimer, Court Reporter; Martha von Gronefeld, Interpreter.

Streicher Disowns the Fruits of His Policy

Q. Let's talk about the extermination policy.

A. Well, all I can say on this question is that I was as surprised as most of the people. The first time I learned of it was by a Swiss paper.

Q. How did it suit you?

A. What could I say? I would not be able to kill anybody or have somebody killed. I wouldn't be able to take the leadership in such a question on account of my whole attitude.

Q. You were one of the principal leaders in fomenting measures against the Jews. You must have been proud when they found a man strong enough and bloody enough to go in and wipe them off the earth.

A. If I had been the leader of the State, I would surely not have thought of doing such a thing in the moment when it was certain that we could not win the war.

Q. I am speaking of measures that were taken, starting with the Russian campaign. You remember the Einsatz groups.*

A. I stayed on my farm, and there was no one who would ever have visited me. I didn't know anything about what the Party was doing or intended to do.

*The activities of one of the Einsatz groups are described in document L-180, vol. VII, p. 978.

Q. You certainly remember the operations of the Einsatz groups on the Eastern front.

A. I repeat under oath—you can ask everybody—there is no one who can say that I have spoken with anyone about these questions during the war.

I read in the Swiss papers—it must have been the end of 1944 or the beginning of 1945, and I couldn't believe it at the time—that they talked about a camp which they found near Cracow where many people had been killed, and I couldn't believe it.

X. ERICH RAEDER*

*Testimony of Erich Raeder, taken at Nurnberg, Germany,
8 November 1945, 1040-12:01 by Major John J. Monigan
Jr., CAC. Also present: Nancy M. Shields, BCV, Reporter; Leo Katz, Interpreter.*

Reasons for Navy's Defiance of Versailles Treaty

Q. Would a fair statement be that the Navy High Command was interested in avoiding the limiting provisions of the Treaty of Versailles regarding personnel and the limits of armaments, but would attempt to fulfill the letter of the Treaty, although actually avoiding it?

A. That was our endeavor.

Q. Why was such a policy adopted?

A. We were much menaced in the first years after the first war, by the danger that the Poles would attack East Prussia, and so we tried to strengthen a little our very, very weak forces in this way, and so all our efforts were directed to the aim to have a little more strength against the Poles, if they would attack us. It was nonsense to think of attacking Poland in this state, and for the navy, a second aim was to have some defense against the entering of French forces into the Ostsee, because we knew that the French had the intention to sustain the Poles. Their ships came into the Ostsee (Baltic) and so the navy was defense against an attack of Poland and against the entrance of French ships into the Ostsee. Quite defensive aims.

Q. When did the fear of an attack from Poland first show itself in official circles in Germany, would you say?

A. In all the first years. They took Wilna. At the same moment we thought that they would come to East Prussia. I don't know exactly the year, because those judgments were the judgments

*See Statements VII, VIII, and IX, Vol. VIII, pp. 684-735; also document D-880, Supp. A, p. 1015.

INTERROGATIONS

of the German Government Ministers, the Army and Navy ministers, Groener and Noske.

Q. Then those views, in your opinion, were generally held and existed perhaps as early as 1919 or 1920, after the end of the first world war?

A. Oh, but the whole situation was very, very uncertain, and about those years, in the beginning, I cannot give a very exact thing, because I was then on duty with the Navy archives for two years to write a book about the war and how the cruisers fought in the first war. Two years—so I was not with these things.

Excerpts from Testimony of Erich Raeder, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 9 November 1945, 1430-1620, by Major John J. Monigan, Jr., CAC. Also present: Alfred H. Booth, Interpreter; Todd Mitchell, Court Reporter.

Competitive Rearmament of the German Navy

A. With the rise to power of Hitler he gave me the following orientation: That the objective of foreign policy was never to antagonize England, Italy, or Japan, and that he would always be willing to concede to England naval supremacy because of her world position. If one is to build up a navy, one must always follow an example because the navy cannot be constructed as an army can increase its divisions. Therefore our navy, like all navies, must be built to fit the combat situation at hand. Inasmuch as England was out of consideration in our navy decisions, the remaining navy powers were Russia and France, but he declared that in no way would such a war be likely against Russia or France. Inasmuch as the navy had to be organized according to an example, we took as our model the French Navy. Now, while we had our armored units, permissible under the Versailles Treaty, of 10,000 tons and equipped with six 28-centimeter guns, and with a speed of 26 sea miles, the French created the Dunkirk Class with eight 33-centimeter guns and a speed of 28 sea miles, and it was explicitly stated by the French that these Dunkirk types were built in order to overpower our navy. England built thereafter the King George Class at a speed of also 28 miles but with 35-centimeter guns, and France followed with the Richelieu Class equipped with 38-centimeter guns and England then followed in turn with the Beatty Class and 40-centimeter guns, while the United States of America had introduced the 40-centimeter guns long ago. I only cite these sequences in order to show that it is the general naval policy to outdo the navies of other countries because one never knows with whom one will have to conduct a war. It is the intention of all navies to build ever stronger units. These matters were candidly discussed in the special magazines, and from that point of view you can consider any naval officer as a war criminal. Because Hitler told me that England would, under no circumstances, be considered as a war opponent, we organized our navy according to France, which had the second strongest navy; and the first two ships, the Scharnhorst and the Gneisenau, were modeled after the French Navy, although not so strong but at a slightly higher speed, had nine 28-centimeter guns, and, because of our speed, could easily get away from the French ships. When we received the news about the Richelieu Class of the French Navy we built our ships also with 38-centimeter guns.

Q. That was the Tirpitz?

A. Yes, and the Bismarck. In 1935 the Naval Agreement provided for a ratio of 35-100 in order to show that we would not aspire to the same strength as the English Navy, and in 1937 a second Naval Agreement was concluded with England concerning the quality of the navy, that is, its size and lifetime. In 1938 the mood in England toward Germany became more unfavorable. I believe that Ribbentrop bears responsibility for that because he was very unwise in his whole behavior. Therefore, in the fall of 1938 Hitler came to the conclusion that we ought to direct our strength in ships along the lines of the British Navy because it may be that his plan not to conduct war against England might not be capable of realization; that is, not the strength of the navy altogether but the strength of the type of ships. For us to attain the size of the British Navy was impossible. Therefore, Hitler ordered me in the fall of 1938 that plans be made according to which our navy would obtain within 7 or 8 years a certain strength with naval units able to withstand the British Navy guns.

Q. Ship for ship?

A. Yes, ship for ship. This plan was called the "Z" plan; possibly this was the last plan we put in effect, and it was intended to consummate this program by either 1945 or 1946. And, as this document shows, which is dated December 1938 (Hela),* it seemed that Carls, then Admiral and Chief of the Fleet was asked to submit his opinion in connection with the plan "Z", and here he says, we will need six battleships, and he expresses himself about the individual type of ships which he thought were necessary, and, in case that England would lead a war against us, economic

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

war would be the proper means. One could not conduct such an economic war exclusively with submarines but it would be necessary to conduct it with large ships, cruisers, and auxiliary cruisers.

Q. What were the circumstances under which this study was prepared by Carls?

A. It seems as if such a request came from me to the commander-in-charge. I pointed out that in contrast to Hitler's former conception of our relationship to England and their present attitude that it was conceivable that a war may occur between England and Germany, and, consequently, the formation of our navy would have to be adapted to theirs. The objective in such a war would be to secure ocean communications and free access to the sea. Such a fight would essentially be a defensive action because we were not strong enough to act otherwise, but we had to contemplate this by means of the economic war since we could not hope to defeat the British Navy, as such.

Q. The indication is in the first paragraph that the colonial matters would not need be settled by peaceful means, is it not?

A. No. It seems here that if Germany, according to the will of the Fuehrer expected to secure world power it needed, besides certain colonial positions, to secure sea communications—

Q. (Interrupting) It is there (indicating in the document) in the second paragraph—the second sentence—

A. (Interrupting) Yes, Carls says that if Hitler would pursue his objectives it was probable the war would come with England—the war which up to then Hitler did not think probable. The Navy in its original plan had oriented itself not toward England because it was not deemed likely that a war would occur between England and Germany. Now this approach had to be corrected because such a war was a real possibility.

Q. Up until that time the orientation of Hitler and the navy excluded the possibility of a conflict with England?

A. Yes, and their ship types were not our model.

Q. And in September, 1938, it was contemplated that the policy of Hitler would result in the possibility of a conflict with England?

A. Yes. Hitler himself did not believe in that. Hitler had, on the 23d of August 1938, in an important speech, enumerated all the reasons why he did not think such a conflict would be probable between England and Germany. The Navy was shocked by the idea that war would occur between England and Germany because it was clear to them that as and when such a war would break out, we would be much inferior to the British Navy.

Q. Did you request your subordinate officers, such as Carls, to prepare a study such as this concerning what action they would recommend for the purposes of such a war—or—how did Carls happen to prepare this?

A. I am certain that I had requested this of Admiral Carls because he was Chief of the Fleet.

Q. And similar studies would undoubtedly have been prepared by the Operations Division, I suppose?

A. Certainly—this came through us to the High Command and served for the basis of our "Z" program later on. Carls said that quite likely if such a war would ever break out it would be launched by England against us because of our political attitude. That in such a case, also, the entire Empire, as well as France, probably also Russia and a number of foreign nations would join England, so that it would become again a world war. May I add something to this: In the contest of the development of the European navies, to which I have referred recently, I wanted to add here that the British Navy, quite apart from tonnage, strength, and speed, claimed a 2 to 1 standard ratio; that is, the British Navy was to be twice as strong as the two next strongest navies together, for example, France and the United States, maybe at times also the Russian Navy, and at times the British Navy even claimed a 3 to 1 ratio. I mention this only in order to point out the strong armament contest, and also that the Navy in its construction program had to take an example from other navies according to their political aims. I also point this out in order to make it understood how this was a very large competitive armament program.

XI. FRITZ SAUCKEL*

Excerpts from Testimony of Fritz Sauckel, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 12 September 1945, 1015-1215, by Major John J. Monigan, Jr., CAC. Also present: Capt. Jesse F. Landrum, AGD, Court Reporter; Mr. Bernard Reymon, Interpreter.

Hitler Legalizes the Slave Labor Program.

A. I was then [1942] told by the Fuehrer and by various Government agencies that the use of foreign workers within the occupied territories would not go counter to the conventions of The Hague. The Fuehrer set forth that those countries had surrendered unconditionally and had governments which had been shaped according to his desire. I then received a definite order to mobilize workers in those countries and, inasmuch as this could not be carried out through voluntary methods, to use the same methods of compulsory conscription which was enforced in Germany. The Fuehrer added that Soviet Russia was not a party at all to the Hague Convention; furthermore, that in the countries which had surrendered he had left millions of war prisoners who had been immediately released. If too great difficulties were created for him he (Hitler) would be compelled to take back again those prisoners of war. I had to satisfy myself with those explanations of the Fuehrer and to carry out my task. I then received the necessary powers and was placed under the authority of Reichsmarshall Hermann Goering, in his capacity as the head of the Four-Year Plan. To carry out the prescribed task, I received from the Labor Ministry two departments: namely, Abteilung 3, which was the department of salaries; and Abteilung 5, which was the department of manpower. I was not entitled to set up any new agencies, but was to be in touch with and to apply to those new government departments which were already in existence in the various ministries and in the Wehrmacht. I could be assisted by various other organizations. This could only be possible in communicating with them, not in issuing to them any orders, as I had no right to do so.

* See also Document 3721-PS, Vol. VI, p. 428; 3722-PS, Vol. VI, p. 459.

INTERROGATIONS

The first principle was that the foreign workers were to be treated and paid in the same manner as the German workers. The second principle was fair, just, and humane treatment. This I have been able to carry out with all the people from the West, South, and Southeast. These people were treated and nourished and dealt with in the same manner as the German working people. Restrictions, however, were placed on me with regard to the Russian workers and partly the Polish workers. The Russian workers by virtue of orders from the Reichsfuehrer SS, which were approved by the Fuehrer and by the Party itself, received, up to 1940, less than the other foreign workers. This was justified on the following grounds: The so-called Ostarbeiter (workers from the East) contrary to what was the case with the foreign workers from the West and South, and so on, had to pay no taxes and no fees, no insurance, and no contributions to the DAF.* Upon my representation and those of other persons, we were told that if the Eastern workers, which actually meant only the Russian workers, were paid at the same rate as the other workers, they would actually enjoy better treatment as they had less expense. With regard to food, they were placed (the Eastern workers) on the same level as the German civilians.

*Deutsche Arbeitsfront (German Labor Front), headed by Dr. Robert Ley.

Excerpts from Testimony of Fritz Sauckel, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 15 September 1945, 1020-1200, by Major John J. Monigan, Jr., CAC. Also present: Capt. Jesse F. Landrum, AGD, Court Reporter; T/5 Harold H. Wolf, Interpreter.

Economics of the German Wage Problem

Q. You may continue with whatever country you select.

A. Since it always concerns some country, I would like to start talking about the German wage problem. In 1942, I was also charged with the department of wages of the Reich Labor Ministry under Ministerialdirektor Kimig. Before he took it over, it was Dr. Wiesil who was in charge of the office of Reichstreuhander. I only want to make a few explanations about the regulations I received concerning the wages in occupied areas. The Fuehrer ordered that the stabilization of prices and wages must become the basic law of the German defense economy. He has mentioned it again and again. The German people's confidence was held as long as these prices remained stable and no inflationary measures appeared, as they did in 1923. A Commissar for prices was appointed at the beginning of the war, Dr. Fischboeck. Dr. Fischboeck was the successor to Wagner. While I was in charge, Fischboeck was in office. Just as Dr. Fischboeck was charged to keep prices stable in Germany and occupied territories, I was charged with keeping wages stable in those areas. Special attention was called to that by me when I took over the office. This was rather difficult because ever since the rise to power in 1933 they were unable to introduce an ideal wage policy. Several attempts had been made but no satisfactory agreement had been reached. We, as National Socialists, would have liked it. The wages for agricultural workers were unsatisfactory ; that was generally recognized. Since a rise in agricultural wages would have resulted in a rise in prices of bread, it was postponed until after the war. The intensity of the defense effort, especially of the airplane industry, resulted in the fact that in various places this wage stabilization was breached and not adhered to. In the airplane industry especially, the various section chiefs concerned, by determining our wage bracket, found they could achieve more quantitative work. Thus it happened at times that people who were less skilled and less qualified actually earned more wages than skilled workers. Thus the workers who worked on the assembly line also earned more money than the man who did precision work. Unskilled workers at the assembly lines earned more money than the skilled workers who produced precision instruments because the latter received hourly wages. Even when I was Gauleiter I tried to bring about a wage compromise so that the skilled workers would be on an equal basis with the unskilled workers. This system I later tried to spread out over Germany and I succeeded gradually. This new order consisted in paying the skilled workers more than those working on mass production.

INTERROGATIONS

Eckloehne* refers to wages the same as we have only that it varies with the arrangement and depends on agricultural productivity of the area; and for instance, in nonagricultural areas the wage was higher. I was for striking an average between these wages all over the Reich and in various communities certain additional contributions were made in accordance with the cost of living index.

Re wages and these Eckloehne, they became a basis of the piece rates and Leistungsloehne. Re wages and these Eckloehne, I had to keep them on a firm basis in the occupied countries. I convinced the Fuehrer that piece rates and these Leistungsloehne should not be cut because the more incentive we give to production the better the results will be. If the worker used little tricks in production he could at times receive high earnings above the Eckloehne standard. The engineers would soon find out about these little tricks that were being used. Thus it was possible for the worker to receive twice as much wages through twice the amount of the Eckloehne due to the little tricks he used in production. If the worker earned too much, the earnings were then somewhat reduced. On the assembly line of workers who worked on the same thing, that is equally applicable. This procedure of cutting down wages was called "Akkordschere" on piece rates. This system of "Akkordschere" was not liked and was even hated. I rescinded this "Akkordschere" regulation in the new wage regulations. We recognized the quantitative production wages even though they were way above the average production wages and nothing could be cut off these wages any more. This became the basis of the German wage policy effective in 1943 for Germany and the occupied countries. We endeavored to maintain these principles in the occupied countries. The wage standards in the countries which we occupied were naturally different. It is therefore not right that I or Germany demanded lower wage standards in the occupied countries. And higher wages were paid

*Although this is the word transcribed by the reporter, the word used by the witness was most likely Streckloehne ("Stretch-wages" or special wages). It is not clear whether the word refers to the wage rate as adjusted by the cost-of-living differential, or to such differential itself.

"Performance compensation" or incentive wages.

Piece-rate "scissors", cut-off, or curtailment.

in Norway and Denmark and Holland. I was ordered not to lower the wages but to maintain the standard as it had been in 1942 when I took over my office. I then had to adhere to this order very strictly. I received requests from other occupied areas for wage increases. If I had granted these requests I would first have violated the orders of the Government and the Fuehrer; secondly, I would have contributed to bring disorder into the European economic system. At any rate, I could not have made such a decision alone; I needed the agreement of the German Price Commissar. This wage question was brought up at the Fuehrer's Headquarters several times and the Fuehrer asked me again and again to maintain stable wages, otherwise wages would start sliding like an avalanche and bring inflation to Europe. I must, therefore, point out that I wasn't set on increasing the wages of laborers in the occupied countries but that I wanted to adhere to the established wage standards. It is, therefore, not right that I kept wages down in occupied countries in order to lure the workers in those countries to Germany, as it says in the document referred to above. However, I do not contest the fact that in those countries where wages were lower it served as an incentive to lure workers to Germany. I have also had lengthy conversations about this with Laval. He admitted that he would like under all circumstances to avoid inflationary courses. Conferences with Laval and other people about this wage standard question were very difficult because even in economic circles this question is considered a very difficult one.

I now come to the main counter-argument to my own convictions. The main counter-argument to the orders which I was asked to carry out by the Fuehrer was the appearance of black markets. It must be noted that I, together with all the other government officials, was a staunch opponent of black markets. I want to declare most sacredly that I could not have derived any benefit from any black market operation. I and the other officers have fought against this black market because it would have undermined the confidence of the French people. It is certain that if any German officials or Germans supported and furthered the black market they have committed a major crime. In conversations with Laval I emphasized again and again the necessity of reducing the wage level to the standard of the years of 1941 and 1942. I felt convinced that just like increasing prices and profits, a strong government on the other hand should be able to reduce prices to the desired levels. I ordered that in all occupied countries, just like in Germany, all merchandise was to be tagged with a price tag which would represent the controlled price in that area.

INTERROGATIONS

How much that was carried out, especially in France where administration was in French hands, I don't know; but my desires and wishes were not greatly welcomed. Upon an order of the Fuehrer, it was recommended that in those French factories where workers worked for Germany or in the organization Todt, factory lunches were to be served and canteens opened where cheap food and other necessities were to be purchased at lower rates. That was also ordered for other occupied areas. I can't say whether these orders were carried out all over, but I myself visited factories in Paris where this had been instituted; I have even eaten there myself. I want to underline that fact now because at Oberursel* it was contested because such institutions would have been against my interest. But I cannot deny anything that I have seen myself and that I have experienced myself. I say that under oath. We hoped that through this measure a certain independence of the French worker from the black market might be achieved. I want to reiterate again my statement which I have also made in the Reich that the black market is like a cancerous growth on the economy. If I am told that I was supposed to know about all these black-market operations, then I must say that I have been so occupied in carrying out my duties that I had no time to conduct any investigations. I also want to add that the Fuehrer had issued an order that each department head was not to meddle into another department's business, and to keep all measures secret. This was a very strict order.

In Italy towards the end of 1942 the following took place: The Fascist Ministerrat (Council of Ministers) ordered a 15 percent wage increase. I suppose—and that is my personal assumption—they did it to make themselves popular. The Duce introduced the formula of a wage increase up to 15 percent. By the time it had reached the Italian press it read "a wage increase of at least 15 percent." The results were that in various areas prices increased 30 percent the next day. Wages—especially in Milan, as I remember—rose to 90 percent. This event became the subject of lengthy discussions in the German Embassy in Italy. Unfortunately, I was not successful in impeding this general wage increase. And the result of all this was a general alert in respect to the wage and price policy in Italy. The lamentable thing is that as far as the masses are concerned the prices increased much faster, to the detriment of the masses. Such events were also uncontrollable in the Balkans, especially in Greece and Yugoslavia. The events had taken place there already, black market, wage increases, price increases.

*Between the time of their capture and their confinement in the Nurnberg prison a number of high-ranking Nazis, including Sauckel, were interned in a detention center at Oberursel.

Excerpts from Testimony of Fritz Sauckel taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 18 October 1945, 1710-1720, by Major John J. Monigan, CAC. Also present: 2nd Lt. Werner N. Von Rosenstiel, Interpreter; T/4 James P. Buck, Court Reporter.

Sauckel's Statement of Innocence After Reading Indictment

Q. You have now been served with a copy of the indictment in this case in which you are accused as a defendant of the commission of various crimes. It is expected that you will continue to be interrogated from time to time unless you expressly object thereto. Please state whether you have any objection to being further interrogated, or whether you consider your interests would be best protected by refusing to be interrogated further.

A. May I make an announcement on this issue. I am neither a lawyer nor do I know in any detail German or international law. Because of the honor of myself, of my family, my children, and my people, I am ready to answer any question that may be directed to me here or in a court of justice. I would like to state at this point, however, that intentionally I have not participated in a conspiracy against the rights of my own nation or against any other nation. I have acted in good faith believing that I would serve my nation. I have been a simple sailor and worker and have tried by home studies to absorb and study the contacts that constitute the life and organic composition of my nation. I have never assumed that the movement of which I became a member might lead to a wanton violation of international law. The Office for the Control of Manpower which I was required to take over in 1942, I have carried through because I was expressly told that in Germany everybody has to take the place he is ordered to take just the same as a soldier has to fight at the front. I would like to state in addition to that which I have said under oath that I have stayed away from any discussion or preparation for international actions, from discussions of a foreign policy nature or with regard to the preparation of war. The execution of my orders in 1942 I have to admit, of course, and I am willing also to be held responsible for that, but I would like to state expressly in this connection again that I have never participated in matters regarding penal institutions or concentration camps or measures of that nature. After having declared my willingness to testify here I would like to be permitted in the future to ask the advice of the Major who is questioning me at this time.

Q. Advice? Do you have any specific matter you wish to discuss?

INTERROGATIONS

A. I am totally alone and I do not know anybody in Germany who could be my defense counsel. I lived a rather isolated life and even in Germany I have only a very limited circle of acquaintances. I do not know whether the Major is a prosecuting official, judge, or any other official. I am aware of the fact that greater things are at stake than my person. Since I have been alone for 6 months by now I bring forward confidence to another person, this being part of my character. But I, myself, am totally unable to select a defense counsel from the list that has been handed to me. Also with regard to other attorneys from my whole country I am not informed. With regard to the substance of the questions I can of course at all times answer myself. But concerning the legal technicalities I naturally have no information.

Q. The manner of the selection of the defense counsel has not been prescribed at the present time. If there is someone that you feel would be capable of representing you, you will have an opportunity to request such person.

A. I don't know anybody of significance even in my home town. Never in my life have I had anything to do with the courts or with the police. I would never have expected this in all my life.

Q. It is not possible for me to give you any advice since I am not a judge in the case. I am an officer of the United States Army and I therefore cannot advise you.

A. Where could I then obtain some advice as I am alone?

Q. Of the people on this list which was given to you, perhaps some person could be selected who could talk to you about it.

A. Then I will have to leave it to a blind chance. In conclusion I would like to state a few days ago on the suggestion of Major Kelley,* the physician, I have delivered a rather detailed description of my life—about 20 pages. And I should appreciate it if you would ask Major Kelley to deliver this description of my life and perhaps pass it on to the International Tribunal. I would like to express before the Major that I never in my life thought to commit a crime and that the only motive of my joining the party was my love for the German worker and the German nation. And for this reason it is impossible for me to consider myself a criminal, because otherwise I would not have stayed alive. But I would like to state at this point that I have not a thought of committing suicide or doing anything against my own life or to deny any testimony whatever.

Q. You understand that the indictment is a series of charges and you will have an opportunity to present your defense.

A. Yes.

*The Nurnberg prison psychiatrist.

XII. FRANZ VON PAPEN

Excerpts from Testimony of Franz von Papen, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 3 September 1945, 1125-1215, by Mr. Thomas J. Dodd. Also present: Rudolf Pressburger, interpreter; S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Reporter.

German Governmental Crises, 1932—1933.

Q. [In English] Before you became the Chancellor, did you hold any other political position excepting the membership in the Prussian Diet?

A. [In English] Political position, no.

Q. Who appointed you Chancellor in 1932?

A. Field Marshal von Hindenburg, then President of the Reich.

Q. And you served in that office for how long?

A. Until the 2d of December, possibly, '32.

Q. And thereafter, what, if any position did you occupy?

A. I had no position up to the 30th of January, possibly, '33, and then on the order of the President of the Reich, I formed the government of Hitler. I took the post of the Vice Chancellor.

Q. I understood you to say that you ceased to be Chancellor in December of 1932?

A. Yes.

Q. Why did you cease to be Chancellor in December of 1932?

A. Well, it's a long story.

Q. As briefly as you can, tell us without going into too much detail at this time.

A. You know that the idea of my Chancellorship was to modify in some way the German Constitution, because we considered that the authority of the Government under the Weimar Constitution was too weak, too small. The constitution of every new government took a very long time. One who knows history knows that it sometimes took weeks to form a government. The president had to deal with all political parties and so on. And at the end of the time of Mr. Bruening, the situation was very much confused, and many people considered that we should get out of this difficult situation only by reform in some way of the Constitution, giving it a stronger government. During the time I was Chancellor, we consulted two times with the Reichstag President and tried to get a better majority. We failed. We didn't get it.

Q. When you say "we", do you mean the political party in which you had membership?

A. No. I mean, I took the Chancellorship quite apart from the political parties. That was the idea. The idea of the Reich Minister in forming the government was not to have a party government, but to have a government of independent men. Now then, we first appealed to the German people to elect a new Reichstag and so the second time we got a better result. For instance, we took between forty and fifty seats of the National Socialists. We couldn't get a majority, and then it has been clear that it was of no use to rest on the results of the Reichstag at that time, and at the beginning of November or at the beginning of December I presented my solution to the President and then went along the organization of von Schleicher who in some way was the originator of my government. Von Schleicher and myself and the Field Marshal, between them there was a long conversation of what to do. In that conversation I put down as my position this: I said, "There is no use to dissolve the Reichstag at this time, the third time. We must go ahead. We must try to change, to modify, the Constitution in the way we intended to do and for that time, say, about three or four months, send the Reichstag people home and then put a new constitution before them or, before the national assembly." Hindenburg, as you know, was very severe to his oath made to the Constitution as President of the Reich, and he always had declined to act against his oath, certainly as he was a man of very great responsibility. But this time he was of my opinion. He said, "Yes, I see there is no other way, and it is a necessity to the state to act and to see that the government should come out of this mess and I am ready to do so." Then von Schleicher put down his opinion. He said, "We do not need to go that way. It is not necessary. I see another way. I shall be able to split the National Socialist Party in two and then we can form a majority of the present Reichstag and you need not depart from your oath and take up all these difficulties of the way before you that I am now to propose." We talked it over and at the end of it von Hindenburg said, "I am sorry. I don't believe in your proposal, Herr von Schleicher, because I don't think you can speak of the party." Then we are again where we are now.

INTERROGATIONS

So he decided himself for the proposition of von Papen and he gave the order to me to form a new government on behalf of that.

Q. On behalf of what?

A. On behalf of that proposal. Then I went home and called two or three friends of the government who were near to me, Herr von Eltz, and Guertner, the Minister of Justice, and told them the proposal. They said, "Well, we are quite ready to go with you. We share your opinion. We think it is the only way we can get to normal conditions." But you know that Herr von Schleicher since the last week goes around and says, "It is quite impossible that you take a new government. There will be civil war." I was astonished because Herr von Schleicher and I had been very close and he had never spoken a word to me about that. I said, "I am very much surprised. I didn't know anything about that." Yes, he told all of us that, too, "We should not in any way consent to a new government under your leadership. It would mean civil war and disturb public order in every way."

I said, "Well, that is a new situation. I must stop negotiations with you and call the whole cabinet tomorrow morning." I did it. The next morning the cabinet went together and I told them about our negotiations with the president. Then I repeated that von Eltz and Guertner told me last night that Herr von Schleicher was very anxious not to go that way, he feared there might be great difficulties in the country, and I begged von Schleicher to express his opinion about it. Herr von Schleicher then arose and said, "Well, we have thought it over in the War Ministry and I have with me Colonel Ott", who later has been Ambassador to Japan. He on his honor made a war plan under the conditions if there should be uprising whether the army would be strong enough to protect the railway communications and have order in the country. This study showed us that if there was a general strike and unrest in the country, we can't do it with the force available. We made Colonel Ott come in and he made a long conversation before the cabinet about that and at the end of it I arose and said, "Well, I see it is quite another condition. In yesterday's conversation with the President of the Reichstag no word has been said about that and I must go for the support of the president." So I did. I went to see Hindenburg and I told him about it. The old man was as much surprised as I was myself. Then he rose and said to me, "Well, you may perhaps think me a feeble man, but I am too old to see my own Fatherland in a civil war. Then as bad as this is, I must decide myself to charge Herr von Schleicher to take the chancellorship and to try to go his way." So he did.

Then, as you know, Herr von Schleicher became Chancellor. He tried to split the National Socialist Party and he failed. And then at the end of January, two months later, he came to see the Reich President and told him that he was sorry that his plan didn't work, that he failed, and he bid the president to give him the same power and the same orders as he did to me on the 2d of December. Whereupon the President said, "No, I trusted and I had confidence in Herr Papen to do it. I can't do it as you say. We must go the only way that is possible and to see that the biggest party comes into power."

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Were you present during that conversation between von Schleicher and von Hindenburg?

A. No.

Q. How do you know about it?

A. Hindenburg told me.

Q. Very well.

A. And then he charged me—he made me account and charged me to form a government with Hitler. So I did it.

Q. That is very interesting, but didn't you have some conversations with the Hitler people before you were charged with forming a new government by von Hindenburg the last time in January?

A. I had several conversations with the Hitler people, certainly. When I was Chancellor I tried twice to get him into my government. I offered him the post of the Vice Chancellor twice. Twice we tried to get him in, and the second time in August when I tried to get him in, as you know, he always wanted to be Chancellor, I said to him—

Q. You are talking about Hitler when you say "him"?

A. Yes. I said to him, "The Reich President won't make you Chancellor now, because he doesn't know you enough. He has not sufficient confidence in you, but I am sure if you collaborate with him a certain time, say, a couple of months and he knows you and he knows your political ideas, then there will not be the slightest difficulty to make you Chancellor and I for myself will give you my word of honor that if that moment comes, I will quit this post as quickly as possible and get you in power then."

Q. To keep the record a little more clear, when did you first meet Hitler?

A. I think I first met him during my chancellorship—possibly '32. I never met him before.

Q. Do you recall the circumstances of your meeting with Hitler?

A. I think I met him with Herr von Alvensleben when he was connected with him and he knew me too.

Q. What did you talk about at that time?

A. We talked about the possibility of going together, I mean, of reforming. I probably told him about my idea, why I had taken over the Chancellorship and what we should do to get out of the mess. As far as I remember we talked about the possibility of my government and the idea of my government, what I wanted to do, what Hindenburg wanted to do. Then as I told you we tried to get him in.

Q. What did he say?

A. He always said he would come in, but only with the whole power.

Q. What do you mean by "the whole power"?

A. Take over the Chancellorship.

Q. What did you say?

A. I said, "No."

Q. When did you next talk to him, Mr. von Papen?

A. Twice during my government I offered him officially, always after the elections, to get him in.

Q. I see, but when do you remember as being the next time that you talked to him after that June meeting?

A. I don't remember the time of the first election of the Reichstag. It might be after the first election to the Reichstag then.

Q. Did you have other conversations with the associates of Hitler during that time?

A. I remember I have seen once in the chancellery Goering and Helldorf, who was later Police President in Berlin.

Q. Was there anyone else of his associates with whom you talked during that time?

A. No.

Q. Do you remember your next conversation with either Hitler or any of his people?

A. My next conversation—I think after the second election of the Reichstag we failed. Then he was hostile. We had no conversations whatever.

Q. When did you next see him and talk to him?

A. The conversation took place on the 6th of January in the house of Herr von Schroeder.*

Q. Who else was present besides you and Hitler?

A. None of my people but some of his men. I don't remember who it was.

Q. Von Schroeder?

A. Yes. I spent Christmas at home in the conservatory and then I wanted to go back to Berlin to get my whole household back so I was on the trip to go to Berlin in the first days of January when I got a call to meet him on this trip to Berlin.

Q. Who called you?

A. One of his men. Not he personally, but one of his men.

Q. And who suggested the place where you would meet?

A. He. I didn't know Schroeder.

Q. You didn't know him?

A. Perhaps I knew him but not intimately, certainly not enough to propose to have a conversation in his house. I think the Hitler

*Von Schroeder's account of this meeting, which he states took place on January 4, 1933, is published in vol. II, pp. 922-924.

INTERROGATIONS

people proposed it and I said, "Yes, I am ready." In that conversation which has been grossly misrepresented by the press and publicity I repeated to him the same idea I had before that he should enter the government as the Vice Chancellor, Vice Chancellor to Schleicher, and to see that he became Chancellor later on in winning the confidence of the Reich President, and I promised him to do my best to talk again with Schleicher that we may make an arrangement with him. That was also about lunch time when we had that conversation, and I went back to my hotel and wrote a letter to Schleicher about the conversation immediately after. But as I see the whole story now it seems to me that Schleicher had a certain interest to misrepresent that conversation with Hitler before he got my letter and before anything could be done, because I did not go straight to Berlin. I went from Cologne to see my mother who lived in Dusseldorf and I stayed there for a few days, and then to my great surprise I saw in the paper a great make-up about that conversation. Later when I came to Berlin I understood that Schleicher saw the old Marshal, the Reich President, and told him that I had made a foul play against Hitler and that the Marshal shouldn't see me anymore. When I came to Berlin, I immediately went to see Hindenburg and told him about everything and that it was a great lie. I didn't move a finger. I did not do anything against the interests of Schleicher, and I think probably it was the idea of Schleicher that I had too much the confidence of the President or he perhaps believed it would hamper his own activities and he wanted me away from the President. So he tried and asked the President not to receive me anymore, but old Hindenburg was very frank and open towards me about that. And I said, "I can't understand why." Well, there was a time when these negotiations between Schleicher and the Hitler people went on.

Q. What did von Hindenburg say to you that day? You didn't finish that. You told von Hindenburg, as I understand you, that Schleicher had misrepresented the facts of the conversation with Hitler and von Schroeder?

A. He said he believed that it was misrepresented and the President understood the instigation of the Schleicher people had misrepresented it.

Q. Did you tell von Hindenburg that it was a misrepresentation?

A. Certainly, I did.

Q. Proceed please.

A. Then you remember came the date of the elections of Lippe with the effect to give the Hitler party new power. In the meantime Herr von Schleicher failed, as you know, in his effort to split the party and Hitler realized to get the party together. During all that time I had no conversation anymore with Schleicher or with Hindenburg up until the time that Hindenburg asked me whether I would act as a Homo Regus to form a new government.

Q. About when was that if you can just recall?

A. A couple days before the 30th of January.

Q. What did you say?

A. I said, "Yes, I will". We didn't see any other way then.

Q. Between the first of January and the 15th of January you only saw von Hindenburg twice, is that so?

A. I saw him after my return to Berlin. We had been living door to door. The garden of my house had a little door that went to his garden and it may be I saw him or not. I cannot say. Anyhow, we didn't have any political conversations.

Q. Didn't you have any talks with him about the situation? It was very delicate and very acute, was it not?

A. No. At that time I didn't even know about the negotiations of Schleicher with the party. I didn't know about it and I didn't know about the failure.

Q. Wasn't that known in the political circles?

A. Perhaps. Maybe yes.

Q. Didn't you know that? In the position that you occupied, didn't you hear those stories that were going around? How could you fail to hear them? The political people all knew about that at that time, did they not?

A. What time are you talking of?

Q. I am talking of those days in January when you say Schleicher failed to achieve his purpose with the Nazi Party.

A. Yes. It may be. Certainly I would have known that, if they had been expressed. I don't remember, but I did not know anything about the idea of Schleicher to go on with the government. I didn't know that.

Q. You were talking it over, I assume, with your associates, were you not?

A. Well, who do you call my own associates?

Q. Who do you call your own political associates at that time?

A. The people of my old government.

Q. Who were they?

A. Guertner and Eltz.

Q. What about Meissner? Didn't you talk to Meissner about it at that time?

A. Maybe.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Lammers?

A. Lammers, I didn't know up until the day he was appointed to his post by the new party.

Q. How about Oskar von Hindenburg?

A. Yes. Probably I met him several times.

Q. He was a friend of yours, wasn't he?

A. Yes.

Q. Of some long standing? You were quite old friends?

A. I wouldn't say friends.

Q. Acquaintances? Well-established acquaintances?

A. Well, yes.

Q. Didn't you see him quite frequently in those days?

A. I don't think—no, not in those days. He has been—Oskar Hindenburg is a very cautious man.

Q. Wasn't he quite helpful in your dealings with the old Marshal?

A. My dealings with the old Marshal, when I had a conviction of my own, I had been man enough to tell my conviction to the Marshal himself. I didn't need Oskar von Hindenburg for that reason.

Q. I am not disputing that, but nevertheless, I think you and I understand each other when I say that since you were a well-established acquaintance of his son, it certainly was helpful to you to have him there to talk with and to discuss your problems because he must have been seeing his father quite frequently.

A. Certainly.

Q. And the old Marshal relied on his son to some extent?

A. He had probably a certain influence upon his father, but I must say that much more than I had been acquainted with Oskar von Hindenburg, Schleicher has been. He was his man.

Q. I am not asking about Schleicher. The old Marshal was very stubborn about his views, was he not?

A. Yes.

Q. And wasn't it quite a job sometimes to get him to see things as you thought he should see them?

A. Yes, but I had not so much difficulty with him because we were of the same trend of thinking.

Q. How old was he then?

A. I think eighty-six.

Q. He was getting pretty feeble, wasn't he?

A. Not then. I think that he was well off up to the midst of '33, when he began to suffer.

Excerpts from Testimony of Franz von Papen, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 3 September 1945, 1430-1650, by Mr. Thomas Dodd. Also present: R. R. Kerry, Reporter.

How Hitler Became Chancellor of the Reich

Q. [In English] Mr. von Papen, we were discussing at noon-time the events of January 1933. Let me ask you this question and maybe we can get started. Isn't it a fact that Field Marshal von Hindenburg was very much opposed to the idea of having Hitler become Chancellor of the Reich?

A. [In English] Yes, certainly. He refused. We tried to get Hitler into the government and he refused.

Q. When did you first try?

A. After the first election of the Reichstag under my chancellorship. He was not opposed to take his government, but to make him the Chancellor. That he was opposed to, but then between the 2d of December and the end of January very much had changed. Schleicher, who tried to split the party, had failed completely, and the result of that failure was certainly to strengthen the National Socialists. And then there was the outcome of the second election, small as they were, but they were taken as a sign that the party was always growing bigger and bigger; so that if at the end of January he wanted to repeat the order he gave me on the 2d, that is to say to form a new government and to reform the constitution, the risk was certainly much bigger then because of the growth of the National Socialists. That was the difference between the two dates.

Q. I have the impression from what you have said that von Hindenburg was always opposed to Hitler. He didn't think that he was the kind of man that should be heading up the government, isn't that so?

A. Yes.

Q. And therefore it must be that someone or more than one person in conversation with him urged him at the proper time to change his mind.

A. Maybe. It is quite possible—

Q. Didn't you think that he should take Hitler on January 30? What did you think about it?

A. Well, when he charged me to form that government, I talked it over, talked over the situation, and I must confess I did not see that outcome. At the end of January the risk was much greater, and Schleicher said to me that there would be civil war and revolution and uproar in the country; and since he had grown up these two months in the country, if we wanted or not to have him at the top of the government, there was no other way. All we could do was to limit him with as many safeguards as would be possible, and that we tried to do. Then you will remember that in forming this government I was made President and Goering the very important post of Interior. That was the only condition of the Nazis, and we couldn't prevent that, but at that time we thought it would be possible for me as the President of the Prussian Government to get in and stop him eventually. Apart from that the members of the government were the same as my government, trustful men Hindenburg knew and I knew and we had confidence in them. The only new one was von Blomberg, who as a special wish of Hindenburg took the place of War Minister. I remember that after having formed the government and going through the new election of the 6th of March, I went around to all the party leaders of—what do you call it, aristocracy? All those except the leftists.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Conservatives—not in the narrow sense but as a general term as opposed to the Nazis.

A. Conservatives. I went around to all of them and said to them that we had been obliged to form this government. It was a very hard and difficult experience. I said it was an experiment which we were going into to form in this election a counterweight. I told them we can't stay with all these old parties. You remember at the last election of the last Reichstag, 32 parties went up as candidates. I said that can't go any further. As a counterweight against Hitler, we have to get all together and put in the ranks new and younger people that will appeal to the masses because at that time the old parties were all directed and all governed by more or less old people. But the result of my endeavors was that Blomberg said to me to let them keep their old doctrines and their old people, that the people wouldn't understand it. He said, "We must stay with our old problems in our old ways." And so I failed to get them together. I am sure that if the meaning of the time had been known, if we could have seen in the future, they would have been all too ready to leave their old doctrines and form a new great party as a counterpart of Hitler's.

Q. It is fair to say, is it not, that whatever your reasons were in January of 1933, you did feel that Hitler should be taken into the Government as Chancellor?

A. Yes.

Excerpts from Testimony of Franz von Papen, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 19 September 1945, 1030-1200, by Mr. Thomas Dodd. Also present: Bernard Reymon, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair van Vleck, Reporter.

Papen's Doubts Concerning Hitler

A. [In English] I would like to discuss a few questions. The first was, whether I persuaded Hindenburg to take Hitler prior to the time Hindenburg separated himself from Schleicher. I am absolutely sure I did not because I know that I didn't separate Schleicher from Hindenburg. I had nothing against him. I can take an oath on that. People often think that if there is some change in high personalities, that there must be some intrigue behind it. People never know that some things go mostly straight without any intrigue and so I did nothing to remove Schleicher from his post. I have done nothing to remove Bruening from his post. You couldn't very well understand how Hindenburg changed his mind.

We didn't consider one fact, it seems to me. He couldn't go back on the order given to me on the first of December, and the situation having changed with the Nazi Party then, by the failure of Schleicher to get a split in the Party. Another reason is that the Reichstag didn't move at all. If the Reichstag wanted to prevent Hitler's coming into power, they could have formed a majority for von Schleicher to keep him in office. I asked you the last time what solution you would have suggested. I said with these facts, quite evidently Hindenburg understood there was no other way and there was no necessity for me to convince him of that. Then you asked me about when I got my first doubts about the situation. Of course, my political creed is manifest. I have made hundreds of speeches, and parts of them are published, and everybody knew what I was thinking about and that is true as to the main facts of the Hitler doctrine. It was my first hope to create as much security as possible around this new government. I had hoped, as a Vice-Chancellor, that I might have a chance to work with him and for him, but in no time at all did he let me do anything. He never was away one day and there was no deputy work to do anyway. I had no department as Vice-Chancellor. I could do things which were discussed in the session of the cabinet and so on, but no more. Certainly, I had many opportunities to make opposition to him at that time. For instance, I remember when we changed our flag. I tried very hard to convince von Blomberg that it was impossible to do so. The second time that I remember, Hitler wanted to change Herr Hammerstein and replace him with a better Party man by the name of von Reichenau. I opposed that very much, but I must say that Herr von Blomberg, the War Minister at that time, had been already so much enveloped into the arms of Hitler that he opposed me. He knew that Marshal Hindenburg didn't want to have von Reichenau. He considered him much too young and inexperienced for this post, and von Blomberg went and asked for Hammerstein's dismissal to be replaced by von Reichenau.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. When would you place this incident that you haye just talked about in time?

A. I think it was in the summer of '34. The non-fulfillment of the Concordat, after it had been signed, with the consent of Hitler—he treated it just as a scrap of paper and I couldn't do anything. Then there was the persecution of the churches and the Jews at the same time. That was late in '33 and '34. Then we come to the question of the second revolution, when I made that speech in Marburg. I didn't tell you that when I came back to Berlin after that speech and heard that Goebbels had forbidden the publication of that speech in the German papers, that was the first time I gave my resignation to Hitler. Then he tried to keep me back and said, "Well, I will straighten it out. You see, it was not right for Goebbels not to give permission to publish it." These discussions between Hitler and Goebbels, if there were any, went on until the 30th of June. So the question of my dismissal was not decided then.

Papen's Part in Hitler's Rise to Power

Q. Are you familiar with the publication called "Das Deutsche Fuehrer Lexikon"?

A. It may be that I have seen it.

Q. Do you know what it is?

A. It is the "Who's Who".

Q. You know it was put out each year in Germany after the Nazis came to power, wasn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Had you ever seen the edition of 1934 and 1935?

A. No.

Q. Then you don't know how it describes you there?

A. No.

Q. Have you ever heard that it says that your political activities made possible the rise of Hitler to power?

A. No, I haven't.

Q. You are not familiar with that?

A. I am sorry, I haven't read it yet. That to me is somewhat strange because, so far as I know, the Party never said a word about my political activities that helped them to get into power. Everywhere they succeeded by their own power and by their own skill.

Q. So you were really more or less an innocent bystander in all of these goings-on in January of 1933, is that it?

A. A bystander for what?

Q. You weren't involved very much. The Hitler people left you out and you were consulting with von Hindenburg, but you weren't promoting the interest of the Hitler people at all?

A. As I told you, when I got the conviction that Schleicher had failed, with the splitting of the party, and Hindenburg had not the intention to go any other way—I mean the way he told me on the 2d of December—then there was no other way out. May I just say this: in our parliamentary life, the taking in of a Party growing stronger every day is the ordinary way, but keeping the Party out is the extraordinary way and so why shouldn't we try? I mean as I told you, the program of Hitler had some good points in our eyes and the people who adhered to his Party came from all walks of life, not all bad elements. May I remind you of this: I remember in July or August when I was sitting in my home as Chancellor of Germany, in '32, when Mr. Schacht came to see me. He is a very intelligent man and it was in the presence of my wife. I have never forgotten it. He said to me, "Give up your place. Give it to Hitler. He is the only man who can save Germany." I remember it. He meant by that to say that I was not the only man believing that the experiment could be made.

Removal of Social Democrats from Power in Prussia

Q. After you became the Reichskommissar for Prussia, you proceeded promptly to depose a lot of these people who had been opposed to the Nazis?

A. It wasn't because they were opposed to the Nazis.

Q. Well, you did depose them, nevertheless, didn't you?

A. I did depose them, yes.

Q. Tell us your reason.

A. One day after I came back from the Lausanne Conference, Herr von Schleicher came to see me and said that he was in possession of very interesting news from the Ministry of Interior of Prussia. He probably had a confidant there. The news was telling that the Social Democrats, then in power in Prussia, were dealing very intimately with the Communists and so it would be necessary to remove the Socialist government in Prussia. I don't remember the particulars, but the material was there and it was shown to the President of the Reich, von Hindenburg, and the idea of Schleicher was to remove the Socialist government there and institute a Reichskommissar. As I couldn't fulfill this duty, as a Chancellor having much more to do than I could, we agreed to take Herr Bracht, a man of the Center Party, a well-known man, a very good administrator, and he accepted and took it. Then I think it was the 20th of July in '32 the government was removed.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Before we go any further into that subject, that was an illegal act, was it not?

A. No, certainly not.

Q. Didn't the Supreme Court say that it was?

A. It had been treated by the Supreme Court of Leipzig later on because it had been fought by the Social Democrats, but it was not illegal because the Reich President had signed the act on account of his possibility to sign an emergency decree.

Q. But the effect of it was to remove from places of prominence and importance, the democratic forces in Prussia?

A. You mustn't mix up the Social Democrats at that time with the general democratic forces. We had no desire to remove democratic forces anywhere, but the situation was not so simple as you perhaps may think it.

Q. It aroused a lot of feeling among the so-called democratic forces in Germany at the time?

A. No, not the democratic forces in Germany. It aroused feeling in the single states. They were anxious that we might do the same thing with them and incorporate them in the Reich. That was the main reason for the anxiety, not any feeling about the democracy.

Q. Didn't it further affect the Nazi Party's relations with the Centrists?

A. In Prussia things were quite different than in the Reich. In Prussia the Center Party had dealt with the Social Democrats since about ten years, I may say, since the war was over. As I told you, I have very often tried to get a coalition between the Center Party and the other parties, the middle parties of the Reich center, but they never wanted it. They were too closely connected with the Social Democrats and they always had dealings with the Social Democrats. The dealings were like this: the Social Democrats, as reigning in Prussia, got two posts here, or three posts there, and the Center Party got one over here. So they made dealings all the time and we considered that not a very good idea for the ruling of the country. But there was another difficulty perhaps you wouldn't understand as a foreigner. The Reich had nothing to say in the interior things of the whole administration of the country. It was all Prussia and the Ministry of Interior of the Reich had nothing to do with it at all. So it was when the police matters, the Prussian police ruled the country, and even before my own home, the Chancellory, Prussian police were posted. So if, for instance, it were true that the Social Democrats had to deal with the Communists, then one good day I might have been arrested by the policemen and the Reich Chancellory put away. It is difficult to understand this situation, I imagine.

Q. A little later on the National Socialists tried to effect an agreement with the Centrists, did they not?

A. In Prussia?

Q. In the Reichstag. You had some difficulties. Do you remember the vote?

A. They were all against me, if you call that a coalition in that instance.

Q. The reason for that was that you hadn't gone far enough for the Nazis and had gone too far for the Centrists, isn't that so?

A. Yes.

Hitler's Conferences with von Hindenburg, 1932

A. I know that twice during my Chancellorship, Hitler had audiences with Hindenburg.

Q. I am thinking of the first one, the one that took place shortly after this overwhelming vote in the Reichstag and the dissolution of the Reichstag. Do you recall that Hitler had an audience with von Hindenburg about that time?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you present at that meeting?

A. No. I was not present. I was not present at any discussion between Hindenburg and Hitler himself.

Q. You must know about what took place there that day?

A. Yes.

Q. What happened?

A. The idea was to get Hitler into the government as he wanted to be Chancellor. Hindenburg refused.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. He got a very cold reception from von Hindenburg?

A. I think he did.

Q. When was the next time that he was received by von Hindenburg?

A. After the second election.

Q. At that time the Nazis had lost considerably in the voting?

A. We got about 40 seats, yes.

Q. Were you present when that next audience was held?

A. Personally, no.

Q. What happened that day?

A. I think he had several audiences, two or three, I think.

Q. Hadn't you suggested to Hitler that he seek a second audience with von Hindenburg after the election and after the National Socialists had lost considerably, didn't you suggest to Hitler that he again see von Hindenburg?

A. It may be that has been suggested by me.

Q. Why did you make that suggestion then?

A. In my desire to take him in the government.

Q. The National Socialists were not as strong as they had been before the election?

A. They were not strong. For myself, I saw it a better chance, having them weakened, now to take them in. I had many reasons to think that I could succeed.

Q. Hitler refused?

A. He refused flatly, yes.

Q. About when was that?

A. It would be in September, I think.

Q. 1932?

A. '32. Yes.

Reasons for Papen's Resignation from Chancellorship

Q. It was in November of '32 that you resigned as the Chancellor, is that so?

A. Yes.

Q. I wish you would tell us a little bit about the events leading up to your resignation. How did it come about, just what happened?

A. After we had failed to get the Nazis into the government, and we couldn't form any majority in the Reichstag, it was obvious that I should offer my dismissal to Hindenburg.

Q. And von Schleicher suggested that perhaps it would be better if you resigned, is that not so?

A. Yes.

Q. And he told that to von Hindenburg, didn't he?

A. Yes.

Q. And isn't that when you began to have your difficulties with von Schleicher? Up to then you had been his protege, more or less?

A. Yes.

Q. From that time on, you and von Schleicher had trouble?

A. From the day of that discussion, from the second I may say, never before. I didn't want to make any trouble in any way. I wanted only to have success in our work and I thought it better that we would go together for a certain while.

Q. I think you will agree that the events of the time of von Schleicher taking over the Chancellory, down to January 1933, would cause one to suspect that somebody was undermining von Schleicher with von Hindenburg.

A. Yes.

Q. Who do you suppose was doing it?

A. I have only a guess—no facts.

Q. What is your present guess?

A. I mean what I heard here, that Meissner had a hand in that.

Q. Meissner was a friend of yours?

A. No.

Q. Didn't you often talk with him and Oskar von Hindenburg during these days, between November, when von Schleicher took over and January '33?

A. I don't think so. No.

Q. You didn't really?

A. No. It has been told that he has been in peculiar difficulties, and that perhaps the Nazis have thought about that and helped him out and he was thankful to them and, therefore, he tried to straighten out the alliance between the Nazis and Hindenburg. That may be.

Papen's Desire for Nazis in the Government

A. I didn't in any way influence Oskar von Hindenburg to influence his father to take the Nazis into the government.

Q. But you had become convinced yourself that they had to be taken in?

A. Yes. I had.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Von Schleicher wasn't convinced?

A. He certainly was not.

Q. The old Marshal von Hindenburg wasn't convinced?

A. I don't know the feeling of von Hindenburg in this question of days. He hadn't been convinced up to January—

Q. He didn't want the "Austrian Corporal" as the Chancellor in those days?

A. Certainly not.

Q. You were about the only one of recent prominence who was convinced then, is that so?

A. As I told you, I had been convinced all the time that the best thing was to take the Party in.

Q. You were working for that purpose then, from November on to January, is that a fair statement to make?

A. No. That is wrong to say that I worked for that purpose. I gave Schleicher credit to go his way and to do what he wanted. I had no idea to oppose him in any way or to separate him from the Marshal.

Undermining and Dismissal of Schleicher

Q. I'm not saying that you told him, but I say you certainly had known that that story (that Schleicher was planning the Potsdam putsch) was told the old Marshal about von Schleicher, hadn't you?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever tell the old Marshal that it was not true?

A. I never went into the story. I only heard it in these days and I couldn't, as an old officer who had served for twenty-five years in uniform, charge von Schleicher with making a revolution against the Marshal without having any fundamental news. How could I?

Q. I should think not. I should think you would have been quite disturbed when you first heard of it.

A. Certainly I was disturbed by any such possibility.

Q. Didn't you go to the Marshal and talk with him about it?

A. No. If I hear a rumor—

Q. This was more than a rumor, this was the straw that broke the camel's back with the old Field Marshal, wasn't it? Is that not actually what caused the dismissal of von Schleicher, what really precipitated the rise of Hitler?

A. I can't tell you. I have never talked about that with von Hindenburg. One man who must know, perhaps, is von Blomberg because Herr von Blomberg was a man of the choice of Hindenburg, who put him at the head of the Army, the post of War Minister. When he arrived he was a General. When he arrived he came to see me at my home and I told him to be careful that Schleicher didn't make any difficulties for him. Then he went to see Hindenburg and he knew everybody in the Ministry. He must have known whether there was any reason to believe that Schleicher was planning a putsch or not. Then he must have said it to Hindenburg.

Q. Hindenburg had always had confidence in von Schleicher?

A. He certainly had, yes.

Q. Someone of very persuasive power must have told him that story about the putsch, to change his mind about von Schleicher, someone with great influence?

A. It may be, but please don't underestimate the change in the Marshal's mind that went on on the 3d of December.

Papen's Opposition to the Nazi Doctrine

Q. By the way, did you at any time ever accept the fundamental principles of the National Socialist Party?

A. No.

Q. None of them?

Q. No. None of them.

Q. For example, the Fuehrer Principle, did you accept that?

A. No.

Q. How did you feel about the Nurnberg laws?

A. Very badly, of course.

Q. What did you think of Hitler's "Lebensraum doctrine"?

A. I fought it all my life through. If you would be kind enough to read all the speeches I made, even when I was an Ambassador to Turkey and even during the war, I considered this always the worst of policies.

Papen's Sponsoring of Seyss-Inquart in Austria

Q. How do you feel about Seyss-Inquart now, looking back on him?

A. I am sorry. For me he has been a very great deception.

Q. Did you suggest him to Hitler?

A. I suggested him. Yes. He is my invention because he was a friend of these young people, Keppler and all these men. They considered him as a sort of conservative man who was a good Catholic, a practicing Catholic, and he would certainly not do anything wrong that way, so I advised Hitler to take him, and Hitler that day when I was over there at Salzburg with Schuschnig-nigg didn't know him. He asked me, "Is he a National Socialist?" I did everything to get him accepted.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Had you had any conversations with Inquart? Did Inquart know that you were going to suggest him?

A. When I saw in what way he behaved after the occupation of Austria, I made a cut and never had a word with him.

Q. I mean before you suggested his name to Hitler, did you have some conversations with Seyss-Inquart in which you told him that you would suggest him?

A. Certainly I did.

Q. He knew that you were going to do it?

A. Yes.

Q. Were there any commitments made to him, any political commitments?

A. No. Only for the task he had been chosen for, he should be the liaison.

Q. I mean was he promised a Reichministry?

A. No, not then.

Q. Not then?

A. Hitler didn't know him. He was opposed to take him.

Excerpts from Testimony of Franz von Papen, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 19 September 1945, 1420-1610, by Mr. Thomas Dodd. Also present: Capt. Jesse F. Landrum, Reporter; Bernard Reymon, Interpreter.

Reasons for Papen's Disappointment in Seyss-Inquart

Q. [In English] Towards the end of the morning session we had at the very end touched briefly on Seyss-Inquart and you said that he had been something of a disappointment to you. I wish you would tell a little about that. Why did he disappoint you?

A. As I told you, I had no men in Vienna, especially men who were friends of my Embassy. I had known him better; I considered him my representative; he had been a lawyer and was very intelligent, educated, and as I thought him very good, I considered him very apt to make such a post of confidence between the two governments. After all, Hitler accepted him and later on he was a member of the leading people in Austria after the Anschluss. He, in my mind, should have acted otherwise.

Q. Otherwise than what?

A. The whole policy after the Anschluss in my mind was a very wrong one.

Q. Can you be more specific about it? What, particularly, did you think was wrong about the program after the Anschluss?

A. For instance, the treatment of the churches, the Jews. Everything could have been given a settlement. As I always had told Hitler, he should give Austria the character of a federal state, just as Bavaria had. The last act I could do for Austria before I left was the day when Hitler talked it over after the parade; at the review I arranged the interview between Innitzer and Hitler that day. This interview was very outspoken between these two men—everything could have been arranged in the sense I hoped for, but it wasn't.

Religious Questions as Obstacles to Anschluss.

Q. Were you present at the conversations in Berchtesgaden on February 12, 1938?*

A. Yes. I was present.

Q. The question of the churches and the religious affairs was raised that day, was it not?

A. Certainly.

Q. What was said about it?

A. I was not present at the personal interview between Schuschnigg and Hitler.

Q. You were not present?

A. No. They were alone. I was in another room. But as it was going on, the whole day and night, intermittently I came and heard.

Q. There were some discussions about the religious situation in Austria?

A. I am sure that Schuschnigg raised that question.

Q. Why was it raised and what was said about it?

A. Well, in Germany everything was going wrong with the churches; persecutions were going on. It was one of the main points in my mind why Schuschnigg was opposed to Anschluss. I am quite sure that it was the main point of discussion of that day.

Q. Well, my question is, who arranged the agenda for the conversations, who first suggested that the question of the religion be discussed between Schuschnigg and Hitler. Did you?

A. I can't remember that; there were lots of questions raised that day about policy of the two states, and I couldn't honestly say whether he raised it or not.

Q. Weren't you somewhat fearful yourself?

A. I have all the time been fearful myself. I have worked all these four years in Vienna to get this point clear.

*See documents 2995-PS, vol. V, p. 709; 2461-PS, vol. V, p. 206; 2464-PS, vol. V, p. 208; 1544-PS, vol. IV, p. 103; 1780-PS (entries for 11, 13 and 14 Feb.), vol. IV, p. 360.

INTERROGATIONS

Papen's Knowledge of the Rearmament Program

Q. When was the first time you became aware of the rearmament program in Germany?

A. In the cabinet sessions where I was present in the years of 1933 and 1934 up to June 1934, the question has been discussed as to how we could relieve the unemployment by rearmament.

Q. The answer to it is that you were rearming from 1932 or 1933 right on; isn't it so that it was stepped up in later years?

A. We knew it, certainly. Rearmament—I wanted us to have an equal standing with the other nations from that point of view.

Q. Wasn't there a time when it was perfectly clear to you, as an old soldier, that the rearmament had reached a point where war was practically a certainty? You must have known that; you were from the Army and had a military education.

A. That is never a decision of the soldier, Mr. Dodd. You cannot be strong and peaceful. But when, for instance, in the middle of August 1939, I came to Germany on account of the death of my mother who died on the 15th of August, I went to Berchtesgaden. I was told that Ribbentrop was going to Moscow the next day to make a treaty with the Russians. Then I was, I may say, surprised with joy, because in my mind that was the surest way to prevent any war; so I never considered the question of rearmament a reason to go to war.

Q. Wait a minute. By that time Czechoslovakia had been completely swallowed up, hadn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Are you trying to tell me in August 1939 you were surprised at the rearmament preparations?

A. Not of the rearmament preparations.

Q. Of the war preparations?

A. But you mean that rearmament means war and I say it wouldn't mean war in itself. It is not so, if it is in wise hands.

Q. I think you know what I mean.

A. And after the experience we had—

Q. I don't think you are giving me any direct answer to that question. I think you have quibbled about it.

A. I realized the extent of the rearmament program when I was in Austria, since it was clear to me that those hopes achieved by Hitler, the Anschluss of Austria, the solution of the Sudetenland problem, all these could only be achieved by Hitler through a preparation brought by military force. It goes without saying that such military power may be used both for peaceful means and for military purposes.

Hitler: "The Greatest Crook I Have Ever Seen"

Q. When did you first form definite conclusions about Hitler as a personality?

A. Well, I thought of it perhaps like a majority of the German people thought.

Q. What I want you to answer is this: What is your present opinion of Hitler as a personality?

A. That he was the greatest crook I have ever seen in my life.

Q. When did you make up your mind about that?

A. Only after I have known the facts under which he started to go to war.

Q. When did you know the facts about him? I want to know about when you made up your mind.

A. Some of these facts I have only known here in prison after I had read the book of Mr. Henderson, the British Ambassador in Berlin.

Q. When would you say that you really made up your mind?

A. When he started to war.

Q. 1939?

A. Yes. 1939.

Q. After that, you didn't think very much of him?

A. No.

Excerpts from Testimony of Franz von Papen, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 8 October 1945, 1815-2200, by Mr. Thomas J. Dodd. Also present: 1st Lt. Joachim Stenzel, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Court Reporter.

Papen Soothes Distrust of Hitler

Q. [In English] Do you recall Schuschnigg's telling you that he didn't think he could rely on the word of Hitler? Did he ever say that to you?

A. [In English] Perhaps, yes.

Q. You know full well he said it. He said it many times to you.

A. He certainly was too polite to put it that way.

Q. How would he put it?

A. Perhaps in a diplomatic way.

Q. How would you say that in a diplomatic way?

A. He had some doubts about Hitler.

Q. All right, but you knew what he meant.

A. Everybody had. I had myself.

Q. Were you urging him that Hitler was the kind of man upon whom he could rely?

A. Under certain conditions, yes.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You had doubts about it yourself. Why did you do that?

A. I knew him. I knew his idea was to swallow Austria over.

Q. I know, but you just said that you had your own doubts about Hitler's word, and at the time, I suppose, that Schuschnigg had his doubts. You know full well that you were constantly telling Schuschnigg that he could rely on Hitler.

A. As I say, under certain conditions; and I would explain to you what I mean by "under certain conditions."

Q. All right.

A. When it was on my mind to work for Anschluss in an evolutionary way, there were several factors very important for that. The first factor was Mussolini, and the second factor was France. Both were opposed to the Anschluss and both perhaps willing to grant a certain type of Anschluss if certain assurances, certainties were given; and it had always been in my mind, as Hitler always laid great strength upon the opinion of Mussolini, for instance, that if an agreement was made about Austria, and it had been sponsored by Mussolini, then it may have been kept by Hitler. It depended very much on the exterior situation, you see, the whole question.

First Steps Toward Anschluss

Q. I have always understood you to say that you were for Anschluss, although you have modified it some tonight and said it was a refinement of Anschluss.

A. I told you from the beginning my idea about it.

Q. Schuschnigg certainly didn't have any such idea, did he?

A. I mean in the end, as you know about our agreement of '36.* He didn't deny that Austria was a German country, and that one day we should come together. He never denied it.

Q. You don't mean that the agreement of 1936 was a formal acknowledgment for preparation for Anschluss, do you?

A. Certainly, it was the first step.

Q. What provision in it, particularly? You know that agreement pretty well.

A. Well, I know that in the first phrases it is said that Austria is a German country. Isn't that so?

Q. Was a German-speaking state with a German population.

A. Yes.

Q. But it doesn't say anything about eventual union with Germany.

A. No, but when you put that in a treaty, that is to say that we belong in some way together. We had a history of a thousand years together. That can't be denied.

*See document TC-22, vol. VIII, p. 369.

Q. Don't you remember that Schuschnigg specifically said at the time that you signed that agreement that he wasn't going to allow Austria to become any state of Germany?

A. I don't remember that he said it, but I certainly know that he didn't want the Anschluss at that time. That is absolutely true.

Q. Do you know whether it was in 1936 that Hitler made a radio speech in which he said, "Germany neither intends or wishes to interfere in the internal affairs of Austria?" Do you remember that speech?*

A. Yes.

Q. And that Germany didn't wish to annex Austria, or to conclude an Anschluss?

A. I think he probably didn't say that he didn't want to annex it.

Q. You don't think he said that?

A. I don't think so, because he always said he wanted the Anschluss.

Q. I am quoting that speech word for word: "Germany neither intends or wishes to interfere in the internal affairs of Austria, to annex Austria, or to conclude an Anschluss."

A. What date did he say this?

Q. That was a radio speech by Hitler on June 11, 1936.

A. After our agreement?

Q. About that time.

A. The eleventh, that is the same date.

Q. Do you remember this speech?

A. No, but I remember that after the conversation of Berchtesgaden on the 12th of February, he made a speech at the Reichstag a few days later, where he spoke of Schuschnigg in very amiable terms and was very satisfied with that agreement. That I remember.

Q. I want to get back a minute. Didn't you and Schuschnigg discuss the agenda of the conversations at Berchtesgaden before he went up there?

A. No. It was clear; that is, all the questions concerning our agreements.

Q. You received a decoration after the Anschluss was effected, did you not?

A. Hitler sent me this.

Q. The Party's Golden Party Emblem?

A. The Golden Party Emblem.

Q. Do you remember the citation that accompanied it?

A. No.

*An excerpt from this speech, which Hitler delivered to the Reichstag on 21 May 1935, is published as document TC-26, vol. VIII, p. 376.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Do you remember it said that it was in appreciation of your cooperation in respect to the Anschluss?

A. No.

Q. Did you feel that you had helped to bring about that Anschluss of March 1938?

A. I felt, Mr. Dodd, that I had prepared the way to a peaceful Anschluss. This Anschluss was absolutely against my ideals, but when it was accomplished without loss of blood, I certainly was glad.

Q. Well, is it fair to say that you contributed very substantially to the Anschluss of March 1938? Is that a fair statement?

A. You should say I paved the way to the Anschluss, but towards another conclusion, not towards that conclusion whereby the army came in and so on, and certainly not towards the conclusion of the treatment of Austria later on.

The German-Austrian Accord of July 11, 1936

Q. Now, what was the importance of that accord, the real importance of it?*

A. You can see the way our relations went after the murder of Dollfuss; everything was broken off. It was so-called "Abgesperrt." Do you understand what I mean? No German could travel into Austria, and everything was cut off, and it was an awful state of affairs. Certainly this agreement was a great step to better these things, and to get normal relations between Austria and the Reich.

Q. Would you say that that was the real importance of the accord?

A. Yes. In the first instance, it was to restore peace between the countries, and to give a certain basis to certain progress.

Q. Wasn't there an unpublished agreement?

A. About the press and so on, I suppose.

Q. Whatever it was about, was there an unpublished agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. That was the really important thing, was it not?

A. Yes.

Q. What did that provide?

A. Peace, press peace, and exchange of commerce.

*Agreement between the German Government and the Federal State of Austria, July 11, 1936. See documents TC-22, vol. VIII, p. 369; 2994-PS, vol. V, p. 703.

Q. This was the unpublished agreement about which we are now talking, this so-called "Gentlemen's Agreement."*

A. Yes, it has been written. It was published by the papers.

Q. That's right. You were talking about commerce and peace and the press; what else? Was there any other provision in that unpublished agreement?

A. I don't think so.

Q. You don't remember any? What was it that Hitler liked best about it?

A. I think he was glad that there was peace by the press. He didn't trouble much about commerce.

Q. Wasn't it about the Nazis who were in jail in Austria?

A. Yes, they should be released.

Q. That was the big thing about that unpublished agreement, wasn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Wasn't that the real important promise?

A. That was the reason for the nonpublication.

Q. That is really the thing that you accomplished in that accord, is it not? That is the thing that really delighted Hitler?

A. Oh, I think so, yes; because it always was the main point of attack of the Party against him—

Q. And that is why you got the promotion, and that was the bacon that you really brought home, was it not?

A. No, no, I don't—I think he considered the whole thing a progress, and he considered it a good piece of work.

Papen's Version of His Position in Austria

Q. Is there anything else you'd like to say?

A. Well, my situation was very simple. I had a mission to fulfill, and I tried to fulfill it in the way I thought best for my country and for Austria; and in this way I acted between zealous troops, between all these different extreme lines, right and left; and the fact that I got on peacefully for 4 years against all the pressure of people in Austria and people in Germany, all the Austrian refugees who made Hitler hot every day—it had been something, I think, to hold that strong position for four years long.

Q. Oh, I don't deny that you did very well for your position.

A. And if he had let me go on smoothly, I am sure—I remember I obliged Hitler to recall his Gauleiter, his biggest man, Leopold, at the end of '37, on account of the revolutionary ideas that these people had.

*See documents 1760-PS, vol. IV, pp. 305, 320-321; 2994-PS, vol. V, pp. 703, 705.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You know, they were thinking of assassinating you at one time, were they not?

A. I know. That illustrates to you the idea of my position. I mean, if I held this position about four years and held Hitler back from an armed invasion of Austria.

Q. I don't mean to minimize the gravity of even the thought of assassinating, but it wasn't so much you as it was any high German official; isn't that what they had in mind?

A. No, it wasn't my person, because if I was put aside, it was as a reason to march in.

Excerpts from Testimony of Franz von Papen, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 12 October 1945, 1035-1215, by Mr. Thomas J. Dodd. Also present: 1st Lt. Joachim Stenzel, Interpreter; S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Court Reporter.

Papen's Opinion of Keitel

Q. [In English] You think Keitel was willing to do whatever Hitler wanted done?

A. [In English] Absolutely.

Q. Did you hear him at any time counsel Hitler against armed intervention?

A. No.

Q. Did you ever hear him advise marching in?

A. No, I can't say that.

Q. What was your general impression of Keitel's attitude that day (11 March 1938) ?

A. That the man didn't say anything. I always had the impression that he regarded Hitler as a specimen of God or something like that; and if he got an order, he'd say, "Oh, that is all right. If he says shoot those hundred people, then I would shoot them."

Nazi Misuse of Hindenburg's Testament with Papen's Acquiescence

Q. Now, I would like to talk about Hindenburg's testament.

A. In the spring of '34 when it was clear that Hindenburg's health was declining rapidly, my idea, and the idea of all people, was how it was going to be with the successor of Hindenburg. There should be two possibilities. One possibility was that Hitler would like to take over this post of head of state, and unite in one hand, head of state and head of government. That was, in my mind and, I think, in the minds of many people, the worst he could do, because it was an unusual act to do it. The second way was that he would substitute one of his lieutenants, say Goering or someone else, to be Reich President. That was neither good nor satisfying. So I came to the conclusion that the best thing we could do would be to convince him to restore a monarchy.

Q. Convince whom?

A. Hitler. And I must say that I had various talks with him about that subject earlier, and he was inclined to do it. He said to me then, "Once I have brought order and prosperity back to Germany, I am quite ready to restore the monarchy." I suggested to him to take one of the princes of the sons of the Crown Prince in his staff, that he might know him better; that he should become more acquainted with the idea; and he didn't decline that. He said that he was willing to do it, but then his whole sentiment about restoring the monarchy, which would have been the safest way for us, changed. It was when he came back from his trip to Italy. Probably it was the impression that he had by the reception from King Emanuel, I don't know. He treated him probably very badly, very cool, or I don't know why or what. Anyway, he was hurt in his feelings, and I heard from other people who talked with him that after this trip he said, "No, no monarchy at all." But it is a fact that previously that was a possibility.

So I suggested to Hindenburg to make an open testament that Hitler, if he had the idea to restore—first to give him the idea of Hindenburg—Hindenburg's words still had some value—and then to give him a possibility against his Party people that he could choose a monarchy. He could say, "This is the will of Hindenburg," in order to facilitate the situation for him; and in this idea, I suggested that, and I made a draft of the testament but you know the result of it. Hindenburg made it, signed it, and when after his death he came to Neudeck, Prussia, it was handed to me by Oskar Hindenburg, and I handed it to Hitler.

Q. Was that an authentic document that you handed to Hitler, do you think?

A. I think it was his testament.

Q. Do you recall the text of it?

A. The text, no, but the text in substance was that normal order and justice and everything in Germany should be restored as quickly as possible, and to give Germany a stable government, it would be wise to restore a monarchy.

Q. It went pretty far in praising Hitler, did it not?

A. Certainly not.

Q. Are you sure of that?

A. I mean, certainly he did not want to make a bad impression and he should say something about Hitler's doings. It probably was that he had done much for the unification. It might be in the text of that testament that Hitler made complete Volksgemeinschaft of the German Reich in getting away from this class hatred, and so on, but it would be words or praise about that.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Well, there were words of praise. The last part of it was very praising to Hitler. That is my recollection of it.

A. I am glad you know it. I haven't it any more in mind.

Q. That has always puzzled me to some extent. That has always been perplexing to me, how Hindenburg, in July, or whenever he wrote this—

A. It was written about—let me see, in March I think.

Q. It is dated May 11th 1934.

A. Oh, May 11th.

Q. And certainly, Hitler had disclosed to some extent on the 30th of June a side of his personality that you couldn't accept, isn't that so?

A. Yes.

Q. Hindenburg must have known of that, as well as you did. It is very difficult therefore, to reconcile your delivery of this testament of Hindenburg's to Hitler after the blood purge of June 30th, and just before the plebiscite, so-called, or the election; the question being whether or not Hitler should combine the office of President with that of Chancellor; and that was used very effectively, you will recall, by the National Socialists in that brief but intensive campaign. Do you understand what I am saying?

A. Yes.

Q. How do you reconcile that?

A. Well, I think the necessity to convince Hitler not to accept that position as head of the state persisted. I mean, I couldn't change the text of the testament that had been made on the 11th of May. I had to deliver it. I must deliver it. How could I change it?

Q. Well, I don't know that you could have changed it after Hindenburg died, but I think you must have had ample opportunity to change it before he died, and between the blood purge and his death.

A. No, Mr. Dodd, I told you several times, that between the 30th of June and the death of Hindenburg, I was not allowed to approach him.

Q. Now with respect to this political testament of Hindenburg's, I want to get this straightened out. It is my recollection, and I think I am correct, that it was dated May 11th 1934. Do you remember the date of it?

A. No, I don't remember.

Q. Would that be the approximate date?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember the last part said, "My Chancellor, Adolf Hitler and his movement have taken a decisive stride of historical importance toward a great goal of leading the German people to inner unity regardless of differences of rank and class."

A. Yes.

Q. "I know much remains to be done, and from the bottom of my heart I wish that the act of National regeneration and unification may be followed by an act of reconciliation to unite the whole German Fatherland. I part from my German people in the firm hope that what I wished for in 1919, and led in gradual process to January 30, 1933, will ripen to full fruition, and the completion of the historical mission of our people."

Now, that is the last paragraph. Was that actually written or dictated by Hindenburg? Was that an authentic expression of Hindenburg's?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you there when he wrote it?

A. No. I wasn't present.

Q. But you did read it on more than one occasion after he delivered it to you?

A. No. I made a draft for him. And he may have corrected it, but then it was closed when I got it later, after his death.

Q. You know, there has always been a very widespread belief that the original Hindenburg will named either the Kaiser or a member of the Kaiser's family as his successor, and you as Chancellor.

A. No. The first may be right, the second not. I mean, he suggested that one of the sons or I don't know what, whether he suggested any person, but he suggested the reinstatement of the monarchy.

Q. An Associated Press dispatch of August 15th 1934, out of Germany, quoted parts of this last will and testament of Hindenburg. Those parts which I have read to you.

A. They have been published?

Q. Yes. They have; and no part that was ever published made any reference to the restoration of the monarchy in any form.

A. That is what I mean. The special reason for which the testament has been made, that was never revealed to the public.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Was it in there when you handed it to Hitler—that is what I want to know?

A. Yes. I think so; it must have been.

Q. You ought to know.

A. That was the testament that he signed.

Q. It wasn't altered at all when it was in your hands?

A. I received it from Hindenburg, and I gave it over to Hitler.

Q. You gave it to Hitler on the 15th of August?

A. I can't remember the date, but it may be right.

Q. Shortly before you left for Vienna.

A. Yes.

Q. Now you know it was very effectively used by the National Socialists in that brief but intensive campaign, preceding the plebiscite, the voting being "Yes" or "No" on the question of whether or not Hitler was to combine the office of President with that of Chancellor. Do you remember that plebiscite, and do you remember the campaign?

A. Yes.

Q. And you must remember that this last will and testament was used widely by the National Socialists to support their wishes in that plebiscite, isn't that so?

A. I can't remember because I don't think that the last wish and—I mean the praise of Hitler contained in the testament certainly was an item for them to show.

Q. That is what I mean.

A. But there was no word in the testament that Hitler should be his successor or should be the head of state.

Q. I don't say that, but that part that I read to you was used anyway. My point is that knowing the contents of the last will of Hindenburg, as you knew it, because you had prepared a draft for him, after it had been turned over to you by his son and you delivered it to Hitler, why didn't you make some objection, or demand that the whole will and testament be made public?

A. Well, I could have done only—how should I do it? I mean the President wouldn't accept it, and Hitler wouldn't do it. At that time everything was—

Q. All right, let me ask you this then: Do you now recall any passage in Hindenburg's testament, as you received it from the hands of his son, praising Hitler?

A. I must say I haven't read that.

Q. Well, you haven't read it in some years, but it was rather an important document.

A. I mean, what I remember from the original draft, and I have no doubt that it was original then—in the testament of 11 May, there were certain remarks about Hitler, because it was psychologically necessary to say something about him, if you want to use him to make a monarchy. You couldn't say to him that all he did himself has been bad and miserable to the German public. I mean that wouldn't—I understand it from the psychological point of view. If Hindenburg wanted to make an impression upon him and have him fulfill his last wish, then he must have done it; he must do it in a general way.

Q. Don't you think it is not at all impossible that the National Socialists struck out of that will what they wanted to take of it, and substituted other statements?

A. That may certainly be, that they took out what they wanted. That is absolute—I have not the slightest doubt about it. They never mentioned this idea of instituting the monarchy.

Q. You know that was in there?

A. Absolutely. That was the reason why it was written.

Q. And was there anything in the testament about who should be the Chancellor if the monarchy should be restored?

A. No. That was a pure question of government. He couldn't put that in a government testament. There certainly was no mention of my person. I certainly would have declined it.

Q. I wonder why you ever did turn that paper over to Hitler?

A. Once it was written it should be delivered. I mean, even if I had the idea that it wouldn't be of any use then—

Q. It wouldn't bother me so much if it had been turned over before the 30th of June. I could understand your doing it then, but after what happened on the 30th of June and the days immediately following it, I have often wondered why you ever turned it over.

A. Well, as a testament, and you are asked to give it to the owner—it had to be done. What else could you do with a testament? If Hindenburg certainly could retain it, could keep it, it would have been in his power. He was actually just a—Hindenburg was the trustee for delivering it.

Q. Oskar Hindenburg?

A. Yes. Oskar Hindenburg. He had the power to retain it or deliver it.

Q. You can see the difficulty that presents itself to people who now examine the whole record. You were a figure of great importance in Germany. You were a man of great experience in the internal political affairs of that country. You knew then that this was a, what we would describe as a "gangster" kind of government, that had seized your native land; and here was the last testament of one of the last great figures of Germany. It was misused obviously in that campaign by people whom you already knew to be not trustworthy; and we wonder why you ever did turn it over to them.

INTERROGATIONS

A. I can only say that I suggested it to Hindenburg, drafted it, and it was a good idea to serve my people and my country, and—and if things had unfortunately changed after the death of Hindenburg, and all power was taken by Hitler, what could we do? I say that Oskar Hindenburg could publish the testament perhaps.

Q. But he wouldn't get it printed?

A. He wouldn't get it printed.

Q. Certainly, by early fall of 1934, you knew that the National Socialists had misused that document.

A. Fall, yes.

Q. You knew it then, and that was another substantial piece of evidence, if you needed more, that the Nazis were not trustworthy, that they were dishonest; that they would conceal or alter and misuse what was really almost a sacred paper, insofar as you were concerned; is that a fact?

A. Yes.

Q. So I come back to a question I asked you some weeks ago: How could you continue to serve such a government, even as a Minister to Austria?

A. I can only repeat what I said very often. I felt a very great responsibility myself about that government, and it would have been much more easy to go back to my home. Many people had emigrated. I think that the worst you can do as a patriot is to emigrate, and to leave your country. I tried to find out in what capacity and where I could help, even if it was a little bit, and I knew that I exercised a certain influence upon Hitler at that time.

Q. You still thought you had some influence?

A. Yes.

Q. Even though he had very nearly taken your life a few weeks before?

A. It is not quite clear, Mr. Dodd, whether he wanted to do that, and I always doubted it. I think it was more the idea of his gang of Gestapo people—of Himmler and those people—I don't think it originated of his own will that I was arrested and should be put on the death roll. I don't think so at that time.

Q. Well, are you now telling me that you think the outrages of June 30th were not directly traceable to Hitler's orders and directions?

A. Certainly, lots of them, but not all.

Q. I understand your statements this morning to be that you doubt that Hitler really directed the killing of all these people, and particularly didn't have any knowledge that you were to be executed. I find that very hard to accept. You were a prominent figure; you had the confidence of von Hindenburg; you were the Vice-Chancellor of the country; how can you say today that you doubt that Hitler knew that you were on the list to be executed?

A. Because that seems very reasonable to me.

Q. Well, it seems very unreasonable to me.

A. Just on account of the position I had. If he killed me, then he might be aware that even Hindenburg, in his state of ill health, would rise and give the order to the army to put an end to all this.

Excerpts from Testimony of Franz von Papen, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 12 October 1945, 1440-1610, by Mr. Thomas J. Dodd. Also present: S/Sgt. Horace M. Levy, Court Reporter.

Papen's Justification of His Service Under the Nazis

Q. [In English] Will you continue, Herr von Papen?

A. [In English] Up to the Munich Agreement, the world, the English and British Government, Mr. Chamberlain, the French Government, and Mussolini, they all believed that it was possible to come then to an understanding, the main wishes of Germany fulfilled, and to have a reasonable and peaceful government established after all in Germany. If these people could hope so, why shouldn't a good patriot and a man, in the first place, who is responsible for all these goings-on have the same hopes, and the same convictions and the same fervent hope that it may become so? That explains my doing.

Q. My greatest difficulty has been that, as I understand the history of the times, as I indicated this morning, maybe I don't see this thing in its proper perspective, but I have been asking myself since I first talked to you, "Why didn't Herr von Papen, at some time between '34 and '44 when you returned from Turkey—why it was that you didn't disavow these people?"

A. There was no other way. You told me about Mr. Thyssen who emigrated, say, after the 30th of June, or the 4th of February. If I had emigrated to Switzerland, and had published a book against Hitler with all I knew about him, then perhaps people would say today, "He has been a courageous man. He took the consequences. He went out and published a book." I confess—I can't do it. I didn't do it. I think to emigrate and to leave your country is the worst thing you could do. I went the other way and the other way is, certainly in my mind, not less courageous, for all I had to stand in these years. Really, living in Switzerland would have been much more comfortable to me.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. By the way, do you know what the repercussions were of Thyssen's departure? Did it create quite a sensation in the higher circles in Germany?

A. Yes. I remember that all his property was seized then by Goering.

Q. Yes. I know that. Goering even went down and took the little paintings and things out of his house, as I remember it. That is in his book. I haven't read it in some time, but I did read it, and I recall that he complained in there that Goering took some of the paintings.

A. Ribbentrop took the house of his son-in-law.

Q. I think so. I think his son-in-law was killed, was he not? Isn't that the one who died in Dachau?

A. No, but he died in a concentration camp.

Papen's Opinion of Hess's Mental Condition

Q. Another thing. It isn't very important for the purposes here, but I think you saw Hess the other day.*

A. Yes. I was asked whether he could recognize me.

Q. What do you think? Do you think his mind is really gone?

A. It seems to be. I found him very much changed, and his face too. I haven't known him intimately. I have seen him several times in my life; but that he didn't recognize any one of these people, and the way he spoke must have been a matter of insanity, I think.

Q. You know what naturally occurs to us—is he pretending or not?

A. Why should he?

Q. I don't know.

A. As I understand his story, he was convinced that the war was a crime and he tried to get a peace, to negotiate a peace, so he shouldn't have any reason to play the idiot now.

Papen's View of His Responsibility for the War

Q. You have told me that, in your opinion, Hitler was one of the greatest crooks in history.

A. After all that turned out, yes.

Q. I mean your present opinion?

A. Yes.

Q. I wonder what you think, or if you care to express the

*The reference is to Hess's confrontation and questioning by former associates, including von Papen. See pp. 1160-1170 of this volume.

thought—Don't you feel that there are men now living, whoever they are, who were responsible to some extent for not only the war but the events which led up to it, and some of the things that took place during it? Do you understand what I mean? Do you think there are such men?

A. I am one of them, certainly, in the big sense of your question. I had a part in his rising to power. I had a part in creating his government, and certainly I have a responsibility about all the historical developments thereafter.

Q. I understand what you said about that, but do you feel that you are responsible to an extent that justifies your being declared to be responsible? What would you say to that? I don't want to mislead you in any respect. I am not trying to frame a cautious question.

A. I know, but it should be to history to decide, to weigh the motives and the acts. Certainly, in human life, there is a saying, "Nothing succeeds like success," and in that way I certainly had a great failure. I think, in the judgment of God, the motives have a better place and the ideas one had, and He doesn't judge so much of the success or of the effect of it, but the ideas or the motives.

Q. Well, as between men, knowing the history of your own career better than anyone else, and knowing the part, whatever it was, that you may have played, and knowing the results of all the play, what is your judgment on yourself?

A. I don't think, Mr. Dodd, that from the human point of view, you could say, or could the German people say that I am guilty of all this disaster.

Q. I don't say guilty of all of it, but I mean, guilty of some of it, or a part of it.

A. If you say responsible for it, I must say responsible for all of it, because when I stepped in with the Hitler government, then I had the responsibility. When I stepped out later on, the second, third acts in my life being in Vienna and Turkey, it was only done, as I explained to you in the will to do some good, and to get Germany out of this mess, to help her; and I am quite sure that in the opinion of most of the Germans, this is recognized.

Q. Well, as I see it, from having talked with you and having given some thought to it, I should suppose that the question of your responsibility would first center in whatever you feel you had to do with the helping of Hitler and his people to power, if that is the right terminology; is that a fair statement?

A. I mean, not the Hitler people. It has never been my design to have National Socialism in Germany. I wanted to have a normal life for Germany. I saw good points of the National Socialist program, the social points, the getting away from class hatred. One of the serious things in Germany was the growing of class hatred, as it was then, and getting away from that was a great relief to all of us, and it resulted in a great progress; so we were certain that we could fight Bolshevism. That has ever been his idea, his words. He fascinated the people with those words. Now, that was worthwhile to do, and I think it was legitimate and I was entitled to do it at that moment.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. All right. Then we come to the second phase, or I will call it the "second phase" for want of a better term, and I consider the time, dating from approximately June 30th 1934, to, let's say March of 1938. What do you say was your responsibility for what happened in that period? Do you feel you have any responsibility for anything that happened then?

A. No responsibility, Mr. Dodd, for the government of Hitler, because I was burdened with a special duty and a special task about Austria.

Q. But I consider Austria was a part of the—

A. Program.

Q. —program during that period of time.

A. Absolutely, and I was of the idea of Mr. Henderson, when he said there couldn't be peace in Germany, if Germany wasn't again united and prosperous again, and that is absolutely true, and in this way I took this job and I acted.

Q. Would you say that you feel any responsibility for assisting in the carrying-out of that part of the program, whatever the real value of it is?

A. Certainly, it was always my endeavor to assist in the reuniting of Germany and to give her, say, her equal sovereign rights and prosperity, and all that I strived for my life long. That certainly was part of my program.

Q. And besides the Austrian incident as a part of that program, do you feel that you have any responsibility for the—for example, for the cessation of civil rights?

A. No.

Q. You do not?

A. No, not one.

Q. Or the enactment of the Nurnberg laws, or any of the others?

A. No, certainly not.

XIII. ARTUR SEYSS-INQUART*

Excerpts from Testimony of Artur Seyss-Inquart, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 8 September 1945, 1415-1720, by Thomas J. Dodd. Also present: Nancy M. Shields, BCV, Reporter; Bernard Reymon, Interpreter.

Seyss-Inquart's views on Von Papen and His Part in the Anschluss

Q. How did you get along with von Papen, by the way?

A. Fairly well. I held him as a reasonable politician.

Q. He is a good politician, isn't he? A capable one?

A. I think he is a capable politician but within the Nazi system he could not carry out—he had no good name with the real Nazis.

Q. What do you mean by that?

A. He was not considered as a real Nazi, a 100 percent Nazi.

Q. How do you know that?

A. I was told that by the Nazis themselves. They always had a certain reserve with regard to him.

Q. I am interested to know how he was able to continue as ambassador first to Austria and then to Turkey if these big men in the Nazi Party had very grave doubts about him.

A. Probably Hitler thought that such a capable man as von Papen could render quite some service, whereas a good Nazi might spill much milk.

Q. What was von Papen's attitude towards the Nazis?

A. He was very reticent, but one could sense that he was not a real Nazi.

Q. He apparently was willing to work in their interests?

A. I think and believe that all he wished for was to work in the interests of the Reich.

Q. Or in the interests of von Papen?

(The witness shrugged.)

Q. What do you say to that?

A. Well, there are people who are ambitious and I can say very little about that.

Q. What is your judgment from your association with him?

A. I think that he had a sort of intuition to serve the Reich, coupled with a desire to play a personal part, in spite of the fact that he was so badly treated by the Nazis.

Q. When and where was he badly treated?

A. Well, those are simply surmises from their general attitude. They simply didn't take him in.

* See Document 3732-PS, Vol. VI, p. 539.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. He had to be in pretty close when he was in Austria as the ambassador in those days before the Anschluss?

A. They used him a great deal. I don't know whether they thought much of him.

Q. I understand you to say they never let him in and I understood you to mean by that, into their confidence?

A. Entire confidence, no.

Q. What I ask now is whether or not it is a fact that he had to be very much in their confidence during the days he was in Austria and the National Socialists were attempting to achieve an Anschluss?

A. Well, they didn't give it. I believe that the primary object of von Papen in Austria was not the Anschluss but the lessening of the tension which subsequently would have the result of bringing about the Anschluss.

Q. I don't understand that, because you know as well as I do, that one of the prime objectives of Hitler's policy was Anschluss with Germany at the time he sent von Papen to Austria as his Ambassador.

A. Well, I don't think that Hitler had any intention of Anschluss as far as von Papen was concerned. He had sent him to Austria with the chief objective of relaxing the terrible strain which was existing. Well, I would like you to understand that I am of the opinion—I was of the opinion and still am of the opinion—that if the tension between Germany and Austria could have been relaxed, then the Anschluss would have resulted by itself. This I do believe still today. I have made an outline about the question of the Anschluss, about 30 pages.*

XIV. CONSTANTIN VON NEURATH

*Excerpts from Testimony of Constantin von Neurath,
taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 1430-1645, 3 October 1945, by Major John J. Monigan, Jr., CAC. Also present: T/5 Gunter Kosse, Interpreter; T/4 James P.
Buck, Reporter.*

The Disarmament Question

Q. [In English] What was the problem in the disarmament treaty? What was to be accomplished by that?

A. [Principally in English] That was in the Versailles Treaty. Germany was obliged to disarm. We had disarmed. There was a * Document 3254-PS "Seyss-Inquart, The Austrian Question 1934-1938" (Vol. V, pp. 961-992).

disarmament commission in Germany. We had to disarm. In the Versailles Treaty there was one part saying that after the disarmament of Germany the other nations also had to disarm. Great Britain was disarmed, Italy was also in with not much left. It was only in France. France made from the beginning opposition against that disarmament because they used—well, there was a new technical expression, "potencia la guerre" [sic]. "We (France) have forty million inhabitants." Germany at that time had about seventy million. Therefore they said, "It cannot be done. We should have 100,000 and Germany 100,000," because there were more reserves in case of war. That was the meaning of the thing. Also, industry was bigger and better. That was the leading point on which we could not agree. England acted as intermediary. And so they came to Berlin twice when Mr. Eden was there, and between the two embassies there was continual correspondence, but such was the leading point on which we could not come to an agreement.

Q. At that time hadn't the rearmament program begun in Germany?

A. No, not then. No. It had only begun in '36—'35 or '36—after the reoccupation of the Rhineland. When the Rhineland was occupied it was a real bluff. There was nothing behind it. There was the 100,000 man army under the Versailles Treaty. The rearmament only began afterwards. In '36 it must have been.

Q. Did you feel it was impossible for the future of Germany in the early times in which you first took office, to carry on under the terms of the Versailles Treaty?

A. Oh, yes. Of course, yes. There was very few of the provisions left of the Versailles Treaty. Oh, there were some in reality I consider, the corridor of Poland, for instance, those naturally remained. Yes, one thing. The railways. The state railways were pawned for reparations by this agreement. The international organization of the Danube, the Rhine—there were those things, but they were not important.

Q. Wasn't it the purpose throughout the foreign policy to avoid the provisions of the Versailles Treaty either by negotiations or otherwise up until 1937?

A. No. You mean after?

Q. From the time when Hitler took office.

A. Yes, of course, and as I told you yesterday I went to Lucerne and it was settled—this question of reparations, and afterwards the equality question in '32, and there remained always the question of disarmament. It was my intention to settle those questions in order to clear the way in understanding this point. The others didn't care for it.

INTERROGATIONS

The Organization "Auslandsdeutsche"

Q. What was the problem of the organization for the Germans living abroad—Auslandsdeutsche?

A. It was a terrible thing for me as Foreign Minister. That was an organization entirely in the Party. The intention of it was to bring the colonies in the different states under one head, because as in Germany itself there were so many parties as heads, and that was the original intention. The first years I had a notion to deal with it because that organization was occupied with sailors only. Afterwards they began also to organize abroad in the German colonies, for instance Rome or elsewhere, to propagate propaganda and to make merely their own politics. I was in Rome until '30 as Ambassador. Until that time there was nothing to fear of that organization. I am sorry to say Hitler came into power in '33. Naturally it was very, very annoying to our representatives and ambassadors because they mixed in everything and every head of that organization thought he would be a better ambassador than the official ambassador and so on.

Q. What did they think they were going to accomplish by the foreign organization?

A. Well, the ideas were absolutely—the first thing was to get power in their hands. First they intended to have an office, and a big office, too. That was the first intention, to make themselves important. So far as I know, several of those representatives from abroad, they were mostly men who had either gone bankrupt or who had not any kind of work, or had no success in their business and so on. Mostly men who were morally not clean.

Rosenberg's "Confused" Ideas

Q. Well, Rosenberg had some ideas on that, too, didn't he?

A. Rosenberg's ideas were very confused — so confused — I would like to say something, but don't say I told it to you, because one day Hitler himself asked me to correct Rosenberg in his ideas—Rosenberg, who was the most well known representative of Nazism, and to send him to me, who was not a member of the party, well, it was ridiculous. But you see from that remark how he was judged himself. I hope I am never compelled to read his books.

Q. It is impossible to understand what he is talking about.

A. Yes. He always intended to become Foreign Minister. That was his first aim in '33. Also because I was much distrusted.

Why Hitler Made Ribbentrop Foreign Minister

Q. How did it happen that Ribbentrop finally got the job of Foreign Minister instead of someone else?

A. That's a question which has been put to me several times, and I can't answer it. I don't know. I can't understand it, especially because on the 14th of January [1938] when I asked Hitler to be relieved from my office he said to me, "But I will never make this Ribbentrop Foreign Minister." And forty days later he was in. Nobody can tell me how it would be. I can't understand it.

Q. He was seemingly unqualified for it.

A. Yes, quite. Totally, totally.

Q. There seemed to be some idea that Hitler thought that because he travelled around a lot he was a great diplomat.

A. Yes. I could only tell in a private conversation, because it is not important for this. But that question—everybody, or nearly everybody, has asked me the question, how Hitler who knew him, "How could he make him Foreign Minister?" I think the only explanation was that he was always saying, "Yes," to him, and he (Hitler) didn't like somebody to give him back-talk. I can't understand it. Hitler changed more and more every month until he became a tyrant.

The "Bureau Ribbentrop"

Q. What was the office which Ribbentrop had before he became Foreign Minister? How did that tie in?

A. His bureau was called "Bureau Ribbentrop." That was a very funny construction. When I heard of it, because it was quite secretive, it consisted of only two men—at the end about two hundred. He had all kinds of agents abroad. I think one of them was later Ambassador Abetz in Paris. He was one of them. Mostly the men were representatives of merchant firms before.

Q. Wasn't he in the express business, or something—Abetz?

A. No.

Q. Before he got in with Ribbentrop?

A. No. But there were all kinds of professions they had. I knew only one of them at all. They were all quite young men.

Q. They had not been in the foreign service?

A. No, they were not at all. They had nothing to do with the Foreign Office. It was more or less a private bureau of Ribbentrop, paid by Hitler. They had no title or anything. Later when

INTERROGATIONS

I was away a long time they all became ambassadors, but by title only.

Q. He took a group of his organization to London with him, didn't he?

A. Yes.

Q. This is along the same line we were talking about yesterday. A conversation you had with Mr. Bullitt on the 18th of May, 1936, concerning the Czechoslovakian matter, and in which you said that it was the policy of the German government to do nothing active in foreign affairs until the Rhineland—I have quoted here, "Until the Rhineland had been digested." Do you recall it?*

A. Yes.

Development of the German-Italian Alliance

Q. When did the alliance between Italy and Germany become fixed?

A. Would you like to hear the development of this?

Q. Yes.

A. Well, I may begin back in '33, because before I had very many difficulties, in Italy when I was Ambassador there. In '33 the relations between Italy and Germany were not good. The relations between Hitler and Mussolini were not good. Hitler aimed to come to better arrangements with Mussolini. In '34 he accepted an invitation of Mussolini to go to Venice. I accompanied him. The result of the meeting was not at all satisfactory. They didn't understand each other. Whether they had private conversation I don't know, for I wasn't there, but I had the impression that what everybody spoke passed each other. That was my impression. Their discussions didn't meet; they didn't understand each other. Then came the relations afterwards which were absolutely unexpected. Prime Minister of Austria, Dollfuss, was shot. That was in '34 or '35—without any notice. He was shot by Nazis and Dollfuss' wife was at that time staying with Mussolini when he was shot. So Mussolini was very angry against the Nazis. The relations were very bad. But later on they got together more and more, but only in '37 came the idea from Hitler's side to make an alliance with Italy. And I told you already yesterday that I was absolutely against it because I knew the Italians too well. I told that to Hitler and told him about their soldiers, but he answered me always with, "But Mussolini." And I said, "Yes, Mussolini. Mussolini is one man, and his people are not behind him. Officially, yes, they are always trying, but they are not persons to be trusted." That has been proven later on. He, Hitler, insisted, but during my time I did not give in and would not allow him to come to an alliance. Immediately when I left, Ribbentrop made it in '38. I always regarded an alliance with Italy as a "stone on our lake," as it was.

*See document L-150, vol. VII, p. 890.

Excerpts from Testimony of Constantin H. K. Freiherr von Neurath, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, on 4 October 1945, by Major John J. Monigan, Jr., CAC. Also present: Nancy M. Shields, BCV, Reporter; T/4 Gunter Kosse, Interpreter.

The Decree for Registration of Germans Living Abroad

Q. [In English] You recall that you are still under oath from last time?

A. [Principally in English] Yes, indeed. You asked me about the decree for the registration of Germans living abroad. (Referring to decree of February 3, 1938.)* I must say I am ashamed I did not say it at once, but have you still the text here?

Q. Yes.

A. Because I must say that it was done through my initiative and the reasons I will tell you.

The reason for that decree was that we, in Germany, had a law according to which, after ten years' absence from home uninterruptedly, German citizenship was revoked. Most of the Germans abroad—and we had millions as you know—did not know that law at all and certainly they came to the consulates asking for certificates of birth and passports, etc. When the ten years had passed, the consulates could not grant such certificates. In consequence, an incessant correspondence with the home office and very much trouble resulted. So, since many years before, I had been urging such a decree to form a register where Germans could be registered with all dates concerned and to put the consular offices in a position to give the certificates. For instance, if one wished to marry, he had to produce in foreign countries, a birth certificate, etc.

That was the original reason for the decree. By this register now, as it is formed by that decree, the consular offices get all the necessary data and they can grant certificates of birth and marriage and new passports, etc. That was the reason for the decree. It may be that afterwards the AO used the registers for propaganda but as I say, it was at my initiative that it was formed, and I only wished to explain it.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

Auslands-Organisation (Foreign Organization of the Nazi Party).

INTERROGATIONS

Relation of French-Soviet Pact to Rhineland Occupation

Q. Do you recall the French-Soviet pact in 1935?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall what the position of the Foreign Office was in regard to that pact and its effects on the Locarno pact?

A. Yes. With that pact, in reality, the Locarno pact was already broken, by the French-Soviet pact. It was broken by the French because the Russians were not members of the Locarno pact although at present they are; and another effect was that it reacted as to the decision of Hitler to re-arm. That was the indirect consequence.

Q. Was it the idea that there was just an agreement between two nations without the inclusion of the other signatories to the Locarno pact, that that, in itself, destroyed the effectiveness of the Locarno pact?

A. Yes, indeed. The fact that two nations agreed, in case of need, to assist each other, it was already violated.

Q. That was the basis for the argument of the German Foreign Office?

A. Yes.

Q. That was a position which you felt to be correct at that time?

A. Yes, and as far as I remember, the signatories of the Locarno pact were informed that we thought the pact was violated through that Franco-Russian pact.

Q. Actually, your government submitted a memorandum on 25 May 1935 setting forth in substance, that position?

A. It was sent. I remember that we sent such a thing.

Q. That was relating directly to the French-Soviet pact as a repudiation of Locarno?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember in February of 1936, there was a discussion between the French Ambassador, Francois-Poncet, and Hitler concerning the rapprochement between Germany and France?

A. In February, 1936? Conversations about—

Q. Concerning the general relationship between France and Germany, directed towards the idea that it was not necessary that France and Germany should be enemies.

A. Yes, yes.

Q. Actually, the interview between the French Ambassador and Hitler occurred on March 2 of the same year. Thereafter, there was a request by you, as Foreign Minister, to the French Ambassador, that the fact that the discussion had taken place should not be disclosed.

A. That I cannot remember. Wasn't it at that time that Hitler officially repeated the renunciation of Alsace-Lorraine?

Q. That came later. It was on March 6th, in his address to the Cabinet Meeting.

A. It was published afterwards.

Q. It was on the 6th of March; there was a Cabinet meeting and Hitler said he had decided to move the troops into the Rhineland.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember why it was that Hitler and you requested the French Ambassador not to disclose the meeting with Hitler?

A. The reason at that time I couldn't say.

Q. Do you know when it was decided to occupy the Rhineland?

A. Only a few days before. Very shortly before.

Q. How was that decision to move into the Rhineland reached?

A. Hitler gave the order to the members of the Reichswehr to prepare the march into the Rhineland, the disarmed zone.

Q. Was that decision reached after consultation among the Army people and representatives of your office—or how was it decided?

A. I knew it, yes, and I agreed, too, because that was also one of the consequences of the Franco-Soviet pact, because we had that demobilized zone—50 kilometres—and then already the Saar had come back to the Reich and there was a totally demobilized zone there and after the eventual menace of the collaboration between France and Russia, it was more or less a military point of view to have reoccupied that zone.

Q. Why was it determined to do it in that fashion by just moving the troops in, rather than by just a matter of discussion?

A. That would have been quite useless. You remember we always had these disarmament quarrels with France, and France naturally would never have agreed to it, and probably they would have occupied the Rhineland. So far as I remember, we at once notified the fact to the British Government and the French Government. Also, we notified them of the reasons why it was done.

Q. Actually, he had a Cabinet meeting with the heads of the army on the 6th of March; then there was a meeting of the Reichstag on the 7th.

A. I think the occupation must have been the 6th and the Cabinet meeting the 7th. I don't think it was discussed. The occupation orders were given to the military authorities by Hitler.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. I think it was the 6th, the same day as the meeting. The 7th there was a meeting of the Reichstag at noon, at which the Foreign Service people from the British Embassy and Belgium and so on, called at the Wilhelmstrasse office and you met them and gave them the memorandum.

A. Yes. I only had it in my mind that I had given the memorandum explaining the reasons.

Q. The substance of the memorandum, you remember, was that the military pact between France and Russia had resulted in a violation of Locarno.

A. Yes, but that is now nearly 14 years ago and it is difficult to have all those details in my mind, but I remember I gave them something and gave the explanation why. As a result of that pact, the Locarno agreement had no longer any significance and virtually ceased to exist and Germany, therefore, did not consider herself bound any longer by the Locarno pact and accordingly, in the interests of her right as a nation to protect its frontiers, and to preserve its means of defense, a general government was therefore restored once more, with full and unrestricted sovereignty of the Reich in the demobilized zone of the Rhineland.

Q. There was also some discussion as to whether the occupation of the Rhineland was symbolic or actual?

A. At the beginning it was purely symbolic. I think I told you it was a mere bluff, more or less.

Q. After the occupation, the other signatories to the Locarno pact, except Germany, on 19th March, drew up a proposal that the re-entry into the Rhineland was a violation of the Locarno pact?

A. Yes. They informed us, and we answered in a memorandum.

Q. In which the substance of the memorandum was that it was a request to submit the matter to the consideration of the international court?

A. Yes.

Q. And at the same time it was asked that there should be no more exploitation or sending troops into the Rhineland pending the determination of the matter?

A. Yes.

Q. And that both requests were refused?

A. Yes.

Q. What was the reason for this refusal?

A. To submit it to The Hague? As far as I remember, Hitler said, "No. I won't go to that International Court any more." After we had left the League of Nations, he had already done it before, and he did not accept the decisions of the Hague Court.

I can't remember whether we were still members of the League or not. At one time we had a representative there but I cannot say the date when we recalled him.

Q. Do you recall how the decision to refuse these considerations was reached? Was that after consultation or how?

A. In conversations?

Q. Yes. Between Hitler and you or how did it come about?

A. No, no. I cannot remember that date of our recalling our representative in The Hague, whether it was before or not I don't know. That is why I asked.

Q. I don't have a note of the time when your representative was withdrawn here but in any case he must have considered, as a separate proposition, whether he would accept these proposals or not, irrespective of whether the representative was there or not?

A. Of course, but he had already said that he did not want to have anybody meddle in his decisions.

Q. Now at that time was it apparent that the attitude of Hitler was such that he did not want to negotiate on such questions?

A. Hitler, you see, always intended to come to better terms with France and he therefore also gave the declaration that he did not think of re-entering Alsace-Lorraine. I think it must have been at that time when he declared that or immediately afterwards, to show that it was not an aggressive act but only an act to reconstitute the sovereignty.

Q. At that time, actually, the memorandum in which the diplomats were informed, carried such assurances that there was no further intention of occupying other territory?

A. Yes, certainly, but I remember it was expressly mentioned about Alsace-Lorraine, that we would not go beyond the frontiers laid down in the Versailles Treaty.

Q. You had a conversation with the British Ambassador, Sir Eric Phipps, after the 21st May speech and you gave him certain assurances that the territorial provisions of the Versailles Treaty, including the Rhineland demilitarization, was still considered to be in force?

A. Yes. Naturally I could give it clearer if I had any notes. I know the dates but I have not got anything. It is difficult after 12 years to remember all that you did.

Q. Particularly in this instance, with a matter of dates?

A. Yes, one day after the other.

Q. After the Soviet-French pact was made, was it then the intention of Germany to reoccupy the Rhineland?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Yes. It was afterwards. It was after that pact, I remember. That pact gave the impulse to reoccupy it.

Q. But even before that pact, it was a matter of concern to German foreign policy whether they would occupy or not?

A. Yes. It was generally viewed because it was a territory not under real sovereignty of the Reich if we could not have military posts in it.

Q. It has been suggested that the French-Soviet pact was merely an excuse physically to occupy the land, which could not have been justified on any treaty violation otherwise.

A. You mean that it was an excuse only?

Q. Yes. The decision to occupy the demilitarized zone was already a matter that had been determined, that it was a matter of conversation among the German government that it could not be accomplished by negotiations and therefore must be accomplished by the fact that it was impossible to justify the reoccupation unless there was some cause.

A. It has not been discussed before, the reoccupation, as long as there was no threat or fear of the collaboration of France and Russia; as long as it was open there was no reason to reoccupy the Rhineland except the general view that the territory was lacking sovereignty.

Q. The desirability of reoccupation was always present of course?

A. That existed always but it was not acute.

Q. And is it your opinion that if it had not been for the French-Soviet pact, that the reoccupation of the Rhineland demilitarized zone would not have occurred?

A. I could not say that. As it has been done—before that pact nobody did speak about reoccupation. It was not discussed at all or I would have discussed it with the French Ambassador and the British Ambassador, too, but it was not at all—Hitler did not have it in mind, or perhaps he had it in mind remotely, but it was not considered imminent or actually acute. The frontier was quite open to any certain invasion of the French. There was no defense at all. The 50 kilometers went nearly into Stuttgart but that was the impulse.

Q. It was no more than a vague idea at that time, until the pact made between France and the Soviet came into being?

A. No, no, no! As I say, the French-Soviet pact was the real impulse. Before that, we only had those 100,000 men. Afterwards it was done but only as a show-piece, without backing to prove it on paper.

Q. Now of course, prior to the reoccupation, the Army had drawn up plans to accomplish it upon the date decided?

A. Yes, I suppose so because it would be very bad general staff work if it had not been prepared.

Q. There was a plan which the army had and which had been prepared by General Von Blomberg dated the 2d May 1935 which outlined the military operations in which they would engage when that took place?*

A. For the reoccupation?

Q. Yes.

A. But that I don't know because these military operations were secret. I didn't know it.

Dispute Over Restoration of the Habsburgs

Q. Do you remember in February, 1937, a visit with Schuschnigg that you had?

A. With Schuschnigg? Yes. I was in Vienna.

Q. Do you remember on that occasion whether there was some discussion suggested by Schuschnigg concerning the possibility of the restoration of the Habsburgs?

A. Yes. Schuschnigg always played with the idea of taking back the Habsburgs but he had great opposition in his own cabinet against it. I remember that the return of the Habsburgs was a thing which did not directly touch us but it was not useful for Austrian relations after all that had happened with the Emperor Charles, as I remember.

Q. From the standpoint of the German Foreign Office, would it have made any difference whether the Habsburgs had been restored or not?

A. We foresaw still greater difficulties with Austria. I know, for instance, that the Austrian Foreign Minister Schmidt was absolutely against the coming back of the Habsburgs, and also the Austrian Minister of Defense.

Q. Did you indicate to Schuschnigg how such an action would be viewed from the standpoint of Germany?

A. Yes, I think so. I must have done. I certainly did it but I cannot tell you in detail. In general, I said to him, "Don't do that because it will make more difficulties in Austria, etc." because the Nazi movement had already grown enormously, and they did not like a monarchy, so they were against the coming back.

Q. It has been said that in that conversation you suggested to Schuschnigg that if they did restore the Habsburgs Germany would march.

*See document C-139, vol. VI, p. 951.

INTERROGATIONS

A. It may be that I said that, because it was the view of Hitler. It is quite possible that I said that.

German Justification for Reoccupation of the Rhineland

Q. Do you feel that you made a substantial contribution to releasing Germany from the Versailles Treaty?

A. Yes, through my work in Lausanne and afterwards the Equality Agreement in 1932. There was not much more left, except the reoccupation of the Rhineland.

Q. There is something I have difficulty in understanding and that is, the connection between the reoccupation of the Rhineland, which after all, was a provision of the Versailles Treaty, and—

A. It was in the Versailles Treaty.

Q. The relation of that to the Franco-Soviet pact and Locarno. If the reoccupation of the Rhineland was justified as not a violation of the Locarno pact because of the Franco-Soviet pact, it still was a violation of the Versailles Treaty was it not?

A. Yes. That was a violation of the Versailles Treaty but on the other hand the French did not fulfill their obligations with disarmament. These two points always come again.

Q. The position then, as to Versailles, and its application to the reoccupation and the Locarno pact, is that France had not lived up to certain obligations regarding disarmament at Versailles. Therefore, it was proper for Germany not to live up to its obligations on re-entering the Rhineland.

A. That was the only one left—that question about France not fulfilling their duties as to disarmament. We thought the disarmed zone was also devoid of any effect and did not exist any more as a justified fact.

Q. Actually, at that time, the most important things left of the Versailles Treaty which were matters of controversy at all, were the disarmament and the Rhineland occupation.

A. Yes. Those two points—disarmament and the reoccupation on the other side.

Excerpts from Testimony of Constantin von Neurath, taken in Nurnberg, Germany, 1445-1545, 8 October 1945, by Major John J. Monigan, Jr., CAC. Also present: Tec/4 R. R. Kerry, Reporter.

Promises to Uphold the Versailles Treaty

Q. [In English] I am going to talk again about that period in May 1935.

A. [Principally in English] May 1935, yes.

Q. We mentioned the meeting between you and the British Ambassador Phipps; do you recall that?

A. Yes, I recall.

Q. Well, the substance of the conversation with Mr. Phipps was that the—the main thought of it, was the Hitler speech of the 21st, and the discussion went along about the second point in Hitler's speech, in which he outlined the 13-point policy. It was regarding the Articles of Versailles, which still were to be considered in effect, and the theory of Hitler as explained by you was, "Germany will respect all provisions of the Treaty of Versailles, including the territorial provisions, and any revisions which will be rendered necessary in the course of time will be put into effect only by the method of peaceful understanding."

A. Yes, that was the line on which I always worked, but to be right, I couldn't remember. But I suppose it was so.

Pre-Anschluss Pressure on Schuschnigg

Q. Now, getting back again to your visit with Schuschnigg in Vienna—

A. Yes; I have thought about it since the last time. It came a little quick then. I have discussed with Schuschnigg the Anschluss question, and especially the position of Austria vis-a-vis its neighbors; and I said to him, "All the neighboring states who had occupied former Austro-Hungarian territories are hostile to the recall of the Habsburgs." Benes had said so officially. The Hungarians said so, because he tried to come to Budapest and he was refused. The Jugoslavian minister also said they would never allow a Habsburg to come back. And Mussolini had repeatedly said to me that at the moment a Habsburg would come back to Vienna, he would occupy the whole of Austria. And in that connection, I said, "Well, that would be a development through which Germany would be touched very much," with the Italians standing only 50 kilometers to Munich, probably to the Danube and in Innsbruck and Linz. So I said, "If it should develop that way, we also would march." That was the way I remembered it.

But a very funny thing was that at the end of this discussion of the Habsburg question certainly, Schuschnigg said to me, "Well, I will tell you quite confidentially, and I beg you not to mention it to anybody, but I never thought to recall the Habsburgs, but I must play that game for political reasons." I said, "Well, if you had said this to me before, we would have saved much time," because then the question was not acute. As to the secrecy of what he told me, I said, "I must say that to Hitler to avoid any impulsive action on his side," and he agreed to that. After that meeting in Vienna, the Habsburg question was out of discussion.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Now, at that same meeting, wasn't there some discussion concerning the position of the Austrian Nazis in the cabinet?

A. In the cabinet?

Q. In the Austrian Cabinet.

A. Not between myself and Schuschnigg. He always—he refused it, I know, but I think we didn't discuss it.

Q. You and he didn't?

A. I and Schuschnigg?

Q. Yes.

A. No; that was between the Party and Schuschnigg.

Q. You don't recall ever having represented to Schuschnigg that the Austrian Nazis should have representation in the cabinet?

A. To avoid any growing of the quarrel, to avoid it from becoming more acute, that was the standpoint. Hitler always asked that the Nazis should be represented in the Schuschnigg government more. I think at that time there was none, as far as I remember, outside of Seyss-Inquart. He was a Nazi, but I think he wasn't a member of the cabinet at that time. He became afterwards.

Q. Yes. At that time apparently Schuschnigg had constantly refused to permit them to be in his Cabinet?

A. Yes, he had refused it. Yes.

Q. And it was your idea that it would be better from his standpoint, in order to prevent further difficulty, to give them some representation?

A. Yes. It was dangerous from the standpoint of Schuschnigg at that time. That was also later on in 1938, after I had left office, I think; we mentioned it the last time Schuschnigg was invited to come to Berchtesgaden. That was a point of the discussion there. But only in 1938.

Q. Do you remember telling Schuschnigg that it was not your intention to have Anschluss with Austria?

A. Yes. I had discussed it especially with the Foreign Minister Schmidt. As I told you, my intentions were quite different, economically Anschluss, but politically not.

Q. Did Hitler always entertain the idea of political Anschluss?

A. Yes, he was against what I thought. He intended to have a full Anschluss.

Q. Had he had that view all along?

A. All along, from the beginning. Yes.

Excerpts of Testimony of Constantin von Neurath, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 12 November 1945, 1015-1210, by Major John J. Monigan, Jr., CAC. Also present: George Sakheim, Interpreter; Anne Daniels, Reporter.

Germany's Reasons for Leaving Disarmament Conference and League of Nations

Q. [In English] How was the decision made by the German Government to leave the disarmament conference in 1933?

A. [Principally in English] Why it was done?

Q. Yes.

A. In the summer of 1933, there were discussions all the time in the disarmament conference in Geneva about the amount of the army, and especially with the French Government.

You know that by the League of Nations—I don't know quite how to express it—it was asserted that the German Government had disarmed totally. Now the question was—according to one clause of the Versailles Treaty—that the other nations signatories to the Treaty should disarm too.

In 1933, during the whole summer, there was a discussion in the disarmament conference about the number of contingents in the prospective armies, but it was impossible to come to an agreement. That was the reason why we left the disarmament conference.

Q. You mean you felt that the talks which occurred in the summer of 1933 were not progressing to the conclusion that the other nations, as well as Germany, would disarm, so you therefore left the conference?

A. Yes. I mean, because we expected to come to an agreement, but it was impossible because France refused to disarm to the satisfaction—

Q. You mean as to the number of troops?

A. Yes, troops. I was myself, I think in September of 1933—I had been in Geneva personally to try to see whether we couldn't come to an agreement. I discussed it especially with the United States representative, who was Mr. Davis, I think.

Q. And had it not already been decided in 1933 to establish a program of rearmament for political and economic reasons in Germany?

A. No. In 1933?

Q. Yes.

(The question was given in German by the Interpreter).

A. No. As I say, we always tried to come to an agreement. In this case Hitler had not decided as yet to re-arm. We only wished to come to an agreement with the powers about the number of troops, etc.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. But hadn't it been determined to expand the Wehrmacht for political and economic reasons at that time, in 1933?

A. Please?

(The question was translated into German.)

No, not yet. We had 100,000 men at that time, and it was not yet agreed. I remember once that Hitler proposed that he would even be prepared to abolish the Army totally and only have police troops if the others would do so also.

Q. By whom was the decision made to leave the disarmament conference?

A. I don't understand.

(The question was translated into German.)

It was Hitler who decided it, but it was after I returned from Geneva in September—the end of September. I pointed out to him how things were going, and that no agreement could be reached there. Then he decided to leave the conference. He said it was of no use to talk in Geneva any more.

Q. What was the reason for Germany leaving the League of Nations?

A. Well, about the same. I can't remember what the discussion was at the time in Geneva.

Q. That was 19 October 1933?

A. Yes, but the reasons were the same, that we couldn't go on in the League of Nations. It was not a League of Nations at all any more, because the United States was not there, Russia was not there, and Japan had left. There was no League of Nations any more.

That was the special reason why we left; it was not the League of Nations which was originally planned.

Q. And that was the reason why it was decided to leave?

A. Yes.

Q. The decision to leave the League had no relation to the disarmament problem?

A. The disarmament conference was a part of the League of Nations, you know, so it was interconnected with it.

Q. Of course, the decision to leave the disarmament conference would not necessarily have required a decision to leave the League of Nations as well, would it?

A. Well, as I say, the real reason was that in the League of Nations the three big nations were no longer there, and we were alone with the rest.

Nazi Agitation in Austria

Q. Do you recall, on the 17th of January 1934, that Dollfuss addressed a note to Germany complaining about the activity?*

A. Oh yes. He did it several times and it was with reason.

Q. Now this activity must have been, as you said, a source of considerable annoyance to you as Foreign Minister?

A. No. I mean, it was absolutely a Party affair, and it always made great difficulties for me.

Q. What did you do to attempt to alleviate the condition?

A. To stop it?

Q. Yes.

A. The only thing I could do was to complain to Hitler. They didn't follow him at that time, especially Habicht; he didn't follow his orders any more. So far as I remember, there was a clique of Austrian Nazis who collaborated with Habicht. That was a very strong clique; they were extremists. They endeavored, first to make Austria a Nazi state, to give it a Nazi Government, and then to have the Anschluss. However, I am not sure whether they intended to have the Anschluss as it followed in the end. I mean, I am not sure, because I had no relation with those matters.

Q. What, in your opinion, was the position of the German Nazi Party people with regard to the agitation and the ultimate assassination of Dollfuss?

A. I think they had nothing to do with the assassination. Maybe Mr. Habicht knew something, but I don't think the Party had anything to do with the murder of Dollfuss.

Q. It would be desirable, from the Party standpoint, to have had Dollfuss removed, would it not?

A. Disappear? No; Dollfuss was not an extremist, he was always for collaboration with Germany. Those extremists who murdered him were terrorists and not politicians.

Q. But the Party, in the Austrian activity, in your opinion, exceeded the intentions of Hitler?

A. Oh yes, certainly.

Q. Their agitation was done too soon?

A. Yes. In Vienna, at least at that time—but also later on—there were absolutely terroristic cliques of Nazis. They were, according to my opinion, Communists.

The German Part in the Spanish Civil War

Q. What was the part played by the German Government at the beginning of the Spanish civil war?

A. At the beginning?

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Yes.

A. Well, in the beginning we had nothing to do with it, only afterwards. There were volunteers going down there, and we were assisting, but I don't know whether we did assist—yes, we did assist Franco with arms, but that was only after the civil war broke out.

Q. Do you recall the visit of the Franco general, Sanjurjo?

A. No, I hadn't seen him.

Q. He came to Berlin in March of 1936.

A. No, I didn't see him. I don't think he came officially. That is why I didn't see him. He had, perhaps, seen Hitler, but I had not seen him.

Q. You know the name?

A. Yes, I know the name.

Q. Were you aware at all of the purpose of his visit?

A. Of what?

Q. Of the purpose of his visit.

A. No. Was that in 1936?

Q. Yes. Do you know what Hitler's views were towards the Spanish civil war?

A. His views?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes. It was in his mind to support Franco against a revolution, or the Reds, as we called them. That was the general view.

Q. Was that based on ideological ideas, or was it on a political basis?

A. No, political basis—would you repeat that?

(The question was translated into German.)

Yes, ideologically, naturally, because Spain was far away from us and politically we had nothing to do with it. It was ideologically, of course.

Q. What, in your opinion, was Hitler's view concerning the usefulness of the Spanish civil war in connection with the position of France to Germany?

A. It may have been in his mind that a strong Franco would, in case of a conflict with France, be helpful to us. I mean, that may be. The first intention or reason why he supported Franco was an ideological one, the campaign against Bolshevism. That was the reason.

Q. And it is quite possible that there would be some incidental benefits to Germany politically if Franco was victorious?

A. You may consider that that was so. I mean, in the event of a conflict with France, a strong Franco could have been of help, at least morally.

Q. Yes.

A. But those considerations were in the bureaus, or in the chancelleries.

Q. I see. Do you recall the occasion of the naval bombardment of Almeria?

A. Yes, I remember a bombardment of Almeria.

Q. —German warships?

A. I remember the bombardment, but I can't remember, at the moment, the reasons. Can you help me out?

Q. Apparently it resulted from some activity by Red aircraft on the ships, and in retaliation they bombarded the town.

A. Oh yes. I think that was the Navy cruiser Leipzig, which was bombarded by an airship or by an airplane, or something of that sort. I couldn't say for sure whether it was afterwards or not. I remember that fact, but I can't remember this.

Q. Was there any discussion about the event?

A. No, it was—I remember the bombardment of that cruiser, the German cruiser, by a Red airplane; there were several dead and wounded on it. I must say "probably," because I can't remember it. However, as a consequence, or as a reaction to that bombardment, Almeria was bombarded.

Q. The details, however, you don't recall now?

A. No; all those things are not in my memory right now. Perhaps you had better ask one of our naval men about that; I can't tell you.

Purpose of German-Austrian Agreement of 11 July 1936

Q. What was the purpose of the German-Austrian accord of 11 July 1936?*

A. That agreement?

Q. Yes.

A. 1936? At that time there was already a strong Nazi movement in Austria, and that movement had more or less excited Mussolini. To show that it was not the intention to occupy Austria, or to make the Anschluss, an agreement between Austria and us was again signed, which stipulated the acknowledgment of an Austria and of no intervention in Austrian affairs. That was the intention.

You see, Mussolini had threatened to occupy the whole south of Austria in case of the Anschluss, and from the Czech side it was said that they would occupy the north to Linz, so from our side

* See Document TC-22, Vol. VIII, p. 369.

INTERROGATIONS

we could only conclude again, or acknowledge again, that the Austrian State had an independent sovereignty. That was the reason for that, as far as I remember, and it was concluded when the Austrian Minister of Foreign affairs came to Berlin.

Q. That was the one in which both parties, Germany and Austria, undertook not to intervene in the internal affairs of either country?

A. Yes, that was because the Nazi Party in Germany had made certain propaganda—I mean, to show that it was not so efficient a policy.

Q. And its purpose was to reassure Italy and the other powers that there was no intention to accomplish the Anschluss with Austria?

A. Yes; at that time it was not the intention. As I said, I think the description in the Indictment is quite wrong; the real Anschluss question came up only in December 1937, and not before. Hitler himself had not the intention to make the Anschluss as it was made afterwards. He favored, naturally, a Nazi Government in Austria, not the Anschluss or the disappearance of Austria. That came only in 1937.

Q. What, in your opinion, was the cause of Hitler's changing his views regarding the Anschluss?

A. In 1937?

Q. Yes.

A. In 1937 there were two or three reasons, I think. First of all, as I said, there was an enormous growing of the Nazi movement in Austria. There were at that time three-quarters of the population who were for the Anschluss. That was the first reason.

We had, then, thousands and thousands of Austrians, especially in South Germany, who were immigrants, and they, naturally, always agitated and insisted with Hitler to free Austria from the Schuschnigg regime. That was the second reason.

The third was that we had no news from England, that the British Government did not any more mean that they were against the Anschluss. That was in December of 1937. So that was the last job for Hitler to decide.

Also in December of 1937, after what I just now told you happened, he asked me whether I thought he should make the Anschluss. I said, "No, don't; or at least speak first with Schuschnigg." The interview which took place in February was a consequence of all those things which took place and I described just now.

However, before, the question of the Anschluss was not at all acute.

XV. HANS FRITZSCHE

*Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Fritzsche, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 3 November 1945, 1430-1530, by Major General Alexandrov, USSR, assisted by members of USSR prosecution staff. Also present: Colonel John H. Amen, OUSCC; Captain Mark Priceman, Interpreter; C. J. Gallagher, Court Reporter.

Views on German Aggression and Hitler's Guilt

Q. Were you a member of the Nazi Party?

A. Yes.

Q. From which date on?

A. Since the 1st of May 1933.

Q. Are you familiar with Hitler's book, Mein Kampf?

A. Yes.

Q. As a member of the Nazi Party did you share Hitler's views as stated in his book?

A. Generally, yes.

Q. Do you admit that Hitler in his book stated clearly his aggressive plans against the West, and the East, and especially against the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia?

A. This is not how I interpreted the book, but as I said, it is now 15 or 16 years since I read it.

Q. Do you remember the passages which deal with the necessity for "Lebensraum" and with the necessity for Germany to have access to natural resources?

A. No, I don't remember that any more. The book was not of that much consequence in my political work.

Q. How did the Party deal with these problems of "Lebensraum" and of natural resources, independently from the book Mein Kampf?

A. It seems to me that during the years from 1933 to '39, the general policy of the Party, and of the Government, was to make the best of what could be done inside the narrow borders of Germany, and to reach this goal through an extensive exploitation of all our resources.

Q. Is it not known to you that it was intended, and propagated

*This interrogation was conducted in Russian. The questions were translated into German, and the answers into Russian by a member of the USSR delegation. Simultaneously questions and answers were translated into English for information purposes only.

INTERROGATIONS

in statements, speeches, and so forth by Hitler himself, that this problem was to be solved through expansion?

A. Do you mean by conquest?

Q. Yes.

A. It became clear to me subsequently.

Q. When did you realize this?

A. During the first part of the war, I felt that the war had not been provoked deliberately by Hitler, but as for the war against Russia, I felt that Hitler had wanted, and had caused it. In 1942, one year after the start of the war against Russia, I became acquainted with the imperialistic aims of the regime to their full extent. In 1941, at the start of that war, I could not believe that Hitler had started it intentionally, because it would have seemed to me like madness to start a new war in the East, having on one's hands an unfinished war in the West. I had Hitler's assurance, and also Ribbentrop's assurance, that the war had been declared on Russia only to beat the Russians to it, who were about to declare war on Germany. Then shortly after the start of the war in 1941, I saw to what extent the occupation of the Eastern territory had been prepared. Finally, in 1942 I realized the full extent of Hitler's imperialistic intentions in the East.

Q. I have a question. In other words, this information which you had received previously from Ribbentrop was not accurate?

A. No, I found out about it only now, as a prisoner. In a prison cell in Moscow I met General Niedermayer, who had been acquainted with an interpreter who had done the interpreting during the conference between Molotov and Ribbentrop at Moscow, as well as at Berlin.

Q. I want to clarify something. In the beginning you started to say that you had received information from Ribbentrop. Now you are saying that you received that information from Niedermayer, as information which he had received from some interpreter, is that so?

A. All the information that I had about the Russian war I had received from Ribbentrop during the night from the 21st to the 22d June 1941. I am referring now to the information which I had up to three-fourths of a year ago.

Q. You said that you realized in 1942 what the imperialistic aims of Germany in regard to Russia were?

A. Yes.

Q. This is why I am asking you whether the information which you had received from Ribbentrop concerning this question was incorrect?

A. I became suspicious about it as early as 1942, but even in 1942 it was still difficult for me to realize what the true situation was. I still could not think that Hitler had deliberately launched this war.

Q. I still want an answer from you. You said that you realized it in 1942. I am asking you now whether what you realized in 1942 checked with the information which had been given to you by Ribbentrop in 1941?

A. There was no real contradiction, because Ribbentrop had informed me only about the fact that the war had started. He did not tell me then about the final intentions.

Q. How did you happen to realize in 1942 that Germany had imperialistic aims in this war?

A. I believe that I received conclusive proof of this being so from Niedermayer when I was in prison.

Q. I am talking about 1942?

A. In 1942 I myself was a soldier, and I was visiting the Eastern areas, and then I saw that extensive preparations for the occupation and administration of the territories, extending as far as the Crimea, had been made, and I came to the conclusion that all of this had been planned long before the war broke out.

Q. This was your personal observation?

A. Yes.

Q. And what do you know about this question from official sources? After all, you were an important official in the Ministry for Propaganda?

A. Properly speaking, nothing. There had been very little official publicity on this question. There had been very little official publicity. There had been a certain amount of talk in the press in 1942 of the wealth in natural resources in the East in order to get people interested.

Q. Do you admit after these conclusions of yours in 1942, that the attack against the Soviet Union in 1941 was the result of preconceived plans, and reflected official views on how to solve problems of labor shortage, and how to increase Germany's wealth in natural resources?

A. Yes, I have come to this conclusion.

Q. Are you then of the opinion that these general ideas about the necessity for "Lebensraum" are the main cause of Germany's preparing and starting the war against the Soviet Union, and in general for Germany's starting the World War?

A. No. This is my conclusion, but I don't have enough documentation to substantiate my views. I would say—

Q. Go ahead.

A. Hitler's guilt is to have prepared this war, to have carried on very extensive preparations, and at the same time to have made the German people believe that his intentions were peaceful. In the end, when the war was imminent, I think that his guilt was just as great as that of the Western Powers. Both he and the Western Powers could have prevented that war from happening. This is how I see things today.

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Fritzsche, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 16 November 1945, 1000-1245, by Col. Likhachov, USSR. Also present: Col. John H. Amen; Capt. Mark Priceman, Interpreter; Mr. James P. Buck, Court Reporter.

Fritzsche's Part in the Werewolf Movement

Q. Do you personally affirm that you had no part in the organizing of this movement—the Werewolves?*

A. On the contrary, I worked against the organization of this movement.

Q. In other words you confirm the contents of your written statement about this subject?

A. I have read the transcript you are referring to only once in its entirety and later on I was given a chance to see parts of it. As I recall it the transcript says about this subject the following: It says that I am supposed to have broadcast over the radio proclamations in favor of the Werewolf movement. As you gentlemen should recall, I did say that such appeals to organize this movement were broadcast over the radio between Sunday, the 1st of April 1945 and Tuesday, the 3rd of April 1945. I did, however, call your attention to the fact that these appeals were transmitted to the broadcasting stations directly by Dr. Goebbels during my absence. And I didn't have a chance to talk to Dr. Goebbels until that Tuesday when I succeeded in getting the broadcast of these appeals discontinued. May I say one more sentence? I also stated that I would of course assume the responsibility for whatever had been broadcast over the radio during my absence, by my subordinates.

Q. But then I cannot understand why you claim you had nothing to do with the organizing of the Werewolf movement.

A. I beg your pardon. When did I say I had nothing to do with the organizing of the movement? I have just stated I actively opposed the organizing of the movement. As a matter of fact several months before the end of the war I was told to set aside a number of radio stations that were to be used for this movement. I also told you at Moscow that I purposely delayed the execution of this order. And I also stated then (and I am stating it now) that suddenly during my absence I had to face the fact that this broadcasting had been done by my subordinates. Furthermore I told you about the dramatic conversation I had with Goebbels on Tuesday, the 3rd of April about the subject. I leave it up to you to draw your own conclusions from that..

*The Werewolves were a movement which the Nazis attempted to organize shortly before Germany's surrender, to resist and sabotage the impending Allied occupation.

This refers to a statement purporting to summarize Fritzsche's interrogations in Moscow, where he was interned after capture by the Russians, before transfer to Nurnberg prison. The document was drawn up by the interrogators and signed by Fritzsche. On interrogation by the American prosecution in Nurnberg Fritzsche repudiated this document as inaccurate in certain respects, and himself prepared a revised statement (see document 3469-PS, vol. VI, p. 174). The Soviet summary is not published in these volumes.

Q. We are talking not only about your participation in any broadcasts that were made. We are talking about your personal participation inasmuch as you, yourself, made statements over the radio that the movement should be organized.

A. I never made any such broadcasts myself, but they were given to the radio by Dr. Goebbels during my absence.

Q. However, it is well known that you yourself made such appeals over the radio. Why do you not admit it?

A. As far as I know I never talked over the radio in that sense.

Q. If that is so we will have to refer to some of the speeches you made over the radio. Do you remember your speech over the radio on the 7th of April 1945?*

A. I don't remember the details of it.

Q. I will make an effort then to revive your memory. You stated over the radio, "May nobody be surprised if here and there civilians may oppose and fight enemy troops in occupied territories and even after the occupation has become a permanent fact it is to be expected that the occupation forces will meet with underground resistance. Such resistance is being organized now under the name of Werewolves." What do you have to say to this?

A. I don't remember having made these statements. If you want me to make a final statement on this question I will have to know the background of this speech and be familiar with the considerations which preceded this statement. Right now I can only say this. If I had spoken such words they would not have been in support of the Werewolf movement.

Q. I am quoting your own words. You must have spoken them and since this happened only recently you must remember them.

A. I have made approximately a thousand radio speeches and I couldn't possibly remember every sentence I spoke. But I repeat that even if I did say these things it didn't mean that I was urging people to support what you are trying to say.

Q. How else can one interpret this?

A. This is not an appeal. It is only a defense. It is a defense which makes reference to some previous very important statement. It starts with the words: "Nobody should be surprised, therefore"

Q. Your explanation is not convincing.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

XVI. ROBERT LEY

Testimony of Robert Ley, taken in Nurnberg, Germany, 1440-1610, 6 October 1945 by Major John J. Monigan, Jr. Also present: Pfc. George W. Garand, Interpreter; Tec./4 R. R. Kerry, Reporter.

How the Nazis Took Over the Labor Unions

Q. This afternoon we will direct our attention initially to the period of April 1933. Do you recall then the meeting which took place at Munich in April of 1933 regarding the question of taking over the property of the trade unions?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember the circumstances under which that meeting was called?

A. Yes.

Q. Who in addition to yourself addressed the meeting on that occasion, if you recall?

A. It was not a conference. I was just reporting to Hitler regarding the circumstances of some unrest that was taking place among the working factions, and I made other suggestions to him. We had the NSBO [National Socialist Factory Cells Organization] under a certain Schuhmann. It was founded—I don't exactly remember the date—I think it was 1930 in Berlin. It was an institution to help the Party gain footing in the factories. Now, the Party had come to power on the 29th of January 1933, and in March there were to be elections, and preparations were being made very eagerly. Clashes occurred between the NSBO and the trade unions, and this conflict threatened to grow worse. The labor unions had planned to use force on the 1st of May, but whether this was true or not, I cannot possibly know. This man Schuhmann himself told me about that. That was in the middle of March. I took these reports to Hitler and stated the case. Hitler told me then he had the intention of taking over the unions and dissolving them. He then asked me if I had any ideas as to who should take over these trade unions. I suggested Schuhmann. Hitler, however, didn't want Schuhmann, and postponed the matter for 14 days, and said that I should keep on watching these happenings, and as soon as danger threatened to report to him.

In early April—I can't remember the day—I went to him again. I told him time was getting shorter and that the matter was becoming more and more pressing. I also gave him details of some instances where clashes had already taken place between the NSBO and the trade unions. He asked me again whom I had to suggest, and I again suggested Schuhmann. "No," he said, "we don't want that again," and he was going to think it over and call me again.

On the 14th or 15th of April—I still can't remember the exact date—he called on me again. He asked me if I had the right man now. Hess was there at the last conversation, and he suggested Bormann, but Hitler then said, "No, I don't want him. You be it, Ley." I said, "Yes, good." And then he said he would give me the exact time and he would give me three days' advance notice. Two days before the 1st of May, he sent for me again. He told me the day, that after the 1st of May, after the May parade had taken place, that I should take over the unions. Then on the 2d of May, we took over the unions without any resistance. I myself took over the headquarters of the free trade unions in Berlin, and the head of the union was sitting there as if he had been waiting. The whole thing took place within four days. It was on a Monday. All the heads of the unions as well as the heads of the employers came voluntarily. Altogether there were 216 different unions, and they came to the Preussische Herrenhaus* where they signed papers to the effect that all their property and funds were to go over to the new organization. There were many unions that reported there whose existence I didn't even know of. On Friday, four days later, I could report to the Fuehrer that the taking over of the unions had taken place, and the German Labor Front was established. In a meeting over the radio, the establishment of that organization was announced after the Fuehrer had authorized beforehand that this meeting take place.

Q. The report which you made to the Fuehrer four days after the taking over of the property was to the effect that the mission had been accomplished and that the DAF [German Labor Front] was formed; was that what you said?

A. I suggested that this organization be founded, and the Fuehrer made me chief of that organization.

Q. Were the people, who were mentioned within the terms of this circular letter as being subjects for protective custody, actually put into such protective custody?

A. They were not to be taken into protective custody. Exceptions are only granted with the permission of the Gauleiter.

Q. Those were the local chairmen though?

A. I have already said it has actually been like that—not to be taken into custody.

*Formerly the Upper House in the Prussian legislature.

See documents 392-PS, vol. III, p. 380; 2336-PS, vol. IV, p. 1052.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. But at the bottom of the first page, there is a directive regarding the taking into protective custody of certain people.

A. But after a few days they were let go again.

Q. Were the actions taken in accordance with this circular letter reported to you by each gauleiter, or how were reports rendered on completion of the action?

A. I can't remember that any more exactly now.

Q. What was the purpose of putting these people into protective custody?

A. To avoid civil war, and to keep them from withdrawing money or property.

Q. In order that the record may be clear, the persons referred to in the paragraph at the bottom of page 1, which begins, "In Schutzhalt werden genommen," were taken into custody, is that so?

A. That I don't know. I didn't take anybody into protective custody. Those who didn't resist were released at once.

Q. But the order directed that those people be taken into protective custody, didn't it?

A. They could be taken if they resisted or if they moved money or property or if they tried to stir up the workers or if there was any danger.

Q. The terms of the order was that they will be taken, is that right?

A. Certainly, if they resisted.

Q. Now, on page 2, the paragraph beginning, "Die Ortsausschussvorsitzenden," says that they are not to be taken into protective custody, does it not?

A. On the first page only a few organizations and the heads are being considered, the leading personalities, to prevent them from giving counter orders, and those who voluntarily surrendered their organizations and signed the paper at once went home. It was only a precautionary measure.

Q. If on the other hand, it was necessary either because they resisted or because they would not comply with signing the required paper to turn over the property; they were retained in custody?

A. They would have been taken into custody, but there was nothing else to be done.

Q. Is it not actually a fair statement that the effect of this circular letter, the general design of it, was to take over the property and to eliminate the trade unions and to substitute for it a new system? That anything which was necessary to accomplish that end was taken under the action directed, is that so?

A. The first is not right. The property was of no importance to us because I had no knowledge of what the property was, and I have never been worried about that. I had no idea what property was owned by the unions. The actual property was nil when we started out. Everything was rotten. Nobody was paying any dues. The labor unions would have had to live from public funds. The head of the Free Labor Unions in Berlin told me—he sat in a chair when I came in. When I told him, "I am taking over this," I asked him to help me, and then he told me, "I am glad that you have come and we can finally have order." Such were conditions.

The second of course is right. Our whole taking over of power was a fundamental revolution, certainly. We had come to power and everybody knew that. Also Hindenburg, who gave us that legal power, knew that. That had been told to him. One has to consider that Hitler was called legally by Hindenburg. This action had taken place under Hindenburg. It couldn't have been done more legally. I would like to defend myself against the thought that I had done this out of a lust for power or a desire for robbery.

Q. Do you recall who it was from the trade union with whom you discussed the matter in Berlin?

A. Everything was done very fast. Within 15 minutes, everything was done. The whole thing for me in Berlin didn't last more than one-half hour. Everything went very fast. I did not arrest anybody, but put in my people and went away, and the other organizations, 216 of them, all come voluntarily to my office. There came men whom I didn't even know, who told me they had an organization of sometimes only 4,000 members. I had a paper which is probably also with you, a document with four or five lines saying, "I turn over all rights and privileges of my organization to the German Labor Front and forfeit all rights and privileges," which they signed, and it was finished.

Q. That was to be executed by the union people?

A. That has been signed. Whoever signed that could go home.

Q. That was the general form that was prepared for their signatures?

A. Certainly.

Q. The particular section that we were interested in was Section 2 in this Reichsgesetzblatt, page 285, dated 19 May 1933.*

A. That is the fundamental law that was given out immediately after the taking over of the labor unions. I myself have worked on that. Now, as to what the fundamentals of the whole structure were, I have already stated this morning. I have already said this morning and in the other interrogations that as the Party represents the interests of the people towards the state, those of the individual towards the group; so the German Labor Front represented the employers and the employees, because its whole influence depended on the trust the people put into it. And now therefore it could certainly not make laws and decrees because with that the notary would become the judge or the lawmaker. Therefore the German labor unions by order of the Party had to set up the fundamentals after which the laws were made, and watched out to see that these laws were carried out. Above all, they had to insure working peace within the factories. On the contrary, the interests of the individual to the unions had to be fitted according to the interests of the community. The class distinction could not be allowed to come up again. I have seen little details from the factories negotiated on the main platform of the Reichstag. Just to give an example, a foreman gave an apprentice a slap in the face in the factory. For this one smack alone, three Reichstag meetings were held. After a while it was not the smack on the face or the head; it was just the parties standing against each other. So it was clear to me and to all of us that this whole factory dirt which came out of the living together of the people should be negotiated there with those people whom it concerned.

*See document 405-PS, vol. III, p. 387.

INTERROGATIONS

Now, I come to speak of this law. To have completely the trust of the employer and the employee, first of all the Labor Front had to be independent from the state as well as from classes, the workers and the employers. We were in a certain way the negotiator between the workers and factory owners. But there were many occasions when people were not satisfied without negotiations. Then there had to be instructions from the state which had to be complied with. This was first the trustee, and the other, the labor court. The trustee was in a certain way the social judge. We represented the Party before the trustee as well as the labor court. As the interests of the employers were different from the interests of the employees, we had two chambers in the Labor Front, one for employers and one for employees. Now, if this conflict came before the state, then we said if there was an employer to be represented, a representative of the chamber of employers came, or if a worker was to be represented, a representative of the employees came. The whole thing was under the office of the Rechtsberatungsstelle. It was understood that this advice was free of charge. So they were working together to solve the whole social difficulty, the German Labor Front, trustee, and Labor Office, Labor Front, the union of all those that were working, the employers as well as the employees, trustee, social judge, and labor office as a representative of the law-giving agencies. This was only that section of the workers' agreement with which the trustee was concerned. We still had the viewpoint of the trade unions, which were only concerned with labor agreements. Rebuilding the social structure, this became only a part of the task which had to be done there.

Q. Then later in 1934, in January, you had a larger concept of the task of the DAF, is that right, when the law of 20 January was passed?*

A. Can I tell you? I had known nothing about these unions. I had never before bothered about them as I myself was only an employee in a factory. Then I saw that he was right in practice and that it was wrong. Under that I became a National Socialist. But since I had not occupied myself with this subject, I did not suggest myself to the Fuehrer. Therefore I was surprised when he named me. I told him that too. I told him, "My Fuehrer, with this subject I have never occupied myself." But he said, "You are the right man." Later on when we christened the first ship during a special ceremony, "Strength through Joy," then he said, "Workers, I have given you as leader the greatest idealist." That was the only thing I brought with me for that task. Everything else came afterwards. More I can't tell you. Out of healthy common sense, out of practice, out of my thinking, out of that it has developed. In any case, from our enemies, that has been told me by Sir Patrick, the Secretary of the Foreign Office, in Mondorf. I think his name is Patrick. He told me word by word, "I myself have coal interests in Germany, and I must tell you that the German Labor Front has been one of the most praiseworthy organizations in Germany which I have ever known." In any case, its success proves it, no strikes, no sabotage, in all, achievements.

You have interrogated me about foreign workers. Unfortunately, I did not remember at that time. Their labor achievements rose exactly as high as that of the German workers; while the achievements of the Eastern workers when they arrived were not over 60 percent on the average, among them were those who only did 20 percent and others who did at least 80 percent and many 100 percent. The foreign workers took up the battle for achievement.

One more thing. While the labor unions in the first world war after one-half year did not have any more dues coming in and were being aided by public funds, we still had in April of this year 90 percent of the contributions, of the dues. There were 55,000,000 per month.

*See document 1861-PS, vol. IV, p. 497.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Now, under whose direction were the trustees? Did they fall within the framework of the DAF or were they under the Minister of Labor?

A. Under the Minister of Labor. At the end under Sauckel. I like to talk about these things. I am not bored. I am glad when I have the opportunity to talk about it because one will be able to feel that at the end of my work, I am still very proud of it. I believe that my system has been the most ideal. It is a great pity that it has not been carried over to other countries.

Excerpts of Testimony of Robert Ley, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 1640-1655, 18 October 1945, by Major John J. Monigan, Jr. Also present: 2d Lt. Werner H. Von Rosen-Stiehl, Interpreter; T/4 James P. Buck, Reporter.

Ley's Statements After Reading the Indictment

Q. You have now been served with a copy of the indictment in this case in which you are accused as defendant of the commission of various crimes. It is expected that you will continue to be interrogated from time to time unless you expressly object thereto. Please state whether you have any objection to being further interrogated, or whether you consider your interests would be protected by refusing to be interrogated further.

A. I am willing to answer any questions. I have nothing to hide. This is all so terrible. I have read this indictment. Of course under it falls every member of the Party. For instance, with regard to me it has been said that I had been responsible for offenses and crimes connected with count number three. I have nothing to do with them at all. I was not in charge. It will be necessary to show me those things as well as where I have been participating in the preparation for the war. That I participated in getting the war started—I had prepared the Party Congress in Nurnberg in 1938. I even had arranged for an excursion for workers to the Far East and around the world for that and the following year. I have had no knowledge or information as to the war. It came to me as a surprise, as a hail storm comes to a corn field. Of course, that I was a member of the Party I have stated here before. And that I should have mistreated foreign workers, it is not true. As a matter of fact I have favored them. I have done everything that was within my power—everything to improve their lot.

Q. You understand you will have an opportunity to present such a defense as you may. At the present time we do not wish to have a discussion of the merits of the charge.

A. I do not know an attorney. I have referred to three names on the list of attorneys but I don't know these gentlemen, but if it is at all possible, I would like to have a Jewish person as my defense counsel. I do not know whether the Major has read my writings. I am willing to die. I haven't written these things to protect my life. I did it because I believed I would serve humanity. And I don't know these gentlemen (referring to the list of lawyers). Who would be able to give me references with regard to these men? Is there anybody who could advise me on this matter?

Q. The procedure for the selection of counsel is not known to me at the present time. However, there will be a decision on it one way or the other. What specifically have you in mind regarding that?

A. I would like to state again that I would like to be represented by a respectable Jewish attorney, and if I could have two, I would like to have an attorney from Cologne. His name is Robert Servatius. He certainly is not a Jew, but two, Falkenberg and Polack, I would presume they are Jewish.

Q. The procedure on obtaining counsel will be decided later, and you will be able to forward your request for a Jewish counsel if that is what you wish. That will be all.

XVII. MAX AMANN*

Excerpts from Testimony of Max Amann, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 23 October 1945, 1030-1225, by Lt. Col. T. S. Hinkel, IGD. Also present: John Albert, Interpreter; Frances Karr, Reporter.

Nazi Acquisition and Suppression of the German Press

Q. Do you recall publicly stating in October 1941 that the majority of the larger and medium-sized papers in Germany were financially controlled by the Party?

A. Yes, I think even a two-thirds majority.

*Max Amann was Reich Leader for the Press; Head of Central Publishing House of the Party; and President of the Reich Press Chamber. Previously he served in the same company with Hitler in World War I, took part in the Putsch of 1923, and was imprisoned for four and one-half months. He was Munich City Councillor 1924-33; member of Reich Culture Senate since its foundation in 1935; and member of the Reichstag since 1933. See document 3016-PS, vol. V, p. 735; see also vol. I, pp. 330-332.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Well, what was the total circulation, at its highest point, of all Party newspapers?

A. If the total circulation amounted to 21,000,000 and I said two-thirds of it is controlled by the Party it would amount to 14 million.

Q. Was the highest peak of circulation of German newspapers, including both Party and non-Party, the 21 million figure, you have cited?

A. Yes, of all German dailies. You have to add a great many weeklies, which had very wide circulation.

Q. Now, isn't it a fact that a large number of private publishing houses that were non-Party went out of existence during the eight-year period from January 1933 until 1941?

A. Yes. We bought quite a lot after 1935.

Q. How many newspapers were owned by the Party at the time the Party came into power in January 1933?

A. I can only estimate, but perhaps 400 newspapers.

Q. How many newspapers did the Party own at its highest point?

A. Approximately, but this is only an estimate, from 1,200 to 1,500, but I rather think 1,200.

Q. Is the difference between the 400 and 1,200 or 1,500 figure accounted for by the purchase of going newspapers or by the founding of new newspapers?

A. Through both.

Q. Which would you say accounted for the larger number?

A. In my opinion, purchase.

Q. What were the methods used in acquiring these various newspapers by purchase?

A. On my strict order two points had to be observed strictly. First, the newspaper had to be relinquished voluntarily and a legal price had to be paid.

Q. Why do you think so many newspapers were willing to sell valuable property to your outfit?

A. The reason was that those publishers, who were regarded as politically unreliable by the Party, were told it would be a good idea to hand over the newspapers to their sons, who should have had newspaper training by now, or any other relative, or, if no other person existed in his family who would be qualified, to offer his paper to somebody outside.

Q. Who, besides yourself in Germany, was doing any purchasing of newspaper properties during the period in question?

A. I don't know that but I am sure that newspapers were also sold in the free market to other publishers.

Q. You don't really think that, do you?

A. Yes. I really believe that.

Q. You do not mean to imply by that that you didn't know the publishing picture as a whole in Germany, do you?

A. Oh yes, I was well informed all the time but I could not recall detailed, single cases.

Q. As a matter of fact, if there had been any substantial buying of newspapers by anybody except yourself you would remember it, wouldn't you?

A. Yes, then I would remember it.

Q. The fact that you do not remember it would indicate that there was no such substantial buying, isn't that correct?

A. Yes, that is right.

Q. Don't you think it is a fair statement to make, that you were practically the sole purchaser of newspapers in Germany during this period?

A. Larger papers, yes, that could be said. May I add one thing? The financial situation of the German newspapers was quite bad during that period. Many papers had collapsed already during the inflation and later on through mass unemployment when few people could afford to buy newspapers.

Q. You are speaking of the period from 1933 on now, are you?

A. Only since 1934 and 1935 the publishing business flourished again. I bought, for instance, from Hugenberg the Ala Advertising Company, which operated at a deficit at that time and it took about two years until it made profits again.

Q. You don't take the position, do you, that all the newspapers you purchased were in a bankrupt condition prior to the time you purchased them?

A. No, I don't want to say that. I want to say in general, the situation was pretty difficult.

Q. Why do you think people who owned newspapers that were profitable were willing to sell them to you?

A. That willingness could be explained by the fact that many publishers were declared politically unreliable and couldn't continue as publishers.

Q. Did you ever make any recommendations as to which publishers should be declared politically unreliable in order that their newspapers might then become available for purchase?

A. No. The Reich Association of the German Press had to investigate the political reliability of people and they used the assistance of the Propaganda Ministry and the criminal and political records of people were investigated, etc. I remember, for example, a case in Zwickau, Saxony, where one publisher would have one Communist, one German Nationalist paper, and one so-called Generalanzeiger, which means neutral press, and that was regarded as politically unreliable to bring out three different newspapers.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Weren't your representatives among those who decided as to whether or not a particular newspaper was politically unreliable?

A. I myself was President of the Reich Association of the German Press until the Reich Press Chamber was founded.

Q. Then you were President of that, is that correct?

A. When I became President of the Reich Press Chamber I retired from the Presidency of the Reich Association of the German Press.

Q. Wasn't the Reich Association of the German Press under the supervision of the Reich Press Chamber?

A. No. If I may explain the difference, the Reich Association of the German Press was a public corporation and represented the interests of the journalists and was not under the Reich Press Chamber.

Q. What interest did the Reich Press Chamber represent?

A. The Reich Press Chamber had the task of representing the interests of the publishers, of the publishing industry, and to build a new Association of the German publishing business.

Q. Isn't it a fact that whenever a newspaper was declared politically undesirable that one or more of your representatives participated in that decision?

A. A certain Mr. Winkler always approached me and told me, "There is another newspaper to be bought." But I didn't want so many newspapers. I was always afraid of the recollection I had of Mr. Stinnes, who built up such a huge concern that he couldn't handle it any more.

Q. This certain Mr. Winkler, to whom you refer, was one of your employees, is that right?

A. No, he was an expert supplied by the Propaganda Ministry.

Q. He worked for you, didn't he?

A. Yes, he then worked for me. There were some confusions at the beginning. He first bought newspapers for the Propaganda Ministry and then I protested and said an official ministry cannot run newspapers, it has to be run by business men and then he bought newspapers for me.

Q. When you say, for you, you mean the Eher Publishing Company?*

*The publishing house of Franz Eher Verlag was given a lucrative monopoly on the publication of all works of Party officials, by virtue of a special decree by Hitler. See document 2383-PS, vol. V, pp. 9, 19.

A. Yes, that is right.

Q. Whatever private misgivings you may have had about developing a large number of newspapers, nevertheless the Eher Publishing Company did buy a large number, isn't that correct?

A. Yes, that is right.

Q. Now, you remember our discussion yesterday regarding the purchase by the Gau, of the "Dortmunder Generalanzeiger"?

A. As far as I can remember it must have taken place in 1933 to 1934 and at that time I had not been in the purchasing business yet.

Q. What do you recall regarding the acquisition of the property rights of the Ullstein Publishing Company?

A. I have a very good recollection of the case of the Ullstein Publishing House because that was the first big publishing house which Winkler tried to buy for the Propaganda Ministry and I protested successfully at that time and said, "Such a big publishing house must be bought by a newspaper expert" and there were long negotiations with the Ullstein Company. I finally talked it over with their Director, Mr. Wiesner, and I had a conversation with Dr. Franz Ullstein, and my proposal was to pay the entire capital stock at the value of 12 million marks but Winkler thought I was crazy. He said it was much too much and much too generous, especially as this publishing house had a deficit of 3.7 million marks the previous year. My opinion was that his publishing house should not be continued at all. It should have been liquidated, as was done with most publishing houses. But then, I felt the only reason for the bad state of the Ullstein business was that it didn't have enough printing orders and, as I could supply that to a large measure, I decided to buy it.

Q. Wasn't that newspaper purchased through the auspices of the Deutsche Bank?

A. No.

Q. Who paid the 12 million marks for it?

A. There was quite some friction with Winkler about the purchase. Winkler said he had the money from a so-called "Caucio Fund," which represented money given by the Reich Government to the Propaganda Ministry but I protested against this procedure. I finally borrowed money from the Bank der Deutschen Arbeit and refused to take Reich money for it, or to use Reich money for it.

I only want to add that finally, on this occasion, it was cleared up that Winkler was not buying newspapers for the Propaganda Ministry but for the Eher Publishing House. The negotiations, which lasted for many weeks, could be finished within a few days, the moment I offered the complete capital as the purchasing price.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. As a matter of fact that 12 million mark purchase price was quite a bargain, wasn't it?

A. In the beginning it looked like a very bad bargain to me, and Winkler, as I said before, warned me against paying so much, but I knew the only problem was to get enough orders to keep the machines going and so I did it.

Q. Actually it was worth about 60 million marks, isn't that true?

A. No, that is impossible. Every layman could find that out because the purchase price was based on the last year's balance sheet and that could be ascertained easily. The last balance sheet for Ullstein for 1933 showed a deficit of 3.7 million marks.

Q. Did you take a look at any of the balance sheets other than for the year preceding?

A. No, I couldn't remember because as a basis for the purchase price only the last year was taken.

Q. Yes. It might very well be that the balance sheet for the year 1933 may have looked bad because the newspapers in the Ullstein chain had been prohibited from publishing for a long period of time. Is that right?

A. I cannot remember that Ullstein papers were prohibited from appearing. The main business was the "Berliner Illustrierte," which was still appearing. The "Gruene Post" had a big business. The "Koralle," a weekly, had had an excellent sale. This weekly, for instance, had a circulation of 80,000 which was regarded high, but the moment we took it over we increased it sharply.*

Q. Would it surprise you if I told you that these papers, to which you have referred, were shut down for periods of weeks at a time because they had printed something that the Propaganda Ministry or somebody else disagreed with politically?

A. I can only remember the "Gruene Post" was forbidden for a short period.

Q. Yes. Now, isn't it a fact that the Ullstein interests were Jewish?

A. Yes, that is right.

Q. Do you think that had anything to do with their sale of their interests?

A. Yes, that had quite a lot to do with it because Hitler had ordered, as a matter of principle, to extinguish and remove forever all former Jewish-controlled newspapers.

*It was an excellent educational paper and we sold a lot to teachers, and so-forth.

Q. Do you recall my asking you yesterday, if it was not a fact, that one of the principal things that assisted you in your newspaper buying activities were the anti-Semitic laws and decrees that had been issued?

A. Those anti-Semitic laws were no help to me. I did not keep within their frame.

Q. I invite your attention to your purchase of the Ullstein interests.

A. I did this against the direct wish of the Fuehrer, who had declared, "I wish this published house to be liquidated."

Q. Wasn't it liquidated when you purchased it?

A. No, it received new life through my purchase.

Q. You don't seriously contend, do you, that the same editorial policy was followed after your purchase as before your purchase?

A. I have to state again I had no influence whatsoever on the political direction and tendency of the newspapers. May I give you one example, the case of the "Frankfurter Zeitung"? Hitler wanted to have this newspaper destroyed, liquidated. Finally, it was ascertained that it was not in Jewish hands at all but was owned by the I. G. Farben industry. I hesitated for years from buying the "Frankfurter Zeitung" but according to the new laws, a stock company like the I. G. Farben Company could not continue publishing. The paper was in bad financial shape. About 500,000 marks a year had to be given as a sinking fund by I. G. Farben to keep the paper going.

Q. Now, do you recall issuing a decree in 1933,* as President of the Reich Press Chamber, to the effect that organizations could not obligate their members to subscribe to certain newspapers?

A. I remember this decree but it was not in 1933 because there was no Reich Press Chamber at that time.

Q. When was the decree issued?

A. At the earliest, 1935.

Q. Well, was that decree seriously followed with respect to the Party newspapers?

A. The purpose of the decree was to stop the many subscription agents, whose practice it was to get subscribers by any means. I even issued instructions to forbid any subscription campaigns all over the Reich. Every subscription agent had to be authorized by an identification card, signed by me. Every agent was investigated for previous criminal record, political reliability, and so forth and I insisted he got a fixed salary so that financial distress would not force him to use wild methods.

Q. Did you ever license any agents who were not Party members?

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

A. Most of them were non-Party members.

Q. I thought you said they were investigated as to their political reliability.

A. No. Only the publishers would be investigated as to political reliability; the agents as to previous criminal records.

Q. Whatever the ostensible reason for issuing the decree, did it not in fact occur so that the result of it was to prohibit people who belonged to various organizations which had their own publications, from subscribing to those publications as a condition of membership in the organization?

A. The decree had as a purpose the preventing of pressure on simple Party members, who belonged to different Party organizations or affiliated organizations, from being forced to subscribe to every single newspaper published by these organizations. For instance, men who belonged to the SA had to subscribe to the "Gau Zeitung." He had to subscribe to the weekly "SA Mann." His wife had to subscribe to the "Frauenschaftzeitung;" his daughter to the "BDM Zeitung" and in addition, very often people were still reading the neutral non-political papers, as in the past, and did not want to give them up. As nobody can afford five or six newspapers every day, this decree tried to prevent this type of pressure on the Party members.

Q. Is it your statement now, this decree was intended to ease pressure on the Party members?

A. In general, no, this decree was planned to have a general effect. I didn't want any subscriptions which were not voluntary because it could destroy the whole prestige of the Party if we would force everybody constantly to pay for newspapers he didn't want.

Q. I suppose you consider it only an incidental fact that other organizations which were opposed to the Party, such as the Catholic organizations, that the members thereof could not subscribe to their papers, as a condition of belonging to such organizations?

A. At that time there were no Catholic newspapers anymore, only the general press. The Catholic newspapers were discontinued under the order of Hitler. There were about 63 dailies, Catholic dailies, which were discontinued. This decree, furthermore, led to a general Party order that "Gau" newspapers should only be sold and subscribed to in the specific Gau.

Q. When were the 63 Catholic newspapers suppressed?

A. During the year 1935 and from then on.

Q. Now, as a matter of fact, you signed the decree suppressing these newspapers. Isn't that right?

A. I don't remember this exactly but it is possible that it originated with the Reich Press Chamber.

Q. Anything is possible. What do you recall about it?

A. I remember that the Reich Press Chamber required all publishers to sign a declaration which said that as a publisher of a German newspaper he was affirming the National Socialist State and this declaration could not be given by publishers of the Catholic newspapers because they had the point of view, and quite rightly from their position, that they could not affirm certain National Socialist measures, like sterilizations for instance, and so these publishers could not sign required declarations.

Q. Now, isn't it a fact that shortly after the Party came into power, that papers of a political left, that is Communist and Marxist papers, were suppressed immediately?

A. Yes, they were closed down by the police.

Q. Isn't it a further fact that shortly after the Party came into power, that papers of other political parties, that is non-Marxist or non-Communist, but also non-Party, were with some exceptions left undisturbed until suitable legislation had been drafted to deal with them?

A. I assume that is correct but the Marxist papers were suppressed immediately.

Q. Wouldn't it be a fair statement to say that the whole purpose of the Nazi press program was to eliminate all press in opposition to the Party?

A. Yes, that can be said.

Q. Do you recall another decree on the 24th of April 1935, which prohibited the formation of press combines, that is, no publisher was allowed to issue more than one independent newspaper in more than one locality?*

A. That is possible. We talked about it already.

Q. Do you recall issuing that decree?

A. This decree was published, after months of negotiations, by the Propaganda Minister.

Q. Isn't it a fact, as a result of this decree, that many publishers were required to sell one or more of their newspapers?

A. If the decree stated things as I was told yesterday, but I am still not certain whether the decree contained that phrase.

Q. The record will show exactly the phraseology of the decree. There is no question about it. My question is whether or not it did not compel certain publishers to sell to you one or more of their newspapers? I do not mean that the decree required the sale be made to you, but you were the ultimate purchaser.

*See document 2315-PS, vol. IV, p. 1007.

INTERROGATIONS

A. He could sell to anybody as long as this person was politically reliable.

Q. And so, it was just by coincidence you happened to be the purchaser, is that it?

A. Most probably the main reason was that during this revolutionary and confused period, very few had the courage to start a newspaper venture without having previous experience.

Q. We have already discussed the decree of 24 April 1935, with reference to the "scandal press." Now, isn't it a fact that this decree was used or could be used against any newspaper that was not covered by the other two decrees that we have discussed?

A. That decree against scandal sheets was a very clear matter. The person in question either must have had a criminal record or there must have been an investigation already pending against him on a criminal case.

Q. But, the fact of the matter is, a newspaper could be threatened with this decree, is that not so?

A. I for myself would never have used any threat because I did not need any more newspapers.

Q. What about your assistant, Dr. Winkler? Was he above using such threats?

A. He also knew exactly my position that I was not eager to buy additional newspapers.

Q. But you bought them?

A. I only bought newspapers which were offered voluntarily but later on there was a certain pressure on me by the Gauleiters to buy newspapers and those Gauleiters were quite powerful people and they would tell me to buy certain newspapers.

Q. Speaking of Gauleiters, did you ever form a newspaper holding company, by the name of Phoenix?

A. Yes, that is right.

Q. Do you recall the original capital of this financial outfit?

A. Well, the matter about the Phoenix Holding Company was the following. In order to secure for myself the benevolence of the quite dangerous Gauleiters, who always said that the Eher Publishing Company was making money through the Gau newspapers, I founded a separate holding company, the Standarte, and I could always tell the Gauleiters that the profits were put into this holding company and did not reach the Eher Publishing House but were used to increase the business of the Gau newspapers. There was another difference. Into the Phoenix Holding Company, or as we called it, Dachgesellschaft, we took former Catholic newspapers mainly. There was another holding company, I don't recall the name, into which former German national newspapers were absorbed, which Hugenberg could not continue. The last one which continued to exist was the Standarte, and another was the Herold Publishing Company. The purpose of these holding companies was to have a more rigid control of the administration of the newspapers.

Q. Now, as I understand your statement, it is to the effect that the Phoenix Company was the device by which various newspapers were acquired, is that right?

A. No. It was a matter of form so as to make it easier to recognize the previous tendency of the newspaper. If it was a former Center newspaper, and so forth, then it would belong to the Phoenix. If it had another direction formerly it would belong to another holding company.

Q. In other words, it was used for the acquisition of newspapers, was it not?

A. Yes. That is true. But it was not actually the Phoenix Holding Company which acquired newspapers because whatever capital might have been there belonged finally to the Eher Publishing House.

Q. Isn't it true that within less than one year this Phoenix Company acquired 365 newspapers of all types and kinds?

A. I don't believe that it was that much.

Q. How many would you say?

A. Perhaps 60 to 80 and that, I think, is a very high estimate.

Q. Well, how many did the Eher Publishing House acquire in the space of a year, taking the best year of its operations?

A. I cannot say so; I am very weak in figures.

Q. You had substantially completed your acquisition of newspapers by 1938, had you not?

A. I had substantially completed acquisition of newspapers as early as 1936 or 1937.

Q. The party had three hundred newspapers in 1933, and between 1,200 and 1,500 by 1941, and you told me you didn't start acquisition of newspapers until 1935 and now you tell me you completed it in 1937. That means that you had acquired between 800 and 1,100 newspapers in the space of two years.

A. I don't remember the figures anymore. But our administrative office has clear statistics on that.

Q. Would you say the computation I just gave you is incorrect?

A. The Phoenix figure you gave is much too high.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. I am talking about the other figure.

A. In my estimate it seems to be correct.

Q. Would you consider it a fair statement to say that under the decrees, to which we have referred this morning, and the other things to which we have referred, that newspapers were faced with the alternatives of either being ruined and closed down with no compensation received for the properties or of selling out at the price fixed by your representative?

A. I would have objected strongly if anybody would have worked with such a threat.

Q. I am not speaking of that particularly, but I am speaking of the situation where these newspapers were considered politically undesirable or considered scandal sheets or whatever other reasons there were for closing them down. Those are the situations I am referring to. Isn't it a fact in those situations the publishers were faced with the alternative of having their properties closed down, without any compensation being received, or accepting the price that was offered by your representative?

A. I never bought former scandal sheets.

Q. Now, answer my question.

A. He could look for a person who was nationally or politically reliable and try to get the price from him.

Q. You don't seriously contend there was any competitive bidding for these newspapers, do you?

A. Unfortunately there was no competitive bidding. I would have preferred it because with every new newspaper I had additional work.

Q. And yet, you were the only bidder for most of these papers, isn't that right?

A. I gave a specific order to my agents to look for sons or relatives who could continue the business.

Q. Well, my question still remains that when these newspapers were sold you were the only bidder, isn't that right?

A. Well, as nobody else was available I was the only bidder.

Q. Yes. That is what you told me before. I do not see why you were so reluctant to tell me this time.

A. I only wanted to make my point of view clear, that I always followed a fair price policy in the purchases.

XVIII. GOTTLIEB BERGER*

Excerpts from Testimony of Gottlieb Berger, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 19 October 1945, 1450-1615, by Lt. Col. Smith Brookhart, IGD. Captain Mark Priceman, Interpreter; Todd Mitchell, Reporter.

The Fate of Red Cross Parcels for War Prisoners

Q. Will you tell us the circumstances under which you were ordered on or about the first of October 1944, to take charge of prisoners of war affairs under the Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler?

A. On the 29th of September 1944, I was ordered to the general headquarters in East Prussia. This surprised me, for the last time I had been there on the 19th of September. Himmler explained to me that he had taken charge of the administration of the POW's, and that he would put me in charge of this activity. On that evening of the 29th I had to go with him to see Hitler in order to be introduced to him. I asked him then why I should be selected for this task as I did not feel qualified for the job of a guardian of prisoners, and he told me that it was essential that the prisoner of war organization be kept separate from the concentration camps and that no confusion be permitted to take place. He did not want to go into detail as he did not have a clear picture himself at that time, and he said he would have to discuss it with Field Marshal Keitel.

Q. Then what happened?

A. And so that evening I went over to Hitler's place. Himmler came along and, finally, sometime between midnight and one in the morning I was received by Hitler, who immediately began by reprimanding me because he had been under the impression that I had been in charge of this administration for some time.

Q. What did he say, and what did you say?

A. Hitler was then suffering from the effects of the attempt against his life. He was in poor physical condition, could hardly get up by himself, pus was coming out of his right ear, and he was extremely irritable. I could not possibly repeat now the exact wording of the conversation that took place.

Q. State it in substance.

A. As I said, he was extremely irritable. He said that scandalous

*Gottlieb Berger was Chief of Central Office of SS; SS Obergruppenfuehrer and General of Waffen-SS; Inspector-General of Prisoners of War; Head of Policy Division of Reich Ministry for Eastern Territories. See also Document 3728-PS, vol. VI, p. 460.

INTERROGATIONS

conditions prevailed in some of the camps for prisoners of war, that up to fifteen tons of food products had accumulated in some of those camps, and that he had information from officials who had been captured in the uprising in Czechoslovakia to the effect that airborne landings were impending, and we were taking the risk of permitting the landing troops to gain control over those stores of food supplies—food reserves. At this point Himmler intervened, and he suggested that if these food reserves were to be removed expeditiously that the best we could do would be to assign them to the NSV, the National Socialist Welfare organization. Hitler said that he would go along if this was in compliance with international commitments—he used some such term—and in any case, he told me, that by the second of October I would have to issue instructions according to which these food reserves were to be moved within fourteen days, and that whatever remained after that period would be lost to the prisoners of war organization. He also told me that I had been the one who had always been in favor of fair treatment for the eastern prisoners of war, and he said now was the time for me to accept the more unpleasant side of my task of handling them, and, in any case, he wanted to see a copy of the order that I was to issue. As I said, this whole field was entirely new to me, and I didn't know at that time what sort of food products were concerned. When riding back with Himmler I asked him about them and only then I learned from him that these were mercy parcels for prisoners of war which had been transmitted through the Red Cross.

XIX. NIKOLAUS VON FALKENHORST*

Excerpts of Testimony of Nikolaus von Falkenhorst, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 24 October 1945, 1050-1230, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD. Also present: Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Anne Daniels, Reporter.

Planning and Execution of the Attack on Norway

A. In February of 1940, I was in the maneuver area in Bavaria—Grafenwoehr in Bavaria. There I received a telegram ordering me to come at once to Berlin to the Fuehrer.

*Nikolaus von Falkenhorst was a professional soldier with rank of General-oberst (General). He was commander of the 21st Army (Army of Norway) and Commanding General in Norway until January 1945, when he was relieved. See also document 3151-PS, vol. V, p. 912.

Q. On what approximate date?

A. I arrived in Berlin on either the 20th or 21st of February. Q. 1940?

A. Yes. 1940. Then on the next day at 11 o'clock, I reported to the Fuehrer in the Reich Chancellery. There I received the order to conduct operations against Denmark and Norway.*

Q. Who else was there at the time?

A. You mean in that room?

Q. Yes.

A. I believe only Field Marshal Keitel. It is also possible that General Jodl was there. I don't know that any more. However, I know that Keitel was there for certain. The enterprise against Norway and Denmark had been decided on by the Fuehrer. The Fuehrer had said to Keitel: "We will do this now. The question is what General to choose for it."

Q. Now, let's just stop for a minute. Did you learn at that conference for how long a time the plans had been under consideration for the attack on Norway?

A. I can't name it exactly, but it was my impression that the whole thing dated back to the fall of 1939.

Q. Now, do you recall from what part of the conversation you gained that impression?

A. That was because it was explained to me that the operation had been worked out by a special staff or a special group of officers in the OKW during the winter.

Q. And by whom were you told that at the conference?

A. The Fuehrer himself.

Q. And was anything said about who the members of that special committee had been?

A. No. Keitel must know that. May I make a statement?

Q. Yes.

A. It was my impression that the thought of the plan had already existed during the winter, and if I am not mistaken, the Fuehrer told me that. It always had been put aside though, because more important things came up all the time, especially the campaign against France and Belgium. Then came the incident in the Jossingfjord between the German ship, "Altmark," and the English ship, "Cossack," and that was on either the 16th or 17th of February.

Q. What year?

A. 1940.

*See documents C-174, vol. VI, p. 1003; 1809-PS, vol. IV, pp. 377, 385 (entry for 21 Feb.).

See document C-63, vol. VI, p. 883.

The British cruiser "Cossack" attacked the German steamer "Altmark" in Norwegian territorial waters, 16 Feb. 1940. They released and returned to a British port about 300 British prisoners who had been captured from seven British merchant ships sunk by the German warship "Graf Spee."

INTERROGATIONS

Q. All right.

A. This put the whole thing back in motion, or rather, it let it become acute again. That is because two or three days later I was ordered there. That happened on either the 16th or 17th of February, and then I was called on the 20th.

In other words, the incident of the Jossingfjord conditioned the decision to carry out the plan now.

Q. And was that so stated at the conference?

A. No. It was not. However, I sensed the nervousness that was caused by the Jossingfjord affair. Apart from that, the Fuehrer told me that the government of the Reich had knowledge or intelligence that the English intended to land in Norway, and then I received my mission and also the reasons for it.

Q. Now wait just a moment. Prior to the date of this conference with the Fuehrer, had you heard anything about proposed plans for the invasion of Norway?

A. No. Never. If I may be perfectly frank, this conference was the first time that I ever talked with the Fuehrer.

Q. Well, let's go back to the conference and tell me everything which was said at the conference from the beginning to the end.

A. I came to this conference because the Fuehrer had asked Marshal Keitel, "Which General should we take for this conference?" Then Sergeant—I mean Field-Marshal Keitel, suggested me for this. I was chosen for this operation because previously I had been in Finland. Thus I had already been in one overseas operation. The Fuehrer asked General Keitel whether there was any General available who was experienced in an overseas operation, and Keitel said, "Yes, we have General Falkenhorst." The Fuehrer answered, "Well, I don't know him, but I would like to have him come here so that I can see him."

I entered the room and I was made to sit down on a chair. Then I had to tell the Fuehrer about the operations in Finland in 1918. That is, how the transportation had worked out, our cooperation with the Navy, and so on. He said, "Sit down and just tell me how it was," and I did.

Then we got up and he led me to a table that was covered with maps. He said, "We are concerned with something similar this time, an occupation of Norway." Then he pointed to the map and he said, "This is the intelligence; The Reich Government has knowledge that the British intend to make a landing in Norway."

Q. Did he say on what that was based?

A. No. He did not name to me the reasons or the sources from which the Reich Government had received that intelligence.

Then he told me the reasons why this operation had to be carried out. He said that it was important in the conduct of the war, that it was necessary in the conduct of the war, and decisive for the conduct of the war; and especially the last thing, decisive in the conduct of the war.

The reasons were, first the strategic outflanking by England would lead them to the Baltic. He further said that there were no troops in the Baltic, and that thus the coast was not protected. He furthermore said that there were no fortresses, no coast fortifications, and no coast artillery there. He said that through the Baltic the English could make a stab into Berlin and into the heart of Germany.

He furthermore said that the successes in the East—that is, in Poland in 1939—and the successes that were to come in France in 1940, would do him no good because if such a stab were allowed, the spine of both fronts would be broken.

That was the first point, namely, strategic outflanking.

The second point that he made, was the freedom of operations for the German Navy from the Bay of Wilhelmshaven. This freedom would be curtailed in this Bay if the English were to remain in Scotland and Norway, because then we could no longer leave that area.

The third point was imports from overseas along the Norwegian coast, especially ores from Norway.

Those were the three reasons that he gave, and he again said, "important for the conduct of the war, necessary for the conduct of the war, and decisive in the conduct of the war." He emphasized those three points again.

Q. In other words, he made it clear that this was a vital part of the overall plan for the entire war. Is that right?

A. Yes. Absolutely.

Q. And there is no question in your mind about that. Is that right?

A. No. If the Fuehrer tells me that in the presence of Keitel, I have no doubts about it.

Q. And will it refresh your recollection if I suggest to you that Jodl was there also?

A. I think it is possible. I just don't know that any more. I think it is possible. However, Keitel was there for certain.

Q. Well, Jodl's diary shows that he was there.

A. Yes, all well and good if it says that he was there, then he was. I just don't remember it. I talked to the Fuehrer constantly while I was there.

Q. Now, what else was said?

A. I was told that the Fuehrer was charging me with this operation, that soon he would launch the operations against the West, and that he needed this closed front for the protection of the coast. He charged me with the mission and he told me that the Supreme Command of the Army would put five divisions at my disposal. It was again said that the thing had been worked out during the winter and that only the larger harbors and the towns situated there would be considered for a landing.

INTERROGATIONS

This thing was not directed against the Norwegian people. It was his intention to occupy only the coasts of Norway and Denmark.

He dismissed me and said that I should come back at 5 o'clock that afternoon and tell him in outline just what my plans were. That is, how I was going to use the five divisions and what my working program was going to be.

Q. Did he explain how Belgium, Holland, Luxemburg were to fit into the general plan?

A. No, not on this occasion. Everything happened very fast. At 11 o'clock there was always a map report to the Fuehrer, and when I came in, all those gentlemen were waiting there already. He just took me in and explained the thing briefly to me, and then he told me that I was dismissed, and he said that he was waiting for the map report.

Q. Well now, what, if anything, did Keitel say in the course of this conference?

A. He didn't say anything, only when I got out afterwards he shook my hand. He said that things had not been planned like that. It had been planned that I was to be merely introduced to the Fuehrer because he had said he didn't know me. However, Keitel also was surprised that I had already received a mission.

Q. And what, if anything, did you say in the course of this conference other than what you have already told us?

A. Nothing at all. If I may make this statement here, I went away from there and went to town and bought a Baedeker, a travel guide, in order to find out just what Norway was like. I didn't have any idea, and I had to find out what all the harbors were, how many inhabitants there were, and just what kind of a country it was. I had no idea about the whole thing.

Q. Jodl's diary says that you accepted that appointment joyfully. Is that correct?*

A. Well, I was so surprised, I really don't know. I was so surprised that right then and there I didn't know what to say. I hadn't penetrated the material or the whole thing at all, and I didn't even know what I was facing.

*See document 1809-PS, vol. IV, pp. 377, 385 (entry for 21 Feb.).

Q. Well, what did you do between the close of the conference and 5 o'clock that afternoon?

A. I went to my hotel and I worked on this Baedeker, and I thought about what to do with these five divisions. Then, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, I went back to the Reich Chancellery, that is, back to the Fuehrer.

Q. And who else was there?

A. Keitel must have certainly been there, and it is likely that Jodl was there. It may have been that he went out and came back, but I think he was there too. He must have been there.

Q. Now tell us what happened at this conference.

A. I went back at 5 o'clock and we again went back to the map table. We talked about the five divisions and what was to be done with them. During the study and the work that had gone before in the winter, it was thought that one division was to be committed at Oslo, one at Stavanger, one at Bergen, one at Narvik, and one at Trondheim. There wasn't much else you could do, because they were the large harbors.

Q. Where had you learned that there was the plan previously agreed upon?

A. The Fuehrer told me that. He said that he had ordered the study to be made, and it was carried out in the OKW.

Q. Were those previous plans in writing?

A. I never saw the plans. If I may, however, I would like to offer you another thought here. I think that Captain Kranke of the Navy, later Admiral Kranke, was involved in that, because if you want to carry on operations overseas, you just have to do it with the help of the Navy, and I think he worked on those plans.

Q. All right.

A. Then, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon it was discussed again that there was one great danger in this whole enterprise, namely, the English fleet at large. The Fuehrer insisted on absolute secrecy so that the British would not receive any knowledge of our intentions. The Fuehrer personally took me under oath, or quasi under oath, by shaking my hand. Then I received authorization at once to transfer my staff from Koblenz to Berlin; however, only those that were absolutely necessary for the work.

Then I also received a consultant from the Navy—that is, Captain Kranke, or Admiral Kranke—and a Colonel from the Air Forces. I furthermore received an order to establish my office and the place where we were going to work in the Reich War Ministry. A small passage was cleared for us, and we were completely separate there. I believe there was even a guard there, and we were completely alone. We used the word "Weseruebung" for camouflage, and as the code name for that operation.

INTERROGATIONS

That is essentially what was discussed after 5 o'clock that afternoon.

If I may repeat it again in summary, the plan and the idea as such was fixed. I was only put into the picture so that I could effect the actual military execution of those plans.

The Fuehrer also said to me—and I must leave it open now whether this was on the 20th or possibly two days later—that things were very urgent and that I should hurry up with my work. He was very worried that an English operation would preclude ours. Then I was dismissed.

First I went back to Koblenz and got those of my staff whom I wanted to have up there. Then I went to the Reich Chancellery every second day and reported to either Keitel or the Fuehrer on the progress of the operation. I was able to report on the 20th of March that I had concluded my preparations; that included all the work, for instance, concerning logistics, and also how troop transports should be loaded, and so on.

There was one innovation here, and that was a thought that originated with the Fuehrer, namely, that troops were not to be loaded on troop transports, but on men-of-war. I believe his thought was that if we were to put together a fleet of transports, that then the English would get to know about it and interfere. Thus, all the troops were loaded on to the warships, that is, just as many as they could possibly hold; and destroyers, cruisers, battle cruisers and battleships were used for that. Since we only had a very small navy, it was impossible to load the total of the five divisions on those ships. Thus, a fleet of transports was commandeered which was to follow the first wave. They were to transport the additional troops, supplies of food, horses, and vehicles of all kinds.

This transport fleet was not to travel in a closed convoy, but in waves, so that, say, each day one ship would arrive, or something like that, so that not too many of them would be at sea at one time. For instance, it so happened that only ten destroyers went to the northernmost point, that is, Narvik. Then there was an interval because the next boats went to Trondheim. They were cruisers and they left some few days later because it was not so far. The same applied to Bergen, Stavanger, and Oslo. That is, it was a little at a time, and by this method the whole thing was loosened up, so to speak.

I asked what the starting date of the operation was going to be, and this was determined by the Navy. At first the 8th of April was suggested as the starting date of the operation. That is the last day when there are still some Northern lights at dawn on the Norwegian coast.

Q. Who had charge of the naval end?

A. Admiral Raeder. Grand-Admiral Raeder was responsible for the fleet. My consultant was Admiral Kranke; and he, on the other side, worked with Schwindt. He had a command in the fleet under Raeder, but Raeder was responsible for the whole thing.

Things were handled like this in Germany: If we were aboard a warship, we had no command jurisdiction. In other words, all orders, decisions, and so forth, were made by the Navy. I ordered where the ships were to proceed to, but during the actual trip the Navy had the entire responsibility. Thus it happened that the Navy had such an important part in this.

Q. Well now, you say the first plan was to make the initial attack on 8 April; is that right?

A. Then it was put on the 9th of April because we had suffered damage to the propellers of some ships from ice in the Baltic.

Q. Was it a part of the plan to attack on a dark night?

A. The application of a dark night in this attack was not discussed at all. The dawn, as such, played a great part in this, and the meteorologists worked out that the most favorable time would be between 5:15 and 5:30 a.m. Before 5:15 it would be very dark, and after 5:30 it would be practically daylight, because the midnight sun is very strong in those parts.

There were several batteries of coast artillery on the Norwegian coast, and they would be silenced first. There were several of them at Christiansund and also at Bergen, and crews had to be taken from the warships and put ashore by motor boats. All this had to be done in the time between 5:15 and 5:30.

Then it was ordered that for the whole front, right down from Narvik, Trondheim, Stavanger, Christiansund, Oslo, and Bergen, and also Denmark, 5:15 a.m. of the 9th of April 1940, was to be regarded as zero hour; that is, as the actual beginning of this operation.

Q. Whose orders were those?

A. This whole thing was worked out with the calculations that the Navy made. The Navy and I agreed on that order, and we submitted it to the Fuehrer and he approved it. This agreed with all the desires of the Navy.

Of course, the specific order that at 5:15 all those boats were to be at their positions—that is, facing those ports—naturally was given by Grand-Admiral Raeder.

INTERROGATIONS

Now, here is quite another thing that happened in addition. A so-called diplomatic step was to be taken at 5:15 a.m. on that day. This diplomatic step was to be effected in such a way that the two envoys in Copenhagen and Oslo—it was Minister von Renthe-Fink in Copenhagen and Brauer in Oslo—were to take a written representation to the governments to which they were accredited at 5:15 a.m. on the same date. I have no idea as to what the contents of those representations were. I only knew of the intention to make such representations.

Then, when I left Berlin to go to my command post at Hamburg, I again reminded Keitel that such a diplomatic step was to be taken, so it would not be forgotten.

Q. What, if anything, did Ribbentrop have to do with this operation?

A. I don't know. I really don't know what he had to do with it. It was my impression that the Fuehrer did this thing alone, and only informed Ribbentrop about it at the very last moment for the sake of secrecy. I believe it was just at the very last moment. At any rate, I know that it was because of the secrecy of the operation.

It seems to me that as far as the negotiations that were entered into by Brauer in Oslo were concerned, there was a rider calling for negotiations with Quisling. I know that in Denmark, the discussions between Minister Renthe-Fink and the Danish King resulted in quick success. They would have led to success in Oslo also if the negotiations had been undertaken with the Norwegian King, who is the brother of the Danish King, and if it had not been insisted upon that Quisling was to head the Government.

I was already in Oslo—that is, I had already landed there—and Brauer was still negotiating with the King about it.

This was not acceptable to the King. He was willing to negotiate as his brother had done in the case of Denmark. He realized that primarily it was our wish to occupy the coast of Norway. However, it was not acceptable to him to have Quisling in the government. Naturally, I regretted this very much because this whole thing only meant one thing to me, namely, combat. Otherwise it would have been a peaceful occupation, just as it happened in the case of Denmark. We didn't want to fight there. All we wanted to do was to be able to occupy the coast.

I must make one addition to the narrative that I have related to you so far.

Just before I went to Hamburg—it was either on the last day of March, that is, the 31st day of March, or on the 1st of April—the Fuehrer called together all the Admirals and Generals concerned in this operation, and discussed the operation with them.

Q. On what date was this?

A. I am sorry, I don't have my diary any more, but it was either at the end of March or the beginning of April. It could have been on either the 31st or the 30th of March or the 1st of April or the 2nd of April. That is, just as I explained, either the end of March or the beginning of April.

This discussion started at 11 in the morning and lasted until 7 in the evening.

Q. Where did it take place?

A. In the Reich Chancellery. He talked to each single General and each single Admiral. He listened to each General and had him explain exactly what his task was, even to the commanders of the boats, and he discussed with them whether they would drop men to the left or to the right of a certain objective. He went into everything. It was his idea. It was his plan. It was his war.

Naturally, the Navy was much involved in this because they were responsible for the ships. Goering was not very much interested in this. Brauchitsch did not participate in it at all.

I directed the operations from Hamburg. I lived in Hamburg and I was in Hamburg on the famous day, the 9th of April, the day of the landing. I lived there together with the Commanding General of the Air Forces for that operation.

Q. Who was that?

A. General Lackner. He was the Commanding General of the Tenth Corps of the Air Forces.

Then on my left I had the North Sea Naval Station at Wilhelmshaven, and on my right I had the Baltic Naval Station at Kiel. Thus it was the best possible place for me to be; and it was facilitated for me to receive the reports of the Navy about the landing because the whole first phase was carried out by the Navy. Because this whole landing did not take place according to plan, and especially at Oslo, I stayed in Hamburg during the entire day and night.

Then, on the 10th of April I flew to Oslo by plane. I landed at 5 o'clock in the afternoon at the airport of Oslo, where Minister Brauer received me. He was there. He told me at once that his mission had failed because of that rider about Quisling. He made all kinds of other suggestions, and since the only cable and telephone connection to Berlin ended in my official residence, he stayed with me and made all his telephone calls from there.

He made several suggestions there, and he also asked me whether I would agree to strike out this Quisling condition. I said I would, and he was to telephone to Berlin to say that I was agreed in that, because it was my ambition to prevent any combat if I could.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Who had insisted upon the Quisling rider in the first place?

A. All that originated from the Fuehrer. That must have been contained in the directive. However, I never saw this general directive because I left before it was issued, but Keitel will know that.

The answer that came back from Berlin was very simple. Brauer was dismissed and sent somewhere else. Thus his activities in Oslo as a German envoy came to an abrupt halt, and we understood that they were not content with him.

Then a Reich Commissioner was appointed, and he was the former Gauleiter of Essen, Terboven. He was transported in an awful hurry to Berlin by plane, and then from Berlin he was put on another plane and sent to Oslo. Thus was initiated the activity of Terboven, who naturally supported Quisling with everything at his disposal.

That is how the chapter of Terboven-Quisling came into being.

Q. Well, what happened next? Now we have you out at the airfield at Oslo.

A. I went into quarters at Oslo. Then started the elimination of resistance, which was showing up in many places of the country because the order for mobilization had been made public there. The mobilization was never effected entirely. In other words, we arrived in the middle of mobilization. But then, north of Oslo, we suddenly encountered the British. The British had landed at Aandalsnes and Namsos. Some of the harbors remained open because we did not have enough warships to land in all of them. The English recognized this immediately and landed there.

Then followed the fight against the British at the road between Aandalsnes and Namsos, around Lillehammer, Otta, Dombaasnes, and Namsos.

The Fuehrer again repeated his request for me to hurry, because he did not want to start the operation against France unless the Norwegian operation was completed. He wanted to have the security of the coast, and he wanted to be covered, up there.

I have to make a further addition here so the significance of this won't be forgotten.

We started our operation on the 9th of April. At the beginning of April, on either the 5th or 6th of April, the English laid mines along the Norwegian coast. This caused extreme nervousness in Berlin because the Fuehrer and the OKW both thought to observe in this the first preparations for an English landing, and they were given to the apprehension that both of these landings would coincide.

After we were able to cause the English to go back to their boats at Aandalsnes, we moved our command post. We now had communications with Trondheim, and we moved our command post there, and I lived there together with the representative of the Air Forces, Stumpff, and also with Admiral Boehm, the representative of the Navy.

Now comes the last phase of our fight in Norway, namely, the fight for Narvik.

In Narvik things really had come to a head because only very few troops could be transported on those ten destroyers. Through the neglect of the Navy, the English had been able to penetrate the harbor of Narvik on the 10th of April, and they shot up every last one of those ten destroyers. The leader of those destroyers and the commandant of the flotilla there, Captain Bonte, was killed in that engagement.

Thus it was made very difficult to give any support to General Dietl, who was in charge at Narvik. It had been prepared that a fleet of transports should come to bring him further troops and supplies, but naturally they could not come there.

The Norwegian mobilization had been effected fully at Narvik, and there was located the Sixth Norwegian Division. Also, the Supreme Commander of the Norwegian Army was there, General Ruge; and somewhere around there—I am sorry that I cannot give you the name of the place now, but somewhere around there—was also His Majesty the King. I believe it was Tromsoe or Harstat. Then, in addition to that, the English landed there.

In addition to that, we also faced French mountain troops and Polish troops. The French troops were under General Bethouart. I have forgotten the name of the Polish Commander, but at any rate General Dietl faced great superiority.

Then, General Dietl was pressed further up on to the mountain, and it couldn't happen any differently there. There are some terrific mountains there, and they were pressed back against the Swedish border. They lay there with their backs to it in a half circle. It was extremely difficult to furnish any support to General Dietl. The only way we could do it was via the air forces. However, this could only be done on some days, because there was much fog and poor visibility up there.

However, at the beginning of June I seemed to detect a crisis in the situation at Narvik. I had a support action under way at that time, and I was using mountain troops which tried to bring support to General Dietl in the way Alpine troops usually do; that is, by establishing small stations here and there for supply. This was more an expedition than anything else. That is, small groups of the men made their way up there in order to bring him supplies and new men, and it was something in the nature of the climb of the mountain Nanga Parbat.

INTERROGATIONS

Then I had a telegraphic communication with the OKW and I made the suggestion to Keitel that possibly the Navy could make an attack from the sea, say, on Harstat, in order to bring some help to Dietl from the outside. Most of the warships at that time were still in Trondheim; they were not under my command. Anything that was floating was under Admiral Raeder's jurisdiction.

Then came the day of Dunkirk, and as a consequence of Dunkirk, England recalled the forces that had been at Narvik. This was to the complete surprise of General Ruge. General Ruge had made a visit to the English headquarters in the morning, and they had discussed things. Then, when he came back at 12 o'clock noon, he was told that the English were moving out. He said, "That is impossible; that can't be done. I talked to them this morning." He said, "We will have to check up on that and, if necessary, we will telephone to London." That they did, and London said, "No, they are moving out."

On that day I received a request from Berlin. It said that a request had been received from Stockholm for the neutralization of northern Norway. I can only imagine that this suggestion originated with General Ruge—that is, with the consent of the Norwegian King—and that then the proposal was put to Berlin through Stockholm. With that, northern Norway was to be made a neutral area.

Then terrific detonations took place in the harbor of Narvik, and personally I thought this was due to the actions of German warships. In reality, it was the English who were moving out, and who effected the last destructions.

Then General Dietl advanced. He received reports from the front that the enemy had disappeared, and thus he gradually moved back down the mountain and into Narvik. The German warships were there, although they had not come into the harbor of Narvik—they were further out, near the Lofoten Islands—and they fired upon the retreating English warships and transports. There was an engagement there.

The events of Narvik, as such, were concluded on the 10th of June. Then an armistice was arranged with General Ruge, and also negotiations were entered into about the capitulation of this Sixth Norwegian Division, which I mentioned before. Thus all combat action was ended in Norway, and we proceeded to occupy the coast. The operation against Denmark was completed too. We only occupied the coast there, and the other Danish Islands—that is, Faroe, Zealand, and so on—were not occupied. We only had one battalion in Copenhagen; only one battalion there.

That is how the operation in Norway took place.

XX. FRANZ HALDER*

Excerpts from Testimony of Franz Halder, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 25 February 1946, 1415-1730, by Capt. Sam Harris, JAGD. Also present: Dr. Jan Charmatz, Interpreter; Miss Jean Tuck, Reporter.

Plots to Overthrow the Nazi Government, 1938-40

Q. When did you first participate in any plans against the Nazi Government?

A. It is hard to say, that is chronologically, to fix a time. I can only tell the development of things. The opposition against Hitler existed in the older officers' corps at a very early moment. May I remind you that the chief of the Heeresleitung (high command of the army), Freiherr von Hammerstein, was a very sharp opponent of Hitler's. But he was removed during the very first days of Hitler's power. Whereas, up to Hammerstein's time, and when von Seeckt was chief of the Heeresleitung, the older officers' corps kept clear of political matters, Hammerstein expressed his especial opposition to Hitler in every possible way.

Q. In the early period, I am interested only in general developments. After 1938 we will be more particular.

A. I mention this because the attitude of Hammerstein is one of the reasons or motivations for the attitude of the officers' corps against Hitler. There were some other things in addition to this—the persecution of political opponents after the taking over of power, the terrible events at the Roehm Putsch, Schleicher, Bredow, Kahr, etc. In addition to that, the persecution of the Jews; the struggle against the church. The officers' corps as a whole had been brought up according to rules of the church. This as a whole gives a latent opposition to Hitler and this is the basis

*Franz Halder fought in World War I, joined the Reichswehr in 1919, entered the Reichswehr Ministry in 1921, and then returned to the Army. He was promoted to Colonel in 1931, Major General in 1934, Lieutenant General in 1936, Artillery General in 1938, and became Chief of the General Staff of the Army in December 1938 which position he held until October 1942. He was arrested after the 20 July 1944 attempt on Hitler's life, although not a participant in the plot. See document 3702-PS, vol. VI, p. 411; affidavit H, vol. VIII, p. 643.

INTERROGATIONS

for the later attitude towards Hitler. This opposition flared up especially after the removal of General von Fritsch and more particularly afterwards, when the highly esteemed General Beck was removed.

Q. What happened after General Beck's removal?

A. When General Beck told me that he was leaving and that I was supposed to be his successor, I told him that the time for memoranda was over. General Beck had shortly before submitted a memorandum to Hitler which had annoyed Hitler extremely. I told him that I regretted his going away and that force could only be met by force.

Q. What was the date of Beck's memorandum?

A. As far as I remember, Beck's memorandum was submitted in June or July.

Q. What was the substance of that memorandum?

A. Beck's memorandum was the result of an extensive military study in which the situation in the winter of 1937 played an important role. A military study is a task which is solved. In the winter of 1937-1938, before a selected audience, the problem was solved, and in this the commander-in-chief of the army took part.

Q. What was the date of this conference?

A. This conference was in 1938, about March, but the so-called study was before. It might even have been April.

Q. What was the nature of the problem that was studied?

A. By that time the question had been raised and treated as to how Germany should behave in the event of an armed conflict in which Czechoslovakia and France took part, that is, where Germany would be attacked on both sides.

Q. Was this the first of such studies?

A. As far as I know, a study had been done in 1937.

Q. What date in 1937?

A. About the summer.

Q. Who participated in the March 1938 conference?

A. The men in charge of the whole project, senior general staff officers and commanders of the military defense commands, Wehrkreiskommandos. I did not take part myself in the study; I only took part in the final conference.

Q. What were the conclusions at which the participants in the conference arrived?

A. The conclusion was that in a war of two fronts—France on the one side and Czechoslovakia on the other—it would be possible to have initial successes against the weaker opponent, i.e., Czechoslovakia.

slovakia. But at the time that these successes in the East could be reached the military situation in the West would have become so bad that the final outcome would be a defeat for Germany.

Q. Did England figure as a factor in these calculations?

A. As far as I know, no. I do not know if it had been mentioned, but as a factor in that game it had not been considered.

Q. Can you fix the date of the conference more precisely? Was it before or after the absorption of Austria?

A. As far as I remember, afterwards.

Q. But the study which was considered at the conference extended over a period which preceded the absorption of Austria?

A. As far as I remember, yes.

Q. Let us now return to the Beck memorandum. What was there in it which annoyed Hitler, as you previously stated?

A. In this memorandum, Beck said that any action of armed conflict would lead to a world war and therefore warned against any action of policy which might lead to an armed conflict. Beck submitted this memorandum to the commander of the army at that time, General von Brauchitsch, who was to submit it to Hitler.

Q. Did Beck give you a copy of the memorandum?

A. I received this memorandum when Beck transferred his office to me.

Q. Where is it now?

A. I have no notion. I only know that at that time it was in my safe. Brauchitsch confirmed the ideas of this memorandum 100 percent. He called together all the commanding generals and group commanders and made public this memorandum.

Q. Made it public? You mean to a limited circle?

A. The leading generals. The generals fully agreed with this memorandum. In the meantime, Adolf Hitler, who had his spies everywhere, heard about the memorandum. Of course it took a few days before it was presented to Hitler, but already Hitler had asked where it was. Then Brauchitsch submitted the memorandum to him. I was not present at this conference. I therefore know only what Brauchitsch told me about it. He told me the following: He handed the memorandum to Hitler and in broad outline expressed the warning of a policy leading to war.

Q. What was the nature of the warning?

A. The military defeat of Germany. According to the description by Brauchitsch, Hitler said that he, as responsible leader of Germany, must decline all assumptions that his policy would bring about a military conflict.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Conflict or defeat?

A. In the very end it is both, but conflict only was spoken of.

Q. What else did Brauchitsch report?

A. That Hitler's main interest was who got this memorandum. He wondered who might have read it because he was troubled. Brauchitsch replied that only the generals and some higher officers of the OKH had learned about the memorandum. I cannot say more because I did not learn more from Brauchitsch.

Q. What did you say the date of Beck's memorandum was?

A. According to what Brauchitsch told me, it must have been July.

Q. The memorandum, I take it, was based upon the study and the conference which took place in April?

A. Yes.

Q. How do you explain the long interval between April when the conference was concluded, and July, when Beck submitted the memorandum?

A. In the OKH they worked not only on the memorandum. The General Staff was working on the reorganization of the Austrian army and many other things. This was a private affair of Beck's. As far as I know, Beck worked out several drafts—he was a very conscientious worker—but only the final draft was given to Brauchitsch. Of course, Beck knew about the importance of that document—he had to weigh every word of it.

Q. When did Beck resign?

A. On the 31st of August 1938, he handed over his office to me. Furthermore, this so-called resignation was only the consequence of an order of Hitler's and the reason was Beck's memorandum.

Q. Did you inherit from Beck any plans for the invasion of Czechoslovakia?

A. Yes, in May of that year an order was given by Hitler for military pressure on Czechoslovakia which had to be organized that way so that the culminating point was on 1 October. This was done in execution of the orders of the OKW. These were written orders.

Q. I take it, therefore, that even after Beck's memorandum reached Hitler in July 1938, plans continued to be made by Beck and others to carry out the order of May 1938?

A. Yes, it was a military order.

Q. Why wasn't Beck dismissed in July rather than late August, if, as you say, his memorandum precipitated his dismissal?

A. I do not know that, because I do not know the train of thoughts of this enigmatic man, Hitler. Even though I took over the office on 1 September, this change was not made public until 1 November.

Q. What ideas were expressed by Beck to you at the time of his dismissal?

A. We talked about our common opposition against Hitler and then we talked about the danger which this man represented for Germany.

Q. Did you lay any plans with Beck for Hitler's removal?

A. Not with Beck, because Beck at that time was still of the opinion that we should not aim at a revolutionary change, but that an evolution would still bring about Hitler's removal.

Q. What kind of evolution?

A. Beck thought of making known to wider circles that memorandum to Hitler, but I told him at the time that he did not know or understand beasts like Hitler. With such a man or beast you can only compete by using force.

Q. Did you communicate with anyone other than Beck concerning the forcible removal of Hitler?

A. At the time when I became successor to Beck I did.

Q. With whom?

A. With the men of the OKW, who I knew shared the same views, i.e., Oster and Canaris.

Q. When did you contact Canaris on this matter?

A. I had had contact with Canaris before, but immediately after I took up office, Canaris came to see me.

Q. Had you discussed this with Canaris before?

A. No, not the question of a definite plan.

Q. But in a general way?

A. There was an exchange of thoughts, that this system must be removed, but no specific plans.

Q. When, if ever, did Canaris submit a specific plan to you?

A. Canaris never submitted plans. He was the sort of man from whom you learned things and who had possible communications with people whom you did not want to meet in public. I want to describe Canaris as an instigator—a man who instigated but never formulated anything.

Q. Who did the actual formulation?

A. Von Witzleben in 1938.

Q. When was your first contact with von Witzleben on this matter?

A. I had known von Witzleben for a long time. He was my predecessor in Muenster. During the first days of September, he came to me to discuss the overthrow of Hitler.

Q. Did he come at Canaris' suggestion?

INTERROGATIONS

A. I do not know. Canaris and von Witzleben never were together. I want to say once more that Canaris never made plans. He was only an instigator of the opposition as a whole. The circle which decided on definite measures was quite separate from the general circle of opposition. If you wanted to start such a plan you had to limit the circle of people active in it to the very minimum. Everyone who knew anything meant a danger. Therefore, I would not talk to people about such things who could not help me. Canaris could not help me. The information I got from Canaris I got without telling him of a definite plan.

Q. Who, besides von Witzleben, were in the immediate group which formulated plans?

A. In order to execute such a military action of force, you must have commanders of troops, those men whose orders are executed immediately by the troops. Von Witzleben gave the task to some of his commanders who were under his orders. May I answer this question by saying that I am sure the commander of the division in Potsdam was in it, a man named Brockdorff-Rantzau—a Major General.

Q. Any others?

A. You see, there is a distinct division between von Witzleben's part in the affair, and my own. Military action was von Witzleben's part.

Q. What was your part?

A. My task was to fix the date when it should take place; and when von Witzleben had done his part, to initiate the commander-in-chief of the army, Brauchitsch.

Q. What do you mean by "initiate" him?

A. To make him effective.

Q. In what respect?

A. If a military putsch is effective and the legal government ceases, then something else must take its place. In the discussions with von Witzleben, I took the stand that I would take part only if future conditions of Government were defined by the German people themselves. In the transitory period from the moment when Hitler ceased to be and the new rule came, this could be done only by an intermediate Government. This was a state which had reigned in Germany under the Weimar Republic. For a short time Seeckt had taken over the executive power, and the Reich Government had retired for a period. Such a transitory period was necessary in order to give the German people a chance to make up their minds and to show to the German people what sort of men were at the head of the German state. The material for this enlightenment of the people had been collected by other people, like Canaris.

Q. Do I understand you to say that during this period, Brauchitsch was to be head of the state?

A. Yes. I did not talk over these things with Brauchitsch because I wanted to tell him at the very last moment. We had thought of a civilian as the eventual head of such a Government.

Q. Like whom?

A. Von Neurath. The name Gessler had also been mentioned. These were only those which I wanted to submit to Brauchitsch at the very last moment.

Q. Hadn't you spoken to him about this before?

A. I had never talked expressly to Brauchitsch about this. But he knew my attitude and he had a notion of what was going on. Once he came to see me when von Witzleben was with me, and von Witzleben spoke in such a way that Brauchitsch could not help but understand unless he was deaf. May I say why I did that. It is clear that such an opinion of the state of Adolf Hitler could be betrayed any moment. It might not succeed. In this case I had to keep apart my commander-in-chief. I had to keep him clear of this. I may play with my own head, but not someone else's.

It had been planned to occupy by military force the Reich Chancellery and those Reich offices, particularly Ministries, which were administered by Party members, and close supporters of Hitler, with the express intention of avoiding bloodshed and then trying the group before the whole German nation. As to the police force, Count Helldorf, the police president of Berlin and its environs who was a Party member, was at the disposal of the plan.

Q. Had you drawn up a slate of officers to succeed the Nazis you planned to depose?

A. No, I am a soldier, not a politician. This had to be prescribed by the person who would be head of this new Government, von Neurath, or Gessler, or even Noske.

Q. Noske, who was that?

A. A Social-Democrat. He was president of Hanover.

Q. Were there others besides von Witzleben, Helldorf, and Brockdorff-Rantzau in the immediate circle which was charged with the execution of the plot?

A. Not that I know of.

Q. Do you know of any persons besides Canaris who were in what you term the "general circle of opposition"?

INTERROGATIONS

A. In Canaris' circle, it was mostly General Oster. Furthermore, other persons without any connection with Canaris, or without any connection I could see, came to say that the army should remove Hitler.

Q. Who?

A. For example, Goerdeler and Schacht.

Q. When did Schacht come to see you?

A. That was the end of September 1938—quite shortly before the visit of Mr. Chamberlain to Munich was announced.

Q. What was the purpose of his visit?

A. The purpose of his visit was to convince me that Hitler must be removed and that only the army had the possibility of doing this.

Q. What reasons, if any, did he advance?

A. There was an enormous depression among all judicious German people who feared an armed conflict on account of the Sudeten question. It was felt that Hitler was impossible as head of our German people and that he was leading us only into misery.

Q. Had you known Schacht before this visit?

A. I knew Schacht only superficially. I knew that he was a man of prestige and that he was friendly with Beck. My attention had been drawn to Schacht by one of my collaborators, who only later became important with respect to this question, that is General Wagner, Quartermaster General. Furthermore, I knew about Schacht from Oster, who was the intermediary in the visit of Schacht.

Q. In what respect had Wagner drawn your attention to Schacht?

A. He told me that the attitude of Schacht was very sharply against Hitler.

Q. In what particulars?

A. That he deplored all the baseness of the system of Adolf Hitler which was built up on lies and murder, and that he deplored them to the highest degree. I do not remember that questions of foreign policy had even been mentioned by Wagner.

Q. Did Beck ever speak to you about Schacht?

A. I only heard from others that Schacht belonged to a circle which met with Beck and among whom were Goerdeler and Popitz. I heard this only in conversations and therefore cannot take an oath on it.

Q. How did Schacht come to visit you?

A. He was brought there by Colonel Oster; and Schacht was accompanied by another man whom I saw for the first time, by the name of Gisevius.

Q. Who was Gisevius?

A. I only know that Gisevius at that time was in the SD service, and I think Beck had the SD under his orders. I knew Gisevius by name from Oster and Canaris because he was their best source for knowing about the meanness of the SD service. These two (Canaris and Gisevius) were very close and Gisevius went to Switzerland and did not come back from there. The SD wanted him back but Gisevius refused. Gisevius knows the whole SD business very thoroughly. I met the sister of this man Gisevius in the concentration camp when I was imprisoned. She was put in prison because her brother would not come back from Switzerland.

Q. In your conversation with Schacht and Gisevius, did Schacht outline any precise plans for the overthrow of the Hitler Government?

A. In no way. He only demanded that this man should be overthrown. He only wanted me to make efforts for the OKH to do something.

Q. Had Schacht discussed this matter with Beck in any way?

A. I have no idea. I do not know whether he had any dealings with Beck regarding these matters. In discussions with Beck in the year 1939, he did not mention the name Schacht.

Q. Did Schacht mention any negotiations he had conducted with Beck?

A. No.

Q. Did Schacht indicate that he knew anything of your conversations with von Witzleben?

A. No.

Q. Where did your conversation with Schacht and Gisevius take place?

A. This discussion took place in my private apartment. Schacht had expressed a wish not to see me in my office but as privately and unobserved as possible. I lived in a very quiet suburb, and after dusk, at about 9:00 p. m., Oster came with Schacht and Gisevius to my apartment. The discussion lasted more than two hours.

Q. What else besides what you have already mentioned did you discuss?

A. Always the same thing. Gisevius was very well-informed about the activities of the SD service and he told us many details. I was under the impression that Schacht believed that he had to incite me and that he had to convince me first that it would be necessary.

Q. Wasn't the real basis of Schacht's opposition to Hitler that he feared Hitler would lead Germany into a war which she would lose?

INTERROGATIONS

A. I do not think so. I think that it was the general fear which I found in the whole German people, and especially at the Reichsparteitag in September, that Adolf Hitler would bring about an armed conflict in the solution of the Sudeten question.

Q. Well, wasn't his primary argument that Hitler was leading the German people into a war which they would lose?

A. The question of losing was not discussed.

Q. But it was implicit in your discussion of the question of entering into an armed conflict, wasn't it?

A. Yes—into an armed conflict, instead of the thing necessary for Germany, that is, peace, quiet, and work. If the question about the awful deeds of the regime preoccupied Schacht more I cannot say.

Q. Did Schacht mention any way of resolving the conflicts over the Sudetenland and the Polish Corridor which were being agitated at that time?

A. I would never have entered into a political question. I know nothing about politics. As little as I like it when military laymen express themselves about military problems, as little do I want to express myself on political matters.

Q. Did you discuss with Schacht the possibility of his obtaining a position in the new Government which would succeed the Hitler Government you planned to overthrow?

A. Apparently it is presumed that I discussed with Schacht my intentions. I never thought of such a thing. I had known Dr. Schacht very superficially. I had only met him once. I saw Gisevius for the first time. Do you think an old fox such as I am would discuss my plans with unknown people?

Q. They were discussing them with you. You were as unknown to them as they were to you, weren't you?

A. Yes certainly, but in this way my answer to Schacht was made: I told him that there were people who wanted to get rid of Hitler, but I also told him that those people who put Hitler into power should decide how to get rid of him.

Q. Meaning whom?

A. In general, political circles.

Q. Including Schacht?

A. No. I did not know about Schacht, but I had gathered experience in the years 1931 to 1934 when I was chief of the Wehrkreis Muenster, Westphalia, where I had talked to the industrialists and where I warned these people about these things.

Q. And you suggested to Schacht that he should go to these people to dislodge Hitler?

A. I did not mention any names. I said, "You elected Hitler, you put him into power. We soldiers had no right to vote."

Q. Well, did you disclose to him that you were sympathetic to the plan?

A. I made him feel that I, in my opposition to Hitler, was just as strict as he, and I could not then deny it because this was generally known. I want to state that I only did it because of the misery of my people.

Q. Did what?

A. That I became revolutionary.

Q. What happened to the plan you and von Witzleben had formulated?

A. Adolf Hitler was at the Berghof at the time when Schacht was with me. Von Witzleben was ready with his preparations. But they could be put into action only after Hitler had come back to Berlin. On the day when Schacht—in the evening—had been to see me, I learned that Hitler had come back to Berlin. I communicated with von Witzleben at once. He came to see me in my office during the noon hours. We discussed the matters. He requested that I give him the order of execution. We discussed other details—how much time he needed for the other preparation, etc. During this discussion, the news came that the British Prime Minister and the French Premier had come to Hitler for a discussion. This was in the presence of von Witzleben and therefore I took back the order of execution because, owing to this fact, the entire basis for the action had been taken away.

Q. Why?

A. People who consider revolutions from the historical, philosophical point of view can distinguish between three conditions for a successful revolutionary action. The first condition is a clear and resolute leadership. The second condition is the readiness of the masses of the people to follow the idea of the revolution. The third condition is the right choice of time. According to our views, the first condition of a clear resolute leadership was there. The second condition we thought fulfilled too, because the fear of an armed conflict was a heavy burden on the entire German nation. In the days of the Reichsparteitag, I heard moving expressions of the fear of a war policy, not only from non-Party members, but also from Party leaders who feared an armed conflict—the group around von Epp. The German people did not want this. Therefore the nation was ready to consent to a revolutionary act for fear of war. The third condition—the right choice of time—was good because we had to expect, within 48 hours, the order for execution of a military action. Therefore we were firmly convinced that we would be successful.

INTERROGATIONS

But now came Mr. Chamberlain, and with one stroke the danger of war was avoided. Hitler returned from Munich as an unbloody victor glorified by Mr. Chamberlain and M. Daladier. Thus, it was a matter of course that the German people greeted and enjoyed his successes. Even in the circles of Hitler's opponents—the senior officers' corps—those successes of Hitler's made an enormous impression. I do not know if a non-military man can understand what it means to have the Czechoslovak army eliminated by the stroke of a pen, and Czechoslovakia, being stripped of all her fortifications, stood as a newly born child, all naked. With the stroke of a pen, an open victory was attained. The critical hour for force was avoided. One could only wait in case any chance should come up again. I want to emphasize once more what extreme importance must be attributed to this Munich Agreement, not only because of the impression it made upon the population, but also upon the Wehrmacht. From this time on, you could always hear the saying, "Well the Fuehrer will do it somehow; he did it at Munich."

Q. Do I understand you to say that if Chamberlain had not come to Munich, your plan would have been executed, and Hitler would have been deposed?

A. I can only say, the plan would have been executed, I do not know if it would have been successful.

Q. Had you disclosed your plans to any foreign power?

A. There was an emissary in England who told them that was the intention. Oster sent an agent.

Q. To whom?

A. A communication was given, by detour, to the British Foreign Secretary. Oster sent an old officer to England who had relations there, in order to spread this news.

Q. What was his name?

A. I don't remember.

Q. When was this?

A. That must have been in the second half of September.

Q. Before Chamberlain went to Munich?

A. Yes. This officer had been interrogated on this matter. I was interrogated in Wiesbaden as to whether I knew anything about it.

Q. When was the last time you saw Schacht?

A. I saw him about six weeks later. I returned his visit to me. Being a man of his position, I thought it only polite to return the call. I confirmed that the necessity was still there but that one had to wait for another chance, and he may have gathered from this discussion that military circles were not unsympathetic to such a plan.

Q. Did Schacht indicate that he was still interested in getting rid of Hitler?

A. Yes, he expressed it very openly and without mincing words. We parted on the understanding that if there should be any necessity, we would seek each other out.

Q. And did you subsequently seek each other out?

A. No..

Q. Did you have any contact with him after that?

A. No, not until seeing him again in jail and in the concentration camp.

Q. Did you ever seek advice of any sort from Schacht?

A. No, not in questions of politics. I only remember that my Quartermaster General, Wagner, before the Western campaign, asked if he might seek advice from Schacht in currency questions.

Q. When was this?

A. It might have been in April 1940.

Q. In advance of the invasion of Belgium?

A. Yes. In such preparations, the question of currency plays a certain role. We had had a rather disagreeable experience in Poland with the OKW and therefore I tried to get the advice of experts on this. Such things, of course, were not treated by officers but by civilians—we had administrative workers. We had all sorts of experts, but no currency expert. Therefore Wagner wanted to ask Schacht if he might rely upon his advice. I permitted this request. But Schacht declined his cooperation right away and with a sharp refusal.

Q. On what grounds?

A. Because he did not want to have anything to do with the whole thing which he considered madness.

Q. What do you mean by "the whole thing"?

A. The whole western campaign.

Q. Is that what Wagner reported to you?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you personally contact Schacht on this occasion?

A. No, I did not.

Q. Did anyone else, von Witzleben, Oster, Beck, etc., refer to Schacht in any subsequent discussions you had with them?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Not von Witzleben. I had presumed this relationship was kept up, and it was indicated to me that General Wagner kept in touch with Schacht and that the communications with Oster were not interrupted. I only remember that in 1942 Wagner gave me Schacht's regards. At any rate, in the years 1939 and 1940, I had no contact with Schacht in this active group. During 1939 and 1940 there was still activity to avoid the western campaign.

Excerpts from Testimony of General Franz Halder, at Nurnberg, Germany, 26 February 1946, 1050-1200, by Captain Sam Harris, JAGD. Also present: Dr. Jan Charmatz, Interpreter; Joan Wakefield, Reporter..

Reasons for Failure to Carry Out Plot Before Invasion of Poland

Q. I should like to resume where we left off yesterday.

A. May I say something in addition to what I said yesterday?

Q. Yes.

A. I have talked once more to General Warlimont, who was present at the conference held by General Beck, about the question of the time.

Q. You mean you talked to Warlimont last night?

A. Yes, and Warlimont recollects that this conference took place only in June. I think it is necessary for me to communicate this to you but I cannot explain this difference in time.

Q. Do you still think it was earlier than June?

A. I had the recollection that it was in spring, but I cannot recollect the date.

Q. Did Warlimont participate in plans for the overthrow of the Hitler Government?

A. No.

Q. At any time?

A. No. May I say Warlimont, in opposition to the other people of the OKW, was a man who, in his thoughts, was about parallel to the people of the OKH. He was not an activist and not a man in whom we could confide; he was not a member of our circle. Naturally you would only bring into your inner circle people of whom you were quite sure, if necessary, you could stake your life. Of course we strictly avoided conversations with other people.

Q. And you did not fully trust Warlimont?

A. I had personal trust in him, but according to his whole character I did not consider him a fighter. Furthermore he was in contact with Jodl and Keitel, and therefore the danger that an unwilling allusion could come from him was too great.

Q. Did you trust Keitel and Jodl?

A. No. Both were absolutely willing tools of Hitler, even though for quite different personal reasons.

Q. What do you mean by that?

A. With Keitel I think the reason for his unlimited allegiance to Hitler was his lack of talent and his feeble character.

Q. And Jodl?

A. Jodl believed in Hitler as a saviour, and Jodl always was very ambitious and he hoped to get a personal position for himself. Jodl, at a very early moment in the year 1936 or 1937, once told me that his military ideal was Napoleon and his marshals. He said, it is not a question as to whether the marshals should go up military ranks from the bottom, but that the right thing was to pick talent in people and put them in their jobs. And the Napoleon whom he thought of as his ideal was Adolf Hitler.

Q. You mentioned yesterday that you were visited by Schacht and Gisevius?

A. Yes.

Q. Can you describe Gisevius?

A. I saw Gisevius only once; my impression of him therefore is no final one. My recollection is of a highly talented, very fluent in his speech, and well educated young man.

Q. I want to pass to a new topic. Prior to the attack on Poland, were any plans laid for the elimination of Hitler?

A. No. At that time there was no possibility.

Q. Why not?

A. After the Czech crisis, the leader of the whole military movement had been transferred to Berlin from Wiesbaden. His successor was a certain General Hase. This is not General von Hassell who was put to death after 20 July, but a General who had the command of an Army in the West, and who died in 1943 or 1944. This General Hase could not be used for the tasks in question here.

Q. How about the Chief of Police?

A. I had no direct contact with the Chief of Police. This contact had been through Witzleben and when Witzleben had gone away I had no contact with Helldorf. I emphasized yesterday a leading role, or rather an executive role, can only be filled by a man who is in command of troops and who can give orders to his commanders whom he knows precisely.

Q. Which of the 3 conditions you outlined yesterday for a successful revolution were lacking before the attack on Poland?

INTERROGATIONS

A. The executive military force had been lacking.

Q. How about the support of the people?

A. This is the second point. The conference of Munich had given Adolf Hitler such a rise in prestige, not only with the masses but also with military circles. May I add that Chamberlain when he returned from the Conference to London had been applauded by the people although he did not report success; Adolf Hitler was even more applauded as he had scored a success.

Q. As I understood your statement yesterday, the possible opposition to Hitler from the people arose from the fact that they feared and hated war above everything else.

A. That is right.

Q. Well, if Hitler were irrevocably committed to war, why couldn't you count on the support of the people before the invasion of Poland?

A. You must excuse me if I smile. If I hear the word "irrevocably" connected with Hitler, I must say that nothing was irrevocable, and whoever knew him did not believe one of his strong words.

Q. You believed him on August 22, 1939, didn't you?

A. Not yet. For this, one must know the history of all this development. May I add that not even the people who were present at the speeches or conferences believed in his intention actually to wage war, even less the people who did not know that; and after all there had not been any mobilization and they did not know anything about it. Whoever did not know Adolf Hitler cannot imagine what a master of deception and camouflage this man was.

Q. Do I understand you to say that even on August 22, after the conference at Obersalzberg, which I believe you attended, you and others still believed that Hitler did not intend to attack Poland?*

A. No, because at this conference Hitler said expressly that negotiations with Poland were continuing. On the 26 August when he gave an order to be ready on the 27th, on the very same day he rescinded the order and told the Commander in Chief of the Army, at that time von Brauchitsch, that there were still negotiations with Poland.

Q. Let me read a statement which you recently made to General Miller Hildebrandt which bears upon your last two answers. It says: "I am not letting any charge be made against our

*See documents L-3, vol. VII, p. 752; 798-PS, vol. III, p. 581; 1014-PS, vol. III, p. 665.

General Staff. I recall that I had to say rather more about Brauchitsch than was strictly necessary. Brauchitsch was just too relenting, too fastidious. I have often felt terribly sorry for him." Your last few answers lend particular emphasis to your stated desire not to let any charge be made against the General Staff.

A. No, I cannot understand this. I recollect this conversation because it had a special reason.

Q. What was that?

A. The reason was this: I had asked General Miller Hildebrandt, who had been my aide, to read my memorandum on the relation, or rather attitude, between OKW and OKH. This memorandum, as far as I know, is here. In this memorandum once, or rather twice, I criticised Brauchitsch. Once in November 1939, in the discussions, or rather arguments, with Hitler, and the second time on his attitude vis-a-vis our aims for revolution in the beginning of 1940. These expressions concerning Brauchitsch of course raised Hildebrandt's interest. They were astonishing to Hildebrandt and in order to explain them, I talked it over with him.

Q. The sentence I was particularly interested in is, "I am not letting any charge be made against our General Staff."

A. You would reproach me for shielding, as former Chief of the General Staff, the officers of whom about 50 ended on the gallows. These officers have no guilt.

Q. They have no guilt now, but there might be some difference of opinion as to their guilt before they reached the gallows.

A. The difference of opinion rises only from lack of knowledge. You reproached me that in spite of my responsibility I tried to overthrow Hitler and that I was ready to overthrow him.

Q. Please be assured that if I were to reproach you, it would be for not overthrowing Hitler.

A. May I make a personal remark. I am the last male member of a family which for 300 years were soldiers. What the duty of a soldier is I know too. I know that in the dictionary of a German soldier the term treason and plot against the State does not exist. I was in the awful dilemma of one, the duty of a soldier, and another, the duty which I considered higher. Innumerable of my old comrades were in the same dilemma. I chose the solution for the duties I deemed higher. The majority of my comrades deemed the duty to the flag higher and essential. You may be assured that this is the worst dilemma that a soldier may be faced with. That is what I wanted to explain.

INTERROGATIONS

Excerpts from Testimony of General Franz Halder, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 26 February 1946, 1600-1805, by Capt. Sam Harris, JAGD. Also present: Dr. Jan. Charmatz, Interpreter; Joan Wakefield, Reporter.

Factors Which Turned Generals Against Hitler

Q. Let us move on to the alleged plans for the overthrow of Hitler in 1939-1940, referred to by you as the 1939-1940 plot. When did that plot originate?

A. I have stated that before the Polish campaign there was no chance to formulate anything. After the Polish campaign, the opposition, so to say, against Adolf Hitler flared up, and a large circle participated in it. I do not know if the reasons in detail are of interest to you?

Q. Yes.

A. It was a question of certain disagreeable events which took place towards the end of the Polish campaign, which had been committed by the SS without our knowledge, but of which we learned, and to which we give the name, the Polish atrocities.

Q. What was the nature of these atrocities?

A. It was, according to our opinion, a series of single acts by the SS in which they illegally and senselessly killed many people.

Q. Why do you say single acts? Didn't you know these acts were committed according to plan?

A. We did not have the impression and the proof of that at that time. I am giving you a picture of that time. Of course later when we learned about the regime of Frank, we saw some connection between these single acts, but at that time they appeared to us as single acts. We thought of no other possibility.

Q. You mean Hans Frank, Governor General of Poland?

A. Yes.

Q. Go on.

A. This was one point of the opposition between the OKH and the OKW. Brauchitsch at that time had a disagreeable discussion with the Fuehrer. Further there were some measures by the SS, the so-called Woman Decree by Himmler. Is it known to you?

Q. Please state it for the purpose of the record.

A. It was the question of a decree of Himmler in which he, in opposition to our principles of morality and married life, asked for the limitless increase of the population. This decree, of course, caused an enormous excitement with the soldiers. You can imagine yourself, the husbands were at the front and the women at home. Furthermore at that time there was a struggle by Hitler and the Party against the Chaplains in the Army, religious services, and so on. Another reason was the increase of the number of SS, which had begun already at that time, and their increasing influence.

Q. In what spheres?

A. In the environment of Hitler all reports from the SS were infallible even in military matters, and what we reported he did not believe. This was shown even more forcefully during the course of the years, but at that time it began. Furthermore there was the struggle of the Party to gain influence on the education and selection of the officers. The Party, at that time, demanded that only such men should be commissioned who were approved by the Party. Also on the question of the executive power there was continuous friction.

Q. May I interrupt. Are you referring to matters that occurred after the Polish campaign or matters which had begun before but had become aggravated? Didn't some of these things start before the Polish campaign?

A. Some of the things may have, yes, but the real development took place afterwards, and in this the opposition played an important role. The whole atmosphere was charged with tension when we came back from the Polish campaign.

Q. Were there any further matters of aggravation?

Difference Between Hitler and Generals on War Against West

A. At this moment I just recollect this. It is possible that other things may be important, but at the moment I cannot think of anything. These were only single symptoms; the main issue was the question of the further waging of war. We of the OKH and the General Staff of the OKH, which was under the orders of Brauchitsch, were of the opinion that for the further development, a political end of the war should be sought, because this conflict, which had started by the declaration of war by England and France, had become a western conflict and should be solved.

Q. Should be solved how?

A. I am not a politician. It was the task of a politician of moderation to make reasonable proposals to end this problem, and it is a matter of course that the Western Powers had no interest to see the West devastated by a war in the western countries.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You mean an amicable settlement instead of a settlement by force of arms?

A. Yes. We wanted a solution without recourse to arms.

Q. Wasn't your idea merely to take a breathing space while you prepared for future campaigns?

A. No. This should have been a final termination of the war. In the Polish campaign Hitler had got the upper hand of us, but now we wanted to put an end to the whole thing.

Q. How about Russia? Wasn't it the plan or intention of the General Staff to wage war against Russia?

A. Never. The whole evolution was always to keep amicable relations with Russia, and I had, on dozens of tactical maneuver journeys, met Russian officers who were attending these maneuvers. It is generally known that a small group worked in Russia on the development of tank weapons and airplanes at the time when we were not allowed to build these things. We always regretted that the political opposition to Communism and the propaganda line of Hitler made impossible a reasonable attitude towards Russia. Before that, this was possible after the Rapallo Treaty under Stresemann and it should have been possible too under Hitler. Besides the Russian question, the Hitler pact with the Russians and the invasion of Poland by the Russians had been clarified, so we had no problem.

Q. We have captured documents which plainly show that as early as 1935 Hitler was irrevocably committed to a war against Russia. Didn't you know about that?

A. He may have talked this over with his political confidants, but I never heard of it and I did not know this idea. Certainly the Commander in Chief of the Army, von Brauchitsch, did not know anything about this either, because he would have certainly told me, and I have a very fresh recollection of the time when he first told me that Hitler had alluded to a possible conflict with Russia.

Q. When was that?

A. At the end of July or at the beginning of August 1940, probably at the beginning of August.

Q. Was that the first you had heard of Hitler's plan or intentions to invade Russia?

A. Yes.

Q. What discussions did you participate in concerning Russia at the time of the invasion of Poland?

A. The thought of Russia at that time, 1939, did not play any role. On the contrary the thought to avoid a settlement by war, that was our main problem. Hitler reproached us afterwards, saying that we had been cowards and that we were afraid, but this was not the question; there were other reasons. We therefore arranged the deployment of our German troops which came from Poland to the West from an exclusively defensive point of view. These thoughts of leading a defensive war were written down in the OKH. Immediately after the Polish war at a very late evening hour, Hitler ordered the Commander in Chief of the Army and myself to his office. We did not know the subject of this conference, which was rather extraordinary, because usually it did not happen that we were alone with him. He put the question to us as to what thoughts we had formulated about the continuation of the war in the West.

Q. When was this?

A. I cannot fix the date; it must have been still in September shortly after the termination of the fighting in Poland. I then stated to him our defensive deployment of our forces in the West. And then quite suddenly he abruptly closed the conference saying that he was too tired that day to continue this conference; I still remember the word tired. I learned afterwards that our thoughts of leading a defensive war had been known at the OKW. Shortly afterwards at the end of September, Hitler made the three Commanders-in-Chief of the three parts of the Armed Forces, and the Chief of the General Staff, come to him and told them of his decision to attack in the West.

Q. This was after the conference you had with Hitler and Brauchitsch?

A. Yes, very shortly. I am sorry to say that all my shorthand diaries have been taken away by the Gestapo.

Q. Did you participate in this conference with the three Chiefs of the Armed Forces and Hitler?

A. Yes.

Q. What occurred there?

A. This was a short giving of orders as was usual in such a type of conference, and Hitler explained that the armed conflict in the West could only be solved by attack; and then the question of Holland and Belgium was tackled. In the first conference—I do not know if this is of interest to you—he did not want to attack Holland.

Q. Only a part of Holland?

A. No.

Q. Not at all?

A. He said that he would only cross the so-called "Maas-trichter Zipfel" (Maastricht region). He said he would arrange for that with the Queen of Holland.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. But in the second conference he decided to invade all of Holland.

A. Shortly afterwards in October, because the other thing had taken place at the beginning of October, with the same audience another conference took place in which developed essentially the same thoughts, with one exception, that is Holland. He explained at that time that the protection of the Ruhr territory was being used by the enemy forces. And in addition to what he said in previous conferences, he said we should invade Holland and prepare the invasion up to the Grebbe line. I mention this, because from this it is clear that Hitler was not willing to look for a political solution. So the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the OKH tried with all possible means at least to delay this attack, in order to give a chance for a political solution; and this led, in an interview between Hitler and the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to a most ugly and disagreeable scene. Through this it was clear that with words of reason you could not tackle this man, and therefore the people who had known each other for a long time, and who had become close to each other in the time of 1938-1939, again rechecked this problem for a forceful solution. These ideas coincided with ideas which came from outside and with which we were approached. These things were not originated from outside, but at the same time from outside to the OKH the same thoughts were intimated.

Q. What persons were involved in these plans for a forceful solution?

A. This group within the OKH was mostly under the influence of the following people: I myself because I was the oldest member, and then Stuelpnagel, Wagner, Grosskurth. This group, of course, had its contact with the Army, to the troops and to the front. The other group was characterized by the personalities of Beck, Goerdeler, Hassell, Popitz. I remember only these names right now. I had no personal contact with people of this group except Goerdeler and Beck. Between these two groups there was a third group which I should like to call the OKW group. This was Canaris Oster, Dohnanyi, a young ministerial director not a soldier, and Thomas. Thomas, on his own initiative, had contacts with the leading people of industry. Thomas came to me several times for conferences. Whether he came by order of Goerdeler or by order of the industrialist I never could ascertain, because it is clear that with respect to the work done by Thomas—he was in charge of war armament—questions of war potential and armament were discussed, that these things played a certain role in the formulation of his thoughts.

Q. Do you remember any of these discussions with Thomas?

A. I recollect two essential discussions with Thomas, one of which I was reminded of by the Gestapo—that was on 27 November; and I recollect another discussion which probably took place in February, on which occasion he handed over to me written material.

Q. How do you remember the precise date, 27 November, so well?

A. Because this was presented to me by the Gestapo at least 3 dozen times and on this question I was squeezed to the last drop of blood. Some unlucky fellow must have put down this date in his diary and it must have got into the hands of the Gestapo.

Q. What happened at the conference on 27 November 1939?

A. I must state that this was not a conference, but that the Chief of the Wi Ru Amt [War Economy and Armament Office] announced that he should make a report on service matters.

Q. General Thomas reporting to you?

A. Yes.

Q. What was the substance of the 27 November conference?

A. At first Thomas reported the things which were within his line of work which he thought might be of interest to me. I must emphasize that Thomas was not my subordinate, that he belonged to the OKW, so it was an act of politeness to tell me of his business. Starting from the idea that a settlement through arms in the West would lead to a limitless war and that Germany, considering its resources, was not able to lead such a war, he appealed to me to avoid, under any circumstances, such an armed conflict in the West. And starting from this, he continued that if there was no other possibility, then Hitler had to be removed.

Q. Did he mention General von Brauchitsch?

A. Yes. He told me that, in order that I should tell General von Brauchitsch.

Q. What was the end result of the discussion with Thomas?

A. The end result of the discussion was, I do not recollect the words, these words are mine: I know that settlement by a war in the West is a catastrophe. He should be assured that we were following this thought at least as intensively as he was. And then I remember that I gave him on his way a rather pointed remark on his industrial confidants.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What was that?

A. I said in the struggle against Hitler I did not hear anything from the industrialists, but now that the clouds of war begin to gather above the Ruhr territory, now they start to be active.

Q. How did Brauchitsch enter into your discussions with Thomas?

A. Later, I told Thomas that I was at that time not yet sure that Brauchitsch would take part actively in a coup d'etat. A further line of thought goes back to things which my closest collaborators always told me, especially von Stuelpnagel. This idea was that if Brauchitsch cannot make a decision, if he has not enough force of character to make a decision, then you must make a decision, and you must play the game across him to present Brauchitsch with a fait accompli.

Q. Was this also your idea?

A. No. The same idea was expressed by General Beck.

Q. Did you concur?

A. No. I want to give the reasons for what I am saying now, afterwards. I was of the opinion that such an action could not be undertaken by a High Command Agency in the state of war, because through this it shows that it is not united. To give the background, I must say that my influence in my official capacity extended only to the Field Army. Also in the Field Army I could not give any orders, but only in the name, and by order of the Commander-in-Chief. On the so-called Home Front, I had no jurisdiction; the Home Army was under the order of General Fromm, under direct orders of von Brauchitsch. I could not even give him orders in the name of von Brauchitsch. The entire Field Army was in contact with the enemy. A forcible action had to be executed by the forces of the Home Army as the Fuehrer was in Berlin and we were in Sossen. I contacted General Fromm and asked if he was ready for such action. He declared that on his own initiative he would take no such action, but if Brauchitsch would give him such an order he would execute this order as a soldier. Therefore I needed, for the execution of such an action, my Commander-in-Chief, Colonel General von Brauchitsch. Of course all this which I explain now in extenso I did not tell to Thomas. It was not his business.

Friction Between Schacht and Goerdeler

Q. Did you have any contact at all with Schacht during this period?

A. No, with the exception of this superficial contact through Wagner before hostilities against Belgium. From later remarks of Schacht's, with whom I was imprisoned, I gather that he and Goerdeler were in opposition to each other; maybe this was put too strongly, that they did not get along with each other.

Q. Goerdeler was one of the leading lights in the Hitler plot, wasn't he?

A. Nevertheless, I understand Schacht's attitude, because I myself had personally no trust in Goerdeler.

Q. Did Schacht agree with Goerdeler's idea of overthrowing the Hitler regime?

A. I am not informed on that. I only know from the mentioned conference in 1938 that he himself aimed at such a solution.

Why the Plot Finally Fizzled

Q. What happened thereafter; that is, after the conference with General Thomas and after your decision that nothing could be carried through without the approval of General von Brauchitsch?

A. Several attempts were made to familiarize the Commander-in-Chief with this line of thought. I myself in my daily reports brought up this matter and I remember that General von Stuelpnagel asked me if he could mention this in his report to the Commander-in-Chief.

Q. Did you ever discuss it directly with General von Brauchitsch?

A. Not so directly that I said: Now we are going to put Adolf Hitler in prison together. But at every possible chance I stressed the dangers of this regime, but this really was not necessary because this Brauchitsch saw and realized. The difficulty with Brauchitsch was in another sphere. He had to make the decision and he had to take the responsibility. For me it was much simpler to tell him this must be done than for him to execute these things. I discussed these things over and over again with Brauchitsch and I know what he thought of these things. He very rightly always emphasized that the removal of a power in the State is a negative act. The thing that is important for a man who is meddling with the fate of his people is: Can he offer something better? There were two more essential thoughts. The German Army was facing the enemy. We had a fully armed enemy in front of us; the French and the British had deployed their troops, and they were ready to fight. The German army was more than a peacetime army, as in 1938. It was taken from all layers of the population and therefore felt the thoughts of all layers of the population. And the officers' corps—in 1938 in a peacetime officers' corps everyone knew everyone else, but in 1940 there was an officers' corps mostly composed of reserve officers, which gave another picture of the Army. There was a danger that the tool, the German Army, the moment you tried to make a coup d'état, would break. That was one of the ideas.

INTERROGATIONS

The second idea, which he repeated to me several times, was: What does the German workman say? Are only some intellectual groups backing this or are the broad masses of the German people backing it? The latter question I could not answer to Brauchitsch, not being a politician. The first question about the structure, how much an idea would be received in the army, I tried to solve. I had directly, and by certain detours, contacted the commanders-in-chief of the army groups and most of the commanders of the armies, hoping that through them I could report to von Brauchitsch that most of the army commanders were making an appeal to him. I had hoped to get General Fromm, the Commander of the Home Army, so far that he would put himself together with his Home Army at the disposal of General Brauchitsch. Both took a long time. It is clear that I could not work in writing, or in any other way that would be observed. I did not succeed in getting for Brauchitsch the united support of the Field Army and the backing of the Home Army.

There were other ideas that decided on Brauchitsch's attitude. If we were in a state of war, if such an action takes place in Germany, this would mean an enormous weakening of the German war potential. This should be understood. The responsibility for such a step could be taken only by a person who had a certain chance or rather a certainty that the military opponents would not interfere in the inner German struggle. To clarify this, Hassell, the former Ambassador in Rome, was active by contacting Great Britain. The contact with Great Britain was there through Hassell, but there was no contact with France and we had no idea what attitude France would take.

The next group of ideas was the inner political situation. We were always told, you must remove Adolf Hitler. Who should succeed Hitler, who should form the government, who should take responsibility for Germany, this we could never find out. That is the positive action, the reconstruction of the German government which should follow the negative act.

Q. Why was it any different in 1939-1940 than in 1938 in that respect?

A. Because Germany was in a state of war. Because it was the free decision of England and France to recognize such a new Government, and from the natural weakness which such an action always brings with it to attack Germany at that time. England and France with their armies were standing at the frontiers, and in the year 1938 no one would have interfered with this inner German matter. One must only ask the commander-in-chief of the other party: What are you doing when there is a discussion on internal politics and if a decomposition of the front begins what will you do? Of course I will take advantage of this weakness. Comparing this with 1938, one must consider that the details of the action, caused through the mobilization of the army, had been entirely changed through the war. We had an enemy standing at our frontier who was ready to attack. That is the fundamental difference. The only similar condition was the fear of the people of further development. Of the three conditions I mentioned, the first condition, the leadership, was not yet given because I was working to contact all the leaders. The second condition, I think, was given because the readiness of the masses was there.

Q. Then the upshot of all this was that the plans did not go through, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. Let me come back to the statement you made earlier about the SS. You indicated that your original view was that the program of the SS in the Polish Campaign of 1939 was more or less a series of isolated incidents, but that later you were convinced that it was part of an organized program. What was the basis for that opinion?

A. Why I thought there was some connection between these acts? This has a special reason. And the reason is the following: A man reported to me, who was present at a conference of Hitler and Frank, that Hitler took away from the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, the Military Government of Poland which had been prepared, and handed it over to the Governor General at the time this conference took place. In the conference which took place between Hitler and Frank, Hitler himself used the expression: The order which I give you, or rather, the task I give you, is a devilish one. That is how it was told to me.

Q. Who told it to you?

A. Canaris. Other people too had a very disagreeable impression of this very agitated conference. I heard from other sources, but no details. Other words which followed in this conference were as follows: Other people to whom such territories are handed, would ask: "What would you construct? I will ask the opposite."

INTERROGATIONS

Q. In other words, I, Hitler, will ask "What did you destroy?"

A. Yes, precisely. I must state that I did not hear these words myself; I only remember them because of the special impression they made on me. And the executive for all these things was the Governor General, and later in other territories, also the SS.

Q. Were you an eye-witness to any of the destruction wrought by the SS?

A. Not in Poland.

Q. In any other place?

A. No. I have only the impression of the enormous destruction which the Russians did.

Q. How about the destruction done by the SS? You mentioned that you learned of the plan to destroy, which was to be executed by the SS.

A. I must state that I did not hear any details, I only heard in the course of conversations from Canaris that this order that Frank got was directed against the intelligentsia, against the priests and the Jews. The later developments in Poland, which we heard about only partly because we had no direct influence, gave me the impression that they were the issue of this conference.

Q. Did you see any of these later developments in Poland?

A. No. I never saw anything. I know of two groups of reports which came in, one a collection of isolated instances—those Brauchitsch discussed personally with Hitler, immediately after the Polish campaign; and the second group was a stack of reports that General Blaskowitz submitted to General Brauchitsch in the short time he had office there. And these reports Brauchitsch submitted to the OKW through channels.

Q. What did these reports show?

A. Shooting of people and mistreatment of the population.

Q. On a wide spread basis?

A. I can remember cases which took place in Northern Poland and another in Lublin, but this is only a superficial recollection.

Q. What happened to the report submitted by von Brauchitsch?

A. Brauchitsch never heard anything of it. The first group Brauchitsch discussed with Himmler.

Q. What did Himmler say?

A. After that Brauchitsch told me, I was not present at this conference, that after a long discussion, Himmler promised he would investigate these cases. Brauchitsch inquired from an officer, whom I know personally, who was with Himmler or rather with Obergruppenfuehrer Wolff, as to what had happened to those things. He got the answer that after investigation the case showed quite another picture. That means nothing ever happened.

Q. And on the second report?

A. This went to Keitel through channels. Whether Brauchitsch discussed this with Keitel, I do not know.

XXI. HANS RICHARD HEMMEN*

*Excerpts from Testimony of Hans Richard Hemmen, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 September 1945, 2030-
2230, by Lt. Bernard D. Meltzer, USNR. Also present:
T/4 Selig Seligman; T/Sgt. Robert Eisenberg; Miss Lillian F. Baxter, Court Reporter.*

Occupation Costs Imposed on France by Germany

Q. [In English] Who determined the economic policy with respect to occupied countries?

A. [In English] The Foreign Office and the HPA [Heeres-personalamt—Army Personnel Office].

Q. And there again was the general policy formulated by a group representing the Finance Ministry and the other ministries you mentioned?

A. Yes, the OKW and all of them.

Q. What were the standards governing the amount of occupation cost they were going to ask the French to pay?

A. Under Article 18 of the Armistice Treaty, France paid the cost of occupation. Soon after my delegation was set up the question arose and was discussed in Berlin, and I was invited to take part at the meeting of the HPA. That was in July 1940. Anyway, the question arose and OKW said we should calculate the sum on the basis of such and such an amount of soldiers of our army which we kept in France, the average cost of so and so much, and that came up to twenty million Reichsmarks per day.

*Hans Richard Hemmen was a professional diplomat specializing in economics from 1918 on. His main function was handling negotiations of trade agreements between Germany and other countries. He was German Charge d'Affaires in Argentina in 1932-33. After the German occupation of France he handled economic matters as a representative of the Foreign Ministry.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Can you remember how many soldiers it was estimated would be in France?

A. Some three millions.

Q. And that three million figure was the basis for determining seven marks per day for each soldier?

A. Yes.

Q. Were those three million soldiers all to be put on occupation duties?

A. Well, I know nothing about that. I do not know even how many soldiers were in France.

Q. Was there any discussion as to considering not only soldiers who were engaged in occupation duties but also those who were there for the defense of France against the Allies?

A. This question was put up by General Huntziger, a French general who had been in Compiegne when the Armistice was signed. Later he was killed in an airplane accident. When I later on had the note from the Foreign Office, General Huntziger said to me he could not give any judgment on the amount because he was a military man and had no means to judge whether it was insufficient, but there was one thing he objected to at once, and that was the rate of exchange, one mark to 20 francs, because he said he was advised that this rate of exchange introduced by the German army was too high, and he asked it to be reconsidered. As to the amount he did consult his government; but he did remark that in Compiegne he had received favorable assurances on signing the Armistice that only the cost of an army of occupation would be charged, and that the cost of an army of operation was distinct. I learned this from him because we were still at war with England, and it was sure that the war would have to be fought on French soil. At Berlin at this meeting nothing was mentioned about that, although of course the OKW was represented. At Compiegne only military people were there with the exception of Hitler, and I referred both questions in writing to Berlin, the rate of exchange, etc. With regard to the rate of exchange, that is a long story because I agreed that it was too high. I have tried my very best to change it; but as to the difference between an operation and an occupation army, I could only refer this question to my Government.

Q. What was the answer?

A. The Foreign Office consulted Keitel and Keitel said he could refer this question to Col. Boehme who was present at Compiegne, and who was then the Chief of Staff of the Military Armistice Commission at Wiesbaden. I went to them and showed them General Huntzinger's question. "I have asked the Foreign Office and Keitel refers the question to you and you will also find his reply there," and Boehme said that he had been in Compiegne and he had been present at whatever was said, and that no difference was mentioned. So I informed General Huntzinger of my action and of the reply I had received, and he said he would leave it to me.

Q. Was there any question raised by Keitel as to whether the three million occupation forces did include the so-called operational forces?

A. I do not know. I have not spoken to Keitel.

Q. Now, did the expenses of occupation vary from year to year, or did they tend to remain constant?

A. Now I must point out one question which is important and that is the condition OKW made. They said that since we were carrying on the war on French territory, the cost must not betray the numerical strength of our armies in France. In consequence, we must ask for a fixed amount over a long period. Now, as to the expense, I have a general judgment from the account. I had no idea how the money was drawn or expended; that was done in Berlin by the Finance Minister, but we had asked that the money be put into an account with the Banque de France in the name of the "Militaerverwaltung" [Military Administration] every 10 days in advance, at the exchange rate of 20-1. They accepted that, as you will see from my memorandum, and started the payments. The French knew always, of course, the amount which stood to their credit, and I also, of course.

Q. You say that military authorities did not want the amount of occupation cost to betray the size of the army. Now the size of the operational army would, of course, vary depending on the military situation. Accordingly, it would seem that the cost of the operational army was considered a legitimate cost by your military authorities to be imposed on the French Government. Have I made myself clear?

A. Yes.

Q. Your occupation army did tend to remain constant subject to redeployment depending on outbreaks and local situations, but most changes that did occur were on the operational side. Am I correct in understanding the policy to be a policy of levying a charge sufficient to cover the costs of the entire army, including both the operational and the occupation army?

A. That is for me a very difficult question. First of all I had no military knowledge at all, as I have never been a military man and had no connections with the military people. Secondly, I had no knowledge of how they in Berlin expended the money paid by the French. I could not calculate for myself whether the amount was in any way correct as to the number of soldiers, and then from the military point of view I really do not know whether one could in fact draw a dividing line between the occupation and operational army. I am not a military man, but I doubt it very much, because from what I observed later on divisions which had been in occupation for a long time were taken into operation.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. General Huntziger thought that that division could be made?

A. He thought it could be made. From the French point of view it was natural to draw this distinction, because the French having lost the war had the German army on their soil to fight England.

Q. Was there any attempt made to establish a division of cost based on this distinction?

A. No, never. So far as I know, an attempt was never made, and the question never arose after I told General Huntziger the results of my interviews.

Q. Did the French ever raise with you as a diplomatic representative of the German government the question of international law involved, based on the Hague Convention, which restricts the amount?

A. No. I do not think so. We may inspect the notes which the French wrote on the cost of occupation, but I do not think we will discover a single argument there because, as I was going to say, General Huntziger, after the meeting we had in his hotel, sent his adjutant to me to inform me that the same afternoon he would fly to Vichy and discuss this question with Marshal Petain, and would recommend accepting this amount. Two days afterward he returned and told me it had been agreed.

Q. After the Italian defeat did the German Government demand additional payments based on the former Italian occupation cost which the Italian government had imposed on France?

A. That is something I forgot to mention in my report. The general course of events was this. Soon after we had agreed on twenty millions, Hitler wanted to meet Petain at Montoire. The French Finance Minister, who was a very clever man, saw his chance to reduce the cost of occupation, and he tried to reduce the payments, and he instructed his delegation to write my delegation a note to say that the French Government would stop payments pending a new system which he expected from the meeting at Montoire. I warned them not to take any unilateral action and then they dropped the matter. I do not remember whether it was 1941 or the beginning of 1942 that we started negotiations on the initiative of the French Government to reduce the amount. I refer to the 10 millions—half the amount. Since about the autumn of 1941, there were paid some sixty billion francs on account and it was quite clear to the French that it was too much. After a few weeks we initialled an agreement to reduce the cost of occupation to ten million marks per day. If I remember correctly, that was in June. The daily payment was reduced to 10, and there were some extra three millions of securities transferred. This never came off.

Q. It never came off? It never actually was completed?

A. No. I negotiated it with permission of the Foreign Office, and it was referred home and Ribbentrop hesitated. It was Ribbentrop personally this time. We waited weeks and then months, and after many months had expired the committee refused permission to sign it.

Q. Did the French make the proposal that the occupation cost be reduced or did the German Government make that proposal? Did the German Government make that suggestion in exchange for an increased control over certain French institutions?

A. No. That was the other way around. The German Government agreed to start discussions on a reduction and to promise indeed a substantial reduction if at the same time the control of the French foreign trade in France could be controlled by three commissars with the Banque de France.

Q. I want to know this. Concentrate on the question whether the German Government proposed the reduction in exchange for increase of German control in France.

A. They made it a condition.

Q. And did they make that condition after the French had made the proposal, or did they say to the French: "If you accept those controls, we will reduce the occupation cost"?

A. It is five years ago but if I remember precisely the German demand to exercise a control over trade through agencies or commissars was very much before these negotiations of ten millions. We had agreed on lifting trade restrictions between the free and occupied zones in the sense that trade could cross the line, payments be made and so on, with the exception of transfer of gold. The French, of course, could exercise their own control as to foreign trade and so on. The "Militäerverwaltung" had observed that by giving this liberty between the occupied and unoccupied zone, things were flowing out, and they had wanted from the very beginning to exercise control by these commissars—and that was a very old demand. You will see from the files that in October, September, and November 1940, long before we ever agreed to discuss a reduction in payment, this demand was already made, and in fact general proposals were already agreed on with the French, but the French Government never accepted them, and then the German Government agreed to reduce cost on condition. The two conditions were: (1) to set these commissars to work, and (2) a certain transfer of security.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. When the French proposed the reduction of occupation cost, did they claim that the funds which the German Government was getting were being illegally used, e.g., in the black market? What was the nature of the protests against occupation cost?

A. Any claim of that description was justified. These amounts were drawn from the occupation cost account in French francs and given to the black market. That was a clear misuse of the money.

XXII. OSWALD POHL*

Excerpts from Testimony of Oswald Pohl, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 3 June 1946, 1400-1700, by Col. John Amen, Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, Jr., and Robert M. W. Kempner. Also present: Lt. Joachim von Zastrow and Bert Stein, Interpreters; Anne Daniels, Reporter.

Diversion of Concentration Camp Labor to Armament Industries

Q. Now tell us when you took over the administration of the concentration camps and how that came about.

A. At the occasion of a conversation which I had with Himmler in the summer of 1942—and I had conversations with him about every quarter of a year—he said to me: "Pohl, I have talked to Speer. The war is reaching its climax; the demands of the armament industries are becoming larger and larger, and the securing of the necessary manpower is becoming more and more difficult. Therefore, we have to try to commit this manpower which is in the concentration camps into the armament industry to an increased extent, and I have the intention of transferring this task to you."

*Oswald Pohl held the following positions: Chief of Administration and Economic Main Office of SS; Ministerialdirektor of the Reich Ministry of the Interior; SS-Obergruppenfuehrer; General of Waffen-SS. Pohl managed to avoid capture until May 1946, when he was discovered working on a farm in the disguise of a farmhand. He was brought to Nurnberg and these interrogations ensued.

I asked him not to do that because, in the meantime, my little office—which at first had been just a small office within the central office of the SS—had, later on, become an independent office for budget and construction. Then, still later on, all the economic questions became mixed up in it, and then it became the WVHA.

I told him, therefore, that in this main office I had so much to do already, because I also had under me the administration of the entire Waffen SS, and of the General SS. I had under me all the economic institutions of the SS. Those were about 50 large, independent enterprises. Also; I had to carry out many special tasks concerning Party and Reich matters. So the transfer to me of new and additional tasks seemed impossible to me.

He told me, however, that the labor commitment of the inmates was so important, and he had no other expert that he could charge with that task, that therefore I would have to do it, in the interest of armaments. He said he would relieve me of all other matters connected with that because Gruppenfuehrer Gluecks was remaining there. Obergruppenfuehrer Eicke had been killed in action in the meantime, and Gluecks was head of this agency, as successor to Eicke.

Q. How soon did you do anything about using the manpower which was needed by Speer in the armament industry?

A. The procedure was discussed with Himmler, but it was done in this way. That was the reason for Himmler's intervention. There was really no method about the thing until that time. The small firms in the Reich that were in want of workers, no matter what branch of the industry they belonged to, addressed themselves to the Inspectorate of the Concentration Camps. Then Gluecks or his representatives allotted so many inmates to them. As a consequence, that meant a strong decentralization of manpower, which it was wished to prevent.

From that time on, Gluecks had to visit me in Berlin once a week. He had to submit the requisitions from the firms to me, and then I decided whether a firm was to get laborers or not. If greater contingents were involved in heavy industry, that is, hundreds of them, the Armaments Ministry was consulted about it. That is, it went through the Armaments Ministry.

The Extermination of Jews at Auschwitz

Q. You brought Hoess into your Division D, Subdivision I.

A. Yes.

Q. What had he done before that?

INTERROGATIONS

A. Before that he was commandant of Auschwitz.

Q. And while he was commandant of Auschwitz, what had been his responsibility there?

A. The same as the position of all other commandants, at first, and then he was employed by the Reichsfuehrer SS in the final solution of the Jewish question.

Q. And what was that?

A. The extermination of Jewry.

Q. By what manner or means?

A. As it has been done.

Q. Tell us about it.

A. Jews were brought to Auschwitz and were gassed there.

Q. How many and over what period, were gassed there; and what was done with the bodies?

A. I don't know.

Q. How did Hoess carry out his end of the program at Auschwitz?

A. He carried out the liquidation of the Jews.

Q. And how many did he liquidate there?

A. I really will have to estimate that; I don't know the number.

Q. Well then, I will ask you for your estimate.

A. I have talked to Gluecks about it, but even he did not know the exact figure. We estimated—and Gluecks thought—about three million.*

Transfer of Valuables from Concentration Camp Victims to Reichsbank

Q. What business did you have with Funk?

A. I had no business with him as President of the Reichsbank.

Q. You never had anything to do with him?

A. Funk got foreign currency for us abroad, but I never had anything to do with him directly.

Q. You had other business, aside from foreign currency?

A. Yes. We gave to the Reichsbank all the valuables that we received from these concentration camps, which had been sent to us from the various offices.

Q. Let's discuss the jewelry and gold teeth that were taken from people in the concentration camps. The Reichsbank was informed when such a shipment was to arrive. Is that correct?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Who made the first arrangements concerning that?

A. As I recall, the first arrangements were made by way of the RSHA, in Heydrich's time, I believe.

*See document 3868-PS, vol. VI, p. 787.

Q. Between Heydrich and the Reichsbank, between Himmler and the Reichsbank, or between whom?

A. Between experts of the RSHA and the Reichsbank. At this moment I only recall that, on several occasions, foreign currency, rings, and other things came from the camps to Berlin, packed in cases, and they were given to the Reichsbank by us.

Q. What was the Reichsbank to do with these gold teeth?

A. They were to evaluate them, and their equivalent was to be deposited at the Reichsbank Treasury.

Q. Hoess has testified that gold bars had also come from Auschwitz.

A. I have seen gold bars, yes. I believe they were also packed in cotton.

Q. Where were they delivered?

A. Also to the Reichsbank.

Q. Which ones went to your medical department?

A. That I don't know.

Q. Where did the gold bars—if they came from Auschwitz—originate?

A. Probably from the Jews who were exterminated.

Q. How was that worked into bars there?

A. I don't know that.

Q. How often did that stuff arrive? We are talking about gold now.

A. I recall exactly that I only saw these gold bars once.

Q. You just wanted to say that it was once or twice. Now what do you want to say, once, twice, three times, or what?

A. I recall very clearly that I have only seen gold bars once. Several times I have seen things like rings and jewelry, but I have only seen gold bars once.

Deposit of Gold Fillings with the Reichsbank

Q. Who took part in those first discussions? Who was the man who would have such discussions?

A. I really don't know. So far as I recall, there were no large discussions. Without my having anything to do with it, those things went to Berlin. I personally told Himmler that. I talked to Himmler and asked him what should be done with all those things; I was told they were supposed to be given to the Reichsbank.

Q. Is that what Himmler told you?

A. Yes.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Did Himmler tell you that he had talked with Funk about this matter?

A. I believe that he had talked with Funk about it.

Q. Do you know in detail what they had been talking about in this connection?

A. What they had been talking about, in detail, I cannot say: I do not recall. I once talked with Funk, but it had nothing to do with that.

Q. What did Himmler talk to Funk about, as far as you know, in relation to the order Himmler gave you?

A. I assume that Himmler and Funk discussed the matter, that the valuables from the concentration camps were to be received by the Reichsbank. Subsequently Himmler said to me: "I want you to do that; deliver them to the Reichsbank."

Q. What particular subjects were discussed at that time?

A. That concerned all the valuables that were delivered from the concentration camps at that time.

Q. Was there any doubt about the fact that it concerned dead Jews?

A. No, there was no doubt about it.

Q. Do you say there was no doubt, or there could not have been any doubt?

A. There couldn't have been any doubt.

Q. Why couldn't there have been any doubt? Where could those things have come from otherwise? Tell me, because you can be quite open with me.

A. There couldn't have been any other source.

Q. When three million disappear, there must have been quite a substantial amount of stuff in one camp. That is, three million in one camp alone. That must have been more than just a few sacks full.

A. There must have been a great total amount.

Q. Now let us go back. We had jewels that went down there to the Reichsbank, and we had the gold eyeglass frames. Is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. What else was there? Please tell us in your own words.

A. All the things that men can have, rings, watches, eyeglass frames, and gold bars.

Q. And what were those gold bars made from?

A. If you ask me now, those gold bars were made from the melting of the various things, among other things, gold fillings.

Q. You have said anything that men can carry.

A. Yes.

Q. What originated from women?

A. Jewelry, pins, broaches.

Q. Anything else? Earrings? Have we mentioned wedding rings?

A. Yes, we had wedding rings also.

Q. What about earrings?

A. Yes, also earrings.

Q. And when you were down there with Puhl didn't you, at that time, open suitcases full of that stuff?

A. Yes, Puhl showed them to me.

Q. Can you recall any particular suitcase in which certain individual things were contained?

A. Yes, he showed me especially valuable rings which had already been assortied.

Q. Now we want to reconstruct the whole thing as realistically as possible. You were down there at the Reichsbank.

A. Yes.

Q. With whom?

A. From my group there were with me Gruppenfuehrer Loerner, Frank, my adjutant, certainly, and several others.

Q. Then Puhl was there?

A. Yes, Puhl was there, and Waldheeker was there, because I know him personally.

Q. Who else?

A. Puhl and Waldheeker. I believe they were the two from the Reichsbank. Afterwards I was together with Funk.

Q. That is exactly what I want to know. Now why didn't you come out with that right at the beginning? That is what I wanted to know.

A. How could I know that you wanted to find out that sort of thing?

Q. All right, very good. Afterwards you were together with Funk. All right.

A. Afterwards we went upstairs and Funk invited us to have dinner with him. There was a huge, round table. In my opinion there were approximately a dozen people present.

Q. And whom did you sit next to?

A. I sat next to Funk.

Q. Now, what did you talk about concerning the beautiful things that you had seen downstairs? Please tell us truthfully and openly.

A. I cannot remember the details exactly, but I think I said that I had seen the Reichsbank for the first time.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Did you say anything about the things which had arrived? What did he say and what did you say?

A. I cannot tell you exactly now what he told me.

Q. Did he tell you anything to the effect that you had delivered the material well and that what had arrived was valuable?

A. That is possible; it is probable that he said such a thing. It is impossible for me to recall in detail the exact words he used when he spoke to me.

Q. But it was in that sense?

A. Yes, I think the conversation was conducted in that sense.

Q. How many of the Reichsbank people were present, and how many of yours? How many people were present at the round table?

A. I estimate about twelve people.

Q. Half your people and half Reichsbank people?

A. Yes, approximately. We had been invited in general by the Reichsbank.

Q. I would like to come back once more to the Reichsbank, downstairs. You were standing around with Puhl. You opened a few of the cases from the SS, and those beautiful jewels were in there. What else was in there among all those things?

A. Foreign currency had also been delivered to the Reichsbank.

Q. Did he also show you a case full of earrings and wedding rings?

A. Yes, I had seen cases with rings, especially the more valuable things.

Q. Did he also show you some of those gold bars?

A. I assume so.

Q. Did he make any remark about the fact that you had contributed to the delivery of those gold bars?

A. How do you mean that?

Q. Did he tell you that those gold bars had arrived from the camps?

A. Yes.

Q. Later on, at the meal, was there anything discussed concerning those gold bars?

A. Between my neighbor and myself? Not that I recall. Perhaps, in the beginning, there were a few words exchanged, but during the table conversation nothing further was mentioned along that line.

Q. Funk knew that you had been downstairs, and he told them "bring those people upstairs"?

A. Yes, Funk knew that we had visited the entire Reichsbank. He knew that.

Q. How did Puhl introduce you to Funk at that time?

A. Funk knew me already.

Q. How long had Funk known you, approximately?

A. Previous to that time I had been at Funk's once. That was the only time that I had to do with Funk.

Q. What business was that?

A. I recall that by order of Himmler I had to visit him in connection with textiles; that was in his capacity as Minister of Economy.

Q. What sort of textiles did that concern?

A. Those were the textiles which were concerned with those actions.

Q. Where did those textiles come from?

A. The textiles remained in the camps, and were then given to the textile industry. Subsequently Himmler sent me to Funk to tell him that he, Himmler, hoped that a greater allotment of clothing material would be sent to the SS, that is, that a higher allotment of clothing would be delivered to the SS.

Q. Let me express myself very clearly, in simple German: From the clothing of the dead Jews, the SS were to receive a greater clothing allotment. That is the meaning, in simple German, is it not?

A. That is probably the way it was meant.

Excerpts from Testimony of Oswald Pohl taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 4 June 1946, 1010-1100, by Dr. Robert Kempner, and Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, Jr., IGD. Also present: Bert Stein, Interpreter; Piilani A. Ahuna, Court Reporter.

Himmler Dresses SS Men in Clothes of Dead Jews

Q. Will you put yourself back to the time of your first conversation with Funk?

A. Yes.

Q. What was the approximate date of that conversation?

A. I believe it was the summer of 1944. 1943 or 1944, I don't know exactly, but it was in the summer. It was good weather.

The reason why Himmler sent me there was the ever-increasing scarcity of uniforms, and the small contingent that we received from the textile industry, I believe it was President Kehrl who always declared it was not sufficient.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Thereupon you received the order from Himmler to get in contact with Funk?

A. Yes.

Q. Where did you visit Funk?

A. I visited Funk in the Economics Ministry.

Q. What did you tell him at that time in brief?

A. That Himmler sent me to him and wanted to tell him that he hoped the Waffen SS, at the distribution of the textile contingents, would receive preferential treatment, for Himmler was giving the clothing from the Jews to the Economy during the action against the Jews.

Q. Which Jewish actions are in question?

A. That was the liquidation of the Jews.

Q. What quantities of clothing from dead Jews came into consideration?

A. We really did not talk about quantities in detailed figures.

Q. Did one mean great, large quantities which justified preferential treatment?

A. Yes, that is to be supposed.

Q. From where was the clothing of the dead Jews taken, and where was it delivered?

A. They were stored in Auschwitz, and they were delivered, but where they were delivered I don't know. I do know that Gruppenfuehrer Loerner should know about that. He was in charge of the whole utilization of textiles.

Q. How was that? Did the procedure change or vary in a certain period?

A. The procedure did not change much, I don't believe so.

Q. The affair started already in 1941, did it not?

A. Yes. What do you mean?

Q. So that the Economy must have had something to do with that prior to that time?

A. The Economy had always something to do with it. The things were always turned over to the Economy.

Q. When speaking of the Economy, which agency do you mean?

A. Our textile contingent was always negotiating with President Kehrl.

Excerpts from Testimony of Oswald Pohl, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 4 June 1946, 1400-1630, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, Jr., and Dr. R. M. W. Kempner. Also present: Bert Stein, Interpreter; Piilani A. Ahuna, Court Reporter.

Funk's Implication in Looting of Concentration Camp Victims

Q. I should like to refer to a matter about which I have just checked. The transfer of gold from concentration camps started in the summer of 1942, did it not?

A. Yes.

Q. Is that correct?

A. After I heard that Himmler had a conversation with Funk in the summer of 1942, it must have been the starting point of this matter.

Q. You received your orders from above?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you still think that the textile matter was in 1943 or 1944, or do you say it was earlier?

A. That must, of course, have fallen into the same period.

Q. You have said yesterday, or this morning, that Funk knew what this was all about. Is that correct?

A. Yes, that was so. I said that.

Q. You stated that these were things coming from the actions against the Jews?

A. I told him that those were things which came from the actions against the Jews which were handed over to the textile industries.

Q. Which actions against the Jews are you speaking of and where did they take place? I mean, was it in western or eastern Germany?

A. I do not believe that I explained it any further, because Funk knew.

Q. What did Funk know?

A. Where it came from, otherwise he would have asked me, but I don't remember that he ever asked me and I don't doubt that Himmler has told him about it.

Q. Was it a self-evident matter?

A. Yes, for me it was quite self-evident.

Q. Was it self-evident for him also, that it was not from living Jews?

INTERROGATIONS

A. That, I suppose so.

Q. You stated yesterday that the Jewish affair was generally known?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you include Funk in that?

A. Yes.

Q. And what are the two details from which you especially know that Funk knew about these happenings?

A. First, from his conversation with Himmler, secondly from the conversation with me.

Q. About what?

A. About the textiles.

Extermination of Mental Patients

Q. Do you know that Frick and Conti emptied the institutes for the mentally sick and other sick by simply killing the patients?*

A. Yes, that was told.

Q. Do you know whether one sent their old clothing and other things to the SS also and other agencies?

A. No, I don't know that.

Q. What do you know about the whole action?

A. I don't know anything about this action, except that it has taken place.

Execution of Concentration Camp Inmates Needed for Labor

Q. Hoess has told us that you reprimanded him repeatedly because not enough workers were being salvaged out of the shipments to Auschwitz. At the same time, Mueller or someone in the RSHA was ordering more executions.

A. Yes, that's quite possible. It is quite possible that I told Hoess and Gluecks that I have these requests for laborers and I had to have more inmates.

Q. Whom, in the RSHA, did you take it up with? You knew they were causing the executions.

A. I have really not negotiated with the RSHA. Gluecks did that. I have never been there.

Q. You and Gluecks conferred about it.

A. Yes, I have spoken to Gluecks about the fact that I must have more inmates for work. If my request would have been fulfilled, not so many would have been executed. Of course I was interested in getting as much manpower as possible.

Q. It wasn't because you were interested in saving anybody's life, but only because you wanted more labor, wasn't it?

*See documents 615-PS, vol. III, p. 449; 621-PS, vol. III, p. 451.

A. Yes, at first I only thought of getting more labor. I knew that I had to have more inmates.

Use of Concentration Camp Labor in I. G. Farben Plants

Q. I would like to take up the case of labor in the I. G. Farben industries.

A. You mean of concentration camp inmates?

Q. Yes. When did you first have anything to do with inmates who worked for I. G. Farben?

A. I really cannot tell you that. Once per week Gluecks came to me, usually in Berlin, or when I was out in the plants I went to his office; then he told me that such and such requests are here and we discussed them. The requests that had been granted were then dealt with by Gluecks. He gave instructions to the camp commanders which had to furnish the inmates. The camp commanders were permitted to furnish these inmates only if the armament industries had available lodgings, food supplies, and medical care for them.

Q. Let me refresh you a little on these specified remarks. Commandant of Auschwitz, Hoess, attended at least one conference which dealt with labor for I. G. Farben, and present at this conference were Pohl, yourself, Frank of your office, Gluecks, and Hoess.

A. When Hoess was in Berlin later on—he was a deputy of Gluecks—he was present also, of course. I have always seen him there.

Q. And you had already ordered that a preference be given to I. G. Farben industries over all other plants of the armament industry in furnishing concentration camp labor; this was on the order of Himmler.

A. No, for the time being I do not remember. Perhaps if you will tell me where these inmates were to be employed. Do you mean the large Buna Werke near Auschwitz?

Q. Yes, tell me about that.

A. The large Buna Werke in Auschwitz—Himmler was present there himself. It was a giant plant with 40,000 foreign workers and inmates employed there. That is true. Himmler had repeatedly inquired about it, and asked me how things were there, and said that we were to see to it that enough inmates were furnished so that the job got finished. Previously, I had thought of I. G. Farben as a whole, but now I remember this particular plant in Auschwitz.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. But what I have stated is correct, they did have a preference?

A. No, only this one plant was involved.

Q. And how many inmates did you furnish these Buna Werke?

A. I cannot say. I cannot give an exact figure of how many were employed there, there were thousands of them, but how many exactly I don't know. I have told you already that I have seen this construction site repeatedly. The engineers told me that there were at least 30,000 to 40,000 people employed there but how many of this total included inmates I don't know.

Q. If Hoess says that as many as 20,000 were furnished, what would you say?

A. That is quite possible. I told you there were about 40,000 altogether.

Q. When I. G. Farben sent a commission of its representatives to visit Auschwitz, did they first come to you?

A. No. Hoess knew the managers too. I believe they were in frequent contact. I have visited that construction site twice.

But these were all the I. G. Farben officials I knew. They were all there when I visited the site, and I believe they were all from I. G. Farben.

Q. And what is your best estimate as to the number of inmates furnished I. G. Farben as laborers from these camps?

A. That is very hard for me to say. I have to remember the 11 main concentration camps which were later on—every one of these camps had approximately 50 to 80 labor camps, outside labor camps. That means that there were 800 outside labor camps, and how many I. G. Farben had I just don't know.

Q. Approaching it from another angle, what instructions or requests did you get from Speer's office in this connection?

A. You mean concerning this construction site?

Q. Yes, and about the priority that was to be given I. G. Farben.

A. Nothing from Speer personally or his office, but I do remember those from Himmler. I can say with certainty that I did not receive any instructions from Speer, just as certain as I can say that I did get instructions from Himmler.

Q. What was Speer's attitude in regard to the armament and other industrial companies that needed labor?

A. Speer, of course, was highly interested in these armament industries running in high gear and I noticed Speer mostly in the year of 1944. His work was more noticeable in 1944. At that time, the transfer of armament industries underground was organized in a big way, and at that time Obergruppenfuehrer Kammler received a giant order from Speer. 15 large construction sites were involved to get industries underground. That was negotiated between Kammler and Speer. Just because of that, I remember Speer and his office, otherwise I did not have much to do with him.

Q. Of the inmates who were employed in the armament industries, for instance the assignment for I. G. Farben, who received the benefit of such labor? Were the inmates paid wages, was the SS paid anything, or who benefited?

A. These plants had to take upon themselves the obligation to feed, lodge, and give them medical care. Then the plants had to give the inmates the additional food ration for heavy workers, and also they had to give them premiums for doing good work—no money but the most industrious one got chits which could be used for purchases in the canteen. Then they got special food at times, such as potato salad. The plants had to pay their wages, which were equivalent to the wages of a normal worker, to the Reich.

Q. To the Reich Treasury or the SS?

A. To the Reich Treasury, not to the SS.

Q. What was the channel for these payments?

A. The payments were made in this manner. The armament plants paid the money. I have only seen the statistics which Maurer kept in the Amtsgruppe D. The monthly amounts were listed, and the plants paid the amounts to the AMT IV, of which Gluecks was the administrative agency. From there they were paid to the Reich Treasury. The last statistics which I saw were kept for one budget year, and they began on 1 April 1944 until February 1945. The statistics showed the amount of 120,000,000 RM.

Excerpts from Testimony of Oswald Pohl, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 7 June 1946, 1400-1615, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, Jr., IGD. Also present: Joseph Maier, Interpreter; Mabel A. Lesser, Reporter.

German Firms Which Used Concentration Camp Labor

Q. After your first meeting with Speer in 1943 on the labor problems how often would you see him thereafter?

A. Perhaps two or three times, on which occasions I discussed other matters with him, for instance, the providing of wood for the construction of barracks.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. How often did you communicate with him by phone or letter?

A. I had very, very little to do with Speer altogether.

Q. Were you always able to meet his demands for labor?

A. We never received any requests from the office of Speer directly because we received them from the individual firms. But it did happen that his subordinate, Saur, called up and suggested that more inmates be sent to this or that firm.

Q. What were the names of the firms?

A. There were thousands of firms. All the armament firms that were in Germany came with their requests to us. Whether it was the Steel Works down to the last factories, they came with requests to us.

Q. I want the names of the principal firms.

A. The names of the main firms, as far as I recall them, were: Heinkel, Messerschmitt, Salzgitter, Brabag-A.G., but there were many, many more.

Q. How about Siemens-Schuchert?

A. I do not recall, that question I wish to leave open.

Q. I. G. Farben?

A. Yes, the I. G. Farben people had the Buna works in Auschwitz.

Q. Krupp?

A. Yes, Krupps had the Berta works in Breslau.

Q. Hermann Goering Werke?

A. The Salzgitter firm is a part of the Hermann Goering Werke.

Q. What about Hermann Goering Werke Coal Mines?

A. I do not recall anything about that. I recall that I saw the Salzgitter Werke and I saw the Berta Werke of Krupp's.

Q. Perhaps it will help you to recall if I mention Dr. Heine of the Hermann Goering Coal Works at Brescze, who, with permission, visited Auschwitz every year and who worked 2,000 inmates from that camp.

A. Yes, I recall him, that is quite true. Yes, there was a labor camp.

Q. Perhaps you will recall more about Siemens-Schuchert if I ask you about an agreement between yourself and Maurer of your Division D(II).

A. Where should that have been?

Q. I am not sure of the location but it was an arrangement made with your agreement.

A. It is entirely possible but I cannot say anything definite at this moment. Perhaps it will come to me later. The SS was a tremendous organization and I do not recall the details at this moment. It is entirely possible, however, that an agreement was made.

Q. Then on a more general basis can you tell us about the problem in 1944 which arose after 100,000 inmates had been promised for labor in Landsberg and Muehldorf and their complex of camps in southern areas and about which Speer complained to you that your Division D was unwilling to furnish these workers?

A. They could not have delivered so many inmates. Where should they take these 100,000 inmates from? I know about Landsberg and Muehldorf; I was once in Muehldorf myself. There were two huge subterranean warehouses which Speer had established there and in both places there were labor camps which had been filled by inmates from Dachau, I believe. But I do not know about sending 100,000 inmates to these places because there were only 30,000 inmates in Dachau. I do not know how large the labor camps there were actually. The labor camp in Muehldorf was rather large. I do not know anything about the one in Landsberg. I was not there.

Himmler's Desire to Save Jews for Bargaining in Peace Negotiations

Q. Do you know what caused Himmler to issue the order, late in 1944, to cease the exterminations?*

A. I do not know anything about an order that Himmler was said to have issued to cease the extermination action. I had an order from Himmler to appear with Gluecks at his office but that was on a different matter altogether.

Q. When and on what matter?

A. That was in March 1945; that was the last time I saw Himmler. He asked Gluecks and me on that occasion how many Jews were still left in concentration camps. We figured out there must have been about 7,000 still left, I do not recall the exact figure. It was then that he gave me the order to visit all the concentration camp commandants to tell them that they were not to touch any Jews any longer. This order I executed but I never received any general order about ceasing the extermination action.

Q. Do you mean that you were able to visit every concentration camp after March 1945?

A. This was my order and as far as I could I visited every camp. It was my instruction to tell every commandant personally about this order that Himmler gave me.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What you mean to say is, every camp that had not been liberated or overrun?

A. When I am referring to concentration camps I mean the 11 concentration camps that were under my jurisdiction. Of course I did not visit all the concentration camps. They were too numerous.

Q. Let us have the names of the 11 camps in your jurisdiction.

A. To be exact, I visited the commandants of the following nine concentration camps: Neuengamme, Oranienburg, Gross-Rosen, Auschwitz, Flossenbürg, Buchenwald, Dachau, Mauthausen, and Bergen-Belsen. The other two, Stuffhof and Schirmeck, had been overrun by Allied Forces and I could not visit their commandants any longer.

Q. How many Jews did you find in the nine camps you visited?

A. I did not walk about and count the Jews there. The figure referred to was mentioned by Gluecks, who seemed to know about the figures better than anyone else. It seemed too small but that was the one that was mentioned as far as I recall.

Q. You just told us that you visited the nine camps. You certainly didn't go there and not find out how many Jews there were that were to be affected by this order. What did you find?

A. All I did was to deliver the order of Himmler.

Q. You just played postman, was that it?

A. Yes, that is true in this case. I played postman in that instance because that seemed very important to Himmler at the time, since Himmler was conducting certain negotiations with Count Bernadotte of Sweden and he wanted to have things fixed in that manner.

Q. He wanted a few Jews as pawns for bargaining purposes, wasn't that it?

A. Yes, that is true. That was my impression as well as Gluecks,—that he wanted to have them for bargaining purposes in the peace negotiations.

Excerpts from Testimony of Oswald Pohl, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 8 June 1946, 1030-1230, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, Jr., IGD. Also present: Dr. Joseph Maier, Interpreter; Charles J. Gallagher, Reporter.

Composition and Activities of "Himmler's Friends"

Q. You have mentioned dealings with Ohlendorf. Will you elaborate on what particulars you dealt with Ohlendorf, or had contact with him?

A. Whenever I met Ohlendorf it was only within that special circle of Friends of Himmler's. I never looked him up in an official capacity.

Q. What were the occasions when you met with Ohlendorf?

A. Every month the circle of Friends of Himmler's got together. There were about thirty persons present and Ohlendorf was among them. I say, these were the occasions on which I got together with him.

Q. Where were these meetings?

A. Usually in the House of Aviators in Berlin.

Q. When were these meetings? What time of the day, and how long would they last?

A. They usually started at 7:30 in the evening and would last until about ten or ten-thirty, when people began to go away.

Q. How large was the average attendance?

A. The average attendance was twenty persons. Sometimes thirty persons. I don't know all the people that belonged to that particular circle of Friends of Himmler's. I just saw the people that happened to be there.

Q. Did the same people attend every month?

A. That varied. At one meeting one fellow would not appear, and another fellow would appear at another meeting. That varied, and I was not there either every time.

Q. You mentioned before that economic and business leaders often attended these monthly dinners for the friends of Himmler's. Who, for instance?

A. The majority of the people who attended were economic and business leaders. Among them were Baron von Schroeder, Lindemann who I believe was the president of the German Economic Chamber, Emil Helfferich from Hamburg, Ritter von Halt, the successor of the Reichsport Leader Tschammer-Osten, Professor Meyer of the Dresdener Bank in Berlin, and Herr Flick, the noted central German industrialist.

Q. Were there other industrial or business leaders at these dinners whom you can now recall?

A. Dr. Binge, who was a representative of a large concern. I am not sure whether that was Siemens. Yes, I seem to recall that he was the Director General of Siemens. Then there was one Rosterig of Kastel-Harthein, but which firm he represented I don't know. One Herr Loscher, formerly of the Reich Finance Ministry, and subsequently a leader of an economic concern either subsidized or established by the Reich Government.

Q. Then you can think about those and give us other names later. Now as you talked to Ohlendorf what did you usually discuss?

INTERROGATIONS

A. It was usually the case that we of the SS would spread among the group, and talk to the other guests. We would not sit together, you see. Thus it happened that Ohlendorf and I did not talk very much to each other.

Q. Was this habit of spreading SS representatives among the other guests a prearranged matter?

A. Yes, it was. We were told not to sit together. The seating arrangement at the table was such that the SS was spread among the other guests. Himmler had his personal guests sit near him, and we were supposed to entertain them.

Q. What were you told to discuss with the guests?

A. We did not have any definite instructions as to what to talk to them about. We were simply asked to entertain them.

Q. Who among the SS approached these leaders for financial support?

A. The manager of this affair was Brigadefuehrer Krane-fuss. He issued the invitations on behalf of the Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler, and even I received an invitation every time. He arranged the seating order around the table, and it was he who discussed all the internal matters with the economic leaders there. They were not restricted to these gatherings for their talks or discussions. That is, the economic leaders were not restricted to these social gatherings. These activities must have taken place outside as well.

Q. I am concerned with the manner in which these industrial and business leaders were approached for financial aid. What do you know about that?

A. I would not know anything about this. All of this was attended to by Krane-fuss. How he did it I do not know.

Q. When did you learn about it, after the money came into the treasury of the SS?

A. I never received the money; that was received by the personal staff, that is Wolff.

Q. You mean to tell us you knew how the money was spent, and not where it came from?

A. I have no idea.

Q. Yes, you do.

A. I am telling you the truth. They never came through my hands. Everything was attended to by Obergruppenfuehrer Wolff, who had his own treasurer.

Q. You are not stupid, and you were well informed in these matters. You probably had a better insight of the SS organization's financial problems and its financial reserves than any other man.

A. That is true.

Q. Now tell us what were the amounts in a general way that were received from these industrial leaders, and what was done with them?

A. I must say under oath I do not know anything about the amount of money given by these industrial leaders. All I know is that Brigadefuehrer Kranefuss, and Obergruppenfuehrer Wolff, and Baron von Schroeder, that among these three men all things were discussed. One could observe from the whole discussion that developed between Kranefuss and Schroeder, that they were on very good terms with each other, and they settled these matters among each other.

Q. How much money was turned over to Hitler out of this fund?

A. I have no idea. I do not believe that Hitler received any money from these funds connected with the personnel administration of Obergruppenfuehrer Wolff, who did not permit anybody to take any look at it.

Excerpts from Testimony of Oswald Pohl, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 10 June 1946, 1400-1700, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, Jr., IGD. Also present: Richard Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Charles J. Gallagher, Reporter.

Disposition of Concentration Camp Inmates as Allied Armies Pushed into Germany

Q. Was there any special order given by Himmler to you as to the disposition of the inmates of concentration camps that were not as yet overrun by the Allied Armies?

A. In the Fall of 1944 Himmler gave a written order that in case a concentration camp was threatened by the approaching enemy, the particular concentration camp should come under the jurisdiction of the local Higher SS and Police Leader, and that then the Higher SS and Police Leader of that region should decide at his own discretion what disposition should be made of the inmates.

Q. And then what happened?

A. I do not know whether Himmler gave the directives to Kaltenbrunner beyond that.

Q. What was done under that order?

A. According to the provisions of this order the Higher SS and

INTERROGATIONS

Police Leader took all measures necessary in the evacuation of these camps, and for the treatment of the inmates.

Q. You mean they were to do that, didn't you?

A. They were to do that, and I give my opinion that they did it.

Q. How long did Himmler's order to this effect remain in force?

A. I never heard that it was rescinded. I remember that Gruppenfuehrer Katzmann evacuated his camps up in the north, and later Obergruppenfuehrer Schmauser evacuated Auschwitz, and Gross-Rosen. I remember particularly towards the end I still received teletypes from Martin, who was Higher SS and Police Leader of this region, what to do with the concentration camp in Flossenburg, and I was still in Berlin, I remember that.

Q. What did he do?

A. I do not know. I left Berlin shortly after that, and all further connections ceased.

Q. What did you tell him to do?

A. I told him that in accordance with the orders of Himmler, he himself would have to know what to do, because I in Berlin could not possibly judge what the conditions were down there.

Q. You say you do not recall any rescission of this Himmler order.

A. No.

Q. Is that what you want to swear to?

A. Yes, I swear to that. I never heard of Himmler either altering or rescinding this order.

Q. You know it was recalled at least twice, don't you?

A. No, I do not know that.

Q. How do you account for the order from Himmler to you for extermination of all prisoners in the concentration camps, which order you attempted to destroy, but failed to do so?

A. I do not remember any such order.

Q. You do not deny it existed?

A. Well, I do not remember having seen such an order.

Who Was Responsible for the Concentration Camps

Q. Let me read some of Kaltenbrunner's testimony. He was being questioned about the deaths that occurred in concentration camps, and this question was put: "Because they continued to be done through 1943, 1944, and 1945, and until the Allied Armies overran the concentration camps, and through those years Kaltenbrunner was Chief of the RSHA which had them in charge.

"A. No, I was never in charge of any such, but orders were generally like such in my statement in London, that Himmler or Pohl, and no commander of any concentration camp on the part of Germany can say he ever received the slightest order from me."

A. I can give you exactly the same answer. No concentration camp commandant ever received the slightest order from me, either written or oral. The WVHA* did not have the slightest jurisdiction over the prisoners. Any such order could only come from Himmler, or from the RSHA, from Mueller, head of Amt IV. I do not know whether Kaltenbrunner knew about it in every case, but at any rate any such orders never emanated from the WVHA, or from me.

Q. You and Kaltenbrunner contradict each other at almost every turn.

A. Well, I am telling you the truth.

Q. Kaltenbrunner says that in all his dealings with you he never referred to concentration camps.

A. That is an error. I already testified to this fact, and I am insisting on it that I wrote quite a number of letters to Kaltenbrunner to release several prisoners and that cannot be changed. Those letters would be entirely surplusage if I myself ever had the power to take them out, because I would have simply to say, "Take them out."

Q. You stand on your oral testimony that when you wanted to deal with any one about taking a prisoner out of a camp, you took it up with Kaltenbrunner, is that right?

A. Yes, I insist on that absolutely, and I will not change it. The whole thing is so clear that any error is absolutely out of the question. Some of my collaborators, no doubt, would be in a position to testify whether or not I had authority to release prisoners. Loerner would know that, and Hoess perhaps.

Q. Here you make out Kaltenbrunner as a liar when he is on trial for his life when he gave this testimony?

A. It is not true insofar as he refers to me. That is absolutely not true.

Q. Kaltenbrunner says if he can be confronted by you he will say that you are the responsible person always.

A. Please confront me with him.

Q. In connection with the Jewish extermination program Kaltenbrunner said this: "During my time"—meaning his time with the RSHA—"I have repeatedly opposed such persecution of the Jews; particularly in view of those reasons I have declined to take charge of this office." What do you know about that? He said further, "The responsibility rests with Himmler, Mueller, and Pohl."

*Economic and Administration Main Office (of SS), in charge of concentration camps and headed by Pohl.

Reich Security Main Office, headed by Kaltenbrunner.

INTERROGATIONS

A. In this Kaltenbrunner makes only one mistake. He put in the name of Pohl instead of Kaltenbrunner, and I will tell you why. If I oppose anything, that means that I have something to do with it; how can I possibly oppose something I did not have anything to do with?

Confiscation of Czech Property after Conquest of Czechoslovakia

Q. Do you recall the Central Office for Settlement of Jewish questions in Bohemia and Moravia that was established at Prague?

A. Yes, the RSHA had an agency there.

Q. What did you have to do with it?

A. I had nothing to do with the Central Office.

Q. Kaltenbrunner said the following: First, that it had been instituted by Heydrich, and then he was asked about the period that Kaltenbrunner was in the RSHA, and he answered by saying: "During this period, no instruction or orders came from this office which I personally have issued. Such instructions or orders could only be issued by Pohl, or from the Chief of the Secret State Police, Mueller."

A. Well, that is complete nonsense. I remember this whole thing now, and I will tell you why in just a second. Heydrich did institute that Central Office there and in the course of time accumulated so many valuables, and such enormous funds that the Reich Ministry of Finance suddenly became interested in it, and sent accountants down there to check the accounts. That is all I know about it, and so far as giving orders to them, that is complete nonsense. My deputy, Obergruppenfuehrer August Frank, who was in charge of all of the accountants, certainly would know about this, because I believe he will remember, too.

Q. Again your story does not agree with Kaltenbrunner's. He said this, speaking of the office there, "I only knew that there was such an institute to take care of the property, because the Ministry of Finance had asked for control of this institute, and I had referred them to Pohl because Pohl was in charge of that institute. I have not reported to Pohl but I have requested the Minister of Finance to refer himself to Pohl." And further, "These control duties were passed on to Pohl. In other words, the Ministry of Finance was asked to refer to Pohl because this institute to take care of the properties was under the directorship of Pohl."

A. Well, all I can say is that Kaltenbrunner's orientation about his own activity is fantastic and poor. I just mentioned to you that the Reich Ministry of Finance got the facts about this thing, and they sent accountants to check the accounts, and apart from this, that institute was entirely Heydrich's and possibly Kaltenbrunner's.

Q. What happened to these properties and valuables?

A. As I said, the Reich Ministry of Finance took over and when they did they also had the right to dispose of this thing. I do not know what happened to them, but as I told him, this thing was much talked about among the accountants in my main office, and the whole thing was rather ominous, but that is the only connection I had with it. I do not know just what value there was in all the things claimed. I believe most of it was in exchange, currency, and other valuable papers, but I know it was many millions. Possibly I may be able to remember more detail about this thing later, and if I may, I would like to add it to my testimony then. As I told you, this Obergruppenfuehrer Frank was connected with this whole thing, and he could be able to give you more detailed information.

Q. In order to refresh your recollection you may recall that more than 17,000 houses were confiscated and among other things, livestock, and liquid funds from the banks and, much other property, which I shall ask you about later.

A. All of that is very possible, as I say. They had both real estate, valuables, and currency. So far as I know money and other valuable papers exceeded the value of real estate by far, but it must have been thousands of houses, and I know that they had two warehouses in Prague that were filled with furniture, and other household goods. So far as I remember recreation homes for German soldiers were furnished with them. This whole thing was much discussed in Berlin; so much, in fact, that it finally got around to the Reich Ministry of Finance, and their accountants.

Excerpts from Testimony of Oswald Pohl, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 13 June 1946, 1400-1600, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, Jr., IGD. Also present: Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Rose W. Cook, Reporter.

Widespread Knowledge of Conditions in Concentration Camps

Q. Kaltenbrunner has told the Tribunal that there were only a handful of people in the WVHA who had any control and knew anything about concentration camps. These are his exact words as they appear at page 7617 of the English transcript of the trial:

INTERROGATIONS

"A. There were just a few people in the WVHA who knew how things really were in concentration camps.

"Q. Now as far as my question is concerned, you were speaking about a handful of men who did not belong to this group?

"A. No, I did not. This handful was Himmler, Pohl, Gluecks, and Mueller and the camp commanders."

A. Well, that is complete nonsense. I described to you how these were handled in the WHVA. As for instance, in the case of the use of textiles and turning-in of valuables, from Gluecks and Loerner right on down to the last little clerk they all must have known what went on in the concentration camps, and it is complete nonsense for him to speak of just a handful of men; and if it was like that in my department, naturally, it was exactly the same in his. Just to illustrate to you what I mean, when I went around to the different camps in March as the representative of Himmler, I came to Bergen-Belsen and found terrible conditions there. An epidemic of typhus had broken out, and there were mountains of dead people all over the camp, and I tried to institute emergency measures in order to stop the epidemic, and although I really couldn't do that, I told the Camp Commandant, "Don't let anybody else come into this camp." Then there were seven or eight thousand Jews there, and I wanted them to be sent to Theresienstadt to get them out of there, and I dispatched a telegram at once to the RSHA, asking them to have these Jews transferred. Later when I got to Berlin I got on the telephone and I remember I called there three or four times every day, and I don't remember any more whether it was Mueller or Eichmann that I talked to in order to have these people moved. That really shows that I, for instance, had no authority to move people and that this was a matter for the RSHA. Now these things happened and they are facts and there is no use to deny them or lie about them. They just are there and there is nothing you can do about that.

Q. All right, why didn't you tell us about this before when I asked you what conditions you found when you were making your trips in early March, and when you denied finding any such conditions? I asked you about nine camps you told us you visited, and you said you didn't observe anything. What did you see at the other camps, dead people also?

A. Well it is not that I tried to hide this from you, but I didn't think you asked me about it. Well, in Bergen-Belsen, you couldn't help noticing it, it was very evident, and if I didn't tell you about it, it is because I thought you didn't ask me about it, or maybe I didn't understand it. I have no interest in not telling you everything I know. It may be I forgot it for the moment, but I will gladly admit it. The only other things I remember about this trip were in Mauthausen. When I arrived there, I saw many sick people there and many of them limping around and I asked Ziereis what medical facilities he had in the camp because these people were not very well cared for.

Number of Concentration Camp Inmates Available as Laborers

Q. Let's turn now to the figure you gave us previously as to the number of inmates of concentration camps who were available and capable of being used as laborers. You have estimated that some two hundred to two hundred fifty thousand were used by the armament industry?

A. Yes, this figure is not complete by any means because it refers only to those that were loaned out to the armament industry but does not refer to those who were used in our own armament factories. This number of two hundred to two hundred fifty thousand refers only to those who were used for purposes of armament in the labor camps and in the "Aussenlager," which were run exclusively for labor purposes, and does not include those who may have been used for the same purpose inside of the concentration camps where industries may have had their own small establishments.

Q. How many were there in this latter group?

A. Perhaps it will be easier if I do it another way. The next thing I would like to talk about are construction brigades. In all construction brigades and armament projects inside the concentration camps a further maximum number of one hundred thousand were used, so that I would be inclined to believe that the total was somewhere around 250,000, but not more than that number.

Q. How were the others out of the total of 470 thousand, which would make 120,000, employed?

A. The remainder of 120,000 I cannot specify in exact percentages, but I believe that it would be a fair assumption to make that roughly 40,000 of them were used for the upkeep of the camps, and for necessary work inside the camps to keep them running. A further 40,000 of them probably were in quarantine at any one time and at least 40,000 of them upon the sick list at any one time, and probably the number of the people on the sick list was higher than that but I can only give you this approximation.

INTERROGATIONS

XXIII. HERMANN REINECKE*

Excerpts from Testimony of Hermann Reinecke, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 23 October 1945, 1045-1235, by Col. John H. Amen, IGD. Also present: Lt. Daniel F. Margolies; General Erwin Lahousen (German P/W); Richard W. Sonnenfeldt, Interpreter; Anne Daniels, Court Reporter.

Branding and Other Inhumane Treatment of Russian Prisoners of War

BY LT. MARGOLIES:

Q. I have here document R-94. The order deals with the marking of Russian prisoners of war.

A. Yes. (The witness examined the document.) I know this order, and, as I said yesterday, it deals with tattooing. It was issued by General Graevenitz at the time, and as soon as we learned about it, it was recalled.

Q. Who is the order signed by?

A. It is signed by the Chief of the Prisoner of War Department, General Graevenitz.

Q. On the order it states—

A. (Interposing) It was always signed "By Order of the Chief of the Supreme Command of the Wehrmacht."

I know this exactly. Graevenitz issued this in July of 1942, and either the Chief of the Department, the Chief of the Section, or the Chief of the Prisoner of War Department would sign it.

He personally had to recall this order; he had to issue another order to cancel this one.

Q. When an order is signed by the Chief of the OKW, does he know about the order before it is issued?

A. Normally, an order that was signed by order of the Chief of the OKW—such an order would have to be previously approved and concurred in by the Chief of the OKW. However, I remember exactly that this order here was issued without either his or my approval, and thus it had to be recalled later.

I don't know any more exactly; you would have to ask Graevenitz about it. I believe that this order was issued after a general directive had been issued by Keitel that prisoners of war would have to be marked in some way.

Q. Well, do you remember when the order was recalled?

*Herman Reinecke was a General of Infantry (Lt. Gen.); Chief of the General Office of OKW; Chief of the NS Political Guidance Staff, OKW; Honorary member of the Special Senate of the People's Tribunal. Reinecke was known as one of the most Nazified of the General generals. In August 1944 he was one of the judges in the trial of participants in the 20 July 1944 attempt on Hitler's life.

Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

A. Yes; I know that exactly because all of us insisted on that as soon as we heard about it. I can swear to that.

Q. Well, do you remember discussing this order with Field Marshal Keitel?

A. If I remember correctly, a general order was given by Keitel that they would have to be marked or identified in some way, and that, of course, was because of the many escapes that took place. Those people would get away from the camps and then put on civilian clothes, and it would be impossible to identify them.

I think this suggestion was made at the instigation of the police. I believe that this is the order that resulted. (Referring to the document)—Yes, that is it.

BY COLONEL AMEN:

Q. Your recollection has been refreshed about the meeting with Lahousen?

A. Yes. I was very much moved and very much stirred yesterday that some of my answers were doubted. I can only repeat again that I had nine departments under me, and one can't remember all these things after four years.

Q. Well, you can certainly remember that there were many conferences concerning the orders for the mistreatment of Russian prisoners of war.

A. Of course, most of those conferences or discussions took place with the Prisoner of War Department.

Q. No, but you personally attended many conferences where those orders were discussed?

A. Of course, that is difficult to say, but it is possible.

Q. Well, I will refresh your recollection about it, I think, in a very little while. Meanwhile, here is document 1519-PS.* I ask you to read it and see if that helps to refresh your recollection on any of these points. (The document was submitted to the witness.)

A. Of September 1941? Oh, yes. This, then, must have been of consequence. I mean, the meeting must have taken place shortly before this. I guess that must have been in connection with the trip that I took to the front in August of that year. I noted all those things, and then I must have said, "Now listen, we can't work things like that," because the commandants of the camps were complaining.

*Circular regarding treatment of Soviet Prisoners of War. See Vol. IV, p. 58.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What were the commandants of the camps complaining about?

A. Well, just about this. Those were camps that were under the authority of the Army; they were not under us. I didn't have any camps there. They complained about the attitude of the Police, and they wanted the same thing that we wanted, namely, they wanted to have all these things done outside the camps.

Q. Who is "they"?

A. By "they" I mean the commandants of the camps, and of course us too. If I remember correctly, in August we had not received any Russian prisoners of war in the home area.

Q. Where were they?

A. They were all with the Army, and that is where the orders were sent. I believe the order that I was shown yesterday had the initials of Warlimont on it and I believe it was sent to the Army.

Q. So what?

A. What I mean to say about that is that those orders were sent from the Leadership Staff of the Armed Forces to the Army, and then we only saw it much later. Otherwise, we would have issued this order of the 8th of September 1941 very much earlier.

Q. Well, the first order was issued on 16 June, was it not?

A. But not about this subject, I don't believe. There is one mention here of the 26th of June 1941 and—oh yes, there is one up here of the 16th of June addressed to the Commander of the District. Only Breier could answer this. I was in the sanatorium at Dresden at that time, and therefore it is impossible for me to answer these questions.

This is also an order that was issued without my collaboration, because otherwise it would have to say "AWA" [General Office of the Armed Forces].

Q. That is a lot of nonsense. Now, do you remember document number 502-PS* which had to do with the killing of the prisoners outside of the camp? Do you remember that order?

A. You mean an order from us?

Q. Never mind who it was from. I said do you remember the order that I showed you yesterday, dated 17 July 1941, about killing prisoners outside of the camp? This order right here. (The document was submitted to the witness.)

A. You mean what I saw yesterday?

Q. I say do you remember it, yes or no?

*Vol. III, p. 422.

A. I don't remember it; it was not issued by us.

Q. That isn't true either. Read the first line. Read it out loud. (Whereupon the witness read as instructed.) Doesn't that say that the activation of commandos will take place in accordance with the agreement of the Chief of the Security Police and Security Service, and the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces?

A. Yes, that is possible; yes.

Q. Is that what it says, "possible"? That is what it says, isn't it? Read it again.

A. Yes, of course.

Q. Then don't sit there and tell me that the OKW didn't have anything to do with it.

A. I didn't say that. I said that I myself didn't have anything to do with it.

Q. Of course you yourself did. What position did you occupy at that time?

A. I was always Chief of the General Office of the Armed Forces.

Q. Yes, don't tell me you didn't have anything to do with it.

A. Well, as far as this agreement is concerned, it is possible—well, maybe Colonel Breier made it. That is possible, he was competent. Or perhaps the Abwehr, they were also competent in these matters. However, we all protested.

Q. Don't you know that you are responsible for everything which they did?

A. Of course, yes.

Q. Well then, why do you keep sitting there telling me that you didn't have anything to do with that?

A. I don't say that. All that I say that I can remember today is that this agreement with the Police was made by the OKW or my department.

Q. Do you remember taking 160 officers down to Dachau at Hitler's request?

A. Oh yes. You mean German officers?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes.

Q. And that was when?

A. Well, that was in the nature of a course, and it must have been in the spring of 1939, or just about at that time.

Q. And how did you come to make that trip?

A. That was a course, and I believe that it was a course which took place in Munich. The regimental commanders of the Army, the commandants of the large ships of the Navy, and the commandants of the Air Force were sent there for a course.

INTERROGATIONS

Well, I put in a day there because at that time there were already rumors among the German people that everything was not all right in the concentration camps, and I made the suggestion to Keitel to ask Himmler to let us see one of those camps. He then arranged this trip to Dachau, which he conducted personally.

Q. Who conducted personally?

A. Himmler.

Q. Was Hitler there?

A. No. And then, after that, in the afternoon, we inspected a china factory which belonged to the camp. Then later we saw an SS regiment in Munich performing combat exercises.

Q. How were the 160 officers selected?

A. The different branches of the armed forces selected them for this detail.

Q. Were they General Staff officers?

A. No; everything was mixed up. They were with the troops, and as far as I remember the Army sent regimental commanders.

Q. And then after the inspection you made a speech, didn't you?

A. Well, I believe that I made one in the evening, in the dining room.

Q. And what did you say?

A. Well, this is very difficult. I really don't know any more what I said. He spoke as our host, and I believe I then replied.

Q. And did you state that the results of the inspection were good or bad?

A. It was good, and we all were very much astonished that it was so good.

Q. And that is not true either, according to all of the officers who were there that we have been able to locate.

A. Well, I can only remember that we found it in such shape that all of us were astonished.

Q. Why were you astonished?

A. Because there was a general rumor among the people that these concentration camps were terrible. That was the reason why we went there; that is, to look at it ourselves.

Q. Did you see any gas chambers there?

A. No; no.

Q. You found everything was fine; is that right?

A. Well, I remember everything we saw was all right anyway. I remember that we started out by seeing a relief map of the whole thing, and then we started out to visit the barracks. Everything was nice and clean, and also the prisoners.

Q. And that is what you said in your speech afterwards?

A. That it was good?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes.

Q. Is that what you said in the speech?

A. Yes; we were content at that time.

Q. And that is what you said in the speech?

A. It is possible.

Q. Anything is possible. Is that what you want to swear to? Is that what you said in your speech?

A. I remember that he was our host and we were all together in the officers' quarters. He greeted us, and then I got up and answered him. I really can't remember what I said, but I do know that we found that those rumors that were going around among the German people were not true.

Q. You understand that you are still under oath?

A. Yes. I remember that I praised very much the exercises of that SS regiment that we watched. They were actually shooting with live ammunition.

Q. I am not at all interested in that.

A. Well, of course, it is terribly difficult to say today what I said in a speech then. I can't do that.

Q. Well, lots of other people can. I don't know why you shouldn't. What do you want to swear to about what you said?

A. As far as I remember, I thanked him because he had conducted us around and shown us all those things.

Q. All what things?

A. That we had seen the camp and this manufacturing of china in Allach.

Q. Never mind the china; I am only interested in the camp.

A. But I am certain that I did not talk about details.

Q. Conditions in the camp? Do you want to swear that you said that you found those conditions to be good?

A. It is terribly difficult to say now what I said then. The only thing that I can remember is that we were very astonished how good everything was and that it was in order.

(Erwin Lahousen* entered the Interrogation Room at this point.)

Q. Are you acquainted with this gentleman who has just come in?

A. Yes; I remember that this must be Lahousen—Colonel Lahousen, yes.

*Maj. Gen. Erwin Lahousen, who had served as an assistant to Admiral Canaris in the Abwehr (Intelligence Service), was one of several Abwehr officers who opposed the Nazi designs. At the trial he testified for the prosecution. See Affidavit A, vol. VIII, p. 587.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. I will ask him to see if he can't help to refresh your memory about this conference which took place, at which you were both present, and at which the Russian prisoner of war situation was discussed.

A. Yes.

General Lahousen: Reinecke, we are concerned here with the conference which, according to my memory—and as I also stated here—took place very shortly after the beginning of the Russian campaign. You were presiding over it. According to my memory, the following men were present: Outside of myself there was Obergruppenfuehrer Mueller of the Reich Security Main Office; the representative of that section, or rather, of the Prisoner of War Department—I can't remember his name any more, but it was not General Graevenitz.

Colonel Amen: Colonel Breier?

General Lahousen: Right. And perhaps there were one or two more officers, whom I can't remember. The subject of the conference was the command concerning the order as to the treatment of Russian prisoners of war. That is, as far as I remember it.

General Reinecke: Yes.

General Lahousen: In this conference you explained and also gave the reasons for the measures which had led to the extremely harsh treatment of this question. At that time I heard, by order of my department and my superior, Admiral Canaris—I had to present the misgivings and reservations which the office had against this decree, or rather, against the orders, which were in contradiction to all international customs.* I don't mean agreement, because there was no agreement with Russia on that subject.

As far as I remember, these reservations or this protest had the following contents in the main:

First, the repercussions of these measures upon the morale of the troops, which were especially and most unfavorably influenced because it happened that those executions were carried out within sight of the troops.

Second, the unfavorable effects as far as the CIC Service was concerned. That was because these measures violated the most elementary confidence as far as the ranks of the prisoners of war were concerned, and that was especially so for certain Russian peoples as, for instance, the Caucasians. They were horrified and put out by this.

*See documents 1519-PS, vol. IV, p. 58; EC-338, vol. VII, p. 411.

Third, I pointed out the lunacy of the execution of these orders or these methods, and I put this question. This question, in the main, was addressed to Obergruppenfuehrer Mueller, according to what opinions and what points these executions were being carried out. That was because it was reported to me that, for instance, prisoners who came from the Crimea, who were Tartars, who had been circumcised because they were Mohammedans, had been killed by the SD commanders, who were competent in these things. That was because they had been regarded as Jews; that is, they had been killed because they had been regarded as Jews.

The fourth point is that because of these methods all desertions or inclination towards desertion had been destroyed.

Lastly, thus the will of resistance of the members of the Red Army itself had only been increased and therefore the opposite effect had been achieved of what had apparently been intended, namely, that by the extermination of certain elements regarded as the promulgators of Bolshevism, it would kill Bolshevism.

In the discussion which started about this, Mueller told me he only granted that the executions were not to take place within sight of the troops, but out of their sight. He made this compromise in a certain cynical manner. Furthermore, he granted a certain and more defined limitation as far as the term "contaminated by Bolshevism" was concerned. That is, a new limitation on that term should be imposed. Outside of that, or as far as the further course of the discussion was concerned, Mueller addressed himself very sharply against any relaxation of this order. He declared that we were in a war of life and death with Bolshevism, and that the soldier of the Red Army was not to be regarded as a soldier like the soldiers of the Allies, but as an ideological enemy to the death, and should be treated accordingly.

You, Mr. Reinecke, agreed with this opinion of Obergruppenfuehrer Mueller in the main, in your conclusions, and you again described this whole problem which I recalled to you in very hot words when we left the conference; that is, after the session had broken up, I mentioned the negative result as far as my protest was concerned, and I regretted it very much. I mentioned this to Colonel Breier—the Colonel Breier that you mentioned. He only shrugged his shoulders and said, "What do you want to do? You know Reinecke very well."

What I pictured here from my memory is, moreover, contained in a document which I had made for the orientation of my chief, Admiral Canaris. I made this notation at once, and thus everything is documented. The document is in a collection which I have called my collection of rarities. I have marked many of my papers thus.

INTERROGATIONS

That is all.

To General Reinecke by Col. Amen:

Q. Now, do you remember the conference?

A. Yes, it must have happened something like that.

Q. Well now, don't say "it must have happened something like that." Did it happen like that or didn't it?

A. It is very difficult for me to remember particulars, but if General Lahousen has made a notation in a document about it—

General Lahousen: Yes.

A. —then it must have happened just as he set forth.

Q. Do you deny anything which Lahousen has just said? Answer yes or no.

A. The only thing that I can imagine—because of my own position I can't imagine that I could have taken such a radical point of view. I must have received an order from Keitel as to that.

Q. Do you deny anything which Lahousen has just said?

A. I can't deny it because if he noted it down at that time—I have nothing in writing that I can remember about that.

Q. Do you deny anything which Lahousen said? And if so, what?

A. I say again that if he made those notations then they must be right. However, I cannot remember that I myself took such a radical position.

Q. But you don't deny anything that Lahousen said or wrote in his book? Is that correct?

A. None other than my own radical opinion. I don't know, but I must have said they were not my orders at the time; they must have been there and have come from the Leadership Staff of the Armed Forces.

Q. I don't care whose orders they were, at the moment. I am asking you whether you deny anything that Lahousen said, and if so, what?

A. I can only say that I cannot agree that I should have manifested such a radical attitude as to those things personally.

Q. What part of it do you deny, if any?

A. I personally—and I believe General Lahousen mentioned that I had supported Obergruppenfuehrer Mueller's point of view very strongly.

General Lahousen: Yes.

Q. Right. Now, do you deny that or do you admit it?

A. As I said before, it is clear that the thing happened later, that the order was issued like that. The sentence here, that the officers of the CIC were to participate in it, proves that.

Q. There was never an occasion when you opposed anything that Obergruppenfuehrer Mueller said; isn't that a fact? Never?

A. That I really don't know.

Q. Well, can you remember any time when you ever opposed anything that Mueller said?

A. I can only say again that all of us were very distressed about this thing and how it was working out. However, it was ordered and thus it had to be carried out.

Q. You weren't distressed about it.

A. Yes.

Q. What did you do about it?

A. I couldn't do anything against it.

Q. You didn't try to do anything, did you? You have just heard Lahousen say what you did about it, which was to support Mueller.

A. If two different departments did not agree, then the normal thing would have been that Admiral Canaris, as the representative of his office, would have gone to Keitel and told him, "It doesn't work out like that." And then Keitel would have settled the difficulty.

Q. Now we will ask Lahousen about that.

General Lahousen: I want to make a statement here. That is just what happened. Admiral Canaris had been to see Keitel to make representations about just what had happened; that is, about the contents of these orders: (a) as far as international law was concerned—that is, about the customs of international law; and (b) about the lunacy of this order. He made very strong representations about that.

I received directives from Canaris before I went to this conference. The purpose of that was to provide you, Mr. Reinecke, with a golden bridge, so to speak. I was to give you all the facts upon which to build, and I was going to give you all the material support possible. Instead of taking this opportunity, you relied upon Mueller.

General Reinecke: Well, the way I look at it, I must have already received Keitel's opinion, because I can't imagine anything else.

General Lahousen: Your personal position was very harsh, in particular; it came out in the expressions which were used at the time and which I don't remember exactly any more, and therefore I can't repeat them. However, they are in that notation that I made in the document; that is, your personal expressions about these questions.

INTERROGATIONS

To General Reinecke by Col. Amen:

Q. Do you deny anything which Lahousen says?

A. It is difficult to deny it.

Q. I don't care whether it is easy or difficult; do you or don't you?

A. If he remembers those things, then it must have been like that.

General Lahousen: I can only tell the truth as to just how it happened.

A. If he put it down in a document—at any rate, I can't remember it.

Q. Then you don't dispute it; is that right?

A. Well, if he noted it down like that, then what can I—well, I remembered it differently.

Q. Do you dispute it or don't you?

(Witness shrugs shoulders.)

Don't just shrug your shoulders; do you dispute it or don't you?

A. If he says it happened like that and he noted it down on paper, then it must be correct. I myself could not fix it as positively as all that.

Q. But you don't dispute it?

A. No.

To General Lahousen by Col. Amen:

Q. Now, I want to ask Lahousen if it isn't a fact that these orders for the treatment of Russian prisoners of war were the subject of constant discussion in the General Staff?

A. I believe yes. I don't happen to know of any concrete instances, but I must suppose that this subject—which had created a terrific reaction within the armed forces—was discussed many times at various places.

Q. And is there any question but what the reaction was a very strong one?

A. No. I know that the reaction was especially strong from the front; that is, especially the commanders and those in a position of command at the front.

I have already stated in my first interrogations that several of these commanders refused to transmit these orders any further, but I am sorry that I cannot name them. I remember very well that Canaris undertook a trip at once, or at least a very short time after this order had been issued, to see the Supreme Commanders and to ascertain their opinions as to this order. Then Canaris told me about this, and that is where I derived the foundation for what I just told you.

Q. Now, what was Reinecke's position at the time of this conference?

A. He was the Chief of the General Office of the Armed Forces.

Q. And what was his responsibility at that time insofar as the prisoners of war were concerned?

A. I can't say that positively, but I can only deduce something from the presence of Colonel Breier, who belonged to your Department.

General Reinecke: Yes, he did.

A. And from the fact that you presided over this conference, I had to conclude thus, that you were concerned very much with this question—that is, the responsibility—without being able to say concretely just how the organization was at that time.

Q. Well, how did Reinecke happen to be at the conference, so far as you know?

A. He was presiding over it, and I even believe that he called it. He called it in order to comment on and explain these orders.

Q. So that if he suggests that he did not know anything about these orders first-hand, that does not conform with the facts as they appeared at the conference?

A. That is absolutely out of the question.

To General Reinecke by Col. Amen:

Q. Do you agree with that?

A. No, I don't agree. Perhaps I may explain this again clearly. As I said before, as far as I remember, when I came back from the front I called this conference. All these orders for the treatment of the Russian prisoners were not given by me, but they all came from the Leadership Staff of the Armed Forces without my participation.

This also appears in this order—and this was after we had issued the outlines. It says here: "The outlines given by the OKW for the occupied areas." That proves quite clearly that the original order came from Keitel and the Fuehrer, and was signed by Warlimont to the General Staff of the Army, because all the camps were under their jurisdiction and the measures had to be taken there. Then gradually, after the prisoners of war came under our jurisdiction, we were forced to take a certain position on that problem.

INTERROGATIONS

To General Lahousen by Col. Amen:

Q. What do you say about that?

A. I can only say that this order, as soon as it appeared, quite independent of the official conferences that took place about that—

General Reinecke: May I ask you again, what order?

A. The order went out for the first time that the Russian prisoners of war were not to be regarded according to the points of international law, but entirely new, cruel, and brutal methods were to be applied to them. You know that this order was discussed everywhere, in the offices, in the quarters, and everywhere, and also the reaction against this order. Therefore, I can't imagine that anyone in the position where I was, for instance, as a chief of a section, much less some one superior to me in the organization of the office, could not know about this order or its principal contents. I think it is impossible that you don't know about it.

To General Reinecke by Col. Amen:

Q. Now, you did know all about that order at the time, didn't you?

A. No. I want to say this again. I knew that the functionaries were to be shot.

Q. Well, everybody knew that.

A. I never denied that.

Q. I knew that myself.

A. Yes, that is clear. I never received the original order, or the particulars about that.

Q. Who cares whether you saw the original order or not?

A. At any rate, I did not work it out, I did not participate in it, and I did not make any suggestions in the formulation of this order. I was only involved by this trip that I took to the front.

Q. You did nothing to oppose it; right?

A. You mean against this order?

Q. Yes, or any of the orders with regard to the treatment of Russian prisoners of war.

A. It is impossible for me to say. Afterwards the order—well, of course, we constantly worked against that.

Q. But you never accomplished anything?

A. No. That is quite clear; it was ordered and what could we do?

Q. And therefore the responsibility of it was yours?

A. You mean for these orders when they came out?

Q. Yes. Now, have you recollected about the order for the branding of Russian prisoners of war?*

A. You mean the one that was shown to me a little while ago?

Q. Yes.

A. I did not give this order. General Graevenitz gave that order, and as soon as we learned about it, why it was recalled at once.

Q. That doesn't correspond with the facts either.

A. Well, that is certainly so.

Q. No, it isn't so. I show you a photostatic copy of an order dated 20 July 1942, and ask you if you can identify that as an official order. (The document was submitted to the witness.)

A. Yes. I have already read this; I read it before.

Q. What is the date of it?

A. The 20th of July. It is quite clear that it was not issued by me, but by the Chief of the Prisoner of War Department; and it does not say "AWA" up here.

Q. I don't care whether you issued it or not. I didn't ask you anything about that. It is your responsibility, whether you issued it or not. What I want to know is, what date did you claim that that order was withdrawn?

A. That I don't know any more. Just as soon as we learned about this order—

Q. I am sure you don't know it any more, and you never did know it.

A. Yes, I knew it, because we ourselves put it into effect.

Q. I know you put it into effect, but you didn't get it withdrawn.

A. Yes, it was recalled, and as far as I know it was never carried out.

Q. That isn't true.

A. As far as I know, it never was applied.

Q. Are you trying to say that you personally withdrew it?

A. As far as I know and as far as I remember I gave the order to Graevenitz to recall it, and that was with the consent of Keitel. That is, after we had learned that Graevenitz had issued such an order.

Q. Why would you give an order to withdraw an order which you say you had nothing to do with?

*See second footnote, p. 1606 of this volume.

Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

A. I didn't say I had nothing to do with it; I merely said I didn't sign it.

Q. You said you caused it to be withdrawn.

A. Yes, I said that.

Q. I say, why would you cause to be withdrawn an order which you had nothing to do with issuing?

A. Graevenitz was my subordinate.

Q. Sure.

A. Well, as far as my powers of command were concerned, I had to do this.

Q. Well, then, you knew all about the issuance of this order.

A. As soon as we learned about it, we had it recalled at once.

Q. How did you find out about it?

A. That I don't know any more today, but it is very probable that somebody told me about it.

Q. I don't care what is probable; if you don't know it, don't try to tell me about it.

Now, did Speer tell you that he wanted you to stop killing off so many Russian prisoners of war so that he would have more to do work?

A. That was discussed yesterday, but as far as I know Speer was not even the Minister for Armaments at that time.

Q. Well, you saw the reference to Speer in the order which I showed you yesterday, didn't you?

A. Yes.

Q. What do you think it was there for?

A. As far as I know, he always received copies so that he could commit labor.

Q. So he could do what?

A. For labor commitments.

Q. Did you have any personal conversations with Speer with regard to Russian prisoners of war?

A. Oh God, that is very difficult to say. I talked to Speer so many times.

Q. And if Speer says he discussed that whole problem with you, would you say he was not telling the truth?

A. I discussed this problem with many people, and it may well be that I discussed it with Speer.

Q. Then you don't deny having discussed it with Speer?

A. It is possible.

Q. Anything is possible. I say do you deny it or do you admit it?

A. Well, what I mean to say is that we discussed these things with so many people because we were so much involved in them that it is difficult to say whether or not I discussed them with Speer.

Q. I am glad to hear you say you were involved in them.

XXIV. WALTER SCHELLENBERG*

Excerpts from Testimony of Walter Schellenberg, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 13 November 1945, 1030-1215, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, Jr., IGD. Also present: Gladys Picklesimer, Reporter; John Albert, Interpreter.

Negotiations for Evacuation of Jews in Return for Asylum for High Nazis

Q. Did you have some other note that you wish to refer to?

A. I thought the situation of the concentration camps over, and I would like to add that during the final period, meaning from September 1944 on, since Kaltenbrunner was living near to Hitler, that he could take responsibility for the treatment given in the concentration camps.

Q. When you use the term "living near to Hitler," just what do you mean?

A. It was the time he appeared daily for reports at the Reich Chancellery.

Q. Do you mean that they also were quartered near each other or only met on official matters?

A. He did not actually live there, but he would stay from 3:00 or 4:00 p.m., till late at night and also up to 4:00 a.m.

Q. Do you know that of your own knowledge?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you ever present at such meetings?

A. No. I would only occasionally accompany him to the Reich Chancellery, and two or three times I would make reports to him there.

Q. But you know it to be a fact that Kaltenbrunner and Hitler stayed late together at night?

A. Yes.

Q. And it is your own deduction that whatever actions Hitler recommended for the concentration camps in these later months Kaltenbrunner must have been informed?

A. I have one concrete example.

Q. Will you state it?

*Walter Schellenberg was Chief of Amt VI (Foreign Political Intelligence Service) and Amt Mil (Military Bureau) of the RSHA, with the rank of Brigadefuehrer (Brig. Gen.). He also held the title of General of Police and Waffen SS. See Affidavit D, vol. VIII, p. 622.

INTERROGATIONS

A. On the 10th of April 1945 when a certain Mr. Musy visited me in Berlin, he told me that the concentration camp Buchenwald had actually been evacuated, which was contrary to assurances given him by Himmler. Thereupon I phoned on the one hand Himmler, and on the other hand I discussed this matter at lunch with Kaltenbrunner. Kaltenbrunner stated, however, that this was done on a directive of Hitler, and that this camp had to be evacuated on his order, and Group Leader Mueller added "You, Kaltenbrunner, told me already three or four days earlier that I should evacuate the Jews from this camp to the south." Then Kaltenbrunner said, "Yes, yes, that's correct. Besides, there is a general directive of Hitler to the effect that all camps should be evacuated, and that especially Jews should be regarded as hostages and be brought to the south." Then he said, turning towards me, "There are still enough people remaining in the camp so that you can console Mr. Musy with that."

Q. Musy was the former President of Switzerland?

A. No. He was the son of the former President of Switzerland.

Q. And his mission was to have as many Jews evacuated to Switzerland as possible?

A. Yes.

Q. And what had been the arrangement or agreement that Himmler was interested in?

A. Himmler first gave the assurance that in February 1,200 Jews would be sent to Switzerland by train, and that from then on every two weeks another train should be sent to Switzerland.

I had to organize the whole thing, but suddenly a stop occurred, and we were threatened with the death penalty for every Jew who crossed the Reich frontier, and this was done on the basis of an order by Hitler.

This order was given after a code message of the deGaulle office in Spain to an office in Paris was intercepted and decoded, which said that Mr. Musy and a representative of Himmler were in negotiations with a Jewish organization for the purpose of evacuating all Jews living in Germany, and that the price for it, so to speak, would be the right of asylum for about 250 Nazi leaders.

Himmler furthermore gave the assurance to Mr. Musy, after Hitler had forbidden further transfers of Jews, that no concentration camp would be evacuated, and Musy was instructed by Himmler to inform the Allied Western Powers officially of this second agreement. And with this official instruction Mr. Musy left Berlin on April 7.

Excerpts from Testimony of Walter Schellenberg, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 13 November 1945, 1445-1710, by Lt. Col. Smith W. Brookhart, Jr., IGD. Also present: George A. Sakheim, Interpreter; S/Sgt. William A. Weigel, Reporter.

Use of Russian P/W's Behind the Russian Lines

Q. You have mentioned the operation Zeppelin. Will you tell us about your participation in this?

A. The operation Zeppelin was initiated in 1942. The purpose of this organization was to choose from a selection of Russian prisoners intelligent and suitable men to be deployed on the eastern front behind the Russian lines. This work was done by our own Commandos of the operation Zeppelin. The PW's thus selected were turned over to Commandos in the rear, who trained the prisoners. They were trained in assignments of the secret messenger service and in wireless communications. In order to furnish these prisoners with a motive for work, they were treated extremely well. They were shown the best possible kind of Germany. This was accomplished by trips around Germany where they were shown industry and farms, and super-highways.

Q. What was your particular function in connection with the training of these units?

A. I laid down the policy for the training, but did not myself participate in the execution of the plan. I remember only that one time in 1943 I called a meeting of the Commando leaders at Breslau. This was necessary because after Stalingrad and the general withdrawal in Russia, the influencing of the Russian prisoners had become increasingly difficult. Therefore, it became necessary to change from a mass deployment of Russian prisoners, such as dropping them by parachute, to using a few highly-skilled, intelligent Russians who were with us because of their conviction.

Q. At approximately what period of time was this change noticeable?

A. That was in January 1943.

Q. Thereafter, you were confined to the very limited group that you have just described?

A. Yes. Thereafter we attempted to select prisoners from the larger PW camps where every kind of category had been thrown together. We tried to select those who would be valuable to us and confine them to one special camp.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Are you still speaking about Russian prisoners for use on the Eastern front?

A. Yes.

Q. As far as the operation Zeppelin is concerned, that was limited entirely to the Eastern front?

A. Yes, only to the Eastern front. From the wireless reports of these Commandos behind the Russian lines and the special reports of those Russian prisoners confined to the highly selected camp, we made reports.

German Intelligence on U. S. Failure of Atom Bomb

Q. Let me turn to another subject. What was the substance of your Intelligence as to American and Allied progress in the development of the atomic bomb?

A. I can say that our Intelligence failed completely in this connection.

Q. Just what did you receive in the way of reports?

A. The only lead we had as to the development of the atomic bomb we got through a Hungarian professor by the name of Hevesy, living in Stockholm, who, in turn, got his information from a Dane by the name of Niels Bohr.*

Q. What were you told?

A. We did not know anything as yet, but I had the intention to follow up this lead. We did not know anything about the atomic bomb, but only about the progress of atom smashing. It is possible, too, that we received some information via Lisbon or Madrid, but these were no real sources of our Intelligence Service, but only newspaper reports.

Q. To what do you attribute the failure of your Foreign Intelligence Service to keep you informed?

A. There are two reasons for the failure of our Intelligence Service: One, my knowledge of Amt Mil was very limited, as Amt IV only had been concerned with political matters. When I organized Amt Mil along technical lines, I discovered that I was lacking specialists and technical advisers who could have outlined the correct objectives. Subsequently I had great difficulties in selecting personnel, as the technical engineers did not know anything about the Secret Intelligence Service, and the Secret Service people did not know anything about technical engineering. For this reason I searched for new material, and trained a mixture of Intelligence people and technically-trained people. I remember that towards the end of 1944 we had installed some new people in Switzerland and Spain, but no results came from these sources.

*See p. 1629 of this volume.

Q. Did you have agents in the United States who were in a position to give you any reports?

A. In the United States we had no active Intelligence Service. All efforts to organize such a service failed right at the beginning.

Q. What period?

A. In 1944 I started some special purpose U-Boat Commandos, one of which was sunk and the other was taken prisoner in the United States.

Q. What did Kaltenbrunner have to do with your plans for these agents whom you were sending to the United States?

A. He gave permission for funds to be used.

Q. What happened to your other efforts?

A. Those efforts were limited mainly to neutrals, such as Spain, Portugal, and South America, so-called Glacier countries, in order to gain information about North America.

German Intelligence on D-Day Invasion

Q. On another subject: What was your intelligence as to the time and place of the D-Day invasion?

A. This question is very difficult to answer, because since January 1944, we were literally swamped with a flood of messages about the time and place and the possibility or impossibility of an invasion. In collaboration with the General Staff in the Department XIV Armies West we constructed a model map on which was shown how our Intelligence Service was deceived by a flood of false information which was directed to it by the enemy Intelligence Service.

Q. When did you construct this map?

A. Beginning of July '44.

Q. That was after the invasion had taken place?

A. Yes.

Q. How much actual intelligence did you have prior to the landings on the Normandy beachheads?

A. From the greatest number of incoming messages we took an average and deduced from that that a landing was imminent. We also deduced that from the instructions given by radio to the resistance movement in Holland, Belgium, and France.

Q. Were you able to determine the sense of those messages?

A. I believe that our counter-espionage service intercepted one message to the French resistance movement twenty-four hours prior to the invasion. They decoded it and all coastal defenses were notified and alerted from Paris. However, something didn't quite work out. Evidently the local military authorities didn't understand the scope and importance of this.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Were you able to fix upon a place where you needed to marshal your forces?

A. I can't say that exactly, but I assume that also from this wireless message one could assume a certain general direction.

Q. Did the military command make any criticism of the failure of your Intelligence Service to adequately warn them for the invasion forces?

A. Yes. We were criticized very strongly. However, this criticism was not directed against us, because at the time of the invasion Amt Mil was under the supervision of a General Staff Officer and my political Intelligence Service was not entirely responsible for the lack of military intelligence.

Q. Who was responsible for the agents that you had in England or in other places outside of Germany—Amt Mil or Amt VI?

A. At what time, please?

Q. At this time. Prior to the invasion.

A. That was only Amt Mil. Then Amt VI had agents only in the neutral countries.

Q. So that the criticism that was directed against the failure of intelligence fell on Amt Mil?

A. Yes; Colonel Hansen was chief.

Q. From what sources were these floods of messages principally that you have referred to?

A. These messages came mainly from the receiving stations in neutral countries, as the main effort of all information at that time was directed towards determining the time, place, and strength of an invasion force. I want to give an example: Every day approximately forty messages were received from good and bad sources and only an average and an analysis of these messages would give an approximately reliable view. From this view one could tell that the invasion was imminent, but the details one could not determine exactly.

Q. Are you talking about all messages received in Amt VI or only those in Amt Mil?

A. All messages regarding the invasion were put at the disposal of the central stations of the Army and the Government.

Q. Reverting back to the attempts to land agents in the United States, what consideration or effort did you give to operations in the Caribbean and Florida waters?

A. As far as I can remember, Amt VI did not undertake anything in that direction. Whether any such undertaking took place in earlier times through Amt Mil I can't say for sure, but I remember vaguely that Amt Mil, through its Meldegebiet Hamburg, did at one time make an attempt to land agents at that time, but I don't know whether it was carried through. In any case, we never got any reports from North America, from that part of the country. I know, however, that Meldegebiet Hamburg had one or two other connections in North America.

Q. Tell us about those.

A. In one case I was informed that the FBI probably had control already of the wireless set. That was near New York.

Q. Are there any other incidents?

A. The other one I don't know about, but it probably was not important, otherwise it would have been reported to me.

German Activities in Argentina

Q. Tell us what you know about the incident of one hundred thousand United States dollars being dispatched by a sailboat to Argentina early in 1944.

A. That is called the undertaking "Jolle II," named after the type of boat that was used; and two agents with medical supplies and money were sent. The radio connection between the boat "Jolle II" and the agent in Argentina worked satisfactorily. They met at the designated point. The commodities were exchanged and two or three German agents were placed on that boat in order to return to Germany.

Q. How much money was landed?

A. I thought very much about this question and if it hasn't slipped my mind because of the many cases that I have handled, I remember that it must have been something like one hundred thousand dollars.

Q. Was there a second shipment, also of one hundred thousand dollars, either late in 1944 or early in 1945, also sent by sailboat to Argentina?

A. In 1945, another such mission was supposed to start, I believe from Norway. The necessary funds had already been subscribed. This was also a sailboat, but never started. You must not confuse these funds with the funds used for the North American missions.

Q. Let's stick to Argentina strictly and be sure that we understand all that you know. Had there been a delivery prior to the one hundred thousand dollar delivery early in '44?

A. Yes. If I remember correctly, the chief commissioner to Argentina took funds along in the year 1942.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. What amount?

A. Fritz Backer is the name.

Q. In what amount?

A. I can't remember the sum correctly.

Q. Was it in American money?

A. No, it was in British currency if I remember rightly. Pounds.

Q. A substantial amount?

A. Yes, a substantial amount, ten or twenty thousand pounds, perhaps. Then I remember a compensation agreement whereby the Telefunken Company paid our agents in Argentine currency and we paid the Telefunken Company in Berlin in Reichsmarks.

Q. How much was involved in this transaction?

A. I don't remember it exactly, but it was a substantial sum in Reichsmarks, something like fifty, sixty, or seventy thousand marks. The equivalent in Argentine currency is unknown to me.

Q. When was this transaction?

A. At the end of 1943.

Q. Were there any other shipments or transfers of any kind between '42 and '44?

A. I cannot remember that there was another transaction with South America.

Q. How were these funds expended after transfer to Argentina?

A. These funds were used for, one, to pay the support of our agents; secondly, to pay for the expensive transmission equipment; and, thirdly, as it is customary in Argentina, as bribery for the middleman.

Q. Do you know who received the shipment of money in early 1944?

A. Becker and Franzock received that money. Franzock was the chief wireless operator.

Q. Was Becker's name Johannes Siegfried Becker?

A. Yes. Johannes Siegfried Becker.

Q. What was the sailing boat expedition which was planned, which you say was planned to start from Norway but did not get under way, in charge of Schuchmann?

A. Schuchmann was our liaison officer with the Navy in these cases, who worked on such cases together with Group VI D.

Q. What was Schuchmann's full name?

A. I don't know. I only know that he was Captain Schuchmann.

Q. What was the name of the second boat that was to be used?

A. I can't remember that now.

Q. At that point did the expedition fail?

A. That was the second one?

Q. Yes, that one that was to sail from Norway.

A. The boat never sailed, first of all because of the general deteriorating military situation. I could not follow it up towards the end.

Q. Were the funds ever gotten together and made ready to put on this boat?

A. If I remember correctly, everything was quite ready for sailing, but I can't say it with a hundred percent certainty.

Q. Was Schuchmann in charge of equipping the first and second successful expedition?

A. Yes, as far as the naval preparations were concerned he was.

Q. He was also in charge of the second expedition as far as it was prepared?

A. Yes.

Q. Reverting to the subject of the atomic bomb, when you said that you had a lead from this Hungarian Professor Hevesy, and from Bohr through him, do you want to say that Professor Hevesy in Stockholm actually received information from Niels Bohr?

A. No.

Q. That was an idea of yours?

A. It was only a liaison.

Q. A possible liaison?

A. Yes.

Q. Only a possible liaison in America?

A. Yes.

Q. A possible liaison from Stockholm to North America?

A. Yes.

Use of Astrology to Turn Himmler Against Hitler

Q. You made reference to your astrological influence with Himmler. Will you tell us what you meant by that?

A. In the spring and summer of 1943 I talked with the doctor and masseur of Himmler whose name was Kersten. We both agreed that Germany probably was going to lose the war and that it was necessary to reach a compromise. According to my way of thinking, I believed that with the aid of the Secret Intelligence Service I would have to influence the most powerful man in Germany, Himmler, in order to reach that goal. I was convinced that Hitler could not be converted to this point of view. Therefore, it was my calculation to turn to Himmler, and Kersten promised me to use his influence to aid me. It was he also who for the first time suggested using astrological influence for his and my purpose. Kersten prepared the way with Himmler in that direction and reported to him that he knew an astrologist who would be able to clear up the future of Germany. The purpose of this preparation by Kersten was that Himmler should give credence to my proposals.

INTERROGATIONS

We had progressed so far in our common effort that towards the end of 1943 Himmler declared that he was prepared to receive the astrologer Wulf from Hamburg. I myself made the acquaintance of Wulf early in 1943 through Kersten and then used my influence to bring him to Himmler. I gave him the instructions to first of all point out the untenable situation of the Reich and to influence Himmler in favor of taking matters into his own hand and put an end to the situation which had deteriorated because of my attempts to bring about a separate compromise peace.

Wulf also read Hitler's horoscope and stated that Hitler would be endangered on the 20th of July 1944 and then even more in November 1944, and if he would not step aside and lay down the reins of government, he would not survive May 1945.

Q. When and where had Wulf read this horoscope?

A. It was early in 1944. I believe he worked it out at home and then passed it on to Himmler through me.

Q. Was it brought to Hitler's attention?

A. No.

Q. Go on and tell us about Wulf and Himmler.

A. Through this reading of the horoscope, my influence over Himmler increased steadily, as I harped on the point of elimination of Hitler. The influence of the horoscope and the doubts planted in Himmler's mind were very great and, although I was not with Himmler all of the time, my influence over him increased without my having contact with him.

Q. Did that continue through to the end?

A. In December of 1944 during a quarrel at Himmler's, I quite openly again touched the question of the elimination of Hitler, because Himmler at that time was very much impressed with the horoscope because of the fact of the entry of Hitler's disease in November 1944, as forecast by the horoscope.

Q. What disease?

A. That was the result of the attempt on Hitler's life, that disease. The weaker Himmler's position became, the more he turned towards me and listened more and more to my plans.

Himmler's Efforts to Remove Hitler and Make Peace

Q. You said that Kaltenbrunner as he came closer to Hitler began to hide things from Himmler. At what point in all these affairs did Kaltenbrunner by-pass Himmler and deal only with Hitler?

A. I would name the 20th of July 1944 as the turning point, at which time, according to my observation, Himmler had something to do with the plot. After that time Kaltenbrunner and Fegelein, from then on those two conspired against Himmler by using their influence with Hitler.

Q. How do you then explain that Himmler got much more power after the 20th of July and was appointed to quite a few new positions, for instance, Commander of the Home Army, shortly after the 20th of July, if you suspect that he had something to do or some knowledge of that conspiracy of the 20th of July?

A. Himmler was appointed the Commander-in-Chief of the Home Army on the 21st of July, and his possible participation or knowledge of the plot was brought out later during the course of the interrogations of the captured members of the conspiracy, and from then on Kaltenbrunner and Fegelein started to undermine his position.

Q. In view of the fact that Himmler became implicated, how do you account for his retaining his command under the Home Army?

A. He had too much power to take it away all at once. He was removed from the inner political circle and was later on given a small sector of the front and was made Commander of the Army Group on the Upper Rhine, even though he was Commander-in-Chief of the entire Home Army; and when he had completed that mission, he was given the most difficult assignment of all, to stop the break-through on the Eastern Front. I base my assumption that Himmler had participated to some extent in the plot on the fact that his influence suddenly decreased with Hitler, whereas Kaltenbrunner's influence steadily increased, and I had the impression that towards the end Himmler lived under constant pressure from Kaltenbrunner.

Q. What do you know about the allegation that in the closing days Hitler read Himmler out of the Party and stripped him of all his positions?

INTERROGATIONS

A. When on the 28th of April 1945 I returned from Copenhagen to Luebeck from my discussions with Count Bernadotte after the refusal by the Allies of Germany's capitulation only to the Western Powers, my section chief of VI C, Doctor Rapp, informed me that the refusal of the capitulation of Germany to the Western Powers was constantly broadcast over the radio and that this refusal had resulted in Hitler's issuing an order of arrest against Himmler, and at the same time it was announced over the German radio that Himmler had been deprived of all his offices, so Doctor Rapp told me. I didn't hear it myself.

Q. Did you see Himmler thereafter?

A. On that evening I had to report to Himmler. I wanted to take along Count Bernadotte for my protection, but I had received an order to report alone, and at that time I feared for my life. For that reason I ordered the astrologer Wulf to accompany me to Himmler.

Q. Did Himmler give any evidence of being stripped of his authority?

A. No. On the contrary, I had the feeling that he was displeased with the fact that, as he had told me three days previously, he was not already the successor of Hitler. At that time I received the impression that something had gone wrong with his plan to do away with Hitler.

Q. Did Himmler thereafter ever give any indication or knowledge that he had been stripped of his authority and let out of the Party?

A. When I saw him again on the 1st of May at 9:00 o'clock, upon my second return from Copenhagen, I saw him at his CP near Travemuende and found a wreck of a man, a bundle of nerves. He couldn't comprehend the fact that now Doenitz was the Chief of State of Germany, but still he tried to aid me in my plans to prevent Denmark and Norway from becoming battle-fields, and he suggested that he wanted to propose me to Under-Doenitz as Secretary or adviser to the new Foreign Minister, Count Schwerin-Krosigk.

Q. As to Himmler's apparent plans for overthrowing Hitler or seizing power, what specifically had he done to bring about such a change?

A. He talked to me about the possibility of removing Hitler, of forming a new government and of dissolving the Party. I knew that he planned to found a new party. I had the feeling that a complete change had been brought about in Himmler's political attitude. I believe it was at that time that he said to me that he regretted the fact that he hadn't listened to me earlier. In other words, he must have regretted that he had devoted himself entirely to Hitler.

Q. Was there any connection between Himmler's discussions and plans and the plans of Obergruppenfuehrer Steiner and Obergruppenfuehrers Hildebrand and Gottberg?

A. I can't say from personal knowledge, but I know that it is possible that these three people also had influence with Himmler and that these three influenced Himmler in that direction.

Q. What was the position of Ohlendorf in all of this?

A. Ohlendorf was in that connection a Parsifal. He declined any such aspirations.

Q. Did he take sides with any particular faction?

A. He declined especially the aspirations of Steiner for such a Putsch.

Q. What was Bormann's position at this time? Whom did he stand with?

A. As far as I know, Bormann was, as always, the strong and evil spirit who dwelled in the vicinity of Hitler.

Q. Did he have aspirations for seizing power for himself?

A. I must consider it possible in view of the character of the man.

Q. Where did Kaltenbrunner stand?

A. Kaltenbrunner was a loyal follower of Hitler to the end and he considered all Himmler's plans as weaknesses. Kaltenbrunner, in April of 1945, stripped me of my position as head of Amt VI and Amt Mil, and replaced me by Bonig and Skorzeny, who were his friends. When they showed the order removing me from my offices to my fellow workers, they stated that the reason for my removal was that, together with Himmler, I had become politically unreliable.

Q. What was the date of that?

A. On the 24th or the 26th of April 1945.

Q. By that time Kaltenbrunner had been named Deputy for Austria, had he not?

A. Yes, he was the Deputy of Himmler in the southern part of Germany, not only Austria.

Q. He was continuing to function as chief of the RSHA?

A. Yes.

Q. Was it by his own action that you were removed as head of Amt VI and Amt Mil?

A. Yes, a co-worker of mine came specially by fighter plane from southern Germany to Franzburg in order to present me with this order.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. How do you account for the fact that you escaped with your life if you were regarded as politically unstable?

A. If I had been in the southern part of Germany, I wouldn't have considered my life worth much. In the northern part I only encountered the one danger on the 28th of April, when I had to present the refusal of the acceptance of the capitulation of Germany by the Western Powers, to Himmler.

Q. Was this offer of capitulation to the Western Powers Himmler's offer? It was not an offer by the Reich Government as a whole?

A. No. By Himmler is his really powerful position.

Q. As Reichsfuehrer SS?

A. Reichsfuehrer SS, Reichsminister, and so on.

XXV. WALTER WARLIMONT*

Excerpts from Testimony of Walter Warlimont, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 12 October 1945, 1030-1145, by Lt. Col. Thomas S. Hinkel. Also present: T/4 R. R. Kerr, Reporter.

German Aid to Franco During Spanish Civil War

A. * * * In the summer of 1936 I got, surprisingly enough, a detail to go to Spain as a military plenipotentiary to General Franco. I went there through Italy and on an Italian man-of-war by way of Tangiers, and joined General Franco in Spain. My duties were administrative, administrator for the German troops there, and to advise General Franco whenever he had further wishes concerning the detailing of German troops.

When I came there, there was only a squadron of transport planes and a wing of fighter planes, 9 or 12 planes. Later on a battalion of tanks, a battalion of anti-aircraft artillery and some 30 or 40 anti-tank weapons were added to this German detail, in the whole, about 800 to 1,200 men, but they all were under Spanish command.

Q. This was in 1936?

A. Yes, '36. That lasted until late in October or early November when the so-called Condor Legion was detailed to Spain. This was by far a bigger unit, under the command of General Sperrle. And then I was asked whether I wanted to join them or go home, and I asked to be permitted to leave Spain and go home. Before that was accomplished I was detailed to Ambassador General Faupel, who came there early in December 1936. I only stayed with him for 8 to 10 days and then was allowed to return home.

*Major General Walter Warlimont was Deputy Chief of the Operations Staff of the OKW, and as such assistant to Jodl.

Genesis of Hitler's Plan to Attack Russia

Q. When was the first time that you heard of an intention to attack Russia?

A. The 29th of July.

Q. What year?

A. 1940.

Q. Why would that particular date stick in your memory?

A. On the 19th of July, Hitler made his speech before the Reichstag concluding the French campaign and promoting all the generals to field marshals and so on. It is only natural that a man in my position was awaiting a reward of some kind too, and so I heard shortly afterwards that I should be promoted from colonel to brigadier general probably on the first of August. And when Jodl announced that he would come to a conference of his staff, which seldom up to that time ever happened, I thought that it had something to do with me and this promotion. I don't know whether it was the 28th, 29th, or 30th. And against all my expectations, he made the announcement that Hitler had decided to war against Russia.

Q. What was the statement that he made?

A. I can't exactly say the words he used, but he made the impression on me and on the other officers of the Wehrmacht Fuehrungsstab who were present, that Hitler had taken the resolution to go to war with Russia, that is, that Hitler expressed if not his decision, at least his intention to wage war on Russia.

Q. What else did he say besides that?

A. He may have noticed the consternation in all of us when he announced this because we lived in a mood of peace after concluding this French campaign. And so perhaps for this reason, he added that this war would have to come sometime anyway, and that it would be better to conclude it in this war instead of taking up the weapons again some years later.

Q. Do you know whether the statement that Jodl made about taking up arms now instead of a few years later was Jodl's thought or was it Hitler's thought, or was it expressed in such a manner that you couldn't tell whose thought it was?

INTERROGATIONS

A. I can't recall it exactly, but I suppose Hitler's, as he at this time always did use the expressions of Hitler when he gave us such statements like that.

Q. What else was said at this conference?

A. He gave us a special task.

Q. Jodl did?

A. Yes. And this task consisted of preparing an order to concentrate the troops on the new German-Russian border, and neither the railways nor the communications nor the accommodations for troops and so on were sufficient to prepare a big concentration of troops. And so he gave a directive of the OKW, which had actually been released on the 9th of August under the designation "Aufbau Ost," and this order contained all the different preparations which had to be made in order to make it possible to concentrate troops at the border.*

Q. In the course of this statement, did Jodl indicate that he had told Hitler that it was his, Jodl's, opinion that an operation against Russia that fall was impossible?

A. I only remember that I have read, whether at this conference or sometime later, a written statement by Keitel against this policy.

Q. You don't remember whether Jodl told you at that conference about what I just said?

A. No. He may have said that the date was fixed for the next spring, but whether he spoke of Hitler's intention, I couldn't recall. But I know that Hitler had mentioned his intention to Keitel and that Keitel contested it, based on a written memorandum.

Q. You saw the memorandum, didn't you?

A. I saw it some time, either on this day or some other day.

Q. Was it during the year 1940 that you saw it?

A. I certainly think that it was about this time.

Q. Now, did your office, starting in early August 1940, devote most of its energies to the preparation of the plans against Russia?

A. No, on the contrary. We prepared this order I spoke of, "Aufbau Ost," and the only task in connection with those plans of Hitler assigned to us was to prepare a study of how to conduct the operations against Russia. But Jodl wanted to have that only for his own information.

Q. Well, as a matter of fact, hadn't the OKH prepared a proposed plan for the conduct of the Russian operation, and wasn't the plan that you have just referred to, really a study of the problem with reference to OKH's plan? Do you remember that?

*See document 1229-PS, vol. III, p. 849.

A. No. The study I referred to was entirely independent from the task which the OKH had, and the OKH had to prepare it for official purposes, and had to report about it to Hitler some time later. This study, which was carried through by Lt. Col. Von Losberg, a name I mentioned earlier, was just to give Jodl a date for his own purpose, that he might not be dependent on that plan, the tentative plan which the OKH would report to Hitler.

Q. As a matter of fact, did it not happen that the two plans more or less coincided?

A. Yes. They coincided in the main lines.

Excerpts of Testimony of Walter Warlimont, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 16 October 1945, 1600-1745, by Maj. Gen. William J. Donovan. Also present: Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Mikhailovic's Collaboration with the Germans

Q. I show you a paper dated the 25th of January '43,* and ask if you can identify it; if your initial is on it; and if you can inform us of any matters relating to this that do not appear in the document itself?

A. It is a telegram set up and sent off by subsection four of the Division for National Defense, which does not bear my signature. The signature which appears at the bottom on the right side, is that of a Captain who was with this section, but whose name I cannot recall at this moment.

Q. You just note that down and let us know when it occurs to you.

A. Yes. I know the other signature too, but I cannot say whom it belongs to, this blue one. I know the signature. The telegram is directed to the German Foreign Office and repeats the contents of another telegram which the commanding general of Serbia had sent to the OKW. This telegram of the commanding general of Serbia reads: That the President of the Serbian Cabinet on his own initiative has proposed to arrest six hundred former Serbian officers and to transport them, as prisoners of war, to Germany. Those officers are undesirable, as followers of Tito, Mikhailovic, and as supporters of rumor propaganda and unrest in the country. The telegram further reads that it is intended to carry through the undertaking as soon as possible. The proposition of the President of the Council complies with the intentions of the German commanding general.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. I would like to ask you a question on that paper. Do you know of your own knowledge or, if not of your own knowledge, has it even been reported to you that Mihailovic was working with the local German commanders in the field?

A. Yes. That was known.

Q. For how long a period did he do that?

A. I have to think of that to give you an exact answer, but I am certain that it started several times and was discontinued several times; taken up again and lasted at least for several months each time.

Q. Did he do that in order to obtain aid in fighting the Tito partisans?

A. We never knew why he did it. Hitler always believed that he only did it because he was short of ammunition and tried to persuade the German officers, who always were inclined to believe in a nationalist like him, that he was going to support them, but Hitler said, "He will always remain a friend of England and a foe of Germany, so it is entirely wrong to go with him." He didn't want it.

Q. What was your opinion about it?

A. I couldn't form any opinion of my own, in spite of being two or three times in Serbia. I always got the opinion of the officers down there who believed in the things and wanted to continue with it.

Q. Had Tito ever given assistance to the Germans?

A. So far as I know, no.

Q. Do you know whether or not Tito had ever fought Mihailovic?

A. Fought him?

Q. Yes; had he had battles with Mihailovic?

A. It was hard to recognize who fought who in that country, but I am convinced that parts of both parties fought each other several times.

Q. It was Hitler's considered opinion that on any occasion when Mihailovic sought the assistance of the Germans, it was as a temporary expedient?

A. As a temporary expedient?

Q. As a temporary means of getting over a moment when he didn't have ammunition.

A. Yes. He only looked at it like that, and if Hitler had discovered before that such a connection, between the subordinates of Mikhailovic on one side and German officers on the other side, was going on, he would have prevented it. It may be of some interest to you, General, that Hitler's respect for Tito was very high and that in the last stages of the war he said several times that Tito should be an example to every German general. That is specially interesting for us as General Staff officers because Hitler wanted to demonstrate by this means the difference between the rough field general, as he thought Tito to be, and the thinking European generals, as we saw ourselves to be.

Q. Do you mean by that, that he preferred the Rommel type of soldier rather than the intellectual type of general?

A. Yes.

Q. And he compared Tito to Rommel?

A. No, more like Schoerner.

Q. What did the German Generals think of Tito?

A. He certainly was a strong man who came through all difficulties and lost a great number of his men, and in spite of that, always was there again, but politically he was entirely opposed to our kind of thinking.

Balkan Collaboration with the Germans

Q. I show you here a photostatic copy dated the 8th of December 1940 from the Fuehrer's Headquarters, and ask if you recognize your signature on it, and if it refreshes your recollection as to the circumstances surrounding it. You will find a translation attached.*

A. It is a document issued by the OKW Armed Forces Operations Staff, Division for National Defense, and it is signed by me. It says that, in preparation for the campaign in the Balkans, several officers will be sent to Bulgaria.

Q. Does that recall to your mind anything that would be of help in looking at the paper, or understanding it?

A. Yes. It is certainly in connection with the preparations for the campaigns which started some time later, but I couldn't say any more than is in the paper itself. It says that those four officers of the Air Force were sent to Bulgaria for reconnoitering purposes, reconnoitering of air fields and so on, I suppose, and that the Navy sent two officers and one employee in order to assist the Bulgarians in the defense of the coast.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. Also at that time, didn't you send down officers to organize watches on the hills in Bulgaria against the British coming in on raids?

A. Yes. That is true. That was during the winter of 1941 because of the care Hitler always took against air raids on Rumanian oil fields. That was the reason.*

Q. How many German soldiers in civilian clothing did you have in Bulgaria at that time?

A. It is funny, but I believe the number was about 200. I think it was restricted to a number of that kind.

Q. Was the King aware of that? Was it by arrangement with the King?

A. Yes. I think so. I don't know exactly. Everything was done by arrangement with the King, much more than with the government in Bulgaria.

Q. Although Filoff was a friend of Germany at that time, was he not?

A. He was estimated to be a friend.

Q. When did you feel that your arrangement was solid with Boris for his help in Bulgaria?

A. Was solid?

Q. Was fixed so that you could rely upon it.

A. I don't know when it really had been established, but I know that we had no difficulties at that time to make him consent to all the measures we wanted from him. I only saw him some time later, when everything was much more firmly established.

Q. When did you have Paul of Yugoslavia with you?

A. In May or June '39.

Q. So from May or June of '39 all the way through he was in working arrangement with you?

A. I don't know. I only saw him at parades and at the theater. I had nothing to do with such arrangements. I didn't hear about it, but I believe so.

Q. Do you know that at the same time he was pretending to the British that he was with them?

A. Yes. He was.

*See document C-53, Vol. VI, p. 877.

XXVI. ADOLF WESTHOFF*

Excerpts from Testimony of Adolf Westhoff taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 2 November 1945, 1430-1800, by Col. Curtis L. Williams. Also present: Capt. H. W. Frank, BWCE, Interpreter; John Wm. Gunsser, Court Reporter.

The Murder of RAF Prisoners of War at Sagan

Q. Now, General, during the month of March 1944 you were in charge of the Allgemeine Abteilung; is that right?

A. Yes, beginning with the 1st of March.

Q. During the month of March there was an incident which occurred at Sagan which I want to call to your attention and ask you to tell me in detail how that incident was handled by you, by Keitel, and by Hitler himself. There were eighty Allied fliers, citizens of England, who had escaped from one of the Luftwaffe camps just previous to this date, March 1944, and they were later captured and some of them were executed. Now, I want to know from you what camp they escaped from. Will you answer that?

A. It was called Luft III, Sagan.

Q. Now, this camp belonged to the air forces, didn't it?

A. Yes, but I don't know it personally; I have never been there. This was a Luftwaffe camp and the commandant was a Luftwaffe officer. His name was Col. von Lindeiner.

Q. Now, after these prisoners had escaped Keitel was criticized in the presence of Hitler by Himmler and Goering, wasn't he?

A. Well, I don't know whether it would be right to say that he was criticized. May I tell the story as I heard it?

Q. Yes, but we will interrupt you so that we can bring out the points which are of the most interest to us.

A. Up to that time I did not know Field Marshal Keitel personally. I hadn't been presented to him, but I knew him by sight. For some reason which I can not remember, Keitel sent for General von Graevenitz. On that occasion he gave the order that I should accompany General von Graevenitz so as to be introduced as his successor. When we arrived at the HQ the Field Marshal stated the following.

He was considerably excited about the escape of these eighty people, due probably to the fact that he had been reproached

*General Adolf Westhoff was Chief of the Prisoner of War Information Bureau.

INTERROGATIONS

by the Reichsfuehrer and the Reichsmarshal. He said that it was incredible that this sort of thing should have occurred, and it must not be allowed to continue. He explained that a conference had taken place with Hitler that same morning in the presence of Himmler and Goering, and it had been decided that, in the future, those of the eighty who would be recaptured must be shot. And he added, "Gentlemen, I can tell you that at this moment most of them have already been shot."

Q. Now, you state that Field Marshal Keitel, in the presence of Graevenitz and yourself, stated to you that the eighty British officers who had escaped from Sagan would be shot when re-captured, and many of those who had already been captured had been shot; is that right?

A. He said, "I can tell you, gentlemen, that the bulk of the people are already dead now."

Q. Did he tell you who had shot them?

A. I am just going to tell you about that.

Q. Just a minute; answer that question: Did Field Marshal Keitel tell you who had shot them?

A. Yes, the Gestapo.

Q. Through whose orders did Field Marshal Keitel say, and under whose authority, were these persons shot by the Gestapo?

A. In my opinion, General Graevenitz raised opposition immediately, but Keitel said, "These things can not go on; we have to make an example and these people must be shot," etc., etc., etc..

Q. But what I am trying to find out from you, General, is through whose authority were these persons shot?

A. I presume that you are aiming at finding out whether they were shot on the authority of Hitler or Keitel, but I am afraid I can't tell you; I can only tell you what Keitel has been saying.

Q. Well, didn't Keitel tell you that he had ordered them shot?

A. No. He said, "It was decided in a conference with Hitler and in the presence of the Reichsmarshal and Himmler that these people were to be shot." That is what he told me, and I can't tell you any more. The Field Marshal had given personal instruction on how this whole matter was to be dealt with, and he also said that no written documents were to be compiled on this subject.

Q. What instructions had he given to you that he refused to put in writing concerning this incident?

A. He said that no correspondence should arise on this matter.

Q. Well, if in the other orders, General, issued by Field Marshal Keitel, there are paragraphs which refer to turning over certain prisoners of war to the Gestapo, what would you say those paragraphs, worded as such, meant?

A. Gentlemen, in that connection I must go into detail regarding the position of the Chief of the Department of POW Affairs. The position of the Chief of POW Affairs has always been that of trying to maintain that the Geneva Convention was observed.

Q. Yes, we know that, General, but my question is: If I showed you an order issued by Field Marshal Keitel, and in it a paragraph said that all persons who had formerly been prisoners of war and had escaped and were recaptured, upon their re-capture will be turned over to the Gestapo, what would be your interpretation of that paragraph in Field Marshal Keitel's orders?

A. Well, of course, you could find two interpretations for that. One was that the so-called bearers of state secrets, that is to say, persons who had knowledge of certain secrets vital for the war effort, were under certain circumstances to be handed over to the Gestapo for safe custody. You must remember in this connection, gentlemen, that at the time when I took up my office, all arrangements had been in existence for at least two years.

And the second explanation, though one could never quite get to the bottom of that story because the Gestapo did not allow anybody any insight into these matters, was that these people were handed over to be liquidated. But this is a matter which I must explain in more detail. Whenever there was a case that any such people were surrendered to the Gestapo, the Gestapo would always maintain that these people were not shot but that they were used for some work.

Efforts to Abide by Geneva Convention Thwarted by "Orders from Above"

Q. Well, the fact of it was, General, that you in the Wehrmacht and in the prisoners section of the Wehrmacht were anxious to follow the rules laid down by the Geneva Convention,* and, as you have said before you had great apprehension when you turned over one of your prisoners to the Gestapo, as to what would actually happen to them after the Gestapo got them in their hands, didn't you?

A. Gentlemen, on that I would like to make the following statement. I will have to be somewhat explicit. The Service Department of the Chief of POW affairs considered it as its task to see to it that the rules of the Geneva Convention were observed, and whenever breaches of the Convention occurred, then we were the people who did our utmost, as far as we could as soldiers, to prevent such breaches. It would have been unnatural for us to act differently. The Protecting Powers had the responsibility of visiting the camps, and in each case of a breach of the Convention they could reproach us for it; that is to say, that whenever such breaches occurred it was for my Service Department to put matters right, and that is obviously the reason why we were against any such breaches.

*See document 3738-PS, vol. VI, p. 599.

INTERROGATIONS

Repeatedly during conferences in the ministry, when somebody would say that we didn't have to bother about the Geneva Convention, I would get up and I would say, "Gentlemen, the Geneva Convention has been signed by the Fuehrer, [sic] and we are therefore a party to it. In my opinion, until I get specific orders from the Fuehrer that the Geneva Convention can be disregarded, it is therefore my duty to abide by the rules and act so that the rules of the Geneva Convention will be observed." And I should like to add that I do not believe that you will be able to prove a single case against the Service Department of the Chief of Prisoner of War Affairs where the Geneva Convention was disregarded unless specific orders to that effect were received from above.

Q. That brings me to this question. How many times were you ordered by the Fuehrer or Keitel or Himmler to disregard the Geneva Convention when the matter concerned prisoners of war?

A. That, gentlemen, is a very difficult question to answer. I shall try to tell you what I remember, but I suggest that I be given time to think that matter over. It is extremely difficult for me to answer that question in detail on the spot.

Q. Well, you certainly were told to disregard it in this instance, weren't you?

A. Not only was the order given, but we were put before completed facts. On that particular occasion, the fact that these people had been shot was put before us as an accomplished fact. So was the fact that they had already been handed over to the Gestapo. And to try and oppose the Gestapo was quite an impossible task for the Chief of the Service Department for Prisoner of War Affairs. The Gestapo was much too powerful a body for that, and we were much too small. I knew that it was Passe's opinion that the Geneva Convention was merely a piece of paper, just as you must realize, gentlemen, that the opposition to the Geneva Convention was entirely caused by the Party. If ever there were difficulties in connection with breaches of the Geneva Convention into which we made investigations, then these difficulties were due to these Party developments.

The Geneva Convention—"A Piece of Paper"

Q. Did you ever discuss with Martin Bormann's deputy the rules of the Geneva Convention outlined therein which were to be accorded to the PW's?

A. There was a big meeting in Berlin between representatives from the various ministries, and that meeting was attended by Friedrichs and Passe. The reason for the meeting was to draft new rules for prisoners of war. Before I go any further, you must realize that the OKW and we were always accused that we were not strict enough with prisoners of war. We used to reply that we were treating prisoners of war in accordance with the Geneva Convention, and that we were also considering the position of our own prisoners of war in enemy hands, for whom we were equally responsible.

During this meeting, if I remember rightly, the question of parcels from the International Red Cross cropped up. The Party Chancellery demanded that prisoners of war should not get as much as they did at the time. They claimed that the German population was getting angry because prisoners were being fed better than the population. I got up, thereupon, and told Friedrichs that the Chief of the Prisoner of War Affairs was responsible that the Geneva Convention was observed, and that it was my opinion, as far as these parcels were concerned, that the more the prisoners were getting, the better, since that would keep them satisfied. I also quoted that the Reichsmarshall and the Ministry of Propaganda had made clear-cut statements according to which these prisoners of war were to have their parcels, whereupon Friedrichs replied he didn't care what these people had said, that one could treat prisoners of war as one liked; that in fact the Geneva Convention was just a piece of paper.

Needless to say, alterations of any kind were not made, at least not as long as I could help it. But the result of this conference was a decree dealing with the treatment of prisoners, which was in turn sent to all the ministries and the Party Chancellery which vetoed it. That is the only occasion on which I have met Friedrichs or had any personal contact with him.

INTERROGATIONS

The Shackling of Prisoners of War

Q. Now, when prisoners were transported from one camp to another, Field Marshal Keitel, knowing that many escapes had taken place while prisoners were being transported, ordered that some of these prisoners be shackled. Do you remember that order?

A. It started at the time of General Graevenitz, but I can put you in the picture. During a certain transport a number of officers—I think more than a hundred—had escaped. Just at that time we had succeeded, after efforts which lasted for nine months, to do away with the shackling of prisoners, which was then the custom, I believe, on both sides. Just as we were very pleased to have succeeded in doing this, we were informed that this new order, referring to shackling during transport, had now come out, which displeased us considerably.

Q. And do you remember what incident brought about the issuance of this new order?

A. Some Dutch officers who were in a camp at Czenstochau had to be taken away from there when the Russians arrived. They were transferred to the camp at Neu Brandenburg. From that transport something like 103—it may have been 130—Dutch officers escaped. That mass escape of officers caused considerable excitement, of course, and that led to this order. But please, may I add that this is as far as my recollection takes me.

Q. Well, you remember that Field Marshal Keitel did order the shackling of officer prisoners, don't you?

A. The order stated that stricter guarding of the prisoners was necessary, and shackling was to take place. It also said that the prisoners were to be informed when they arrived at the station that this treatment was not to be regarded as dishonorable and that it was merely necessary because of previous mass escapes. They were also told that they would be unshackled after arrival.

Q. But it was against the Geneva Convention, wasn't it?

A. Gentlemen, this story was extremely unpleasant for us, as I told you. On the other hand, I can imagine that the Field Marshal had a certain statement by the British Government in mind which stated that no assurance would be given that there was going to be no shackling. I don't know whether it was like that, but it is a possibility. Apart from that, he never had shackling of British or American prisoners carried out at any time. Every transport of American or British personnel had to be reported to the Field Marshal by teleprint, and he made his own personal decision, not only whether and when the transport was to be dispatched, but also whether there was going to be shackling. But to the best of my recollection, he never ordered shackling in any single case of transport of American or British personnel.

Q. But on the other hand, he always ordered the shackling of Russian officers, didn't he?

A. The exact position is that he ordered von Graevenitz that all transports, with the exception of American and British transports, were to be shackled. If ever, therefore, any other transport was dispatched without shackling, then this was done on the responsibility of the commander who was responsible for that transport. Incidentally, French prisoners weren't shackled either. But if such a transport of Russian or Serbian officers was dispatched without shackles and a single one escaped, then this would cost the general's head. I don't want to say it could cost his head; I would say that he was responsible.

XXVII. SIEGFRIED WESTPHAL*

Excerpts from Testimony of Siegfried Westphal, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 23 October 1945, 1030-1230, by Col. Curtis L. Williams. Also present: Nancy Shields, BCV, Reporter; Capt. Mark Priceman, Interpreter.

OKW Orders for Brutal Treatment of Italian Partisans

Q. I will just ask you if you, in the Army, did not receive an order from OKW which outlined the treatment that would be accorded to partisans in the territory of Italy? If I read you that order, do you think that it would refresh your memory and cause you to remember whether or not you did receive it?

A. Yes, surely.

Q. I then will read you an order which is purported to have been issued by Field Marshal Keitel, entitled "Combatting of Partisans."

A. What is the date of this order?

Q. This order was issued several different times; one was in Russia in 1941; another was issued in the Balkans in 1942; another in Italy in 1944. Copies of this order are purported to have been found in the Headquarters of Field Marshal Kesselring,

*Brigadier General Siegfried Westphal, after serving with Rommel in Africa, became Chief of Staff to Field Marshal Kesselring in Italy. After the Army purge which followed the 20 July 1944 attempt on Hitler's life, Westphal was appointed Chief of Staff to Field Marshal von Rundstedt.

INTERROGATIONS

who was succeeded by Vietinghoff in Italy, and was in the file from 1942 to 1945.

I shall read you that order and ask if you saw a copy of it. The order reads:*

"The Chief of the High Command of the Armed Forces
Armed Forces Operations Staff;
Chief Operations Office;

SUBJECT: Combatting of Partisans.

TOP SECRET

Reports have been submitted to the Fuehrer that individual members of the armed forces participating in the fighting against partisans have subsequently had to account for their actions in combat. The Fuehrer has therefore ordered:

1. The enemy employs in partisan warfare communist-trained fanatics who do not hesitate to commit any atrocity. It is more than ever a question of life and death. This fight has nothing to do with soldierly gallantry or the principles of the Geneva Convention. If the fight against the partisans in the East, as well as in the Balkans, is not waged with the most brutal means, we will surely reach a point where the available forces are insufficient to control this pest. It is therefore not only justified, but it is the duty of the troops to use all means, without restriction, even against women and children, as long as it ensures success. Any consideration for partisans is a crime against the German people and the soldier at the front, who will have to bear the consequences of partisan plots and who can see no reason whatever for showing the partisans and their followers any leniency.

2. No German employed against the partisans will be held accountable for his actions in fighting against them or their followers, either by disciplinary action or by court-martial. All commanders of troops employed in fighting partisans will be responsible that:

First, the contents of this order are strongly impressed on all officers of subordinate units; their legal advisers are informed of this order immediately; no judgments will be confirmed which oppose this order.

(Signed) Keitel.
(Certified by a Captain.)"

Did you, in Italy, see a copy or know of the order?

A. I am not sure of it. It may be that I did see it, but I cannot say so for sure.

Q. You know such an order was issued, don't you?

A. Yes, I believe so, but I am not sure that I have seen it. There is one sentence in the beginning which sounds familiar to me.

Q. What sentence is that?

*See document UK-66, vol. VIII, p. 572-582.

A. The sentence referring to the cruelties that have been committed in the Balkans. However, I would like to state again that we had issued an order according to which partisans were to be treated as regular troops, as long as they could be recognized as troops by their insignia or by appearing in organized formations.

Q. That is exactly what I am trying to get at. You officers in the field, in the Wehrmacht, refused to obey orders which were issued by Keitel with such strenuous terms as this order that was issued by Keitel concerning the treatment of partisans, did you not?

A. We couldn't simply refuse publicly to accept these orders.

Q. You accepted them, then threw them in the waste basket, did you not?

A. Yes. We did exactly the same thing with the commando order* which I have already had occasion to mention.

Q. You also accepted them and filed them and never referred to them again, didn't you?

A. We have done so in cases where they were not in accordance with our opinions.

Q. And you did so in this particular order, which I have now referred to, didn't you?

A. Of that, I am not sure. It depends on the date on which it reached us. I don't know when it came to us. I don't know whether the order I mentioned that was issued was provoked by this order or whether we had issued it independently.

Q. You will admit that the order which you, of the OBSW, issued concerning the treatment of partisans, did not have within it the same principles as outlined in the order which I have just read to you, did it?

A. Yes, of course. Excuse me, may I add something? You should keep in mind that I am testifying under oath and I would not say anything of which I am not entirely sure. This is why I am so hesitant and need some time for reflection.

Q. But you are sure, General, that the order which you issued for Marshal Keitel did not embody in it the paragraph that "It is therefore not only justified but the duty of the troops to use all means, without restriction, even against women and children, as long as it ensures success"?

A. This is the most atrocious sentence in the whole order.

Q. But you do know, do you not, that Keitel's order, issued by Keitel himself at the direction of the Fuehrer, contained within

*See document 498-PS, vol. III, p. 416.

INTERROGATIONS

it that very paragraph that I have read to you concerning the treatment of women and children?

A. I believe so, but I cannot affirm it with certainty. In any case, I know that we never conducted war against women and children. As this order was found, it must have been issued by the OKW. It is the usual lingo of an order of the OKW.

Q. I will ask you further, if you, as Chief of Staff for Field Marshal Kesselring, did not know that the police troops behind Kesselring's line did take this very action outlined by Keitel towards the partisans in the north of Italy?

A. In Italy, I never heard of such policies being actually practiced and as for other theaters of war, I had no insight. Only now, in captivity, I have learned about alleged policies in Russia, and my feeling is that if those were actually practiced, they have to be condemned very strongly.

Q. You not only have heard of it, General, but you know that Keitel did issue orders couched in the terms of this order, which I have read to you, do you not?

A. Yes, but I do not believe that it was his own mind that produced those orders. As it says here, this was by order of the Fuehrer.

Q. But Keitel did sign these orders, did he not?

A. Yes, of course.

Q. He, as Chief of the OKW, fully expected his troops to carry out that order when they received it, didn't he?

A. Yes.

Q. And although you members of the Wehrmacht in the field refused to carry out that order, you would certainly have been punished by Keitel had he heard that you had refused to obey the order?

A. Yes, of course.

Treatment of Allied Commandos in Africa

Q. Now, General, when you were with Field Marshal Rommel in Africa, you received orders from the High Command outlining the treatment that would be accorded commandos, too, didn't you?

A. Yes. I already testified to that point.

Q. Can you outline for us about what those orders covered?

A. I do not recall the details, but I can summarize them. They provided that in view of the increased activities of commando units behind our lines, all enemy soldiers found behind our lines should be "killed in combat." This order was immediately burned on the spot after Field Marshal Rommel and myself read it.

Q. I now hand you a document which bears the date of 18 October 1942,* and ask you to read it and tell me whether or not this is a copy of the order that was issued by the OKW at the direction of the Fuehrer and which outlined to the troops under the commands who are listed on the last page, and tell me if this copy is the copy of an order which you, in Africa, received concerning the treatment of commandos when captured by your forces?

A. Yes. This is it.

Q. Did you know that at the very time you received this order, that you had in your possession the nephew of Field Marshal Alexander, of the British forces?

A. Yes. It may, however, have been before or after that.

Q. Wasn't Field Marshal Alexander's nephew a commando of the British forces?

A. Yes, he was.

Q. What did you do with him?

A. We treated him as a prisoner of war, although he had violated International Law. He was wearing a German-Africa hat and carrying a German pistol at the time of his capture.

Massacre of Hostages at the Ardeatine Caves

Q. Then if 335 Italians were executed on the afternoon of 23 March 1944, at the Ardeatine Caves, by Obersturmbannfuehrer Herbert Kappler, BDS Italian Aussenkommando Rome, that action of Herbert Kappler was a direct result of an order which was issued by the OKW at the direction of the Fuehrer?

A. Yes, this was so. However, I do not know now whether it was on the 23d March 1944 or whether the exact number of Italians was 335, and as I said before, they were not hostages.

Q. However, OKW and the Fuehrer were informed that you did not have in your possession any of the people who were reported to have committed the crime for which these 335 persons were to be executed, were they not?

A. Yes.

Q. And any order issued by OKW or the Fuehrer concerning punishment that was to be meted out as a result of the action taken against the German Police in Italy was issued with the knowledge that you didn't have in your possession the actual perpetrators of the crime?

A. Yes, but I do request you to make it part of the record

*See document 498-PS, vol. III, p. 416.

INTERROGATIONS

that those people who were actually executed were, according to the reports from Kappler, not hostages but people in his custody, anyway.

Q. But the intent in the mind of you commanders in OBSW and in the minds of the 14th Army Commanders and in the mind of Kappler was to convey to the Italian people a message that you had executed 335 hostages wasn't it?

A. Yes, this was so, in order to scare them and discourage them from repeating such incidents.

XXVIII. KARL WOLFF*

Excerpts from Testimony of Karl Wolff, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 26 October 1945, 1430-1650, by Col. Curtis L. Williams, IGD. Also present: Capt. Mark Priceman, Interpreter; William A. Weigel, Court Reporter.

German Atrocities in Italy. Mussolini's Complaints Ignored

Q. In addition, in those reports which you received daily, you also received reports which showed what action was taken against the partisans, didn't you?

A. Yes, about every three days. As for the other reports that I was just talking about, I said they were daily reports. They did not necessarily come every day. Sometimes they covered several days.

Q. These reports that you received concerning these atrocities outlined to you definitely the number of civilians that were killed or the number of German soldiers that were killed, didn't they?

A. Yes, of course. A look at my records would clarify this whole incident. Reading your report here, it is impossible for me to know what it was all about. It doesn't even mention the unit involved in this action. Assuming that this report was correct, it would have come to me in approximately this form: It would say that on this day four of our soldiers had been killed by bandits; that in the action that ensued, thirteen bandits had been killed and that so and so many houses from which we had drawn fire had been burned down. My subordinate responsible for this sub-area was the Brigade Leader Tensfeld, whom I mentioned this morning and who would be in a position to say much more about what happened in this area of his responsibility.

*Karl Wolff held the following positions: Supreme SS and Police Fuehrer in Italy; Commander of the Italian SS Legion; General of the Waffen-SS at the Fuehrer's Headquarters; Chief of the personal staff of the Reichsfuehrer SS (Himmler); SS-Obergruppenfuehrer.

Q. Maybe this will refresh your memory: Il Duce made a report to you and to the Army High Command of the atrocities that had been committed in Italy during this period, and number one on this list was this very incident which we are now talking about.* Read paragraph one of that report which was rendered by Mussolini to you and the High Command, and see if that calls to your mind what happened at this place and what action you took in regard to it.

A. (Examining document) I remember Il Duce protested once or twice or possibly three times in writing against excesses committed allegedly by German troops. This matter of Boccia again strikes a familiar chord and I seem to remember this incident now. I believe that I received a report either directly from Il Duce or more likely from Kesselring with instructions to investigate the case.

Q. Did you investigate the case?

A. Yes, of course.

Q. Was there any punishment rendered by you to those who committed it?

A. Il Duce was just an Italian like any other Italian and all his statements or complaints were full of the typical Latin exaggerations. Undoubtedly you have had the same experience with the Italians. Sir, this matter was immediately investigated and a report was made which went to Kesselring and probably to Il Duce. However, the facts as reported were not accurate.

Q. You now deny that the allegations made by Il Duce in his report to Field Marshal Kesselring are correct, is that right?

A. Reports by Il Duce can be generally dismissed. He would take the word of any girl, or of any person who came running to tell him some grotesquely inflated story and accept it as truth and pass it on in the form of a report or complaint.

Q. My question was, do you deny that Il Duce's report which you have identified is correct?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. You will note that they both contain the same number of individuals who are alleged to have been killed, thirteen in each case, do you not?

A. Yes.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. You will note that in Il Duce's report, he names the persons who were killed, do you not?

A. My God, in such cases I would take the greatest pains to investigate any such reports. I was grateful for them. I did want to establish the facts, but in all my investigations, I didn't find one occasion to punish a single man for any of those alleged crimes.

Q. In other words, you are now admitting that all the time that you were the Commander Plenipotentiary in Italy and all the time that you were the Commander of the SS troops in Italy, that you did not punish a single soldier for any atrocity that was reported to you as committed by them?

A. I do not recall ever having had sufficient evidence to take legal action against any military person involved in such actions, and please ask Tensfeld or my Judge Advocate about these matters. They will confirm the fact that I kept repeating my instructions to be fair and to be just, to do everything legally and lawfully and to avoid irresponsible executions.

Q. I want to ask you if Field Marshal Kesselring did not in paragraph one of his order of the 17th of June 1944,* state as follows: "The fight against the partisans must be carried on with all means at our disposal and with the utmost severity. I will protect any commander who exceeds our usual restraint in the choice and severity of the methods he adopts against the partisans. In this connection, the old principle holds good that a mistake in choice of method in executing one's orders is better than failure or neglect to act. Only the most prompt and severe handling is good enough as punitive and deterrent measures to nip in the bud outrages on a greater scale."

A. Of course, this was the result of this order.

Q. That is exactly what I mean. Under that order as issued by Field Marshal Kesselring on the 17th of June 1944, any of his commanders could have committed any sort of heinous atrocity and no one could have held them guilty for it, could they?

A. Certainly. That was the reason why when I returned I had a talk with Kesselring and why we decided to change this order.

Q. Now General, isn't it a fact that the reason that you didn't investigate these cases that I have enumerated here this afternoon is because at the time that they happened, you were operating under paragraph one of Field Marshal Kesselring's orders of the 17th of June 1944, and couldn't actually legally make an investigation without getting yourself in trouble with Kesselring?

A. All such reports were received by my Chief of Staff, Ober-fuehrer Witt, and he would pass on this information to the parties concerned and supervise any investigations. All I can do is reiterate that I do recall several complaints from Il Duce which were investigated and that we always found that, apart from some minor incidents, the facts were not correct.

*See document UK-66, vol. VIII, p. 572-582.

Q. Don't try to turn me off the question. My point was, you did not investigate those cases because you were operating under paragraph one of Kesselring's order of 17 June 1944. Yes or no?

A. As far as I know and to the best of my knowledge, we did investigate many incidents. Don't think that I am trying to evade your question, and I would not like to antagonize you, but if you would like me to, I could tell you what my real concerns during that period were and what I was personally engaged in in those days.

Q. I know that you are going to tell me that you were going to try to get Kesselring to surrender to the American troops. That is not what I am interested in. I want an answer to this question that I have put to you last: Were you operating under paragraph one of Kesselring's order of 17 June 1944?

A. I was covered by this order, but my hands were not tied by it, and I do seem to remember having heard the name of Boccia, and that I did order an investigation of this case.

Q. But you didn't punish anyone for it, did you?

A. Because according to my recollection, the facts reported by Il Duce were inaccurate. May I also mention that Il Duce had written a long letter of protest to Goebbels which was to be transmitted to the Fuehrer, and in which he protested against alleged conditions in the rear areas in Italy. As a result, an assistant Gauleiter by the name of Leyser was sent to Italy, and he investigated all these things very thoroughly. It appeared from his investigation that practically nothing was true.

Q. As a result of Il Duce's protest to Field Marshal Kesselring, a copy of which went to you and to Ambassador Rahn, Ambassador Rahn then sent a message to Kesselring asking for a reply, which reply was to be based upon the investigations that were made by your headquarters, and Kesselring's headquarters. I want you to tell me, did Kesselring make that reply as demanded by Ambassador Rahn to Il Duce's inquiry?

A. I really don't know, but General Roettiger ought to know.

Q. Marshal Kesselring did not make a reply, but on December 27, 1944, Vietinghoff did make a reply, didn't he?

A. I really don't know. I had no control over the actions of Colonel General Vietinghoff.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. I want to show you a copy of the report that was made by General von Vietinghoff to Ambassador Rahn in compliance with the request which had previously been made to Field Marshal Kesselring and read that to you, and then ask you if Vietinghoff believed that there had been committed any excesses by the troops of Germany towards the partisans and innocent people in Italy.

"Subject: Punitive measures in the combatting of partisan warfare. To the German Plenipotentiary Ambassador Dr. Rahn: The cases of exceeding of powers in the application of sanctions which were reported by Il Duce and brought to the attention of Field Marshal Kesselring by the Ambassador have all been looked into. The result of the inquiry is given in the attached. Where cases have still not been fully investigated, they will be reported as soon as details are available.

"The measures which the various German units were ordered to take were based on the policy laid down by the Commanding General of the Wehrmacht in Italy and the Supreme Head of the SS and Police Command in Italy as a result of instructions from the Commander in Chief Southwest. It is not possible to say at this juncture how far isolated cases of undue severity in their application might have been avoided. It is apparent, however, that the Italian reports to Il Duce give an added version or entirely omit the circumstances occasioned by the partisan situation. The order which the Commander in Chief Southwest intends to issue for a unified application of sanctions will put an end to any inconsistencies that still remain in the treatment of such cases." Signed, "Vietinghoff."

Do you remember this report that was rendered by Vietinghoff to Ambassador Rahn?

A. A report which was sent by Vietinghoff to Ambassador Rahn? Was it sent on the 27th of December?

Q. That is correct.

A. No, but it proves that I was correct in my statement which I made from memory that I had ordered an investigation of these and that I had made a report to the Army group.

Q. And it also proves that excesses had been committed by the German troops in Italy against the partisans, doesn't it?

A. Of course, there were excesses committed by both sides, but never to the extent claimed by Il Duce.

Q. Admitting, then, as you do, that excesses had been committed and that you did not punish anyone for the commission of those excesses, what now have you to say about your actions towards the partisans?

A. But I couldn't punish anybody unless I had the facts to prove his guilt. It is easy to be clever now, but in those days I was up against a very difficult task, as everybody on my staff could confirm. I was most conscientious in the investigation of such matters and if I had had any basis for action, I certainly would have taken it. I am fully aware of the fact that the people under my orders were not angels and that normal human excesses were likely to occur. Please, Colonel, you understand and know that both you and I are human and have our human faults, and certainly the people under our command have too.

Before I went to Switzerland, I told my subordinates to tell me all the facts, including those that they had not told me about before, because I knew that when I went to negotiate in Switzerland, I had to disclose all the facts, or else I would get no quarter. Please, also, forgive my excitement, but all I have is my poor head, which has been pumped for the past six months and you should realize that I am telling you everything I can and everything I know.

Q. General Roettiger in his testimony to me has admitted that these atrocities in most instances were committed. He has further admitted that Field Marshal Kesselring issued the orders that I have been reading to you. Now, I want to ask you why you do not admit that these things did happen as they were alleged and why you did not investigate them and tell me the truth and say the reason that you didn't investigate them was because you were operating under the order which prevented you from investigating them, which order was issued by Field Marshal Kesselring on the 17th of June 1944.

A. General Roettiger was a newcomer to Italy. In fact, he spent at least one year less there than I did. Therefore, everything was new to him and made a greater impression on his memory. It would be much simpler for me simply to say that I had instructions or orders from my superior and that I complied with those orders. It would be much simpler for me and possibly for the Colonel, but I am sure the Colonel wants me, since I am testifying under oath, to present the facts as they were, and even though it may be much more painful to do it the hard way, and more dangerous for me not to choose the simpler but less honest procedure, I cannot do so. When I was about to tell the Colonel about the things that were my concern in Italy, I didn't mean to speak about my mission to Switzerland or my negotiations with the Allies. I meant to tell him about all the many things that I was in charge of while in Italy. For instance, relations with the Pope. I had to visit the Pope. I was concerned with so many administrative and military matters in my area of responsibility, and my poor brain just cannot retain all the incidents that happened while I was in office there.

INTERROGATIONS

Please don't think that it is cowardice on my part if I don't give you a positive reply regarding these particular incidents. I happened to recall this one name of Boccia, and I told you so, but since I do not have any recollection of the other incidents that you questioned me about, how could I say that I do recall them?

Q. Then you are admitting now that these things could have happened and they wouldn't have been called to your mind, is that right?

A. I never said anything else. I never said they didn't happen. I just said that I didn't know.

Q. I call to your attention some more atrocities that were reported and see if you remember those.* On the 10th of August 1944, at Milan, fifteen Communists were shot as reprisals for partisan activity by order of the German Command. Actually twenty-five political prisoners were taken from San Vittorio prison following an explosion which took place in a German lorry, killing three German soldiers. Fifteen of these prisoners were shot and ten were sent to concentration camps in Germany. The person responsible was the O. C. Gruppen Oberitalien West, Walter Rauff, Standartenfuehrer.

Do you remember that incident and did you investigate it and what did you do and what action did you take?

A. I don't recall this case as such. If the report was made to me, it presented the case in such a way that there was no reason for me to investigate it. Standartenfuehrer Rauff was a highly rated man whom I considered as absolutely dependable and there was every reason to believe that everything reported by him was entirely correct.

Q. Then in your estimation from what I have read to you, Standartenfuehrer Rauff was absolutely acting under orders in this case?

A. Surely.

Q. You didn't punish him for anything that he did there on that date, did you?

A. No. But this incident was not reported to me in the same manner as it is described here.

Q. In what shape or form or wording would a report have had to have been made for you to have taken any disciplinary action on it?

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

A. A report from either a superior or subordinate stating that one of my subordinates had committed an illegal action would have caused me to act.

Q. I now direct your attention to the 1st of September 1944.* During the evening of the 31st of August, local partisans ambushed a German ambulance between Leghetto and Villa Dico about one kilometer south of Colico. The only passenger in the vehicle, an Italian nurse, was killed. The driver, a German, was uninjured. This ambulance, which was already marked as such, was attacked because partisans had observed the Germans using ambulances to convoy ammunition and reinforcements. As a reprisal, about forty Germans and Italian soldiers entered Leghetto during the morning of the 1st of September and burned down five houses belonging to the partisans.

Do you remember this incident and did you investigate that?

A. No.

Q. You do admit, however, that you used ambulances to haul ammunition and supplies to the front, don't you, in Italy?

A. I assure you that I never heard of any case where ambulances were used to transport either ammunition or reinforcements. I can't tell anything to the Colonel that I don't know. I see the Colonel is shaking his head. Why should I try to get out of admitting such minor incidents and why should I deny it if I knew about them, since the most terrible things have been discovered in German concentration camps? Compared to those, these matters seem trifling. The next question by the Colonel would be, where were you? How did it happen, and so forth, and how would I know? I wouldn't be able to give this information.

Q. I didn't ask that. I only asked you: Did you know that it was done?

A. After having seen, as I was forced to do, the moving picture on the concentration camps, I am ready to believe anything, but as for these things, since I didn't know about them I can't say that they happened.

Q. All I want you to answer when I ask you a question, is yes if you know about it, and no if you don't know about it.

A. That is what I have been doing.

Q. What job did you have in Italy on the 17th of June 1944?

A. Supreme SS and Police Chief in Italy.

Q. On the 17th of June 1944, did you receive a teleprint message from the Supreme Commander of the Southwest, Field Marshal Kesselring, which read as follows: "Anti-Partisan Measures"?

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

A. My answer must be the same as the answer that I gave to the question whether I had seen the other orders which were discussed this morning.

Q. I will show you a copy of the order and direct your attention to the units to which it went and ask you if you had previously seen the order or had known about it?

(The document was translated to the witness by the interpreter.)

A. (Examining document) The Colonel would like to know whether I have seen this order?

Q. That is right.

A. I am not sure of it. As I said before, the same applies as in the case of the other orders.

Q. Well, in the heading of the order, it was directed to your Headquarters, wasn't it? Although you were absent?

A. Yes. Yes. Certainly.

Q. And an order with the importance of this order would have been called to your attention upon your return, wouldn't it?

A. Yes, verbally or in writing. This is why I said that I could swear to it only if I saw my own initials on the order.

Q. Well, to the best of your memory you have either seen this order or knew of it and knew of its contents, is that right?

A. (Examining document) Yes, I was familiar with its contents.

(The document reads as follows:)*

"Teleprint to: 10th Army High Command
14th Army High Command
Army von Zangen
Plenipotentiary General of the Wehrmacht in Italy
2nd Air Fleet
German Navy Command in Italy
Highest SS and Police Fuehrer
General of Transportation in Italy
Stab Ruk (Rear Area Command)
Plenipotentiary General of Greater Germany with Italian Gov.

"Re: Teleprint of Supreme Command Southwest Ia T No
0402/44 6.17.44 top secret
Teleprint of Supreme Command Southwest Ia T No
0627/44 6.22.44 top secret

"Re: Anti Partisan Measures

"In my appeal to the Italians I announced that several measures are to be taken against the Partisans. This announcement must not represent an empty threat. It is the duty of all troops and police in my command to adopt the severest measures. Every act of violence committed by partisans must be punished immediately. Reports submitted must also give details of counter measures taken. Wherever there is evidence of considerable numbers of partisan groups, a proportion of the male population of the area will be arrested and in the event of an act of violence being committed, these men will be shot. The population must be informed of this. Should troops etc. be fired at from any village, the village will be burned down. Perpetrators or the ringleaders will be hanged in public. Nearby villages to be held responsible for any sabotage to cables and damage inflicted to tires. The most effective counter measure is to recruit local patrols. Members of the Fascist party will not be included in any of the reprisals. Suspects will be handed over to the prefects and a report sent to me. Every soldier will protect himself outside villages by carrying a firearm. District Commanders will decide in which town it will also be necessary to carry firearms. Every type of plunder is forbidden and will be punished severely. All counter-measures must be hard but just. The dignity of the German soldier demands it."

*See document UK-66, vol. VIII, p. 572-582.

(signed) "Kesselring
Supreme Commander
(High Command 6th Army Group.)
Ia T No 9864/44 top secret."

Sauckel's Slave Labor Activities in Italy

Q. Who was the General Plenipotentiary Chief of Military Administration in Italy, on the 26th of November 1944?

A. On the 26th of November 1944, it was the Governor Doctor Waechter.

Q. Was Doctor Waechter a member of your staff?

A. Yes, he was. On my staff as Plenipotentiary General. He was one of my "pillars" as he was in charge of military administration.

Q. Did Doctor Waechter ever discuss with you the taking of hostages?

A. It couldn't have been hostages. He was concerned with the matter that also concerned Sauckel, the recruiting of Italian workers.

Q. That is what I am talking about, and I now show you a letter which was written by the General Plenipotentiary Chief of Military Administration in your Headquarters in which, in discussing these particular points, he mentioned as follows, and I want you at the end of the reading of this to tell me whether or not you discussed these particular points with Doctor Waechter, and whether these are your opinions as expressed by him on November 26, 1944?

(The document was translated to the witness by the interpreter.)

After having heard it translated thus far, do you remember anything about this order?

INTERROGATIONS

A. No. I do not remember this letter, but here is what it suggests to me, looking at the date and noting the contents of this letter; at about that time Sauckel was in Italy. He was concerned with the importation into Germany of Italian workers and was pressing for more and more of such persons to be sent to Germany. Before Sauckel's trip, I had obtained the agreement of the Commander-in-Chief that no more labor would be deported from Italy, as I was opposed to this policy, and Sauckel had come in order to obtain a revision of this prohibition. He had conferences with all the important officials concerned, such as Vieringhoff and Roettiger, and the other members of the General Staff. I was present myself and I developed my views and told Sauckel then that some day—I remember this very vividly—I told him that some day he would have to account for all the bloodshed and all the misfortunes that would come over the German people as a result of similar measures taken, not only in Italy, but in Russia and France and in other countries. I used the word "Menschenfang," and I remember that when we were driving back from this conference Sauckel was very reproachful about my having accused him of "Menschenfang." When we were conferring with Rahn, he brought up this matter again and he asked me never to use this word again. Rahn was very reasonable about this whole matter. He took my side and was instrumental in maintaining the prohibition in effect.

I don't know whether this will interest the Colonel: Himmler had radioed instructions directly to the Commander of the 16th SS Division, and he had done this by bypassing Kesselring, to continue the forcible recruiting of workers for deportation to Germany, and to ignore the order prohibiting it.

It may be that Sauckel had this letter written by his representative Kretschmann, who represented him on the Staff of the Chief of the Military Administration and was in charge of labor problems.

The document reads as follows:*

"HQ/QU .2
"Subject: HOSTAGES
"To: 1A

"HQ 26 Nov 1944.

"With reference to the question of selection of hostages the following information is quoted from a letter of the General Plenipotentiary Chief of Military Administration:

"Before anything else I would like to draw your attention to the obviously not always happy choice of hostages by the unit. The units apparently follow the accepted rule always to detain the best known members of the community, although, as opposed to the rest of Europe, the lower classes in Italy are more friendly towards us than the upper classes. It would therefore be to the point to select the hostages from these strongly pro-British circles. It must however be born in mind that any officials of the leading classes are by far preponderantly composed of proven Fascists i.e. such men who, within the Italian theatre are the nearest to being within the spirit of the German-Italian Alliance.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

"I would welcome therefore if it were expressly pointed out to the troops that Fascist officials of the State, Party or community are on one side supporters of German interests, and that on the other hand their arrests as hostages in no way produces the desired impression upon the terrorists.

"A suitable conference with the local duty stations of the Military Administration who are fully aware of these circumstances should ease the question of selection of suitable hostages in every case."

"Further a report of the Military Local HQ, Cuneo/Administrative Section attached to the above letter:

"Within the last few days the XXV A.K. (Army Corps) ordered the taking of preventive hostages. Amongst others arrested were Community Fascist Secretaries, Industrialists and Managers of important installations whose absence undoubtedly affected production adversely. It takes lengthy intervention to clear up the results of such measures. It has occurred frequently, in the operational area, rearward Army zone, where the troops in accordance with orders have all power of command, and where responsibility is entirely theirs, that Doctors and Chemists have lately been taken as hostages. According to the viewpoint of the Prefecture the medical care of the civilian population is in jeopardy as it has been proved that these persons, should they ever be released after a certain time, leave their domicile, so as to avoid being arrested on a future occasion.

"1a
"(signed) Signature"

Excerpts from Testimony of Karl Wolff, taken at Nurnberg, Germany, 27 October 1945, 1030-1235, by Col. Curtis L. Williams, IGD. Also present: Capt. Mark Priceman, Interpreter; Pvt. Clair Van Vleck, Court Reporter.

Stringent Measures Used Against Italian Partisans

Q. General, on the 18th of December 1944, Field Marshal Kesselring sent out his proposed order applicable to punitive measures against partisans to you and to Ambassador Rahn and asked you to make your comment thereon. I will show you a copy of that proposed order and ask you if you remember receiving it and if you made a reply to that proposal?

INTERROGATIONS

A. May I ask this question: Could this not be a misunderstanding? As I recall it, Kesselring at this time was suffering from the consequences of an accident and was in a hospital. I think he only returned to his office in mid-January of 1945.

Q. This is a copy of an order, which was drafted in his headquarters and sent to you and to Ambassador Rahn for your comment. Do you remember receiving that and did you make any comment thereon in reply?

(Whereupon the following was read to the witness by the interpreter:)*

"A Preliminary draft on the application of punitive measures is forwarded below and you are requested to take note of same.

"1. In the event of hostile activities from certain quarters, directed against the German Armed Forces, SS and Police organizations, etc., punitive measures must be taken if justified by the severity of the deed. Punitive measures are not to be applied if it has been possible to apprehend the wrongdoer.

"2. The punitive measures must correspond to the severity of the case and there must be borne in mind that in first applications the severest measures must not be taken so that it remains possible to increase them in the event of further misdemeanors."

A. Reading this far, you see that there is a complete change in policy as compared to that set forth in the order of the 17th of June. This change in policy was the result of many conversations, which Kesselring had had with me, with his Chief of Staff Roettiger, with von Vietinghoff and others.

Q. Dollmann?

A. I would say principally with me and sometimes my advice came to him through my liaison officer, Dollmann. I know that Kesselring had suffered under the weight of the constant pressure to which he was subjected by the OKW to be harsh. There were also people like Goering, who were constantly interfering with his policies; and, on the other hand, he was subjected to pressure from our side, and he himself was not a man who liked these cruel measures. So he was only too happy to be able finally to abolish that old policy and to come around as I have described it yesterday, to a policy which actually was entirely the opposite of what had been done before.

Q. However, the OKW had not, even at this time, changed their former instructions to Kesselring or to his headquarters concerning the treatment which the OKW wanted him to mete out to the partisans, had they?

A. No. This was a result of joint efforts on the part of Kesselring and myself. We worked out this new policy as the ones responsible for the Italian theater.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

Q. It is a fact, is it not, General, that the OKW daily still called on you, urging you to use a more and more stringent policy toward the partisans in Italy?

A. The last order of this kind, that I recall having received as the Plenipotentiary General, came to me in the beginning of August of 1944. It was shortly after the attempted assassination of the Fuehrer. No change in the general policies of the OKW with reference to the combatting of partisans became known to me during the following period. However, I do not recall having received any further orders confirming the old policy, and I do think that those gentlemen back in Berlin at that time were much too busy with so many other things, such as the liquidation of the people who had made the attempt against Hitler's life, and that they had a lot to worry about in connection with the conduct of the war.

Q. You do know that every time that Field Marshal Kesselring or General Roettiger called Berlin by telephone, and asked for additional units for the purpose of using them to combat the partisans, that they were told time after time that the only thing that the Reich Government could furnish them was advice to be more and more drastic in the treatment of those who were operating against the German Army, don't you?

A. Yes, I know that.

Q. And you knew that conversations were held between Keitel and Kesselring, and Keitel and Roettiger, and every time a conversation was held concerning the partisans, Keitel said that you must use more drastic punishment against the partisans, didn't he?

A. Yes; I know it, not because I listened in on those conversations, but because I was told about them by Roettiger, and occasionally by Kesselring, who complained to me about these things.

Q. Coming back to our original question: You do remember receiving this document that was sent to you by Field Marshal Kesselring, outlining his proposed order for the treatment of the partisans in December of 1944; do you not?

A. Yes.

Q. Then, General, on the 29th of December, you replied to Field Marshal Kesselring's previous proposed order to you in the following terms, did you not?

INTERROGATIONS

(Whereupon, the document was read to the witness by the interpreter as follows:)*

"Punitive measures may be employed in the event of hostile action on the part of the civilian population. Such acts of violence are, in almost all cases, not merely of local significance, but are previously prepared acts of terrorism carried out by the Patriot Movement of Italian Resistance Circles, which is guarded and supported by the enemy. For this reason, it would appear more practical for the purpose of applying punitive measures not to place the responsibility on Military Administration, such as Military and Civil HQ's, but rather on the organization charged with combatting Partisan operations. It would therefore, in this case, be a question of the officers 1/c Security Measures and the Chiefs of SS and Police. Further it must be borne in mind that punitive measures always have a political aspect and must be carefully weighed and balanced in particular as far as their execution and their repercussions are concerned. The participation of the commander of the Security Police and of the Protective Service in Italy must be assured without fail, since he is the person who is competent for and responsible for political counter-measures. He must also be authorized to apply punitive measures on his own responsibility. Inclusion of his subordinate posts also must be authorized.

"(IV, 1b) In the area of the Supreme Head of the SS and Police Italy, the Officers 1/c Security Measures.

"(IV, 2b) In the area of the Supreme Head of the SS and Police, Italy, the Chiefs of SS and Police, who will have to come to agreement on the necessary measures in close collaboration with the responsible detachments of Security Police and of the Security Service.

"(IV, 2c) The Commander of the Security Police and Security Service.

"(IV, 3b) In the area of the Supreme Head of the SS and Police, Italy for the application of punitive measures under 3b and d the Officer 1/c Security Measures in agreement with the detachment leaders of the Security Police and Security Service Posts concerned.

"(bb) For the remaining measures the Chiefs of SS and Police, in agreement with the relevant subordinate at the Security units of the Security Police and the Security Service.

"(IV, 6b) The choice of hostages must be carefully prepared in conjunction with the existent detachments of the Security Police and Security Service in order to avoid unpleasant consequences and blunders.

"(IV, 7) In the territories of the Chief Commissar the carrying out of punitive measures is always to be agreed upon, case by case, between the GOC Operations Zone Alpenvorland, HQ, LXXXVII: Corps for Special Duties and the authoritative representative of the responsible Security Police Posts in accordance with past instructions. Since punitive measures, in view of their consequences, cannot be considered too carefully, I propose that, also in the areas which are not part of my responsibility, the troops there at that time should, when imposing punitive measures, make it their duty to obtain the participation of the responsible Security Police and Security Service Posts.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

"The modification suggested by me to the effect that individuals of the Commander Partisan organization rather than the Officer of the General Plenipotentiary should be charged with the carrying out of punitive measures, does not of course preclude the participation in local incidents of the then Military and Civil HQ's. For such events the necessary instructions would be sent from here, to enable the military authorities to participate to the extent which is their due.

"The Supreme Head of the SS and Police, Italy 1a/1625/44 SECRET Circular geh.R.S.—Rundschreiben, signed Wolff, SS Obergruppenfuehrer and General of the Waffen SS."

A. Yes; I recognize it now. What I did here was simply to express my agreement with the new policy, and I added for practical reason, the recommendation that a sixty year old gentleman, who was a very fine general but politically rather candid, should not tackle a task which called for an administrator, experienced in police measures, and this is why I recommend that the Supreme SS and Police Chief should be made the executive in this kind of operation.

Q. All of these transactions and discussions between your headquarters, Rahn's headquarters, and the headquarters of Field Marshal Kesselring, were culminated on the 8th of February, 1945, in an order issued by Kesselring's headquarters, outlining his policy as of that date, and thenceforth in regard to punitive measures that were to be taken against the partisans. I want to show you an order dated the 8th of February, 1945, and ask you: Is this not the order issued by Field Marshal Kesselring, which on that date expressed his policy to his subordinate commanders for their action toward the treatment of partisans in Italy from the 8th of February onward?

(Whereupon the document referred to was read by the interpreter to the witness as follows:)*

"GOC in C., Southwest (HQ, Staff, Army Group C); Ia T No. 1680/45; MOST SECRET: HQ, 8th Feb. 45.

"Subject: Punitive Measures.

"1. The unhesitating carrying out of the steps ordered by me for the protection of the life and property of the German Armed Forces against the underhand attacks of the Partisans have borne fruit and brought to light, furthermore, the loyal and friendly attitude of the mass of the Italian people. They have, in full knowledge of the present state of affairs, withdrawn themselves

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

completely from those elements hostile to Germany and to the Fascist State. The struggle against Partisan bands, now proven to be led by the Allied High Command, must be carried on all the more determinedly—a fight which must at the same time have the goal of protecting Italians devoted to Fascism and our cause, from their (the Partisan's) menaces, and softening the bitterness of this strife in a peaceful land. All measures therefore in operations against Partisans are intended to be directed not only against organized bandit groups, but, aided by the Fascist organization, in particular against Partisan circles and persons sympathizing politically with the Partisans. In the spirit of this Field Directive, the instructions and orders, issued by me and hitherto valid, have been drawn up afresh and are as follows:

“2. The fight against Partisan illegal activities has often resulted in the necessity to give up all punitive measures. In order to avoid mistakes and excesses, it is always essential to assure oneself whether the measures taken have a pacifying result, or whether they merely serve to make the population feel sympathetic towards the misdoers. For the acts of isolated individuals no collective punishment may be imposed except in the case where the whole civilian population supported the deed, either actively or passively. When punitive measures are imposed rapid and permanent solutions are essential. Proved members of the population and in particular of the Fascist Party are definitely to be excluded from all punitive measures.

“III. The following steps amongst others may be taken:

“1. Light: Introduction or extension of the nightly curfew. Confinement to houses. Ban on travellers stopping in a town, periodic closing of hotels, theaters, cinemas, etc., ban on the sale of alcohol for a fixed time.

“2. Severe: Ban on the issue of smokers' ration cards, withdrawal of provisions. Ban on the distribution of wine. Rendering the population responsible for the protection of certain objects (railway lines, bridges, electrical works, news agencies, etc.).

“3. Most Severe. (a) Arrest of relatives of misdoers since it can be generally assumed that they are Partisan suspects or helpers.

“(b) Measures as in 1 and 2 for longer periods.

“(c) Destruction of blocks of houses or quarters of a town, but only if the population has actively supported the Partisans.

“(d) Execution of Partisan suspects or helpers.

“Measures (a)-(d) are therefore applicable in order of severity.

“IV. Empowered to impose punitive measures in general are:

“1. Light punitive measures.

“(a) In an operational area and to a depth of 30 kms. along the coast, an officer with the disciplinary powers of Regt. Comdr.

“(b) In the remaining area, the officer 1/c Security Measures.

“2. Severe punitive measures.

“(a) In an operational area and to a depth of 30 kms. along the coastland, an officer with a Div. Comdr.'s disciplinary powers.

"(b) In the remaining area the Chief of SS and Police, likewise, the Officer comdg. Security Police and the Security Service.

"3. Most severe punitive measures.

"(a) In an operational area to a depth of 30 kms. along the coast an officer with the disciplinary powers of GOC.

"(b) In the remaining region the Chief of SS and Police.

"4. Inasmuch as punitive measures outside the operational area cannot be applied by the officials mentioned under (1)-(3) for instance in the case of partisan operations, the responsible Platoon Leaders must necessarily contact them in order to fix the type and extent of eventual punitive measures.

"5. If there is danger in delay and the situation demands it, an officer with lower disciplinary power than those under IV (1) and (2) may intervene. He cannot, however, in every case render account of the steps he has taken and justify them to his immediate superior without delay. Such cases generally only occur in operational zones.

"6. In the carrying out of punitive measures the assistance should be secured in good time of the Officers of the General Plenipotentiary of the German Armed Forces, Italy, as well as of the competent Security Police and Security Service departments.

"7. In order to prevent bungling, it is once more pointed out that judgment can only be passed by a Permanent Court.

"V. In the territory of the Chief Commissar the carrying out of punitive measures is to be agreed upon from time to time between the offices of the GOC Operations Zone Alpenvorland, the General Commanding for Special Duties LXXXVII Corps, on the one hand and the Chief Commissar through the competent SS and Police Chief on the other; in accordance with the foregoing instructions the Chief Commissars make the decision.

"VI. The following previous documents concerning punitive measures are hereby cancelled:

"G.O.C. in C. South/Chief Q.M./Q.M. 2 No. 22785/43, SECRET of 8th Oct./43. G.O.C. in C. South/Ic. No. 6917:43 MOST SECRET of 10th Oct/43 and G.O.C. in C. Southwest/Ia T.No. 0864:44 MOST SECRET of 29th June/44.

"Signed: Kesselring, Field Marshal."

A. Yes; I remember this order.

Q. As you have testified before and as these orders clearly illustrate, Field Marshal Kesselring had reversed his policy toward the punitive measures that were to be taken against partisans in Italy, when you compare this order to that order of the 17th of June 1944, didn't he?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. What caused that change in policy other than your alleged conversations with Field Marshal Kesselring?

INTERROGATIONS

A. The operations that were initiated in June of 1944 had a definite military character and as General Roettiger already stated, quite a shock resulted from the first application of really stringent measures in this very cruel and not very fair fight. These Italians were really very cowardly and as long as they thought that the Germans were soft people, who would let them get away with it, they perpetrated all sorts of attacks against us, but once they discovered that we would give no quarter, their attitude changed. Another consideration was also our own difficult situation. We did not have too many troops to spare for these operations and thus the Supreme Commander realized that if he left these operations up to competent people, who due to their training and their speciality were suited for this sort of police operations, he would get better and cheaper results. May I add that in the beginning of May 1944 I had an audience with the Pope. I took this step entirely on my own, of course, without any instructions from either Hitler, Himmler, or Ribbentrop. This was quite an unprecedented move on the part of an SS Chief and had never happened before. I told the Pope on this occasion that I had been, and was willing to give all the assistance to the Catholic Church I could, and, actually, I had engaged the help of Cardinals and Bishops in my territory in bringing the local populations to their senses. The truth of this statement of mine has already been checked and established by the 209th British Interrogation Center at Rome. It had been agreed between the Pope and myself that these conversations would be treated as confidential. In fact, if we had not lost Rome and I had been able to continue these conversations, undoubtedly our surrender would have come about much sooner in a much more orderly manner. I am mentioning this desire of the Pope's to have this matter treated confidentially because I want to ask you, if this be possible, to respect the confidential nature of this audience of mine with the Pope, as it might be embarrassing for the Pope if any publicity were given to the matter.

Q. Isn't the main reason that Field Marshal Kesselring and the other organizations in Italy decidedly reversed their policy toward the treatment of partisans the fact that you found out through your harsh treatment of them during the months of June, July, August, September, and October of 1944, that such stringent measures, as you had then applied, did not pay?

A. I suppose this may have had something to do with it, but Kesselring and Roettiger should be asked about that. I had always maintained my view, which was that we should be fair and decent.

Q. Isn't it a fact, that late in 1944, a member of your staff and Field Marshal Kesselring's staff were placed together in order to comment upon the order which I have just previously shown to you, as proposed by Field Marshal Kesselring, and ask you if this conversation didn't occur between them?

A. Yes, of course. Whenever any agreements were reached between our respective headquarters and a policy had been agreed upon, the specialists or special staff members concerned would get together and work out the details, would formulate the new policies, as neither Kesselring nor myself had the time to do that work ourselves.

Q. I will ask you if your staff officer didn't discuss that proposed policy in the following words:^{*}

"Hereby the principle of taking hostages must be abolished altogether. We cannot take hostages in an allied country. We must even avoid that word on all occasions. Besides, experience in other vanquished countries has shown that the method of taking hostages only expiates heaviest damage to the German interest. Hostage measures drive even well-wishing parts of the population to the enemy's camp and lead to the greatest unrest in the rear of the fighting troops and harm, because of unavoidable damage to German respect. When sentencing persons within the frame of punitive measures, it must be established, at least formally, that they were sentenced to death for assistance to partisan units, desertions, and so forth. The word 'hostage' is sufficient to provoke politically negative sentiments of sympathy among the population."

A. Yes, but I did not start preaching this in December. I had been preaching this all along and Field Marshal Kesselring could testify to it, also Rahn and Roettiger.

Q. He had not listened to your preaching previously to this date, had he?

A. The bad mistake that Kesselring committed was that he issued his order of the 17th of June while I, the competent man in this matter, was taking my cure at Karlsbad. When I returned, I was able to convince him that the measures which he had ordered were not right, but you must realize that it is hard for a Field Marshal, who is 16 years older than I am, to admit to his subordinate that he has been one hundred percent wrong. I have already told you that we agreed in principle that this policy had to be changed, but we couldn't make a hundred and eighty degree turn right away. We had to do it gradually. This is what we had agreed upon and this is what we did.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Q. It took Field Marshal Kesselring from June the 17th, 1944 until February the 8th, 1945 to be convinced that his previous policy was wrong and that he should turn around and absolutely reverse himself in his action towards the partisans; is that right?

A. No. This was not so. Changes in this policy were made as early as July and August. You must consider that poor Field Marshal Kesselring was constantly subjected to pressure from Hitler and Keitel. Take, for example, the paragraph in the order which you just read to me, which states that in particularly serious cases, hostages may be taken and executed. This was only a concession to instructions from Berlin. Actually, we didn't mean to do any such thing and I say again that so far as I was concerned, and in my execution of these policies, I always used fair and mild measures.

Q. It makes no difference to me what Field Marshal Kesselring had in his mind between June the 10th 1944 and the 8th of February 1945. The facts are as shown by the orders which he issued, that he did not change his stringent, drastic, cruel treatment of the partisans in Italy from the first date mentioned until the last date mentioned, are they not?

A. There must be an order, which came out on or about the 20th of August, and which has not been shown to me here as yet, which constituted the first temporizing measure in the policies of Kesselring in his fight against the partisans. In fact, if you look again at your reports on atrocities committed, and if you compare the dates, you will undoubtedly notice that after, or shortly after that approximate date, there was a noticeable drop in the number of such atrocities. Of course, it takes some time when new instructions are issued for the effects to be felt. You must also consider, apart from written orders, the many personal conversations and discussions, which took place all along. Also if my representative was able to express the opinions that you quoted a few minutes ago in December, that shows that all these things were under consideration during that period and that the change in our policy was really not as sudden as it may appear, when one considers only the fact that there was an order of the 17th of June and then another one of the 8th of February.

Q. You are going to admit, are you not, that the reason for the change of this policy and the reversal of the attitude of Field Marshal Kesselring and your headquarters was because you had found that it didn't pay to be cruel to people whose country you were occupying?

A. Yes, of course, this was one of the reasons and I don't deny that it was one of the most important ones, but a decision is not made without considering all factors, and there were a number of circumstances which brought it about.

Q. A moment ago, you mentioned to me that you felt that in August of 1944 Field Marshal Kesselring must have issued an order, which showed a change in his policy in regard to his action towards the partisans.

A. Yes.

Q. I have an order, which was issued by Field Marshal Kesselring's headquarters on the 21st day of August 1944 and I want to read it to you and see if you think, after reading it, that he had changed his policy in treating the partisans from that policy as announced on the 17th of June 1944. This order, which I am showing to you, is addressed to all of the major units under the command of Field Marshal Kesselring and it reads:*

"In connection with operations against partisans, and larger scale actions against same, incidents have occurred within the last few weeks, which caused the greatest harm to the dignity and discipline of the German armed forces, and which had nothing to do with punitive measures."

What do you think Field Marshal Kesselring meant when he said "Incidents have occurred within the last few weeks, which have caused great harm to the dignity and discipline of the German Armed Forces, and which had nothing to do with punitive measures"?

A. What he had in mind were the atrocities and excesses committed in the execution of the instructions, which he had been forced to publish. Kesselring never intended to instruct the German soldier to commit any actions which would have been detrimental to his dignity and honor. Unfortunately, it could not be avoided, that after these instructions had been issued, they would be misinterpreted and that cases would occur where the persons involved would abuse the leeway which had been given them. You must consider that the basic order had been issued at a time when everybody was most indignant about the activity of the partisans and, accordingly, under high pressure. Later on, I did not have much trouble in convincing Kesselring that this was extremely dangerous and that we had to do something about it. Here you see the first step, which he took to counteract any such excesses and misinterpretations of his instructions.

Q. I shall continue reading:

"As operations against partisans should be conducted with all means available, no innocent elements are affected by same."

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

INTERROGATIONS

Does he not realize there that innocent people are affected by these raids? He still says that they must use all means available against the partisans.

A. It is unavoidable in any kind of war and, of course, in a war against bands of partisans, that from time to time, innocent bystanders are affected.

Q. I want now to read to you a letter, which was addressed by Ambassador Rahn to all the officers of the Propaganda Section of every Regiment on the Italian front, during the month of December 1944; and ask you if you did not, as Commander-in-Chief of the Police in Italy, receive a copy of this letter and what action or what comment did you make thereon?

A. May I ask this question? Are you speaking about the National Socialist Party representatives in the regiments?

Q. I am speaking of a letter, which was addressed by Ambassador Rahn to all the officers of the propaganda section of every regiment on the Italian front.

A. May I ask you to tell me what the contents of this letter is?

Q. Yes; I am going to read it to you now.*

"I am perfectly conscious of the sentiment of violent aversion nourished by the German soldiers against the Italians, including those Italians who, for one reason or another, continue to fight on our side. This negative attitude damages our war effort. It is an emotional impulse, which must be better hidden. I shall thereby be very grateful to the officers, to whom this letter is addressed, if they would pay more attention to this and if they would see to the attitude of their men. It is necessary to organize some lectures in which it is explained what benefits Germany has received from the false political reconstruction of Fascist Italy. They must be reminded that the first objective is to mobilize all the strength and productive potentialities of the part of Italy occupied by us in order to lighten German needs. Everything in occupied Italy must be exploited by us for our war effort. This is our opportunity, for we can avail ourselves of the advantage of the concentrated hate that almost all Italians have for their Republican Fascist Government. By using our intelligence we can turn this hate to our favor.

"During the first months after 8 September '44, the German armed forces succeeded in representing the only legal authority in occupied Italy; therefore, many Italians turned to us in their difficulties. This political good luck has facilitated our work but lately our position, among other things also the Italians; has become worse owing to the acts of violence and reprisals committed by our soldiers against the civilian population. Field Marshall Kesselring's order, dated the 2d of August, 1944, specifies clearly that the indiscriminate reprisals against the civilian population, rather than against the patriots, diminishes the trust of the population in the German armed forces, and furnishes excellent propaganda for the enemy. These acts on the part of the German troops, even if justifiable, must diminish. It is very urgent to change our behaviour, not for humanitarian considerations, but in cold calculation that this is the best way to take care of the interests of the German war effort in Italy.

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

"Therefore, the German soldiers' attitude toward the Italian population is decidedly important. Whether we hate the Italians or not is of no importance. The important thing is that we must obtain from Italy everything possible for our war effort. After five years of war, we cannot give ourselves to the luxury of spoiling favorable situations, just to satisfy our emotions. Our sentiments must be held in check, at least for the moment. It is better to satisfy our hate and aversion at the right moment, taking into account particular circumstances of military nature. We must pretend the greatest friendship possible and act without mercy once it is no longer necessary to hide our real sentiments."

A. I do not remember this letter.

Q. Do you know if these were the true sentiments of Ambassador Rahn in December of 1944?

A. I can't answer this question with just yes or no. It is necessary for me to describe Rahn in order to clarify this matter.

Q. Go ahead.

A. Rahn is a career diplomat and one of the new brand, very gifted with a lot of ideas and imagination. He takes great delight occasionally in reaching his objectives with the help of Jesuitic means. I have observed on many occasions that whenever he wanted to get Hitler, or the Army chiefs, or Mussolini, or Ribbentrop, or anybody else to agree to a certain measure, he would deliberately represent himself as worse than he was. He would assume the position of a Jesuit, whose only consideration is the goal, and who does not care what means are used. The Colonel asked me whether I knew whether this was Rahn's opinion. As the Political Plenipotentiary of the Great German Reich, Rahn was in those days the recipient of a great many complaints from the Duce and other Italian dignitaries about excesses and incidents. For that reason he felt that he had to do something about the education of our troops in this respect. I know that considerable difficulties resulted for Rahn in his dealings with the Duce and the Italian Government from the existing mutual dislike of the Germans for the Italians and of the Italians for the Germans. As Rahn considered himself responsible for making the best of war production in Italy, he thought that he had to consider that matter in connection with this task of his. I would like to mention that whenever Rahn felt that he had to use one of these immoral

INTERROGATIONS

Jesuitic tricks, he would say to himself: "I have to act as the advocatus diaboli—the devil's advocate."

Q. Do you remember on July the 10th 1944 that you received an order from Dr. Lokotsch, who was Oberstrichter, and which read as follows:*

"The Fuehrer has ordered that with immediate effect, no further proceedings will be taken by military courts against the civilian population in occupied countries on account of acts of terrorism and sabotage against the German occupational forces. Accordingly, no cases already under consideration will be brought to trial. New orders for troops and courts will follow. The judge is to be informed that any necessary order should be issued to subordinate units."

A. No; at that time I was not the Plenipotentiary General so that I would not have been on the distribution list of this order.

Q. On January the 12th, 1945, what position did Tensfeld hold in your command?

A. He was the SS and Police Chief in Upper Italy, in the Western part of Upper Italy. His territory included the provinces of Lombardy, Liguria, and Piedmont. In other words, it included the triangle Milan, Torin, and Genoa.

Q. Would a copy of the orders that were issued by Tensfeld be sent to your headquarters, as a part of his normal distribution?

A. No; unless it was something of prime importance and meant a fundamental decision, in which case I, as the Supreme SS and Police Fuehrer, had to be informed; otherwise, he took his decisions and issued his orders independently.

Q. SS Brigadefuehrer Tensfeld on the 12th of January 1945 issued an order, and paragraph 9 of that order reads as follows, with the heading of "Tribunals of Security Commanders":*

"I have reason again to draw your attention to the following:

"Any execution through shooting of persons as a reprisal, must be preceded by a judgment of a tribunal, which has been formed by order of the local Security Commander. I don't think it is necessary to emphasize that only such persons will be picked, who at any rate, would have lost their lives according to battle rulings. The persons will best be picked by the local Police Commander in collaboration with the Security Police. It is in such a way that the outside appearance of a lawful condemnation is being kept up. The population will be notified by posters that the execution has taken place as a reprisal. It has to be said that the respective people have been condemned to death."

*Document referred to did not form part of prosecution case as finally prepared and hence is not published in this series.

Did you ever receive a copy of the order containing this paragraph; and if you did, what was the meaning of it?

A. No.

Q. You know that the Security Police ordered the formation of all the local courts, don't you?

A. Yes.

Q. And that all persons who were captured as commandos, or as partisans, were to be turned over to the Security Police, weren't they?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know the action that the Security Police took in connection with all commandos that were captured?

A. Yes.

Q. What was that action?

A. Each case was investigated thoroughly and wherever any guilt could be proven, the case would be submitted to an SS and Police Court, or to a military tribunal.

Q. You are now talking about commandos. Was that the action that was required concerning them?

A. This procedure applied to everybody.

Q. I show you an order from the OKW, dated the 18th of October 1942 and ask you if you ever saw that order, and if you did not operate under the authority contained therein in Italy, in 1944?

A. No. In 1942* I had not been in Italy and in any case, we never had an occasion in Italy to comply with such an order.

Q. I will ask you in that connection if you ever heard of 13 American soldiers, 11 enlisted men and two officers, being executed under the direct authority contained in this order in Italy, which execution took place in the year of 1944 and was ordered and carried out by General Dostler?

A. I hadn't heard about it at the time when it happened. I was informed of it while I was a prisoner.

Q. Do you know under what authority General Dostler alleged that he executed those thirteen American commandos in 1944, near La Spezia, Italy?

A. He claimed to have consulted the army group, through the army, and I believe the question was passed on to the OKW and eventually the execution took place on the basis of this order of the 18th of October 1942.

*See document 498-PS, vol. III, p. 416.

See document 2610-PS, vol. V, p. 330.

BIOGRAPHICAL INDEX OF PRINCIPAL PERSONS REFERRED TO IN THE INTERROGATIONS

[In the following data German titles and offices have been translated into English, wherever possible. Likewise, the English rather than the German spelling of Christian names has been adopted. In the case of military or para-military (i.e., SS or SA) personnel, the highest rank attained is given, and no attempt has been made to trace the dates of promotions. It should be noted in this connection that the German system of military ranks differs from the American, and that while both systems have several ranks in common, these ranks are not exact equivalents when considered in their respective hierarchies. For example, a German Lieutenant General is equivalent in rank to an American Major General. For further information on this question, see Table of Commissioned Ranks in the Germany Army, Navy, and SS, with Their Equivalents in the American Military Forces, Vol. II of this series, p. 1099. For explanation of German phrases, as well as abbreviations, see Glossary of Common German and Nazi Titles, Designations, and Terms, with Their Official Abbreviations, Vol. II, p. 1084-1098. For further biographical information, see Biographical Data on Principal Officials of Reich Government, Nazi Party, and Armed Forces, Vol. II, pp. 1055-1077.—Ed.]

ABETZ, Otto—German Ambassador to the French Government headed by Petain at Vichy; Foreign Office representative at headquarters of German Commander-in-Chief in France during occupation. pp. 1217-1220, 1491.

ALVENSLEBEN, Bodo Count von—Member of a famous Prussian aristocratic family; president of the Herrenklub (Berlin), 1932. p. 1452.

AMANN, Max—Hitler's company sergeant during World War I who became business manager of the Nazi Party in 1921; participated in Munich beerhall putsch of 1923 and was imprisoned; when Hitler came to power in 1933, was appointed Reich Press Leader and President of the Reich Press Chamber, which made him virtual dictator of whole German press; as head of Zentral Verlag, Franz Eher Nachf. (central publishing house of the Nazi Party) and subsidiaries, controlled world's largest press and publishing combine; member of the Reichstag. pp. 1521-1532.

ANTONESCU, Marshal Ion—Iron Guard Leader who was Nazi-backed dictator and Prime Minister of Rumania from 1940 until 1944, when King Michael dismissed him; (not to be confused with Mihai Antonescu, Rumanian lawyer and former delegate to anti-Comintern meeting in Berlin who was Rumanian Deputy Prime Minister, 1942-1944); both Antonescus were executed on 1 June 1946 in Bucharest. p. 1206.

BALDWIN, Stanley (1st Earl of Bewdley, Viscount Corvedale, 1937)—British Conservative Party leader who was Privy Councillor, 1920; President of the Board of Trade, 1921-1922; Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1922-1923; Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury, 1923-1924, 1924-1929 (succeeded by MacDonald), and 1935-1947 (succeeding MacDonald, and succeeded by Chamberlain); Lord President of the Council, 1931-1935; Lord Privy Seal, 1932-1934. pp. 1175, 1214, 1248, 1249.

BALFOUR, Arthur James (1st Earl of Balfour, 1922)—British author and Conservative Party leader who was First Lord of the Treasury and Lord Privy Seal, 1902; Prime Minister (succeeding Lord Salisbury, his uncle), 1902–1905 (succeeded by Campbell-Bannerman); First Lord of the Admiralty (succeeding Churchill) in Asquith cabinet, 1915; Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Lloyd-George cabinet, 1916–1919, and in this capacity, in November 1917, promised on behalf of the British Government to provide a national home for the Jews in Palestine after the war ("The Balfour Declaration"); British Delegate to the Paris Peace Conference, 1919; Lord President of the Council, 1919–1922; British Delegate to Washington Conference 1921–1922; died in 1930. p. 1425, 1426.

BARTHOU, (Jean) Louis—Premier of France and Minister of Public Instruction, 1913; Minister Without Portfolio in Painlevé's World War I cabinet; Minister of War in Briand's cabinet, 1921; Senator, 1922; Vice Premier and Minister of Justice in Poincaré's cabinet, 1926; as Foreign Minister, 1932, foresaw Nazi menace and initiated Franco-Soviet Pact; assassinated with King Alexander I of Yugoslavia at Marseilles, 9 October 1934. p. 1175.

BECK, Col. Jozef—served in Pilsudski's Polish Legion in World War I and was Chief of Staff to Marshal Pilsudski; Military Attaché at Polish Embassy in Paris, 1922–1923; Foreign Minister of Poland, 1932–1939; and in pursuing generally anti-French policy negotiated and signed Non-Aggression Pact with Germany, 1934; after invasion of Poland fled to Rumania and lived in retirement until his death in June 1944. p. 1104.

BECK, Col. Gen. Ludwig—Chief of the German General Staff, 1935–1938, who resigned because of disagreement with Hitler's aggressive policies during the Sudeten crisis in the summer of 1938; chief military leader of the anti-Nazi underground, who was to become Chief of State of Germany if 20 July 1944 plot against Hitler succeeded; after failure of plot was forced by Fromm to commit suicide on night of 20 July 1944. pp. 1090, 1270, 1548–1551, 1554, 1555, 1559, 1560, 1568, 1570.

BELOW, Col. Nikolaus, von—Air Force aide-de-camp to Hitler who remained at the Fuehrer's Headquarters in the air-raid bunker in Berlin during Hitler's last days, April 1945. p. 1280.

BENES, Eduard—Czechoslovakian Minister for Foreign Affairs, 1918–1935; Premier, 1921–1922; President 1935–1938; President of Czech Government-in-Exile in London, 1939–1945; returned to Czechoslovakia and resumed office as President after liberation in May 1945. p. 1501.

BERGER, Gottlieb—SS Obergruppenfuehrer and General of the Waffen SS; Chief of the Central Office of the SS; Head of the SS Prisoner of War Administration and Inspector General of Prisoners of War; Head of Policy Division of Reich Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories. pp. 1320, 1321, 1533, 1534.

BERNADOTTE AF WISBORG, Folke Count—nephew of King Gustav V of Sweden; member of Committee for International Relief Work, 1944; as Vice President of Swedish Red Cross visited Germany to negotiate release of Danish and Norwegian prisoners in early spring of 1945; acted thereafter as intermediary in abortive attempts of Himmler and Schellenberg to make peace with the Western Allies, and transmitted Himmler's offer to Eisenhower. pp. 1596, 1632.

BETHOUART, Gen. Emile-Marie—Commander of French forces during Norwegian campaign, April–June 1940; as commander of division stationed near Casablanca cooperated with Anglo-American forces during landing in North Africa, November 1942, and was arrested for refusal to obey orders of Vichy Government to resist; Gen. Giraud's liaison officer with Allied Commanders in Chief following North African landing; head of Casablanca Military Mission, 1943; Chief of Staff for National Defense in Algiers Government, 1944; Commander of 1st Army Corps, 1st French Army, September 1944; Commander-in-Chief of French Occupation Zone in Austria, July 1945. p. 1545.

BIDDLE, Col. Anthony J. Drexel—United States Minister to Norway, 1935–1937; Ambassador to Poland, 1937–1939; accompanied Polish Government in move from Warsaw to other temporary capitals after invasion, 1939; American Deputy Ambassador to France at fall of France and followed French Government to Tours and later Bordeau capitals, 1940; Ambassador to Government-in-Exile of Poland, Belgium, Norway, the Netherlands, Yugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia, 1943–1944; retired from diplomatic service, January 1944, and entered U. S. Army on Eisenhower's staff at SHAEF. p. 1195.

BISMARCK-SCHOENHAUSEN, Prince Otto Eduard Leopold von—Minister President of Prussia, 1862–1871; created unity of German states proclaimed as new German Empire under William I, at Versailles, 1870, after defeat of France in Franco-Prussian War; Chancellor of Imperial Germany (the "Iron Chancellor"), 1871, and served until his dismissal after accession of William I in 1890; died in 1898. p. 1189.

BLASKOWITZ, Col. Gen. Johannes—Commander of German invasion armies in Austria and the Sudetenland, 1938; Commander-in-Chief of the German Army in Poland, 1939, and resigned in protest at SS interference; Commander of the First Army in France with Headquarters at Bordeaux, 1942. p. 1574.

BLOMBERG, Field Marshal Werner von—Hitler's Minister of War from 1933 until 4 February 1938, when he was dismissed after a Nazi-engineered frameup and Hitler assumed Supreme Command of the Armed Forces. pp. 1087, 1089, 1100–1102, 1111–1113, 1152, 1458–1460, 1466, 1499.

BOEHM, Admiral Hermann—Commander of German "non-intervention" fleet in Spain, 1936; admiral in command in Norway, 1940–1943. p. 1545.

BOEHME, Maj. Gen. Hermann—Chief of Staff, German Armistice Commission in France 1940–1943. pp. 1576, 1577.

BOEPPEL, Ernst—Under Secretary in the General Government of Poland; formerly deputy head of Bavarian Ministry of Education. p. 1375.

- BOHLE, Ernst Wilhelm—Under Secretary in the German Foreign Office; head of the Foreign Organization of the Party; SS Obergruppenfuehrer. p. 1168.
- BOHR, Niels—Professor of Theoretical Physics at University of Copenhagen since 1916; Director of Institute of Theoretical Physics in Copenhagen since 1920; winner of Nobel Prize in Physics, 1922; one of pioneers in research on atomic fission. pp. 1624, 1629.
- BORIS III—King of Bulgaria during period when Bulgaria was adherent to the Tripartite (Axis Pact) and an ally of Germany; died in 1943 after reigning since 1918. p. 1640.
- BORMANN, Martin—Head of the Party Chancery and Secretary of the Fuehrer (succeeding Hess in 1941); Reichsleiter and Reichsminister; member of the Ministerial Council for the Defense of the Reich; member of the Reichstag; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; appointed Party Chancellor in Hitler's political testament, 29 April 1945; missing and rumored killed in attempt to escape from Berlin, 2 May 1945. pp. 1120, 1135, 1145, 1203, 1222, 1275, 1276, 1297, 1298, 1334, 1336, 1337, 1358, 1381, 1515, 1633, 1645.
- BRACHT, Heinrich—Mayor of Essen and Center Party leader who succeeded the Social Democrat, Carl Severing, as Prussian Minister of the Interior during the crisis of 20 July 1932. p. 1462.
- BRANDT, Heinz—Press Leader for the Gau Oberschlesien; SS Obersturmfuehrer; (not to be confused with Prof. Dr. Karl Brandt, SS Obergruppenfuehrer and Reich Commissioner for Health and Medical Services). pp. 1125, 1127, 1129.
- BRAUCHITSCH, Field Marshal Walter von—Commander-in-Chief of the German Army (OKH) from February 1938, when he succeeded von Fritsch, to December 1941, when after the defeat before Moscow he was dismissed by Hitler, who himself assumed personal command of army operations. pp. 1543, 1549, 1550, 1552, 1553, 1562–1567, 1569–1572, 1574, 1575.
- BRAUER—Foreign Office Representative in Norway, with rank of Minister, during occupation by Germany. pp. 1542–1544.
- BRAUN, Eva—Hitler's companion, whom he married in the air raid bunker in Berlin early in the morning of 29 April 1945 and with whom he committed suicide the following afternoon. p. 1294.
- BROCKDORFF-RANTZAU, Col. Gen. Erich von—Commander of the Potsdam Division and a participant in the early (1938) plotting against Hitler. pp. 1552, 1553.
- BRUECKNER, Wilhelm—SA Obergruppenfuehrer; led the "Munich Regiment" in the 1923 putsch and was imprisoned; in 1930 became Hitler's personal adjutant and was one of Hitler's closest entourage for many years before the war; member of the Reichstag. p. 1399.
- BRUENING, Heinrich—Leader of the Catholic Center Party who was Chancellor of Germany, 1930–1932; escaped to the United States during the Roehm crisis of June 1934. pp. 1412, 1449, 1459.

- BUEHLER, Josef—Under Secretary and Deputy to the Governor General of Poland (Hans Frank) and head of government in Cracow, 1939; Ministerialdirektor in Ministry of Justice, 1944. pp. 1369, 1375, 1376, 1381.
- BUERMANN, Gen.—Representative of the Wehrmacht (OKW) in Poland during the German occupation. pp. 1382, 1400.
- BULLITT, William C.—United States Ambassador to the Soviet Union, 1933–1936; to France, 1936–1940. pp. 1195, 1492.
- BURGDORF, Lt. Gen. Wilhelm—Successor to Schmundt as Chief Military Aide-de-Camp to Hitler, and Chief of Personnel Division of Army (OKH), July 1944–1945. pp. 1257–1259, 1261–1270.
- BUSCH, Field Marshal Ernst—Commander of German 16th Army which, after taking part in the Western Campaign, participated in invasion of Russia on northern sector, June 1941. p. 1282.
- CANARIS, Admiral Wilhelm—Chief of Bureau of Foreign Abwehr (Intelligence Section of OKW) until 1944 when he was dismissed and the Abwehr was absorbed into the RSHA; although Anti-Nazi, had not actually joined the underground movement but secretly frustrated Hitler's orders for conduct of warfare contrary to laws of war; arrested by the Gestapo after failure of 20 July 1944 attempt and executed by strangulation with piano wire at Flossenbürg concentration camp in early 1945. pp. 1316, 1317, 1551–1555, 1568, 1573, 1574, 1612, 1613, 1615, 1617.
- CARLS, Admiral Rolf—Commander-in-Chief of German Naval Group "East" from 1938 until September 1940, when he became Commander-in-Chief of Naval Command "North"; took decisive part in battle for Baltic Isles, 1940–1941. pp. 1439–1441.
- CHAMBERLAIN, Rt. Hon. (Arthur) Neville—British Conservative Party leader who was Postmaster General, 1922–1923; Paymaster General, 1923; Minister of Health, 1923, 1924–1929, and 1931; Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1928–1924 and 1931–1937; Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury, 1937–1940 (succeeding Baldwin); signed Munich Pact, September 1938; Lord President of the Council, 1940; died 7 November 1940. pp. 1216, 1251–1254, 1483, 1554, 1558, 1562.
- CHURCHILL, Rt. Hon. Winston Leonard Spencer—British writer and Conservative Party leader who was President of the Board of Trade, 1908–1910; Home Secretary, 1910–1911; First Lord of the Admiralty, 1911–1915; Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, 1915; Minister of Munitions, 1917; Secretary of State for War, 1918–1921; for Air, 1918–1921; for Air, 1918–1921; for the Colonies, 1921–1922; Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1924–1929; First Lord of the Admiralty, 1930–1940; Prime Minister, First Lord of the Treasury, and Minister of Defence, 1940–1945; was defeated and became leader of the opposition, July 1945. pp. 1250, 1425.
- CONTI, Dr. Leonardo—Reich Health Leader; Under Secretary and Chief of Health Divisions in Ministry of Interior; Chairman of numerous medical organizations; SS Obergruppen-

- fuehrer; was physician to Nazi "martyr," Horst Wessel; committed suicide in Nurnberg prison, October 1945. p. 1590.
- COUGHLIN, Rev. Charles Edward—Roman Catholic priest and pastor of the shrine of the Little Flower, Royal Oak (Detroit), Michigan, since 1926; known for radio sermons on communism, labor conditions, etc. p. 1423.
- DALADIER, Edouard—Prime Minister of France, 1938–1940; signed Munich Pact, September 1938. pp. 1217, 1219, 1558.
- DARRE, WALTER—Reich Minister for Food and Agriculture; Reich Leader for Peasantry; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; on "long leave" from 1942 (succeeded by Herbert Backe, acting). p. 1152.
- DAVIS, Norman H.—United States Ambassador-at-Large and Observer at League of Nations, 1933–1938; American representative at Geneva Disarmament Conference, 1934. p. 1503.
- DIETL, Col. Gen. Eduard—Commander of the German 20th Army (mountain), operating in Northern Finland on the Murmansk front. pp. 1545, 1546.
- DIETRICH, Otto—Reich Press Chief; Under Secretary and Chief of Press Divisions in Reich Ministry of Propaganda; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; not to be confused with Josef ("Sepp") Dietrich, SS Oberstgruppenfuehrer commanding the Leibstandarte "Adolf Hitler," and later the 1st SS Panzer Corps; organizer of the Waffen SS). p. 1232.
- DIRCKSEN, Herbert von—German Ambassador to Soviet Union, 1929–1933; to Japan, 1933–1938; to Great Britain (succeeding Ribbentrop), 1938–1939. p. 1216.
- DOENITZ, Grand Admiral Karl—Commander of the German U-Boats, 1935–1943; Commander-in-Chief of the Navy (succeeding Raeder), 1943–1945; appointed Reich President, Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces, Minister of War, and Commander-in-Chief of the Navy in Hitler's political testament, 29 April 1945; as Hitler's successor, headed the short-lived Flensburg Government which capitulated on 7 May 1945. pp. 1087, 1113, 1222, 1250, 1266, 1275, 1276, 1281–1283, 1632.
- DOHNANYI, Hans von—Former Justice of the German Supreme Court who was chief assistant to Oster in the Abwehr; a member of the anti-Nazi underground; arrested by the Gestapo in 1943 and executed at Sachsanhausen concentration camp in April 1945. p. 1568.
- DOLFFUSS, Engelbert—Chancellor of Austria from May 1932 until his assassination by Otto Planetta, acting for the Nazis, in Vienna, July 1934. pp. 1145–1150, 1474, 1492, 1505.
- DOLLMANN, Eugen—SS Sturmbannfuehrer (Colonel); head of Gestapo in Rome and SS representative at Mussolini's Headquarters. p. 1664.
- DOSTLER, General of Infantry Anton—Commander of the 75th German Army Corps in Italy; tried and found guilty by a U. S. Military Commission, on 12 October 1945, and executed, for having ordered the summary shooting of 15 American prisoners of war captured near La Spezia on 24 March 1944. p. 1677.

EDEN, Rt. Hon. (Robert) Anthony—British Conservative Party leader who was Parliamentary Under Secretary in the Foreign Office, 1931–1933; Lord Privy Seal, 1934–1935; Minister without Portfolio for League of Nations Affairs, 1935; Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Baldwin and Chamberlain cabinets, 1935–1938 (succeeded by Halifax); Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, 1939–1940; Secretary of State for War, 1940; Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Churchill cabinet, 1940–1945; leader of the House of Commons, 1942–1945. p. 1489.

EDWARD, VIII (WINDSOR)—King of England, acceding to the throne on the death of his father, George V, on 20 January 1936; abdicated on 10 December 1936 to marry Mrs. Wallis Warfield Simpson; succeeded by his brother, the Duke of York, who became George VI; took title of Duke of Windsor; Governor of Bahamas, 1940–1945. p. 1214.

EICHE—SS Obergruppenfuehrer and Commander of Concentration Camps (succeeded by Gluecks). p. 1581.

EICHMANN, Adolf—SS Obersturmbannfuehrer; Chief of Amt IV B 4 of the RSHA (Gestapo section charged with "Jewish affairs," i. e., extermination). p. 1604.

EIGRUBER, August—Appointed Reich Governor and Nazi Gauleiter of Oberdonau (Austria) in May 1938 after taking a prominent part in pre-Anschluss Nazi agitation in Austria; Obergruppenfuehrer in SS and SA; member of the Reichstag. p. 1320.

EISENHOWER, General of the Army Dwight David—Chief of Staff of United States 3d Army, 1941; Assistant Chief of Staff in charge of Operations Division of War Department General Staff, 1942; Commander of European Theatre of Operations, 1942; Commander-in-Chief of Allied Forces in North Africa, November 1942–1944; Supreme Commander of Allied Expeditionary Force in Western Europe, 1944–1945; Commander of American Occupation Zone of Germany, 1945; Chief of Staff of U. S. Army, 1945–1948. pp. 1283, 1428.

ELTZ und RUEBENACH, Paul, Baron von—Reich Minister for Posts and Transport who refused the Golden Party Emblem and resigned in January 1937 because of Hitler's attacks on the Christian Church. pp 1450, 1451, 1455.

EPP, Lt. Gen. Franz, Ritter (Knight) von—Head of Colonial Policy Office of Nazi Party Directorate; Reich Governor of Bavaria; SA Obergruppenfuehrer; member of the Reichstag; started Hitler on his political career and participated in the 1923 beerhall putsch in Munich. pp. 1362, 1557.

FALKENHORST, Col. Gen. (Paul) Nikolaus von—Commander of German 21st Army during Polish campaign, 1939; Commander-in-Chief of German Armed Forces in Norwegian invasion and occupation, 1940; Commander-in-Chief of German Army in Finland, 1941; resumed command in Norway, 1942; relieved of command in Norway, January 1945. pp. 1289, 1290, 1534–1547.

FAUPEL, Wilhelm—German Ambassador to Spanish National Government (Franco), 1936-1937; formerly military adviser to Argentine and Peruvian Governments; retired Lieutenant General; head of Ibero-American Institute. p. 1635.

FEGELEIN, Hermann—SS Gruppenfuehrer and Commander of SS Cavalry Division operating on Russian front until later 1943; succeeded Wolff as Personal Representative of the Reichsfuehrer SS (Himmler) at Hitler's Headquarters, 1944; married in 1944 to Gretl Braun, sister of Eva Braun; executed on Hitler's orders in garden of Reich Chancellery, late April 1945. pp. 1125, 1314, 1631.

FILOFF, Bogdan—Bulgarian Professor of Archaeology who became Prime Minister of Bulgaria and signed Tripartite (Axis) Pact on 1 March 1941. p. 1640.

FISCHBOECK, Hans—First Nazi Minister of Commerce and Transport, 1938; Commissioner General for Finance and Economics in occupied Holland, 1940; Reich Price Commissioner, 1942; SS Oberfuehrer; member of the Reichstag. p. 1443.

FISCHER—Governor of Warsaw in General Government of Poland under Hans Frank. pp. 1373, 1375, 1376.

FLICK, Friedrich—Proprietor and head of large group of German industrial enterprises (coal and iron mines, steel producing and fabricating plants), including Friedrich Flick, K. G.; one of leading financiers and industrialists who from 1932 contributed large sums to the Nazi Party; "Wehrwirtschaftsfuehrer," 1938 (title awarded to prominent industrialists for merit in armaments drive—"Military Economy Leader"); member of "Circle of Friends" of Himmler who contributed large sums to the SS; member of the Nazi Party. p. 1597.

FORD, Henry—Pioneer American industrialist who developed system of mass production; founder of the Ford Motor Co., 1903, and president of same, 1903-1919 and 1943-1945; died in 1945. p. 1423.

FRANCO, BRAHAMONDE, Generalissimo Francisco ("El Caudillo")—Chief of the General Staff of the Spanish Army, 1935; Commander of the Nationalist (rebel) forces which deposed the Republican Government of Spain and seized power, 1936; Chief of the Spanish State and Generalissimo, 1936; President of Spain, 1939; in 1942 took title, "President of the Political Junta of the Falange." pp. 1098, 1099, 1107, 1183, 1214, 1506, 1634.

FRANCOIS-PONCET, André—French Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Tardieu cabinet, 1930; Under Secretary of State to the Premier's office in the Laval cabinet, 1931; Ambassador to Germany, 1931-1938; to Italy, 1938-1940; Member of the National Council, 1941; Controller General of the Press, 1942; arrested by the Gestapo, 1943; liberated by Allied armies, May 1945. p. 1494.

FRANK, August—SS Gruppenfuehrer and Lt. Gen. of Waffen SS; senior official and direct subordinate of Pohl in SS Economic and Administration Office (WVHA) until November 1944, when he was appointed head of the Army Administration Division after purge following the 20 July 1944 attempt.

pp. 1585, 1591, 1602, 1603.

FRANK, Hans—Leading Nazi Party lawyer who became Bavarian Minister of Justice, 1932; Leader of Nazi Lawyers' Bund, 1933–1942; Governor General of Poland, 1939–1945; Reichsleiter until 1942; Reich Minister without Portfolio; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; member of the Reichstag; President of the International Chamber of Law, 1941–1942; President of the Academy of German Law; (not to be confused with Karl Hermann Frank, agitator in the Sudeten German Nazi Party and Nazi member of the Czech Parliament before 1938 who became Higher SS and Police Fuehrer for the Sudetenland and the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia after German invasion; German Minister of State in the Protectorate; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; Member of the People's Court; member of the Reichstag). pp. 1126, 1127, 1348, 1349, 1356–1400, 1564, 1573, 1574.

FRICK, Wilhelm—Early Nazi agitator who participated in 1923 Munich putsch but escaped imprisonment; Reich Minister of the Interior, 1933–1943 (succeeded by Himmler); Reich Protector of Bohemia and Noravia (succeeding Heydrich), 1943–1945; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; Reichsleiter; Member of the Reichstag and head of Nazi Parliamentary Group in Reichstag; Member of Ministerial Court for Defense of the Reich. pp. 1400–1420, 1427, 1590.

FRIEDEBURG, Admiral Hans Georg von—Commander-in-Chief of German U-Boats, 1943–1945; succeeded Doenitz as operating Commander of the German Navy when Doenitz became Head of the German State on Hitler's death, May 1945; sent by Doenitz as emissary to Montgomery on 3 May 1945 with first offer of German surrender; signed instrument of surrender with Jodl at Rheims on 7 May 1945. p. 1282.

FRIEDRICHS, Helmut—Deputy Head of Nazi Party Chancery and Head of Section for Internal Party Affairs therein (subordinate of Bormann); SS Gruppenfuehrer; member of the Reichstag. p. 1645.

FRITSCH, Col. Gen. Werner, Baron, von—Commander-in-Chief of the German Army from 1935 who was dismissed from his command on a fabricated charge in February 1938 (succeeded by Brauchitsch); sought and found death in battle before Warsaw, September 1939. pp. 1088–1090, 1100–1102, 1548.

FRITZSCHE, Hans—Chief Editor of DNB (German News Agency), 1933; Head of Home Press Division in Propaganda Ministry, 1940; Plenipotentiary for Political Supervision of Broadcasting in Greater Germany and Head of Broadcasting Division in Propaganda Ministry, under Goebbels, 1943; official radio commentator on program, "Hans Fritzsch Speaks." pp. 1509–1513.

FROMM, Col. Gen. Fritz—Chief of Army Equipment and Commander of the Replacement Training ("Home") Army from 1939 until 20 July 1944, when he was replaced by Himmler; although his last-moment refusal to order out his troops helped foil the July plot, of which he was informed but in which he did not participate actively, he was arrested by the Gestapo, tortured, and executed. pp. 1270, 1570, 1572.

FUNK, Walter—Reich Press Chief and Under Secretary in the Ministry of Propaganda, 1933–1937; member of the Reichstag, 1932–1933; Minister of Economics (succeeding Schacht), 1937; President of the Reichsbank (succeeding Schacht), 1939; Member of the Ministerial Council for the Defense of the Reich, as Plenipotentiary for Economics; Vice President of the Reich Chamber of Culture. pp. 1087, 1387, 1582, 1584–1590.

GAUS, Friedrich Wilhelm—German Ambassador at special disposal of the Foreign Office from 1943; previously head of Legal Division of Foreign Office. p. 1226.

GESSLER, Otto Karl—Minister of War during Weimar Republic, 1920–1928; interned in Dachau Concentration Camp, 1944. p. 1553.

GISEVIUS, Hans Bernd—Former official of Ministry of Interior, member of Gestapo, and Abwehr official who became one of leaders in German resistance movement; one of few survivors of 20 July 1944 attempt, after which he escaped to Switzerland. pp. 1554–1556, 1561.

GLAISE-HORSTENAU, Lt. Gen. Edmund von—Member of Austrian Council of State, 1934; Austrian Minister without Portfolio, 1936; was Nazi sympathizer who helped bring about Anschluss and became Austrian Vice-Chancellor under Seyss-Inquart, 1938; General in charge of Prisoners of War in German High Command; German General Plenipotentiary in Croatia, 1943; member of the Reichstag; SA Gruppenfuehrer. pp. 1131, 1182.

GLOBOCNIK, Odilo—Leading Nazi agitator in Austria who became Gauleiter of Carinthia and member of SS, 1933; Chief of Staff of Nazi Party Directorate in Austria and Gauleiter of Vienna, 1938; Commander of SS and Police in Lublin District of General Government of Poland, 1939; transferred to North Yugoslavia, 1942; SS Gruppenfuehrer and Lt. Gen. of Police; member of the Reichstag. p. 1396.

GLUECKS, Richard—SS Gruppenfuehrer and Lt. Gen. of Waffen SS who succeeded Eiche as commander of concentration camps, 1940–1941; Chief of Amtsgruppe D of WVHA (SS Economic and Administration Head Office); Inspector General of SS “Death’s Head Formations” (concentration camp guards). pp. 1300, 1304, 1315, 1581, 1582, 1590, 1591, 1593, 1595, 1596, 1604.

GOEBBELS, Paul Josef—Reich Minister of Propaganda; member of Secret Cabinet Council; Nazi Party Propaganda Leader; President of Reich Chamber of Culture; Gauleiter of Berlin; member of the Reichstag; Chairman of Inter-Ministerial Committee on Air Raid Damage Relief; took initiative in suppressing 20 July 1944 putsch in Berlin and became Plenipotentiary for Total War Effort, 25 July 1944; founder and editor of Nazi paper in Berlin, “Der Angriff”; appointed Reich Chancellor in Hitler’s political testament, 29 April 1945; committed suicide in Hitler's air-raid bunker, May 1945. pp. 1275, 1282, 1297-1299, 1302, 1460, 1512, 1513, 1655.

GOERDELER, Carl Friedrich—Reich Price Control Commissioner, 1931-1936; resigned as Mayor of Leipzig in protest against Nazi anti-Semitic measures, 1936; principal civilian leader of German resistance movement; arrested after failure of 20 July 1944 attempt; tortured and executed at Ploetzensee on 2 February 1945; was to have been Chancellor of new government if 20 July 1944 plot had succeeded. pp. 1554, 1568, 1571.

GOERING, Reichsmarshall Hermann Wilhelm—German flying ace in World War I who became early follower of Hitler and took part in the 1923 Munich putsch; SA Obergruppenfuehrer and first leader of the SA; President of the Reichstag, 1932-1945; Prime Minister of Prussia and President of Prussian State Council, 1933; Commander-in-Chief of the Luftwaffe, 1935-1945; Reich Minister for Air; Trustee for the Four Year Plan, 1936; designated successor to Hitler and No. 2 official in Nazi regime, 1 September 1939; Chairman of Ministerial Council for Defense of the Reich; member of Secret Cabinet Council; as holder of special title of Richsmarshall, 1940, highest ranking officer in German Armed Forces; head of the Hermann Goering Works; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; founder of the Gestapo and concentration camp system as Prussian Minister of the Interior, 1933; dismissed from all his offices and right of succession and arrested on Hitler's order for attempting to take power in late April, 1945; denounced for treason and expelled from Nazi Party in Hitler's political testament, 29 April 1945; committed suicide after being condemned to death at Nurnberg, October 1946. pp. 1087-1154, 1161-1166, 1169, 1172, 1203, 1239, 1266, 1272, 1274, 275, 1277, 1281, 1289, 1298, 1312, 1328, 1329, 1338, 1339, 1363, 1367, 1381, 1382, 1387-1389, 1393, 1394-1398, 1399, 1413, 1442, 1453, 1458, 1477, 1484, 1543, 1641, 1642, 1664.

GOLTZ, Maj. Gen. Ruediger, Count von der—German General Staff officer in World War I. p. 1289.

GRAEVENITZ, Maj. Gen. Hans von—Assistant to Reinecke in OKW General Office; head of Division of Welfare and Pensions in OKW General Office. pp. 1606, 1612, 1619, 1620, 1641, 1642, 1646, 1647.

GRANT, Madison—American lawyer and writer; Vice President of Immigration Restriction League; Trustee of Eugenics Research Association, author of "The Passing of the Great Race," 1916, and various works on zoological subjects. p. 1423.

GREIM, Field Marshal Robert, Ritter (Knight), von—Chief of Air Force Personnel, 1937; directed air attacks against Great Britain, 1940; directed air operations on Eastern Front, 1941-1944; Commander of 6th Air Fleet with headquarters at Munich, 1945; promoted by Hitler to Field Marshal and successor to Goering as Commander-in-Chief of the Luftwaffe, April 1945; committed suicide after capture in June 1945. pp. 1280, 1281.

GROENER, Gen. Wilhelm—Chief of Staff to Hindenburg in World War I, 1918–1919; with Hindenburg deposed the Kaiser and approved acceptance by Germany of the Versailles Treaty; Minister of War and of Interior under Weimar Republic, 1928–1932, and in this capacity prohibited the SA. p. 1438.

GROSSKURTH, Lt. Col. Hans August—Chief of Section 2 of Abwehr in charge of commando activity, 1939–1940 (succeeded by Lahousen); Deputy Corps Commander in Crimea, 1942; Chief of Staff of 9th Army Corps in Russia; captured at Stalingrad and died in captivity, March 1943; was one of a group of officers involved in early plotting to overthrow Hitler (1939). p. 1568.

GUDERIAN, Col. Gen. Heinz—As Commander-in-Chief of all Panzer Troops, played leading part in Polish campaign, 1939; Inspector General of Panzer Troops, 1943, in charge of tank and motorized armor units of German Army; appointed Chief of Staff of Army (OKH) (succeeding Col. Gen. Kurt Zeitzler) in July 1944 after putsch of which he had been informed in advance, which he originally tacitly approved, but which he helped defeat at a critical stage; member of Tribunal which tried participants in 20 July 1944 putsch; succeeded as Chief of the General Staff by Krebs, February 1945. p. 1280.

GUERTNER, Franz—Reich Minister of Justice in Papen cabinet of 1932 and Schleicher cabinet of 1932–1933; although not a Nazi, was appointed Minister of Justice by Hitler on Hindenburg's insistence, and served from 1933 until 1941; died in 1941; succeeded by Otto Georg Thierack, 1942. pp. 1358, 1362, 1450, 1451, 1455.

HABICHT, Theodor—German who led Nazi agitation and uprisings in Austria as Provincial Inspector of Nazi Party for Austria, appointed by Hitler in 1931; a leader of the "Austrian Legion" formed in Germany, 1933; involved in murder of Dollfuss, July 1934, and dismissed from his post for indiscretions connected therewith. pp. 1145, 1146, 1149, 1326, 1505.

HAEFTEN, Lt. Werner von—Adjutant to Stauffenberg; went with Stauffenberg to Hitler's Headquarters at "Wolfschanze" in Rastenburg, East Prussia, on 20 July 1944 and arranged getaway while Stauffenberg placed bomb next to Hitler; executed summarily on order of Fromm after plot failed that evening; brother, Hans Bernd von Haeften, a Legation Counsellor in the Foreign Office and also a member of the resistance movement, was arrested by the Gestapo shortly afterwards and executed in August 1944. p. 1270.

HAGELIN—Quisling's deputy in Germany, 1939–140, for purpose of collaborating with Germans on forthcoming invasion of Norway; subsequently assistant to Quisling during occupation. p. 1328.

HALDER, Col. Gen. Franz—Quartermaster General of Army General Staff, 1937; Chief of General Staff of the Army, 1938–1942 (succeeding Back); retired in 1942 (succeeded by Col. Gen. Kurt Zeitzler); as Bavarian monarchist, was opposed to Hitler's policies and made cautious and indecisive plans with the underground to depose Hitler in 1938–1939 but was unwilling ing to take initiative; his constant procrastination was largely responsible for failure to execute these early plots. pp. 1547-1575.

HALIFAX, Earl of (Edward Frederick Lindley Wood)—British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 1938-1940; British Ambassador in Washington, 1941-1946. pp. 1105, 1151.

HAMILTON, Duke of (Marquess of Clydesdale) (Douglas-Douglas Hamilton)—Premier Peer of Scotland; Chief Pilot of Mount Everest Flight Expedition, 1933; when Hess parachuted from a plane over the Scottish moors near Dungavel on 10 May 1941 he hoped to see Hamilton and through him make peace with King George VI; Hess and Hamilton knew nothing of each other except for a brief meeting at dinner in Berlin during the 1936 Olympic Games. pp. 1168, 1169, 1250.

HAMMERSTEIN-EQUORD, Gen. Kurt, Baron von—Anti-Nazi supporter of Weimar Republic who was Commander-in-Chief of the German Army from 1930 until 1934, when he was forced to resign by Blomberg and retired from the Army; one of military leaders in underground movement; died natural death, 1943. pp. 1460, 1547.

HASE, Lt. Gen. Paul von—Commandant of 3d Military District (Berlin); supporter of 20 July 1944 conspiracy; arrested by Gestapo afterwards. p. 1561.

HASSELL, Ulrich von—German Ambassador to Italy, 1932-1937; replaced as ambassador of Axis and Hitler's aggressive policies; thereafter became diplomatic adviser to and one of leaders of anti-Nazi underground; took part in 20 July 1944 plot, and if plot had succeeded and surrender negotiations were undertaken first with Western Allies, was to have been Foreign Minister of new German government; after failure of 20 July attempt was arrested by the Gestapo, tried and condemned by the People's Court, and executed in September 1944. pp. 1568, 1572.

HAUSHOFER, Albrecht—Son of Karl Haushofer; Professor of Geopolitics at University of Berlin; at one time was a Nazi on Ribbentrop's and later on Papen's staffs; later joined underground and was implicated in 20 July 1944 attempt; caught while trying to escape to Switzerland, imprisoned, and executed without trial by the SS in April 1945. p. 1167.

HAUSHOFER, Prof. Karl—Retired general; President of Society for Geopolitics; Publisher of periodical, "Die Geopolitik"; lecturer at Munich University, where Hess was his favorite disciple; through Hess his doctrines of German expansionism were communicated to Hitler and became part of Nazi program; although his wife was partly Jewish, Hess shielded them from Party action until his flight to England; thereafter both Haushofer and his wife were sent to a concentration camp; both committed suicide in 1946. pp. 1160, 1163-1167, 1169, 1170.

HEINRICI, Col. Gen. Gotthard—Commander of German 4th Army, 1942, and participated in Russian campaign; succeeded Himmler as Commander of the Army Group Vistula, which was fighting west of Berlin in late April 1945; was ordered by

- Hitler to come to relief of besieged Berlin on 28 April but was unable to do so. pp. 1279, 1281, 1282.
- HELLDORF, Wolf Heinrich, Count von—Berlin Chief of Police (Order Police); an early supporter of Hitler and SA leader who staged anti-Jewish demonstrations in Berlin; later became opposed to Nazi regime and joined resistance movement; after failure of 20 July 1944 plot was arrested and executed in August 1944. pp. 1177, 1453, 1553, 1561.
- HEMMEN, Hans Richard—German Foreign Office official with rank of Minister who specialized in economic affairs and negotiation of trade agreements; was attached to German occupation headquarters in France. pp. 1575–1580.
- HENDERSON, Sir Neville—British Minister to Yugoslavia, 1929–1935; Ambassador to Germany, 1937–1939; died in 1942. pp. 1216, 1224, 1471, 1486.
- HENKE (HENCKE), Andor—Professional diplomat who was head of Political Division of German Foreign Office; Head of German delegation to German-Soviet Central Committee for Frontier Problems, 1939; attached to German embassy in Madrid as Minister, 1943. p. 1296.
- HERZL, Theodor—Hungarian-Jewish author who in 1896 published his famous pamphlet, “Der Judenstaat”; founder Zionist or Jewish Nationalist movement in Basle, 1897, with goal of a Jewish homeland in Palestine; died in 1904. pp. 1425, 1427, 1435.
- HESS, Rudolf—Joined Nazi Party in 1920 and became Hitler’s private secretary; after 1923 Munich putsch was sentenced to imprisonment with Hitler in Landsberg fortress, where Hitler wrote “Mein Kampf,” dictating most of it to Hess; designated second in line of succession to Hitler (after Goering), 1 September 1939; author of slogan, “Guns instead of Butter”; Deputy of the Fuehrer for all Party Affairs; Reich Minister without Portfolio; Head of the Party Chancery; Member of the Secret Cabinet Council; Member of the Reichstag; flew to England, 10 May 1941, and was interned during remainder of war (succeeded by Bormann). pp. 1090, 1145, 1148, 1154–1174, 1198, 1250, 1271–1273, 1297, 1484, 1515.
- HEYDRICH, Reinhard—As Chief of the Security Police and SD and head of RSHA was Himmler’s chief assistant until 1942 (succeeded by Kalterbrunner); Reich Protector for Bohemia and Moravia, 1941 (succeeding Neurath), where he earned title of “The Hangman”; in revenge for his assassination in Prague in May 1942 the Czech village of Lidice was obliterated, its men murdered, its women sent to concentration camps, and its children scattered throughout the continent. pp. 1300, 1324, 1363, 1582, 1583, 1602, 1603.
- HIERMER, Ernst—Chief Editor of Streicher’s periodical, “Der Stuermer”. pp. 1426, 1428, 1431, 1433, 1436.
- HIMMLER, Heinrich—Formerly an agriculturalist; was an early Nazi follower and took part in the 1923 Munich putsch under Roehm; as Reichsfuehrer SS took leading part in liquidation of Roehm, Gregor Strasser, Schleicher and others on 30 June 1934; Chief of the German Police; Reichminister of the Interior, 1943 (succeeding Frick); Member of Ministerial Council for Defense of the Reich; Reich Commissar for the Strengthening of German Folkdom; Military Chief of the Volkssturm; Reichsleiter; Chief of Army Equipment and Commander of the Replacement Training Army (succeeding Fromm) after 20 July 1944; Chief of the Waffen SS; Commanding General of Army Group Vistula on Eastern Front, February 1945 (succeeded by Heinrici, April 1945); toyed with plans to succeed Hitler after military putsch, 1943–1944, but finally rejected them and helped suppress 20 July 1944 plot; in spring of 1945, assisted by Schellenberg, made unsuccessful peace overtures to Western Allies through Bernadotte; expelled from Party and dismissed from all his offices by Hitler in his political testament of 29 April 1945, and ordered arrested for treason; committed suicide after capture by British troops, May 1945. pp. 1120–1126, 1128, 1203, 1205, 1206, 1287, 1289, 1290, 1298–1306, 1308, 1310–1317, 1320–1322, 1324, 1351–1353, 1358, 1363, 1365–1367, 1369–1371, 1376–1378, 1380, 1384, 1396, 1424, 1482, 1583, 1584, 1564, 1574, 1575, 1580, 1581, 1583, 1584, 1587–1592, 1595–1601, 1604, 1610, 1622, 1629–1634, 1641, 1642, 1644, 1662, 1670.

HINDENBURG (von BENECKENDORFF und von HINDENBURG), Lt. Gen. Oskar—Son and aide of the Field Marshal; suspected of intriguing with Nazis and influencing his father to accept Hitler as Chancellor, 1933; Commander of Prisoner of War Camps in 1st Military District during World War II. pp. 1456, 1465, 1477, 1481, 1482.

HINDENBURG (von BENECKENDORFF und von HINDENBURG), Field Marshal Paul—World War I German military leader who dethroned the Kaiser; President of Germany, 1925–1934; died on 2 August 1934 leaving a political testament indicating, in passages suppressed by the Nazis when the document was published, a wish not to have Hitler succeed him as President. pp. 1177, 1360, 1363–1365, 1410, 1411, 1449–1452, 1454–1467, 1476–1483, 1517.

HITLER, Adolf—German Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor; Commander-in-Chief of the German Armed Forces; Commander-in-Chief of the Army; Fuehrer of the National Socialist German Workers' (Nazi) Party; born in Braunau, Austria, in 1889; in November 1923 staged unsuccessful attempt at coup d'état in Munich beerhall and was sentenced to 5 years imprisonment in Landsberg fortress, where with Hess he wrote "Mein Kampf" (published in 1925); released from prison in December 1924 and recommenced political agitation; in 1930 obtained German citizenship; in 1932 candidate for President against Hindenburg and was defeated; during new elections in July 1932 carried on energetic campaign resulting in offer of post of Vice Chancellor which he refused; on 30 January 1933 was appointed Chancellor on resignation of Schleicher; in June 1934 liquidated "unreliable" elements of Party ("Roehm Purge"); in August 1934, on death of Hindenburg, became head of state; in February 1938 dismissed Blomberg and Fritsch and assumed command of Wehrmacht; in September 1939 first unsuccessful attempt on his life was made in Munich; in December 1941 dismissed Brauchitsch and took over personal command of Army operations; on 20 July 1944 second unsuccessful attempt on his life occurred at his military headquarters in Rastenburg, East Prussia; on 29 April 1945 married Eva Braun in air-raid bunker in Berlin; on following day committed suicide in bunker. pp. 1088-1105, 1107-1122, 1127, 1128, 1131-1136, 1138, 1140-1154, 1157-1163, 1167, 1168, 1174-1220, 1222-1229, 1231-1233, 1235-1244, 1247-1257, 1259-1264, 1267, 1270-1299, 1302, 1305-1307, 1310, 1311, 1314, 1316-1319, 1321-1323, 1326-1334, 1336-1344, 1346, 1348, 1351, 1355-1360, 1363-1369, 1371, 1373, 1374, 1376-1378, 1380-1382, 1393, 1394, 1396, 1398, 1399, 1401-1403, 1407-1418, 1421-1425, 1427-1429, 1431, 1432, 1438-1443, 1445, 1446, 1449, 1452-1455, 1457-1461, 1463, 1464, 1466-1473, 1475-1492, 1494-1498, 1500-1506, 1508-1511, 1514, 1515, 1517, 1519, 1521, 1526-1528, 1533-1544, 1547-1574, 1576, 1578, 1599, 1609, 1610, 1621, 1622, 1629-1633, 1635-1642, 1644, 1648, 1650, 1651, 1655, 1665, 1670, 1672, 1675, 1676.

HOEPNER (HOEPPNER), Col. Gen. Erich—Tank warfare expert who commanded first German armored corps and served in Polish, French, and Russian campaigns; courtmartialed in July 1942 for advocating retreat during Russian campaign against Hitler's orders, and was dismissed from service; an active member of resistance movement and after 20 July 1944 was arrested, tried and condemned by the People's Court, and tortured and executed in August, 1945. p. 1270.

HOESS, Rudolf Franz Ferdinand—Commandant of Auschwitz Concentration Camp, 1940-1943, during which period 3,000,000 persons were exterminated there; previous experience at Dachau and Sachsenhausen concentration camps; member of SS, Waffen SS, and Deathshead Formations; Chief of Amt I in Amt Group D of WVHA (SS Economic and Administration Head Office), 1943-1945. pp. 1581-1583, 1590-1592, 1601.

HOFACKER, Lt. Col. Caesar von—Staff officer under Kluge as Commander-in-Chief in the West; member of resistance movement who acted as liaison between Beck-Goerdeler group of conspirators in Berlin and Stuelpnagel-Kluge group in Paris, in preparation for 20 July 1944 attempt. pp. 1268-1270.

HORTHY de NAGYBANYA, Admiral Nicholas Vitéz—Captain in Austro-Hungarian Navy in World War I; Rear Admiral in Command of Fleet, 1918; War Minister in Hungarian Szeged Government, 1919, and suppressor of Communist Revolution of Bela Kuhn; later Commander-in-Chief of Hungarian National Army; Regent of Hungary, 1920-1944; arrested by order of Hitler and taken to Germany as prisoner after Nazi-supported Ferenc Szalasi seized power in October 1944. pp. 1208-1211, 1292.

HOSSBACH, Lt. Gen. Friedrich—As Colonel was adjutant to Hitler, 1937; Commanding Officer of 82nd Infantry Regiment, 1938; took part in French campaign, 1940; Commander of 31st Infantry Division, 1942; Commander of 46th Panzer Corps in Balkan and Russian campaigns, 1943-1944. pp. 1088, 1089.

HUGENBERG, Alfred—Leading German publisher and chairman of German Nationalist (conservative) Party whom Hitler took into his cabinet as Minister of Economics and Food Supply in January 1933; controlled the conservative Scherl Publishing House and was principal shareholder of the motion picture concern, UFA; forced to resign in June 1933, when Nationalist Party was dissolved. p. 1523.

HUNTZIGER, Gen. Charles—As Head of French Commission, signed armistice with Germany at Compiegne, 22 June 1940, and with Italy two days later; Minister of Defense and Commander-in-Chief of French Army (succeeding Gen. Maxime Weygandt) in Petain's Vichy Government; died in airplane accident in 1941. pp. 1576-1578.

INNITZER, Theodor, Cardinal—Roman Catholic Archbishop of the Church Province of Vienna and Bishop of the Diocese of Vienna; incurred Nazi wrath for support of the Dollfuss and Schusschnigg governments; after German occupation of Austria issued proclamation with other Austrian bishops endorsing National Socialism and urging approval of Anschluss in Nazi plebiscite; reprimanded by Pope Pius XI and obliged to make partial retraction, suppressed by Nazi censors. pp. 1150, 1469.

JESCHONNECK, Col. Gen. Hans—Chief of Staff of the Luftwaffe, February 1939–November 1943 (preceded by Gen. Stumpff, succeeded by Gen. Korten). p. 1108.

JODL, Col. Gen. Alfred—As Chief of the Armed Forces Operations Staff of the OKW, was Hitler's chief adviser on military strategy and planning, August 1939–May 1945; signed instrument of surrender on behalf of Germany at Rheims, 7 May 1945. pp. 1108, 1109, 1111–1113, 1266, 1274, 1276–1279, 1281–1283, 1287, 1293, 1535, 1537–1539, 1560, 1561, 1635–1637.

KALTENBRUNNER, Ernst—Austrian Nazi who was commander of SS in Austria, 1933–1934; was imprisoned for part in putsch in which Dollfuss was murdered, 1934; SS and Police Leader for Ostmark and Chief of Security in Seyss-Inquart Government, 1938; Chief of the Security Police and SD, and head of the RSHA, January 1943–May 1945 (succeeding Heydrich); member of the Reichstag; SS Obergruppenfuehrer. pp. 1295–1325, 1599–1603, 1621, 1622, 1625, 1631, 1633.

KAMMLER, Ing—Chief of Works and Buildings Section of WVHA (SS Economic and Administration Head Office); SS Gruppenfuehrer and Lt. Gen. of Police; thought to have had charge of production of V2 rockets. p. 1593.

KATZMANN, Friedrich—Before 1939 in administration of concentration camps; SS and Police Leader for District of Radom (Poland), 1940; SS and Police Leader for District of Galicia (Poland), 1941; Higher SS and Police Leader of 20th Military District, 1943–1945; SS Gruppenfuehrer and Lt. Gen. of Police; Member of the People's Tribunal. p. 1600.

KEITEL, Field Marshal Wilhelm—Chief of the High Command of the Armed Forces (OKW) and deputy to the Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces (Hitler), February 1938-May 1945; conducted French armistice negotiations at Compiegne and signed for Germany, June 1940; member of Cabinet with rank of Reich minister; member of Secret Cabinet Council; member of Ministerial Council for Defense of the Reich; signed instrument of surrender on behalf of Germany at Berlin, 10 May 1945. pp. 1109, 1111-1113, 1256-1294, 1316, 1321, 1378, 1476, 1533, 1535-1540, 1542, 1544, 1546, 1560, 1561, 1575-1577, 1606, 1607, 1610, 1614, 1615, 1617, 1619, 1636, 1641-1644, 1646-1650, 1665, 1672.

KEPPLER, Wilhelm—German industrialist who became official in Ministry of Economics and economic adviser to Hitler, 1933; sent by Hitler as German representative to World Economics Conference in London, 1933; Under Secretary for Special Duties in Foreign Office; dispatched to Vienna on 11 March 1938 to put pressure on Schusschnigg to agree to Anschluss; Senior official in Four Year Plan, in charge of raw and “ersatz” materials; chairman of numerous Reich-controlled industrial firms; member of the Reichstag; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; head of the “Circle of Friends” of Himmler. pp 1138-1135, 1467.

KERSTEN, Felix—Swedish physiotherapist who, as Himmler’s masseur, became influential confidant of the Reichsfuehrer SS. pp. 1629, 1630.

KESSELRING, Field Marshal Albert—Chief of Staff of the Luftwaffe, 1936; Commander of an Air Fleet in Polish campaign, 1939; Commander of Air Fleet II in Dutch campaign and against Britain, 1940; Military Commander in the Mediterranean Area, 1941; Commander-in-Chief of German Forces in Italy and Military Commander of Italy, 1943-1945 (succeeded by Vietinghoff); Commander-in-Chief West, March 1945 (succeeding Rundstedt); tried by British Military Commission for war crimes, including 1944 massacre of hostages at Ardeatine Caves in Rome; was convicted and condemned to death, but sentence was commuted to life imprisonment, July 1947. pp. 1647, 1650, 1653-1657, 1659, 1661-1665, 1667, 1669-1674.

KLUGE, Field Marshal Guenther von—Commander of 4th Army in Poland, 1939; Commander of Army Group Center (succeeding Field Marshal Fedor von Bock), formed for attack on Russia, June 1941; Commander-in-Chief on Western Front, July 1944 (succeeding Rundstedt) until August 1944, when Rundstedt resumed command; a vacillating member of the resistance movement, he refused to carry out his assignment to seize control of the German administration in Paris, on learning that Hitler had survived the bomb explosion on 20 July 1944; was thereafter dismissed of command in West; when his attempt to surrender to Gen. Patton proved unsuccessful, committed suicide in August 1944 to escape arrest by Gestapo. p. 1262.

KOERNER, Paul—Personal Secretary to Goering in Prussian Ministry of Interior, 1933; State Secretary to Plenipotentiary for Four Year Plan (Goering); Prussian State Councillor; member of the Reichstag; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Hermann Goering Works. p. 1329.

KOPKOW—SS Hauptsturmfuehrer (captain); head of section A2 of Amt IV of RSHA section of Gestapo in charge of defense against sabotage, combatting of sabotage, political falsification). p. 1308.

KOPPE, Wilhelm—Higher SS and Police Fuehrer and State Secretary for Security in General Government of Poland from November 1943, succeeding Krueger; SS Obergruppenfuehrer and General of Police; member of the Reichstag. pp. 1380, 1384.

KRANEFUSS—SS Brigadefuehrer; assistant to Himmler who specialized in economic spoliation of occupied territories and building up financial reserves of SS. pp. 1598, 1599.

KRANKE, Admiral—Participated in planning of "Weseruebung", the plan for invasion of Norway. pp. 1539, 1541.

KREBS, Col. Gen. Hans—Took part in Western campaign, 1940, and invasion of Russia on central sector in June 1941; Chief of Staff of German 9th Army under Model, 1942-1943; Chief of Staff of the Army (OKH), February-May 1945 (succeeding Guderian), and was with Hitler in the air-raid bunker during siege of Berlin; attempted to negotiate armistice with Field Marshal Zhukov of Red Army after Hitler's death but was unwilling to accept Russian terms, 1 May 1945; was witness to Hitler's political testament, 29 April 1945. pp. 1280, 1290, 1291.

KRETSCHMANN, Ernst—General Labor Fuehrer; Representative of Plenipotentiary for Manpower (Sauckel); President of the Labor Service Office for Hessen-Nassau; Reich Trustee for Labor in Rhein Main. p. 1662.

KRUEGER, Walter—SS Gruppenfuehrer; Higher SS and Police Fuehrer and State Secretary for Security in General Government of Poland until November 1943 (succeeded by Koppe); thereafter Commander of SS Panzer-Grenadier Division, "Das Reich" on Russian Front; killed by Polish patriots. pp. 1376, 1380.

KRUPP von BOHLEN und HALBACH, Gustav—After marrying Bertha Krupp, Krupp family heiress, in 1905, took Krupp name and became head of Krupp industrial enterprises; Chairman of Board of Friedrich Krupp, A.G., (munitions works); secretly manufactured armaments in violation of Versailles Treaty during 1920's; one of leading German industrialists whose financial aid helped bring Hitler to power; Chairman of Reich Association of German Industry, 1933; Leader of War Production, 1937, and thereafter made large contributions to Nazi Party and organizations; awarded Party's Golden Badge of Honor for services to the Reich, 1940; by special decree of Hitler in 1943 Krupp Works were transformed into private family concern controlled in perpetuity by a single member of the family, in recognition of services to Reich; in 1943 control of Krupp Works passed to Krupp's son, Alfred, formerly President, and a member of the Nazi Party. p. 1594.

LACKNER, Lt. Gen. Walter—Commanding General of 10th

Flight Division of the Luftwaffe; participated in invasion of Norway, 1940. p. 1543.

LAHOUSEN, Maj. Gen. Erwin—Chief of Section II of Abwehr in charge of commando activity under Canaris (succeeding Grosskurth), 1940–1943; as an opponent of Hitler, joined Canaris and other Abwehr officers (Col. Georg Hansen, Col. Pieck-enbrock, Oster) in sabotaging Hitler's orders for the conduct of warfare contrary to the laws of war. p. 1607, 1611–1618.

LAMMERS, Hans Heinrich—Reich Minister and Head of the Reich Chancery, and as such, chief administrative and legal adviser to Hitler; member and secretary of Secret Cabinet Council and Ministerial Council for Defense of Reich; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; Prussian State Councillor; Member of Academy of German Law; with Bormann constituted a kind of palace guard around Hitler, gradually obtaining more power, and hence in conflict with Goering, Goebbels, and other ministers; gradually elbowed out by Bormann; arrested with Goering on Hitler's order, April 1945. pp. 1330, 1375, 1381, 1396, 1456.

LAVAL, Pierre—French Foreign Minister 1934–1936; with Sir Samuel Hoare, British Foreign Secretary, concluded the Hoare-Laval Accord recognizing Italian conquest of Ethiopia and recommending cession of certain Ethiopian provinces to Italy, 1935; Foreign Minister in Petain's Vichy Government, 1940; Premier, 1942; most notorious of French collaborators with Germans; convicted of treason and after attempt to commit suicide was executed by firing squad in Fresnes Prison, October 1945. pp. 1219, 1244, 1445.

LEOPOLD, Capt. Josef—Leading Nazi agitator in Austria working for Anschluss, 1938. p. 1475.

LEY, Robert—Leader of German Labor Front (DAF); Reichsleiter and Chief of Party Organization; Reich Housing Commission; SA Obergruppenfuehrer; Head of Organization of Reich Party Rallies; committed suicide in Nurnberg prison, October 1945. pp. 1332, 1514–1521.

LEYSER, Ernst-Ludwig—Deputy Gauleiter of Westmark (formerly Rheinpfalz) from 1933; SS Brigadefuehrer; member of the Reichstag. p. 1655.

LIEBEL, Willi—Oberbuergermeister of Nurnberg from 1933; head of Central Department in Reich Ministry of Armaments, 1942–January 1945; official of German Red Cross; SA Oberfuehrer; member of the Reichstag; member of the People's Tribunal. p. 1399.

LINDEMANN, Karl—President of Reich Chamber of Commerce; Chairman of Board of Directors of Atlas Works and North German Lloyd Steamship Co.; director of Dresdener Bank, Hamburg-American Line, and other large concerns. p. 1597.

LIST, Field Marshal Siegmund Wilhelm Walter—Commander of German 14th Army during Polish campaign, 1939; Commander of 12th Army during Western campaign, 1940; Commander of Army Group A in the Balkans, 1941–1942; Commander-in-Chief Southwest until summer 1942; retired in 1944. p. 1287.

LLOYD-GEORGE, David (First Earl of Dwyfor)—British Liberal Party leader who was President of the Board of Trade, 1905; Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1908–1915; Minister of Munitions, 1915; Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury, 1916–1922 (succeeded by Baldwin); as British representative was, with Wilson, Clemenceau, and Orlando, one of the “Big Four” at Paris Peace Conference, 1919; Leader of the Opposition, 1922; died in March 1945. pp. 1114, 1425.

LOERNER, Georg—Head of Supply Section of WVHA (SS Economic and Administrative Head Office, headed by Pohl;) SS Gruppenfuehrer and Maj. Gen. of Waffen SS. pp. 1585, 1588, 1601, 1604.

MACDONALD, (James) Ramsay—Leader of British Labor Party who was Prime Minister of Great Britain, January–November 1924 and 1929–1935 (succeeding and succeeded by Baldwin both times); author of Geneva Protocol, 1924; Lord President of the Council, 1935–1937; died 9 November 1937. p. 1175.

MAISEL, Maj. Gen. Ernst—Deputy Chief of the Personnel Office of the Army (OKH). pp. 1257–1259, 1263, 1268.

MARTIN, Benno—SS Gruppenfuehrer and Lt. Gen. of Police; Higher SS and Police Fuehrer “Main” (13th Military District), 1942; previously Police President of Nurnberg and head of Gestapo in Nurnberg. p. 1600.

MEISSNER, Otto Lebrecht—Chief of the Presidential Chancery, 1920–1945; Minister of State, 1934; curator of the Political Academy; member of Academy of German Law; was instrumental in persuading Hindenburg to appoint Hitler Reich Chancellor, 1933. pp. 1455, 1465.

MESSERSCHMITT, Wilhelm—Leading figure in German aircraft industry; chairman and director of Messerschmitt, A. G., aircraft works; Vice President of German Academy of Aeronautical Research; awarded title, “Pioneer of Labor”, 1940; “Wehrwirtschaftsfuehrer” (title awarded to prominent industrialists for armaments achievements); professor of engineering. pp. 1162, 1163, 1273.

MIKHAILOVIC, Gen. Dragoliub (“Draja”)—Leader of the Yugoslav Chetniks, who first resisted Germans in Yugoslavia; Minister of War of Yugoslav Government-in-Exile in London and Commander-in-Chief of Free Yugoslav Army, 1942; tried by People’s Court appointed by Tito for treason and collaboration with Germans; condemned and executed, 17 July 1946. pp. 1637–1639.

MILDNER, Rudolf—Colonel of Police; Doctor of Jurisprudence; Chief of Section A5 of Amt IV of RSHA (subdivision of Gestapo); Commander of Security Police in Vienna; formerly Gestapo chief in Chemnitz and Katowice, and Inspector of Security Police and SD in Kassel; Commander of the Security Police and SD in Denmark, 1943. pp. 1300, 1301.

MODEL, Field Marshal Walter—German tank warfare expert who was Chief of Staff of 4th Army Corps during Polish campaign, 1939; Chief of Staff of an army in Western campaign, 1940; Commander of Armored Division in Russia, 1941; Commander of 9th Army in Russia, January 1942–November 1943; Commander of Army Group North on Eastern Front, January 1944–May 1944; May–June 1944 Commander of Army Group North Ukraine; June–September 1944 Commander of Army Group Center of Eastern Front; Commander of Army Group B in the West, September 1944–April 1945 (succeeding Kluge); reported a suicide. p. 1285.

MOLOTOV, Vyacheslav Mikhailovitch (Skryabin)—Soviet People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs since 1939, when he replaced Maxim Litvinov; previously Premier; Vice President of the Council of Ministers of the USSR; member of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the All-Union Communist Party. pp. 1109, 1110, 1187, 1189–1192, 1194, 1243, 1510.

MONTGOMERY OF ALAMEIN, Field Marshal Sir Bernard Law (First Viscount of Hindhead, 1946)—Commander of British 3d Division, 1939; 5th Corps, 1940; 12 Corps, 1941; Southeast Army, 1942; Commander of 8th Army from July 1942 during campaigns in North Africa, Sicily, and Italy; his "Desert Rats" defeated Rommel at El Alamein, November 1942; Commander-in-Chief of British Group of Armies and Allied Armies in Northern France, 1944; Commanded 21st Army Group, 1944–1945; Commander of British Army of the Rhine, 1945–1946; Chief of the Imperial General Staff since 1946. p. 1283.

MORELL, Prof. Dr. Theodor—Hitler's physician and constant companion, 1936–1945; introduced to Hitler by his personal photographer, Heinrich Hoffmann; a quack who made a fortune manufacturing patent nostrums under Nazi patronage; concentrated on treatment by continuous injections of varied drugs and artificial stimulants. p. 1274.

MOSLEY, Sir Oswald Ernald—Formerly a Conservative Member of Parliament for Harrow; Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in the Labor Government, 1929–1939; Leader of the B.F.U. (British Union of Fascists) since 1932; at his secret wedding to Diana Guiness in Munich, December 1937, Hitler was best man; chairman of Mosley Publications, Ltd. p. 1423.

MUELLER, Heinrich—Chief of Amt IV of RSHA (Gestapo) under Heydrich, 1939–1942, under Kaltenbrunner, 1943–1945; SS Gruppenfuehrer and Lt. Gen. of Police; known as one of the most vicious men in SS; secret intriguer against Himmler, his chief. pp. 1300, 1301, 1303, 1304, 1306, 1315, 1317, 1590, 1601, 1602, 1604, 1612–1615, 1622.

MURPHY, Robert Daniel—American diplomat who was counsellor to American Embassy in Paris, 1940; Charge d'Affaires at U. S. mission to Vichy Government, July–August 1940; appointed by Roosevelt to investigate conditions in French North Africa, November 1940; concluded economic accord with Gen. Maxime Weygand, February 1941; effected political preparations for Allied landings in North Africa, November 1942; appointed Roosevelt's Personal Representative, with rank of Minister, to French North Africa, and Chief Civil Affairs Officer on staff of Supreme Commander AFHQ; participated in negotiations for Italian armistice, July–August 1943; U.S.

Political Adviser with rank of Ambassador, AFHQ, October 1943; U. S. Political Adviser for Germany, Supreme Headquarters, AEF, September 1944. p. 1250.

MUSSOLINI, Benito ("Il Duce")—Former Italian editor; as leader of Fascisti (Black Shirts) marched on Rome and seized power in bloodless coup, October 1922; Prime Minister, Chief of Italian Government, and Dictator of Italy, 1922–1943; invaded Ethiopia, 1935; Hitler's partner in Anti-Comintern and Axis Pacts, 1937; First Marshal of Italian Empire, 1938; removed from office and made prisoner by decision of Fascist Grand Council, July 1943; rescued by Skorzeny in October 1943; executed by firing squad of Partisans on 28 April 1945 in village of Dongo on Lake Como. pp. 1097, 1107, 1146, 1147, 1149, 1184, 1191, 1192, 1204, 1314, 1472, 1483, 1492, 1501, 1507, 1653, 1655, 1656, 1675.

MUSY, Alt Bundesrat—Swiss statesman who negotiated with Himmler for large-scale release of Jews in 1944; son of Jean Marie Musy, former President of Swiss National Confederation, 1925, and 1930, who also carried on similar negotiations with Himmler, 1945. p. 1622.

NEUBACHER, Hermann—Engaged in illegal Nazi agitation in Austria and was imprisoned, 1935; on release, employed in Central Office of I. G. Farben, 1936; after Anschluss was first deputy Buergermeister of Vienna, 1938; Special Envoy, with rank of Minister, to Rumania for Economic Questions, 1941; Special Envoy to Greece for Economic Questions, 1941; Nazi Party Political Leader for Vienna, 1941; Special Envoy of Foreign Office in Balkans, 1943. p. 1297.

NEURATH, Constantin H. K., Baron Von—German diplomat who was Ambassador to Denmark, 1919, Italy, 1921–1930, and England, 1930–1932; on 2 June 1932 appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs and continued in office by Hitler; succeeded by Ribbentrop in February 1938 and appointed President of Secret Cabinet Council; first Reich Protector of Bohemia and Moravia, 1939; temporary retirement, 7 September 1941 (succeeded by Heydrich); final retirement, 1944; SS Obergruppenfuehrer; member of the Reichstag; member of Reich Defense Council; Reich Minister without Portfolio. pp. 1089, 1212, 1213, 1368, 1488–1509, 1553.

NIEDERMAYER, Maj. Gen. Prof. Dr. Oskar, Ritter (Knight) von—Commander of 162d German Infantry Division which was engaged in Russian campaign, 1941–1943. pp. 1510, 1511.

NIEMOELLER, Pastor Martin—German U-boat captain in World War I; Evangelical Lutheran clergyman who with others founded the "Confessional Church" as Protestant revivalism of anti-Nazi character; interned in concentration camps at various times, 1937–1945; leader and symbol of Church's resistance to Hitler. p. 1366.

NOSKE, Gustav—Minister of War during Weimar Republic, February 1919–March 1920; head of Province of Hannover from 1933. pp. 1438, 1553.

OHLENDORF, Otto—Manager of Reich Group Trade, 1938–

1943; Chief of Amt III of RSHA (SD Inland—Security Service), part-time, 1939–1945; Chief of Einsatz Group D (unit of Security Police and SD) attached to German 11th Army during invasion of Russia, and responsible for liquidation of 90,000 men, women, and children, 1941–1942; Permanent Deputy to the Under Secretary of Reich Ministry of Economics, 1943–1945; SS Gruppenfuehrer and Lt. Gen. of Police. pp. 1596–1598, 1638.

OLBRICHT, General of Infantry Friedrich—Chief of the General Army Office in OKH; Deputy Commander of the Replacement Training Army (often called Reserve or Home Army) under Fromm; one of military leaders in the resistance movement, which planned that either he or Oster should become Minister of War in new government after Hitler was assassinated and the Nazis deposed; after failure of 20 July 1944 attempt he was executed that night without trial on orders of Fromm. pp. 1270.

ORSENIGO, Monsignor Cesare—Papal Nuncio in Holland, 1922–1925; in Hungary, 1925–1930; in Berlin from 1930, where he was also Dean of the Diplomatic Corps. p. 1238.

OSTER, Maj. Gen. Hans—Chief of the Central Division of the Bureau of Foreign Abwehr and chier assistant to Canaris; one of earliest military leaders of resistance movement; Ministry of War in new government to be established after end of Hitler regime was slated to go either to him or to Olbricht; placed under house arrest before 20 July 1944 attempt; after its failure was imprisoned by Gestapo and executed at Flossenburg concentration camp with Canaris, April 1945. pp. 1551, 1554, 1555, 1558–1560, 1568.

OTT, Lt. Gen. Eugen—German diplomat and general who was head of Far Eastern Section in Ministry of War, 1931; Military Attache in German Embassy in Tokyo, 1934; Ambassador to Japan, 1938–1942. p. 1451.

PAPEN, Franz von—German diplomat who was Military Attaché at German Embassy in Washington and Mexico City, 1913–1915, and was expelled from U.S. for formenting sabotage; as member of Catholic Center Party became Reich Chancellor (succeeding Bruening), 1 June 1932–2 December 1932 (acting pro tem. 17 November–2 December) (succeeded by Schleicher); Vice Chancellor under Hitler, 30 January 1933–August 1934; Reich Commissar for Prussia, January–April 1933; Special Plenipotentiary for the Saar, November 1933–June 1934; negotiator of Concordat with Vatican, concluded 20 July 1933; German Ambassador to Austria, July 1934–February 1938; appointed Plenipotentiary Minister Extraordinary on special mission to Austria by Hitler, July 1936; awarded Golden Party Badge of Honor by Hitler after Anschluss, February 1938; Ambassador to Turkey, April 1939–August 1944. pp. 1130, 1149, 1150, 1167, 1168, 1177, 1410, 1411, 1449–1488.

PAUL (KARAGEORGEVITCH)—Nephew of King Peter I of Serbia; Prince Regent of Yugoslavia, 1934–1941, when Yugoslavia was occupied by Germans; when King Alexander I of Yugoslavia was assassinated at Marseilles in October 1934, his son Crown Prince Peter, aged 11, succeeded to the throne under a regency headed by Paul, as provided by Alexander's will, to last until Peter came of age. pp. 1185, 1640.

PETAIN, Marshal Henri-Philippe—French general who was Ambassador to Spain, 1939–1940; Vice Premier in Reynaud Government, May 1940; Chief of French State at Vichy after surrender to Germany, 1940–1944 (succeeding Paul Reynaud as Premier); tried and convicted of treason and collaboration, and sentenced to death in August 1945; sentence commuted to life PHIPPS, Sir Eric—British Ambassador to Germany, 1933–1937 (succeeded by Henderson); to France 1937–1939. pp. 1497, 1501.

POHL, Oswald—Chief of the SS Economics and Administration Head Office (WVHA); Ministerial Director in Reich Ministry of Interior; SS Obergruppenfuehrer and General of Waffen SS; member of Board of Directors of Golleschauer Portland Zement. pp. 1128–1125, 1127, 1128, 1300–1302, 1304–1306, 1310, 1315, 1580–1605.

POPITZ, Johannes—Prussian Prime Minister of Finance, 1933–1934; a leading civilian member of the resistance movement; after failure of 20 July 1944 attempt, was arrested and tried before the People's Court; executed, February 1945. pp. 1554, 1568.

POTOCKI, Jerzy, Count—Polish diplomat who was aide-de-camp to Marshal Pilsudski, 1920; Senator from Tarnopol, 1930; Polish Ambassador to Rome, March 1933; Ambassador to Turkey, 1933–1936; Ambassador to U.S. and also accredited to Cuba, 1936–1940; now retired. pp. 1194, 1399.

PUHL, Emil—Member of Board of Directors of Reichsbank, 1935–1945; Vice President of Reichsbank, 1939–1945. pp. 1585–1587, 1591.

QUIRNHEIM, Col. Merz von—German General Staff Officer and Chief of Staff to Olbricht; participant in 20 July 1944 attempt; executed that night without trial on orders of Fromm. p. 1270.

QUISLING, Vidkun—Major in Norwegian Army General Staff; Minister of Defense, 1931–1933; leader of Nationalist Party; collaborated with Germans in preparations for German invasion and led Nazi 5th column inside Norway; became Chief of Norwegian Government under Nazi occupation, April 1940; appointed Premier, February 1942; tried and convicted of treason, and executed by firing squad on 24 October 1945. pp. 1174, 1326–1331, 1542–1544.

RAEDER, Grand Admiral Erich—Commander-in-Chief of German Navy (OKM), 1935–1943 (succeeded by Doenitz); Admiral Inspector of Navy 1943–1945; awarded Golden Party Badge of Honor, 1937; member of Secret Cabinet Council, 1938; member of Cabinet with rank of Reich Minister as chief of OKM, until 1943. pp. 1089, 1113, 1213, 1326, 1437–1441, 1541, 1546.

RAHN, Rudolf—German diplomat stationed in Ankara, Lisbon, Paris, 1931–1942; German Minister in Tunis on special mission, 1942–1943; Ambassador to Italy, December 1943–May 1945 (succeeding Mackensen). pp. 1655, 1656, 1662–1664, 1667, 1671, 1674, 1675.

RAUFF, Walter—SS Standartenfuehrer (Colonel); Chief of the Technical Department in Amt II of RSHA, in charge of gas van operations, 1942; later in charge of various SS operations in Italy under Wolff, including execution of hostages. p. 1658.

REICHENAU, Field Marshal Walter von—Chief of Staff to Blomberg in War Ministry, 1933–1935; one of the earliest and most zealous converts to Nazism among high military officers; tank warfare expert; supported Hitler during Roehm crisis, June 1934; Commanding General of 7th Army Corps, 1935; Commander of 10th Army in Polish campaign, 1939; Commander of 6th Army during western campaign, 1940; succeeded Rundstedt in December 1941 as Commander of Army Group South in Russian campaign; died of unascertained causes in the field, January 1942. p. 1460.

REINECKE, General of Infantry Hermann—Chief of the General Department of OKW, 1943; Chief of Nazi Party Guidance Staff in OKW, 1943; Honorary Member of Special Senate of People's Tribunal; one of judges in trial of participants in 20 July 1944 attempt; one of most fanatic and vicious Nazis among the high military. pp. 1606–1621.

RENTHE-FINK, Cecil von—German Minister in Copenhagen, 1940–1942 (succeeded by Werner Best); Special Envoy to Vichy Government, 1944. p. 1542.

RIBBENTROP, Joachim “von”—German importer who joined Nazi Party in 1932 and helped obtain business leaders' support for Hitler; after 1933 became Hitler's adviser on foreign policy, largely on disarmament questions; Ambassador at Large, 1935, and negotiated Anglo-German Naval Agreement; German Ambassador in London, 1936–1938; negotiated Anti-Comintern and Tripartite (Axis) Pacts, 1937; Reich Minister for Foreign Affairs, 1938–1945 (succeeding Neurath); Member of Secret Cabinet Council, 1938–1945; SS Obergruppenfuehrer, member of the Reichstag, 1933–1945; through adoption by maiden Aunt, Gertrud, in 1925 obtained right to use prefix, “von.” pp. 1110, 1174, 1256, 1295, 1296, 1298, 1312, 1470, 1484, 1491, 1493, 1510, 1542, 1579, 1670, 1675.

RICHTHOFEN, Field Marshal Wolfram, Baron von—Served in Baron Manfred von Richthofen's famous Squadron in 1918; Chief of Staff of Condor Legion in Spain, 1936–1937; Commander of Condor Legion, 1938–May 1939; Commander of Air Fleet in Italy, 1943; Commander of 2d Air Fleet, April 1945. p. 1108.

RIETH, Kurt—German diplomat who served in Rome, 1922–1924, and Paris, 1924–1930; German Minister to Austria, 1931–1934 (succeeded by Papen); thereafter an official in the Foreign Office. pp. 1147–1149.

ROEHM, Capt. Ernst—One of earliest Nazi fighters and follower; co-founder of Nazi Party and SA; took part in 1923 Munich putsch; Supreme Commander of SA and one of Hitler's closest friends; played important part in bringing Hitler to power; member of Reich Cabinet with rank of Minister; with several hundred others, was executed without trial on Hitler's orders during blood purge, 30 June 1934, on charge of conspiracy to overthrow Government, but actually in order to enable Hitler to consolidate his personal power by removing and terrorizing opposition; (succeeded as Supreme Commander of SA by Victor Lutze). p. 1288.

ROETTIGER, Lt. Gen.—Chief of Staff of German 4th Panzer (tank) Army, which was engaged in Polish and Russian campaigns. pp. 1655, 1657, 1662, 1664, 1665, 1670, 1671.

ROMMEL, Field Marshal Erwin—As an early Nazi, was attached to Hitler's bodyguard; commanded Fuehrer's Headquarters in Austrian, Sudetenland, and Czechoslovakia occupations, and during Polish campaign of 1939; Commander of 7th Panzer Division in France, 1940; Commanding General of Afrika Corps, December 1941–May 1943 (known as the "Desert Fox"); Commander-in-Chief in Northern Italy, 1943; Commander of Army Group B in France, November 1943–July 1944; joined resistance movement, when convinced German victory impossible, at 11th hour was compromised after failure of 20 July 1944 attempt and forced to commit suicide under threats transmitted from Keitel, October 1944. pp. 1256, 1259–1271, 1639, 1650, 1651.

ROOSEVELT, Franklin Delano—Assistant Secretary of Navy, 1913–1920; unsuccessful candidate for Vice President on Democratic ticket with James M. Cox, 1920; Governor of N. Y. State, 1928–1932; 31st President of the United States and inaugurator of the "New Deal", 1933–1945; died on 12 April 1945. pp. 1194, 1200, 1232, 1247, 1250.

ROSENBERG, Alfred—First editor of Nazi newspaper, "Voelkischer Boebachter," 1921; participated in 1923 Munich putsch; appointed Hitler's private envoy in London, 1933; Reichsleiter and head of Nazi Party Office for Foreign Policy and Ideology, 1933; Reich Minister for the Occupied Eastern Territories, 1941; SA Obergruppenfuehrer; member of the Reichstag; publisher of Party periodical, "Monatshefte"; official Nazi philosopher; author of "The Myth of the 20th Century" and other involved treatises on Nazi doctrine. pp. 1139, 1140, 1245, 1256, 1326–1356, 1361, 1397, 1427, 1490.

RUGE, Gen. Otto—Chief of the Norwegian General Staff, 1932; Supreme Commander of Norwegian Army during German invasion, April 1940; same position, 1945–1946. p. 1545.

RUNDSTEDT, Field Marshal Karl Rudolf Gerd von—Senior ranking officer of German Army (next to Goering); Commanded army group in Sudeten campaign, 1938; retired October 1938; recalled in summer and 1939 and led Army Group South in Polish campaign; led Army Group A in French campaign, April 1940–June 1941; Commander of Army Group South (Ukraine) in Russia, June–December 1941; recalled for Army Group D in France and Low Countries, March 1942–July 1944; Commander-in-Chief West, July 1942; "relinquished" command as Commander-in-Chief West in July 1944 (succeeded by Kluge); one of judges in trial of participants in

- 20 July 1944 attempt; recalled to post of Commander-in-Chief West, September 1944; German commander during "Battle of the Bulge", December 1944; relieved of command, March 1945 (succeeded by Kesselring). pp. 1266, 1271, 1274, 1284-1286.
- SANJURJO, Gen.—One of Franco's lieutenants in Spanish Civil War; killed in airplane crash, 20 July 1936. p. 1506.
- SAUCKEL, Fritz—Plenipotentiary General for Manpower (in Four Year Plan), 1942-1945; Gaulieter of Thuringia, 1927-1945; Reich Defense Commissioner; Reich Governor of Thuringia, 1933-1945; SS Obergruppenfuehrer, 1942-1945; SA Obergruppenfuehrer, 1937-1945; member of the Reichstag, 1933-1945. pp. 1122, 1128, 1383, 1387, 1395, 1441-1448, 1520, 1661, 1662.
- SAUR, Otto Karl—Head of Technical Division in Armaments and Ammunition Branch of Reich Ministry of Armaments and War Production, under Speer; Chief of Staff and Leader of Mechanical Engineers in Head Office of Nazi Party German Technical League; appointed Minister of Armaments in Hitler's political testament, 29 April 1945. p. 1112, 1594.
- SCHACHT, Hjalmar Greeley—German banker who secured support and contributions of industrialists in bringing Hitler to power, 1932-1933; President of Reichsbank, 1928-1939 (succeeded by Funk); Minister of Economics, 1934-1937 (succeeded by Funk); General Plenipotentiary for the War Economy, 1935-1937; Economic Director of Third Reich, 1936; author of system of "Mefo" financing which made possible German rearmament; Reich Minister without Portfolio, 1937-1943; arrested and interned in concentration camp in autumn, 1944; awarded Golden Party Badge of Honor, January 1937. pp. 1087, 1151-1154, 1461, 1554-1561, 1570, 1571.
- SCHELLENBERG, Walter—Chief of Amt VI of RSHA (Foreign Political Intelligence Service), 1941-1945; Chief of Amt Mil of RSHA (which took over military intelligence functions of Abwehr from OKW), 1944-1945; SS Obergruppenfuehrer and General of Police and of Waffen SS; on behalf of Himmler negotiated unsuccessfully with Bernadotte in early 1945 for peace with the Western Allies. pp. 1303, 1314, 1317, 1621-1634.
- SCHICKEDANZ, Arno—Chief of Staff in the Foreign Policy Office of the Nazi Party under Rosenberg; head of one of the Central Departments of the Reich Food Estate. p. 1329.
- SCHLEICHER, Col. Gen. Kurt von—Executive officer to Seeckt as head of the Reichswehr, 1924; Under Secretary in Ministry of War under Groener, 1928-May 1932; Minister of War in Papen cabinet, June-December 1932; Chancellor of Germany, December 1932-January 1933 (succeeded by Hitler); murdered with his wife on 30 June 1934 during Roehm crisis. pp. 1410-1412, 1450-1452, 1454-1457, 1459, 1461, 1462, 1465-1467, 1547.
- SCHMAUSER, Ernst Heinrich—SS Obergruppenfuehrer and General of Waffen SS; Higher SS and Police Fuehrer Southeast (8th Military District). p. 1600.
- SCHMIDT, Guido—Foreign Minister of Austria in Schuschnigg government, 1936; long-time apostle of Austrian union with Germany; negotiated and signed on behalf of Austria the Austro-German Accord of 11 July 1936; present with Schusschnigg at Berchtesgaden on 12 February 1938 when Hitler delivered ultimatum. pp. 1136, 1251, 1499, 1502.

SCHMUNDT, Lt. Gen. Rudolf—Chief Wehrmacht Adjutant to Hitler, 1938–1944 (succeeded by Burgdorf); kept official minutes of Fuehrer's conferences and kept Hitler's military diary; Chief of Army Personnel Office in OKH until 1944 (succeeded by Burgdorf); killed by bomb explosion at Fuehrer's Headquarters in Rastenburg, East Prussia, on 20 July 1944. pp. 1117–1120, 1257.

SCHOERNER, Field Marshal Ferdinand—Took part in Polish campaign, 1939; Commander of a Mountain Regiment in Alsace, 1940; participated in Greek campaign, 1941; Commander of an Army Corps under Dietl on Murmansk Front, 1941; Commander of an Army Corps on Eastern Front, 1942–1943; Commander-in-Chief of Army Group A on Eastern Front, March–May 1944; Commander of Army Group South Ukraine on Eastern Front, May–July 1944; Chief of Nazi Party Guidance Staff for the Army, 1944 (succeeding Reinecke); Commander-in-Chief of Army Group Kurland on Eastern Front, July 1944–January 1945; Commander-in-Chief of Army Group Center on Eastern Front and temporary Commander-in-Chief of whole Eastern Front, February 1945; continued fighting in Bohemia after Germany's surrender in May 1945; known as a Nazi general; appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Army in Hitler's political testament, 29 April 1945. p. 1639.

SCHROEDER, Kurt, Baron von—Leading German banker who helped bring Hitler to power and contributed to Nazi Party; partner in J. H. Stein banking firm, Cologne; director of numerous industrial enterprises, including Thyssen Hytte, A.G.; President of Regional Economic Chamber for Cologne-Aachen; head of Economic Group Private Banks. pp. 1178, 1453, 1454, 1597, 1599.

SCHULENBURG, Friedrich Werner, Count von der—German Ambassador to the Soviet Union, 1934–1941; formerly Minister to Iran and to Rumania; joined resistance movement on return from Russia; advocate of German rapprochement with Russia; was slated to become Foreign Minister in new government after Nazis were overthrown if surrender negotiations were first undertaken with Russia; arrested and executed after failure of 20 July 1944 attempt. p. 1188.

SCHUSSCHNIGG, Kurt von—Member of Austrian Parliament, 1927; Minister for Justice in Dollfuss cabinet, 1932; Chancellor of Austria, 1934 (succeeding Dollfuss), until March 1938, when he was ousted by Nazis after Anschluss (replaced by Seyss-Inquart); imprisoned in concentration camp by Nazis, 1938–1945. pp. 1130–1135, 1149, 1150, 1221, 1467, 1469, 1471–1474, 1499, 1501, 1502, 1508.

SCHWERIN von KROSIGK, Lutz, Count—Reich Minister of Finance in Papen, Schleicher, and Hitler governments, 1932–

1945; appointed Minister of Finance in Hitler's political testament, 29 April 1945, and served as such in Doenitz's government until surrender on 7 May 1945. pp. 1087, 1137, 1632.

SEECKT, Col. Gen. Hans von—Commander-in-Chief of German Army, 1920–1926; creator of the New German postwar Reichswehr (professional army of 100,000 men); father of blitzkrieg theory of warfare carried on by small, highly trained, mobile and armored units in place of ponderous non-professional mass armies; died on 27 December 1936. pp. 1547, 1552.

SELDTE, Franz—Reich Minister of Labor, 1933; Labor Minister of Prussia; member of the Reichstag; SA Obergruppenfuehrer; former leader of the Stahlhelm (organization of ex-servicemen which was largely taken into the SA in 1933.) p. 1387.

SEYSS-INQUART, Arthur—Austrian lawyer who was Nazi sympathizer and worked for Aschluss; appointed Councillor of State by Schusschnigg, May 1937, to appease Austrian Nazis; appointed Minister of Interior and Security on Hitler's demand, February 1938; Post-Anschluss Chancellor of Austria, 11–15 March 1938; Reich Governor of Ostmark (Austria), 15 March 1938–1 May 1939; Reich Minister without Portfolio, May–September 1939; Chief of Civil Administration of South Poland, September 1939; Deputy Governor General of Occupied Poland under Hans Frank, October 1939–May 1940; Reich Commissioner for Occupied Netherlands, May 1940–1945; SS Obergruppenfuehrer, 1938–1945; member of the Reichstag, 1938–1945; member of Reich Cabinet, May 1939–1945; appointed Foreign Minister in Hitler's political testament, 29 April 1945. pp. 1131–1134, 1467, 1468, 1487, 1488, 1502.

SIMON, Sir John Allsebrook (First Viscount of Stackpole Elidor, 1940)—British Conservative Party member who was Solicitor General, 1910–1913; Attorney General, with seat in Cabinet, 1913–1915; Secretary of State for Home Affairs, 1915–1916; Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 1931–1935; Secretary of State for Home Affairs and Deputy Leader of the House of Commons, 1935–1937; Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1937–1940; Lord Chancellor, 1940–1945. p. 1175.

SIMOVIC, Gen. T. Dushan—Yugoslav officer who was Commander-in-Chief of Air Force, 1936–1938 and 1940; Chief of General Staff, 1938–1939; led Coup d'etat in Belgrade, 27 March 1941, against regime of Prince Paul and against Yugoslav participation in war on side of Axis; Prime Minister of Yugoslavia, Minister of Interior, Minister for Air Force and Navy, Deputy Minister for War, and Commander-in-Chief of Yugoslav Armed Forces, 1941–1942. pp. 1183, 1192.

SKORZENY, Otto—Chief of Group S in Amt VI of RSHA under Schellenberg, 1943; daring and ruthless SS Colonel who rescued Mussolini in October 1943; reported to have led group who infiltrated behind American lines to kidnap and assassinate high personages, including Eisenhower; entrusted by Himmler with task of tracking down conspirators in 20 July 1944 attempt; in charge of SS terrorist and sabotage bands; kidnapped Horthy's son, 1944. pp. 1314, 1633.

SPEER, Albert—German architect who designed decorations for Party rallies and various public buildings constructed by Nazis; Inspector General for Rebuilding of Berlin, 1937; Prussian State Councillor, 1938; Reich Minister for Armaments and War Production and head of Organization Todt (succeeding Todt), February 1942–1945; General Plenipotentiary for Armaments in Four Year Plan, 1942–1945; Head of Armaments Office of German High Command, 1942–1945; member of Central Planning Board, Reichsleiter and Chief of the Nazi Party Technical Office; member of the Reichstag; awarded Golden Party Badge of Honor; broke with Hitler over continuation of war in early 1945 and refused to carry out Hitler's orders to destroy factories and scorch the earth; planned to assassinate Hitler by introducing poison gas into ventilating system of the Fuehrer's air-raid bunker, but was unable to carry out plan. pp. 1087, 1112, 1113, 1121, 11277, 1128, 1291, 1292, 1298, 1382, 1580, 1581, 1592—1595, 1620, 1621.

SPEIDEL, Lt. Gen. Hans—Chief of Staff of Army Group B on Western Front under Rommel, 1944; arrested by the Gestapo after 20 July 1944; freed at end of war. p. 1267.

SPERRLE, Field Marshal Hugo—Commander of Condor Legion in Spain, 1936–1937; Commander "West", 1939; Commander of 3rd Air Fleet, 1939–1944; participated in Western campaign, 1940; in charge of air operations against Great Britain, 1940–1941. p. 1635.

STALIN, Josef Visarionovitch Dzhngashvili—Generalissimo and Premier of Soviet Union; Chairman of Council of People's Commissars; Secretary of All-Union Communist Party; member of Political Bureau of Central Committee of Party (Politburo); Commander-in-Chief of Soviet Armed Forces and Army; President of the Council of Ministers. pp. 1110, 1187, 1189, 1190, 1192, 1194, 1204, 1228, 1243, 1249.

STAUFFENBERG, Col. Claus Schenk, Count von—Chief of Staff of Replacement Training Army under Fromm, and liaison officer between that army and Hitler's Headquarters, 1944; active participant in resistance movement; set off the bomb at Hitler's Headquarters in Rastenburg, East Prussia, 20 July 1944; executed without trial on orders of Fromm that night in Berlin. p. 1270.

STINNES, Hugo—Leading German publisher and Ruhr industrialist who supported Nazis and helped Hitler come to power; through widely ramified holdings controlled an industrial empire; chairman of board of directors of Muelheimer-Bergwerk-Verein; director of numerous other heavy industries. p. 1524.

STREICHER, Julius—Editor and publisher of "Der Stuermer", 1922–1933; thereafter publisher and owner; former Nurnberg school teacher who formed a Party called the German Socialist Party, whose chief policy was anti-Semitism, and delivered it to Hitler in 1922; thereafter became Nazi agitator and member of Party; Gauleiter of Franconia, 1925–1940, when he was dismissed by Hitler; member of the Reichstag, 1933–1945; SA Obergruppenfuehrer; publisher of daily newspaper, "Fraen-

- kische Tageszeitung," 1933-1945; known as Germany's No. 1 Jew-baiter. pp. 1239, 1284, 1420-1437.
- STRESEMANN, Gustav—Head of German National Liberal Party (middle-of-the-road) who was Chancellor of Germany, August-November 1923; Foreign Minister, 1923-1920; outstanding political leader during Weimar Republic; died in October 1929. p. 1566.
- STUELPNAGEL, General of Infantry Heinrich von—Commander of 17th German Army on Eastern Front, February-October 1941; Military Commander in Occupied France, 1942-1944 (succeeding his cousin Otto, who served 1940-1942); was informed in advance of 20 July 1944 attempt and supported it by arresting Nazi and SS leaders under his command in Paris but was compromised by vacillation of Kluge, his superior; ordered to Berlin, he stopped en route at Verdun and attempted to shoot himself but succeeded only in wounding and blinding himself; he was taken to a hospital, tortured, and strangled to death. pp. 1260, 1568, 1570, 1571.
- STUMPFF, Col. Gen. Hans-Juergen—Head of Personnel Department of Luftwaffe, 1933-1937; Chief of General Staff of Luftwaffe, 1937; Chief of Air Defense, February 1939; Commander of 1st Air Fleet, 1940; Commander of 5th Air Fleet in Norway and Finland, 1940-1945; Commander-in-Chief of Air Fleet "Reich", 1944-1945; member of the People's Tribunal. p. 1545.
- SZTOJAJ, Field Marshal Doeme—Former Austro-Hungarian officer who was Hungarian Minister in Berlin; on German occupation of Hungary, March 1944, became Premier and Foreign Minister of puppet cabinet which fell on 29 August 1944 (succeeded by Col. Lakatos). p. 1210.
- TERBOVEN, Josef—took part in Munich putsch, 1923; leader of SA and Nazi Party in Essen, 1925; Gauleiter of Essen, 1928-1945; Head of Rhine Province, 1936; President of 2 large Thyssen industrial concerns, 1940; Reich Commissioner for Occupied Norway, 1940-1945; SS Gruppenfuehrer; member of the Reichstag; Prussian State Councillor; committed suicide in Norway, May 1945. pp. 1290, 1327, 1330, 1544.
- THOMAS, General of Infantry Georg—Professional German officer who was for long time liaison man between industry and army; Chief of Economy and Armaments Division of OKW; member of the Armaments Council; Director of the Herman Goering Works, Continental Oil, United Aluminum Works, and other industries; founded and headed Armaments Division of Ministry of Armaments until 1942; one of early military leaders of underground, and only survivor of ringleaders; after failure of 20 July 1944 attempt was sent to a concentration camp; liberated by Allied forces, April 1945. pp. 1568-1571.
- THYSSEN, Fritz—Ruhr steel magnate whose financial backing helped Hitler come to power; President of the Reichsverbaend der Industrie; chief shareholder of Vereinigte Stahlwerke (German steel trust); lost out to his competitors, Friedrich Flick and Hermann Goering Works; member of the Reichstag; Prussian State Councillor; fled from Germany in 1939. pp. 1483, 1484.

TIMOSHENKO, Marshal Semyon Konstantinovich—Marshal and Hero of Soviet Union; member of Supreme Soviet of USSR; Soviet Commander-in-Chief on Western Front, July–November 1941; People's Commissar of Defense, May 1940–June 1941; in command of operations on south and southwest fronts, 1941–1942, on northern front, 1943, on 2nd and 3rd Ukrainian fronts, 1944; member of Central Committee of All-Union Communist Party since 1939; decorated for operations in Finland, 1939. pp. 1287.

TITO, Marshal (Josif Broz)—Prime Minister, Minister of National Defense, and Dictator of Yugoslavia, since 1945; served in Red Army, 1917–1921; returned to Yugoslavia and took prominent part in activity of illegal Yugoslav Communist Party; sentenced to 4 years imprisonment for conspiracy, 1923; recruited Yugoslavs for International Brigade in Spanish Civil War, 1936–1937; leader of Partisans in war against Germany, 1941–1945; Chairman of Committee of National Defense in Provisional Regime of Partisans established on 4 December 1943 in opposition to German-in-Exile in London; President of National Liberation Committee, 1943; assumed power on defeat and withdrawal of German troops from Yugoslavia, March 1945. pp. 1637–1639.

TODT, Prof. Dr. Fritz—Reich Minister of Munitions, 1940–1941; Minister of Armaments and War Production on creation of ministry, 1941; head of Organization Todt (OT) (labor battalions which built fortifications and repaired bridges and roads in rear of army); General Deputy for Building and Construction in Four Year Plan; Reichsleiter; as Inspector General of Road Construction, built network of autobahns (super-highways); constructed Siegfried Line ("Westwall") opposite Maginot Line, and commenced building of Ostwall as counter to the Stalin line in the East; killed in airplane crash, 1942, and succeeded in all his offices by Speer. pp. 1113, 1298.

VANSITTART, Sir Robert Gilbert (1st Baron of Denham, 1941)—British diplomat stationed in various capitals, 1902–1930; Permanent Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 1930–1938; Chief Diplomatic Adviser to Foreign Secretary, 1938–1941; Privy Councillor, 1940; one of leading British statesmen, who warned against rising menace of Hitler's pan-Germanism in 1930's. p. 1215.

VICTOR EMMANUEL III—King of Italy (House of Savoy), 1900–1946; refused to halt Mussolini's march on Rome, October 1922, and invited him to head Italian Government; Emperor of Ethiopia, 1936, and King of Albania, 1939, as result of Italian conquests; abdicated on 9 May 1946 in favor of his son, Crown Prince Umberto; died in exile in Egypt, 28 December 1947. p. 1477.

VIETINGHOFF-SCHEEL, Col. Gen. Otto-Heinrich von—Commanded Panzer Division in Polish campaign, 1939; Commander of any Army Corps in French campaign, 1940; commanded an armored Army Corps which took active part in overrunning Serbia, 1941; Commander of 15th Army on Western Front, February 1942–August 1943; Commander of 10th Army and

- Army Group C in Italy, September 1943–April 1945; Commander-in-Chief South, April 1945 (succeeding Kesselring); with Wolff, negotiated unconditional surrender of all German forces in Italy, April 1945. pp. 1648, 1655, 1656, 1662, 1664.
- WAECHTER, Gustav—Former Viennese dentist who was leader of putsch in which Dollfuss was assassinated, July 1934; escaped to Hungary with false papers issued by Himmler; reached Berlin, where helped plan invasion of Austria; returned to Vienna in 1938 and practiced law; appointed District Governor of Lwow in General Government of Poland under Hans Frank, 1939–1945; SS Gruppenfuehrer. p. 1661.
- WAGNER, General of Artillery Eduard—Quartermaster General of German Army; one of leading military participants in resistance movement from its beginning; took part in 20 July 1944 plot and was executed thereafter. pp. 1554, 1559, 1560, 1568, 1571.
- WAGNER, Josef—Reich Price Commissioner; Gauleiter and Governor of Silesia until 1940, when dismissed by Hitler for insufficient radicalism; was thought to be implicated in affair of 20 July 1944 and executed early in 1945; (not to be confused with Robert Wagner, old-time Nazi and Gauleiter of Baden). p. 1443.
- WARLIMONT, Lt. Gen. Walter—Deputy Chief of the Armed Forces Operations Staff (OKW) under Jodl, and head of Joint Planning Staff in that office in charge of strategic planning and plans for future operations, until 1944. pp. 1312, 1313, 1319, 1320, 1322, 1560, 1608, 1617, 1634–1640.
- WEIDLING, Lt. Gen. Helmuth—Commander of 86th Infantry Division engaged on central sector of Russian front, 1941–1945. pp. 1290, 1291.
- WENCK, Maj. Gen. Walter—Commander of 12th Army on Eastern Front, April–May 1945; was fighting on Elbe, southwest of Berlin, during last days before capture of Berlin; was ordered by Hitler to come to relief of Berlin and the Fuehrer's Headquarters but was unable to do so because of shattered condition of his forces. pp. 1277–1283.
- WESTHOFF, Maj. Gen. Adolf—Chief of the Prisoner of War Information Bureau. pp. 1321, 1641–1647.
- WESTPHAL, Maj. Gen. Siegfried—Chief of Staff to Kesselring; appointed Chief of Staff to Rundstedt after purge following 20 July 1944 attempt. pp. 1647–1652.
- WILSON, Sir Horace John—British high civil servant who was Permanent Secretary in Ministry of Labor, 1921–1930; Chief Industrial Adviser to H. M. Government, 1930–1939; seconded to the Treasury for service with the Prime Minister, 1935; as confidential adviser to Chamberlain, was his companion and emissary in conferences with Hitler at Berchtesgaden, Godesberg, and Munich in September 1938; Permanent Secretary of H. M. Treasury and official head of H. M. Civil Service, 1939–1942. pp. 1251, 1253, 1254.
- WINKLER, Hermann—German industrialist and former democratic member of Prussian Parliament who became Nazi in - 1933 and assisted Amann in nazifying the German press; acted as intermediary between publishers and Ministry of Propaganda, of which he was official; also assisted Goebbels in nazi-fying German film industry. pp. 1524-1526, 1530.

- WINTER, Lt. Gen. Paul—Deputy Chief of Armed Forces Operations Staff (OKW) under Jodl (succeeding Warlimont), September 1944-May 1945. p. 1276.
- WITT, Fritz—SS Oberfuehrer (Colonel) who was Chief of Staff to Wolff in Italy, 1943-1945; formerly Commander of SS Division "Hitler Jugend." p. 1655.
- WITZLEBEN, Field Marshal Erwin von—Commander of Berlin Military District, 1938; retired 1940; one of earliest and leading military members of underground; was slated to take general command of all German armed forces and direct command of army after assassination of Hitler and overthrow of Nazi regime; after failure of 20 July 1944 attempt, was tried before People's Court in first trial of conspirators, with Hoepner and others; executed in August 1944. pp. 1270, 1551-1553, 1555, 1557, 1559-1561.
- WOLFF, Karl—SS Obergruppenfuehrer and General of Waffen SS at Fuehrer's Headquarters; Chief of Personal Staff of Reichsfuehrer SS (Himmler); Himmler's liaison officer with Hitler's headquarters until 1944 (succeeded by Fegelein); Personal Adjutant to Himmler, 1941; Chief SS and Police Commander in Italy, September 1943; founder and commander of Italian SS Legion, February 1945; with Vietinghoff, negotiated unconditional surrender of all German forces in Italy, April 1945. pp. 1205, 1206, 1575, 1598, 1599, 1652-1677.

★ U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1948 —768060